

SAVITRI DEVI

CONTENTS

ALL ILLUSTRATIONS APPEAR AS AN INSERT FOLLOWING PAGE 80.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS vii

INTRODUCTION: "Discovered Alive in India: Hitler's Guru!"	1
1. Hellas and Judah	7
2. Aryavarta	26
3. Hindu Nationalism	43
4. The Nazi Brahmin	64
5. The Duce of Bengal	77
6. Akhnaton and Animal Rights	92
7. The Hitler Avatar	109
8. Defiance	126
9. Pilgrimage	147
10. The ODESSA Connection	169
11. Inside the Neo-Nazi International	187
12. Last Years and Legacy: Nazis, Greens, and the New Age	210

NOTES AND REFERENCES	233
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE	251
INDEX	255
ABOUT THE AUTHOR	269

INTRODUCTION

“Discovered Alive in India: Hitler’s Guru!”

The young German sat on the threadbare sofa listening to the words of the old woman before him. Through windows opening onto a balcony, shafts of dust-flecked sunlight shone into the darkened space of her humble, spartanly furnished room. Outside the strange, heady tumult of India resounded in the full glare of the midday heat. All around he could hear the street sounds and raucous, bustling squalor of this back alley in Delhi. Occasionally, her narrative was interrupted by the songs of the exotic birds she kept in her room and the young man was distracted by the sudden darting movement of the many cats, her inseparable companions, that lay at her feet or dozed out on the balcony in the warm air.

His attention fixed on the worn and crinkled face of the old woman as she carefully chose her words to tell the story of her life. She was dressed in the fashion of Indian women, wearing a loose white sari and a thin cotton shift over her shoulders. Soft gray hair framed her high forehead and was gathered behind her ears. While her brow was barely lined, her cheeks, chin, and neck blurred in a mass of furrows and wrinkles. Her lips were thin, and her mouth looked twisted, pointing downward at the right side. But it was her eyes that held him. Her eyes burned with a strange luminous quality, the light of inner vision and missionary zeal. But he also noticed that the left eye stared with a pained expression, while the right appeared tired and liquid, and he remembered with a start that she was now almost blind with cataracts.

The old woman’s name was Savitri Devi and the young man had traveled all the way from Frankfurt to find her in this small bare room in old India and to hear in her own words the story of her sacred mission for Hitler and Nazism. This elderly and infirm prophetess of Aryan revival, a philosopher of Hitler's cosmic purpose and Nazi pilgrim in the ruins of the German Reich at the end of the Second World War, had lived for years in poverty and obscurity in Calcutta and Delhi. Now in November 1978, at the end of a long life devoted to the Aryan cause, she had found a new publisher.

In late 1982 Ernst Zündel, the founder-proprietor of the neo-Nazi Samisdat Publishers in Toronto, publicized the availability of a set of five two-hour cassettes of live interviews with Savitri Devi and a brand-new edition of her out-of-print classic The Lightning and the Sun (1958). The notice was mailed worldwide on card flyers and it is worth quoting in its breathless entirety:

THE HITLER CULT REVEALED. Discovered alive in India: Hitler's guru! For serious students of the occult: You can now purchase the complete set of tape cassette recorded, live interviews with Hitler guru Savitri Devi at her home in India. Hear in her own words the narration of a prophetic pilgrimage along the edge of the cosmic abyss. Watch the clouds of evil scatter under the lightning of Cosmic Justice and the sun of Cosmic Truth.

Read her shocking and most recently published manuscript, "The Lightning and the Sun," which exposes the tangled roots of Nazism for all to see. Discover through her the secret Nazi pyramid connection with Pharaoh Akhnaton and the ancient cult of the sun. Learn the real significance of Genghis Khan's evil role in history, his incredible significance in the present. Discover the hidden springs of Hitler's manic will to power, his mystical bond with the dark forces of time and destiny. Pursue the outlines of evil in its awesome cosmic context.

Decipher now the encoded workings of the Nazi mind. Perceive how Hitler saw the workings of the universe through: Human sacrifice. Vegetarianism. Aryanism. The cyclic view of history. The children of violence. The will to survive and to conquer. The seat of truth. Gods on earth. Kalki, the avenger.

Were ancient sanskrit laws of the universe compiled in the Bhagavad Gita the secret source of Nazi strength? The amazing answers to these riddles are now at hand. Read them in "The Lightning and the Sun," Hitler guru Savitri Devi's huge, illustrated 448 page illumination of occult Nazi wisdom and prophecy.¹

The Samisdat publicity was a resounding finale to a long and eventful life, begun early in the century in the beautiful, old walled city of Lyons.

* * *

When I first read these lines on the card flyer, I knew very little of Savitri Devi. But Samisdat Publishers was known to me as a far-right press owned by Ernst Zündel, notorious for the publication in 1974 of the first English-language translation of The Auschwitz Lie, a short book that denied the very fact of the Holocaust. However, the Samisdat catalogue mingled efforts to glorify the Third Reich, minimize war crimes, and deny the extermination of the Jews with odd books about UFOs, incredible German secret weapons, and postwar Nazi bases in Antarctica. Ernst Zündel clearly offered these topics as a potent myth of apocalyptic Nazi revival backed by astonishing resources. This myth might appeal to an older generation of unrepentant Nazis seeking imaginative relief from the division of Germany since 1945. At the same time it introduced a young generation of Germans to the idea of the Third Reich's achievement and technological superiority against a backdrop of neo-Nazi science fiction.

Samisdat's presentation of Savitri Devi was evidently part of this strategy designed to entice new audiences with the neo-Nazi message. Ancient mythology and pyramid secrets, Eastern religion, vegetarianism, and Green ideas—the very currency of the burgeoning New Age with its interest in exotic religion, spiritual truths, and a worship of nature—could be exploited as bait for the young, unwary, or simply curious. By the late 1970s the historical experience of the Third Reich was quickly receding into the past. As popular literature and films ably demonstrated, Nazism was becoming something mythical, even fantastic and also plastic, that could be molded and combined with novel associations and thereby given new meanings. By republishing the work of Savitri Devi, Zündel aimed to create a new cultic interest in Hitler, linking him to ancient mysteries, the world of nature, and powerful religious symbols drawn from the Orient.

Her ideas have since built unlikely bridges between neo-Nazism and the New Age. Savitri Devi viewed nature in the Hindu fashion, as a violent pageant of creation and destruction in which man held no special rights. A cloyingly sentimental love of animals stood in marked contrast to her misanthropic contempt for non-Aryan humans, the weak, and infirm. Himmler and Rosenberg, among other leading Nazis, also combined a concern for animals with their monstrous blueprints to eliminate all “unworthy” human life. The Impeachment of Man (1959), her book devoted to a thoroughgoing rejection of the “man-centered creeds” of Judaism and Christianity, was republished by the far-right Noontide Press in America in 1991. Here the brutality of Social Darwinism meets both the Green cult of nature and the antisocial excesses of “animal rights” activists. Again, the amoral worship of beauty and force implicit in Nazi thinking finds new alliances with Hinduism, the cult of Shiva, and Deep Ecology, that radical current of ecological thought that condemns modern man as the scourge of nature.

Savitri Devi was a Frenchwoman of Greek-English birth who had become an admirer of German National Socialism in the late 1920s and was obsessed by the Aryan myth. Deeply impressed by its racial heritage and caste system, she had emigrated to India in the early 1930s to acquaint herself at firsthand with what she regarded as the cradle of the Aryan race. There she spent the years of the Third Reich and the Second World War in expectation of a global Axis victory, after which she and her Brahmin husband expected to help in the establishment of a racial New Order in the subcontinent.

During these years Savitri Devi elaborated an extraordinary synthesis of Hindu religion and Nordic racial ideology involving the polar origin of the Aryans, the cycle of the ages, and the incarnation of the last avatar of Vishnu in Adolf Hitler. She regarded the Third Reich as “the holy Land of the West, the Stronghold of regenerate Aryandom.” Her ideas were actually representative of a certain section of high-caste Brahmin Indian society that hated the Raj and was impressed by Hitler’s dramatic challenge of British imperial power. Such Indians were fascinated by the Nazi swastika—a holy Indian symbol—and fondly recalled the German tradition of Sanskrit scholarship since the early nineteenth century. However, it seemed unlikely that these ideas, so foreign to the actuality of National Socialism, could ever find supporters in the West.

The situation changed with the total defeat and collapse of the Third Reich in 1945. In its wake Savitri Devi pursued a long and busy career as a neo-Nazi apologist and ideologue in Europe. She was arrested by the British occupational forces in Germany for Nazi propaganda activities and imprisoned. Her extravagant Hitler cult, her Hindu-Nordicist doctrine of the Aryan race, and unswerving loyalty to the Nazi cause found numerous devotees among her fellow prisoners and demoralized Germans. After her release she befriended leading personalities of the Nazi regime such as the air ace Hans-Ulrich Rudel and the commando leader Otto Skorzeny, who both played an active role in maintaining a global Nazi support network. She met with Nazi émigrés and fugitives in Spain, Egypt, and the Middle East. She wrote books hymning the Third Reich and National Socialism, accounts of her propaganda campaign and detention, and a highly charged emotional memoir of her "pilgrimage" to Hitler shrines and other places of Nazi association in Austria and Germany during the 1950s.

Savitri Devi, a foreigner who had not even directly experienced life under National Socialism, supplied a new religious cult for the vanished Führer and an international rationale for Nazi-Aryan ideology that effectively transcended the narrow realities of German nationalism and anti-Semitism in the Third Reich. Defeated and humiliated Germans who could neither grasp the disgrace of their country nor accept the vilification of an idolized leader found comfort in Savitri Devi's rapturous approval. Hardened practitioners of Nazi terror and persecution were flattered by her doctrine of universal Aryan mission. The prosaic and gruesome aspects of Nazi practice during the years of tyranny yielded before a mythological tableau in which Hitler was deified and his regime invested with new religious significance.

Nor was her appeal confined to die-hard German Nazis and survivors of the Third Reich. The existence of small but persistent neofascist and neo-Nazi movements after 1945 in Europe, the United States, and South America is a well-documented fact. While these tiny groups and parties continue to peddle racism, anti-Semitism, and appeals for an authoritarian state, the universal postwar condemnation of Hitler and National Socialism is a major obstacle to their ever gaining popular acceptance. The extermination of European Jewry has become the horrific hallmark of the Third Reich, forever tainting any attempts to rehabilitate National Socialist ideology. By her outright inversion of this accepted moral scheme, Savitri Devi became a heroine of the neo-Nazi scene. In emotionally laden prose she transformed the negative attributes of Nazism into a religious cult of cosmic significance. The Third Reich was presented as a rehearsal for the Aryan paradise, and Adolf Hitler was celebrated as an avatar, a supernatural figure whose intervention in the cycle of the ages was essential to the restoration of the Golden Age.

Powerful ideas of anti-Semitism as a form of world-rejecting gnosis, Aryan paganism as a global religion of white supremacism, and Hitler as a divine being within a cosmic order together compose an unholy theology of the Aryan myth. Seen in this light, neo-Nazism has all the characteristics of an international sect with a religious cult. There are devotional practices, initiates and martyrs, prophecies and millennial expectations, and even relics. By entering the strange world of Savitri Devi, we catch a glimpse of the fatal attraction of neo-Nazism and Hitler cults for their followers. Above all, we may understand their perennial capacity to transmute religious energies and hopes for cultural revival into anger and violence.

Through her divinization of Hitler and National Socialism, Savitri Devi became a leading light of the international neo-Nazi underground from the early 1960s onward. She was a confidante of Colin Jordan, the flamboyant leader of the National Socialist Movement in Britain, and his henchman John Tyndall, who heads the British National Party today. She knew Lincoln Rockwell, the founder of the American Nazi Party, and in August 1962 she attended the notorious Cotswold Camp in Gloucestershire that acted as the founding meeting of the World Union of National Socialists (WUNS). In the late 1960s her books were reprinted in National Socialist World, the organ of the WUNS published by Lincoln Rockwell and William Pierce. In the pages of the magazine she was credited with a "mysterious and unfailing wisdom according to which Nature lives and creates: the impersonal wisdom of the primeval forest and of the ocean depths and of the spheres in the dark fields of space . . . [which Adolf Hitler made] the basis of a practical regeneration policy of worldwide scope."²

By the 1980s Savitri Devi had assumed the status of a cult figure herself on the neo-Nazi scene. Her eclectic ideas deriving from Hinduism, the myth of the Aryan race, Germanophilia, and adoration (the word is not too strong) for Adolf Hitler supplied a new mystique for that sinister minority of Nazi apologists in various countries around the world. Following her death in 1982, her ashes were placed in a Nazi shrine at Lincoln Rockwell's headquarters in Arlington, Virginia. Ernst Zündel, the German-Canadian publisher of Holocaust revisionism, sold her books and taped interviews in mass editions to young German neo-Nazis. Miguel Serrano, the former Chilean ambassador and pioneer of "Esoteric Hitlerism," paid fulsome tribute to her inspiration in his own books about the Hitler avatar. Nazi satanist groups and skinheads in Europe, America, and New Zealand cultivate her memory and ideas today. In Savitri Devi and her entourage one finds an articulate statement of the Hitler cult that defines the unholy theology of neo-Nazism.

1

HELLAS AND JUDAH

Savitri Devi was born Maximiani Portas on 30 September 1905 in Lyons. Her mother, Julia née Nash, came from Cornwall, one of two surviving daughters of one William Nash, an Englishman, who had married his first cousin. Her father was of mixed Mediterranean stock with an Italian mother from London and a Greek father who had acquired French citizenship on account of his residence in France.¹ Although Maximiani was a French national by birth, her early sympathies lay with Greece. Her father was a respected member of the sizeable Greek community in Lyons, and she enjoyed their company. Her given name Maximiani, the female form of Maximian, a name borne by several Roman emperors including Marcus Aurelius, also reinforced her own sense of Greek identity.

Her mixed ancestry and residence in an adoptive country was quite possibly a strong factor in her long quest for a true fatherland. In her youth Maximiani sought her roots in Greece, but later she embraced the idea of a supranational Aryan race, first in India and then in Germany, the country of her idol and exemplar, Adolf Hitler. Although her physical appearance was Mediterranean, she later comforted herself that she was of predominantly Nordic stock. Her maternal grandfather was the descendant of tenth-century Vikings from Jutland, while her father's Italian forebears came from Lombardy, a part of north Italy settled by the Germanic Langobard tribe during the migrations of the Dark Ages.²

Maximiani Portas was a willful and often insolent child with strong opinions. Her mother's English friends bored her with their endless conversation of relatives and illnesses, and this helped her form a negative image of England. France fared no better in her estimation. She was contemptuous of the French Revolution and the republican pride of the French. She regarded the ideals of equality, liberty, and fraternity as specious and was once punished at school for making an obscene gesture at the plaque displaying the Declaration of the Rights of Man. Above all, she had a great love of animals. From the age of five she voiced concern about man's cruelty to animals, animal experiments, circuses, and the fur trade. While still a schoolgirl, she abjured meat-eating and insisted that her mother prepare vegetarian food for her. The peasant torture of cats in France, a folk practice based on medieval superstition, disgusted her and turned her further against mankind.³ This special affection for animals and her feelings of misanthropy led her to mistrust and eventually reject the man-centered nature of Western beliefs and values. This attitude became the hallmark of her Weltanschauung.

During her adolescence she discovered the French poet Charles Leconte de Lisle (1818–1894), who had been elected to the Academy in 1886 in succession to Victor Hugo. Leconte de Lisle's own tragic view of the universe, his romantic colors always tinged with somber pessimism, strongly appealed to Maximiani. He regarded all religious symbols as fragments of a divine truth, but the profusion of faiths over time convinced him of the relative value and ultimate vanity of every doctrine. Beset by a sense of cosmic futility, Leconte de Lisle rejected Christianity and evoked the stoical heroism of barbarian and exotic peoples in his famous cycle Poèmes barbares (1862). He was also powerfully attracted to Hinduism, following the translation of its sacred texts in the 1840s.⁴ Maximiani felt a profound sympathy with Leconte de Lisle's view of life's fragility, the vanity of existence, and the illusion of the world. His romantic poems about the ancient Egyptians, the Scandinavians, Celts, and Hindus, their proud paganism, and heroic action yet final resignation in the face of death and oblivion confirmed her own aversion to Christianity and helped form her own fatalistic worldview. She continued to quote the verse of Leconte de Lisle throughout her life.

After the outbreak of World War I, Maximiani Portas soon found political reasons for rejecting England and France, while passionately defending their rivals and enemies. She detested the Allies for their treatment of Greece during the war. In August 1914 England and France had made valuable propaganda about the barbarian conduct of imperial Germany, which had invaded Belgium and thereby violated its neutrality. Young Maximiani regarded their protests as pure hypocrisy in light of their subsequent disregard for Greek sovereignty when the Entente (Britain, France, and Russia) landed troops in Greece and attempted to force its alliance. The constitutional crisis surrounding Greece's entry into the war and its ill-fated postwar occupation of Anatolia had a major bearing on Maximiani's profound sympathy for Greece and her burgeoning hatred of Britain and France during the 1920s.

During the war years a so-called National Schism prevailed in Greece between the pro-German King Constantine, who favored a policy of neutrality between the Entente and the Central Powers (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Ottoman Turkey), and Prime Minister Eleftherios Venizelos, who was an enthusiastic champion of Greece's traditional British connection. The king forced Venizelos's resignation on two occasions in 1915 over this dispute in policy, and in August 1916 a group of pro-Venizelos officers staged a coup against the royalist government. Meanwhile, French troops had first landed at Salonika in October 1915, and the Entente then intervened with a landing of British and French troops in Athens in November and December 1916 to back up its demands for weapons and for Entente access to the Macedonian front to aid Serbia against Austria-Hungary. After formally recognizing the Venizelos government, Britain and France mounted a ten-month blockade of those provinces of the kingdom that remained loyal to the king until Constantine gave up his throne and the Venizelos government was firmly installed in Athens in June 1917.⁵

The events in Greece were watched with mounting concern by the émigré community in Lyons, and opinion was often bitterly divided between loyalty to the king and support for the Entente. The Allied intervention in the domestic affairs of Greece, involving the deposition of the king, was understandably condemned by many Greeks as an intolerable interference with the sovereignty and neutrality of their country. As a young girl Maximiani harbored strong anti-Entente feelings and demonstrated them by chalking the slogan "A bas des Alliés. Vive l'Allemagne" on the wall of Lyons railway station in late 1916. She also vividly remembered reports of demonstrations in Constitution Square in Athens, when the royalist crowds protested against the Allied blockade and support of Venizelos against the king. Young Maximiani reviled the Allies for their treatment of Greece during the war, but her contempt increased after their betrayal of their former ally Venizelos and his imperial adventure in Anatolia in the period from 1919 to 1923.⁶

This Anatolian campaign had its roots in the Megali Idea, or Great Idea, the irredentist aspiration to absorb all the Greek communities of the declining Ottoman Empire into a single Greek state. These ambitions owed their inspiration to the former glories of the medieval Byzantine Empire, which had been the great power of Eastern Europe until its final conquest by the Ottoman Turks after the fall of Constantinople in 1453. After the Greek War of Independence in the 1820s, the idea of a neo-Byzantine Greater Greece held a magical appeal for many Greek nationalists. In 1844 the Greek statesman John Kolletis outlined this vision of a Greater Greece: "The Kingdom of Greece is not Greece. Greece constitutes only one part, the smallest and poorest. A Greek is not only a man who lives within this kingdom but also one who lives in Jannina, in Salonica, in Serres, in Adrianople, in Constantinople, in Smyrna, in Trebizond, in Crete, in Samos and in any land associated with Greek history or the Greek race. . . . There are two main centres of Hellenism: Athens, the capital of the Greek kingdom, and 'The City' [Constantinople], the dream and hope of all Greeks."⁷ These sentiments were often strongest among émigré Greeks due to their more acute sense of nationality. The Megali Idea was widely current among the Greeks of Lyons at the end of the Great War, and Maximiani rejoiced in its chauvinism and extravagant claims, not least the traditional last toast at dinners: "Let us go to Constantinople!"

Following the armistice of November 1918 and the proclamation of Allied victory, Venizelos was eager to reap rewards for his long-standing support of the Entente. He acted as Greece's chief negotiator at the Versailles peace conference, where his prime concern was the status of the Greek population of Asia Minor, hitherto part of Ottoman Turkey, which amounted to more than a million and a half persons. Venizelos's goal at Versailles was the incorporation of Smyrna (İzmir) and its hinterland within an independent Greek national state. By giving political expression to the Megali Idea, he hoped to increase his domestic popularity. Before the war there had been a Turkish majority in the Aydin province of Ottoman Turkey, which included the Smyrna region (950,000 Turks and 620,000 Greeks), but Venizelos speculated that a Greek province of Smyrna would attract a large influx of Greeks resident elsewhere in Asia Minor, which combined with the high birth rate of the Anatolian Greeks would soon give a substantial Greek majority in the region.⁸

The Greek annexation of Smyrna and its hinterland was accepted at Versailles, and the Greek occupation forces began to disembark at Smyrna under the protection of Allied warships in May 1919. However, the occupation was no easy matter; rival bands of Greek and Turkish guerrillas were soon fighting, and by the end of the summer there was already a strong revival of Turkish national feeling in Anatolia, which ultimately made the acclaimed Greek-Turkish Treaty of Sèvres in August 1920 a hollow truce. The Western powers also reacted with displeasure to the restoration of King Constantine in December 1920 and began to undermine the Greek advantage. In February 1921 the French and Italian governments weakened the Greek position in Asia Minor by their agreements with Mustafa Kemal, the leader of the Turkish nationalists. But Greece still expected British support for a further Greek offensive in Asia Minor, which was launched in March 1921. However, in April came the proclamation of an Allied policy of strict neutrality; Britain accordingly forbade any arms sales to the Greeks, while the French turned a blind eye to private sales to the Turkish nationalists. Because Greece had embarked on the occupation of Smyrna with Allied approval at Versailles, these developments appeared to the Greeks as the height of hypocrisy and double-dealing on the part of Britain and France.

Throughout 1921 and 1922 there was a growing realization in Greece that the Greek occupation in Asia Minor was no longer politically or militarily tenable. When Mustafa Kemal launched his major offensive in August 1922, the Turkish attack swiftly developed into a Greek rout, with the Greek forces retreating in chaos to Smyrna and the coast. On 8 September the Greek army evacuated the city and the Turkish army entered it the next day. Killing and looting soon began, followed by a full-scale massacre of the Christian population. As many as 30,000 Christians lost their lives and the Armenian, Greek, and Frankish quarters were destroyed by a great fire that raged unchecked through the city. A quarter of a million people fled to the waterfront, but the Allied ships in the harbor maintained a studied position of neutrality and neither help nor quarter was given to the hapless Greeks and Armenians. The scale of the debacle was inconceivable: within a few days the Greek army had withdrawn to the Greek islands and mainland and the 2,500-year Greek presence on the coast of Asia Minor had suddenly ended.

More than a million Greek refugees, many of them destitute, often with no possessions other than their holy icons, and a great number speaking no other language than Turkish, flooded into Athens, Thessalonica, and other cities on the Greek mainland. This enormous influx, of both rural peasants and middle-class merchants and traders, placed great strain on the social fabric and economy of a war-weary Greece that had already experienced six years of international hostilities. The population of Athens itself almost doubled between 1920 and 1928, with refugees living in wretched shantytowns all around the city that survived for many decades. The painful period of political and economic adjustment was difficult for all Greeks and lasted well into the late 1920s. This debacle signaled the absolute defeat of Greek territorial ambitions in Asia Minor and the final betrayal of the Megali Idea that had shone for a century on the Greek nationalist horizon.

By her own account, Maximiani had lived for the Megali Idea as a child and young girl. With its ignominious defeat, Greece seemed to her a martyr of all that was highest and most ideal in humanity. Greece had once been the fount of classical civilization with its emphasis on idealistic philosophy, aesthetic perfection, the attainment of physical and intellectual prowess. Now Greece was exhausted, its cities and meager farmland overwhelmed by the wave of Anatolian refugees, and its fond imperial hopes dashed by resurgent Turkish nationalism. In Maximiani's view, Allied treachery had led to the destruction of a Greek culture that had endured and flourished in Asia Minor throughout classical antiquity and the early Christian era. She was convinced that the French and British were the enemies of Greece. For the rest of her life she regarded the Allies' trumpeting of democracy and liberalism as so much cant and a mere pretext for the extension of their own political and commercial interests.

After the defeat of Germany, Maximiani's resentment of the Allies increasingly involved the demonstration of pro-German sympathies. In 1919 she and her family visited a POW camp near Lyons, where she proudly expressed her solidarity with a young German prisoner. When the Versailles Treaty was signed, she was repelled by the sight of French crowds in Lyons screaming their approval of the tough settlement and immense German reparations. Now that hostilities had ceased, these demands seemed intended only to humiliate a former enemy. She was also appalled by the French government's use of black Senegalese troops to occupy the Ruhr and to help enforce reparations under the terms of the treaty. Occasional reports in the French press of German resistance and its forceful suppression only served to increase her anger with the French. After the catastrophe in Anatolia, she saw no reason that she should support a settlement that favored the Allies after they had undermined the Treaty of Sèvres, which had been welcomed by the Greeks. She rejected the Versailles Treaty as an undue burden on Germany and noted the rise of revanchist movements including the National Socialists with approval. The Allies' conduct toward Greece remained all the while an important factor in her feelings of solidarity with defeated Germany.

After completing her secondary schooling, Maximiani Portas made her first visit to Greece in the second half of 1923. She was not yet eighteen years old and her head was full of wonderful ideas and the gilded memories of old Greek émigrés in Lyons. She sailed on a Greek steamer of the Piræus-Marseilles line and landed at the port in early August. She was soon made painfully aware of the recent disaster in Asia Minor by the severe hardships of the Anatolian refugees who were crowded into the poorer districts of the capital, Plaka, Kerameikos, and the shabby suburbs to the west of the Larissa railway station. She stayed at the "International Home," a hostel at 54 Leophoros Amalias, the thoroughfare that runs from the Arch of Hadrian past the Anglican Church of St. Paul to Syntagma (Constitution Square) along the eastern perimeter of the old-city quarter of Plaka, distinguished by its narrow streets, alleys, little squares, and long flights of steps spread around the footslopes of the great limestone crag of the Acropolis hill. Opposite the hostel across the Leophoros Amalias stood a large expanse of trees, shrubs, and colorful flower beds, extending as far north as the Old Parliament building. This was the National Garden, originally laid out by Queen Amalia, wife of the Bavarian King Otto of Greece (1832–1862), which offered the hostel residents a welcome relief from the hot and dusty confines of nearby Plaka.

Here in Greece after World War I, Maximiani began her lifelong odyssey toward the Aryan racial philosophy, which would lead her ultimately to India and the ruins of the Third Reich. As yet, however, she spoke only of "Hellenism," which she understood to be "a civilisation of iron, rooted in truth; a civilisation with all the virtues of the Ancient World, none of its weaknesses, and all the technical achievements of the modern age without modern hypocrisy, pettiness and moral squalor.”⁹

During the mild autumn days the young girl would wander among the dramatic ruins of ancient Athens. She often climbed the Acropolis, marveling at the massive fluted Doric columns and sculptured friezes of the Parthenon, its bleached white stone bathed in warm sunshine; the delicate roofed temple of the Erechteion with the Porch of the Caryatids, its entablature borne by six figures of maidens in place of columns; and the great marble surfaces of the Propylaea gateways, surmounted by residences, bastions, and defensive walls. The gleaming fragments of scattered masonry, capitals, friezes, and broken columns lay all around her, an eloquent testimony to the art, beauty, and vigor of the “Hellenism” she so admired.

Facing north, she could survey the expanse of the city, its crowded districts of traditional and modern buildings dotted with green hills, parkland, and squares. At her left the grassy slopes of the Arios Pagos, the famous Tribunal, ran down toward the Greek Agora and the disorderly ruins of the Stoa overlooked by the well-preserved Temple of Hephaistos on a scrubby knoll. Further still lay the tangled undergrowth of the Kerameikos cemetery with its great Dipylon gate, ruined walls, and scattered tombs in the midst of a rundown quarter. To her right, at the foot of the Acropolis rock, stood the Arch of Hadrian near her hostel, beside it the lofty columns of the Temple of Olympian Zeus on the gentle slopes of the Olympieion hill. Further east she saw the steep white marble terraces of the Stadion built for the first Olympic Games of modern times in 1896. Far away in the northeast she glimpsed the tiny whitewashed chapel of St. George perched high atop the dominant Lykabettos hill rising to more than 900 feet above the suburb of Kolonaki.

Maximiani was exalted by her view of Athens. The unparalleled ruins resplendent in the bright autumn sunshine, the ethereal landscape, and the deep-blue skies inspired her to forget her bitterness at the misery of postwar Greece and anger with the Western Allies. The beauty of Athens conjured a vision of its ancient society before her mind’s eye: the physical perfection of the slim and athletic Grecian youths, the order and simplicity of daily life, and the martial bearing and courage of the soldiers. She saw the merchants and townspeople in loose-fitting white garments going about their business on the con-courses of the Agora, where philosophers sat conversing on its low stone walls. Everywhere she perceived beauty, order, and light, an image of classical man in harmony with nature, creating admirable buildings and great public spaces. In her opinion, this noble culture of "Hellenism," "an out and out beautiful world of warriors and artists," could be the product only of a pure race. In due course, she would claim that Greece was the oldest Aryan nation in Europe, with its origins in the Nordic Mycenaean invasions of circa 1400 B.C.¹⁰

It is noteworthy that Savitri Devi's enthusiasm for Greece also reflected a vital and long-standing German tradition of philohellenism. Once the Bavarian Prince Otto had ascended the Greek throne, a busy traffic in culture and ideas flourished between Bavaria and Greece. Leopold von Klenze (1784–1864), the Bavarian court architect to King Ludwig I, had designed Munich's Ludwigstraße and Siegestor (triumphal arch) on neoclassical lines. He also planned the layout of the restored Greek capital and many other German and Danish architects supplied public buildings for the new Athens after centuries of Ottoman neglect and ruin.¹¹ This German-Greek cultural axis continued a German intellectual tradition dating from the late eighteenth century when Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717–1768) revived an appreciation of Greek art in German letters.¹² Savitri Devi's nascent Germanophilia was awakened in her ancestral country by German idealism made manifest in the very stones of Athens. When she finally visited Munich and saw Klenze's neoclassical Glyptothek and Propylaea (1846–1862) on the Königsplatz, she interpreted the nineteenth century exchange between Greece and Germany as proof of their common Aryan ancestry.

Years later, she would recall that she spent such a sunlit afternoon upon the Acropolis on 9 November 1923, the fateful day of Hitler's putsch, when he and his followers had attempted a coup against the Bavarian government and staged a march to the Feldherrnhalle in the center of Munich. The police successfully broke up the march, and sixteen martyrs of the early Nazi movement fell beneath a hail of bullets. When details of the incident were published in the world press the following day, there was some discussion over lunch at the "International Home" hostel. Maximiani admits that she did not yet connect Hitler with her own dream of a new racial order based on her view of classical Greek antiquity. However, she strongly sympathized with him as an enemy of the Allies on account of his contempt for the Versailles Treaty and saw a parallel between his nationalist idea of one state for all Germans and the Megali Idea among the Greeks. She engaged in a heated argument in defense of Hitler with the French manageress of the hostel.¹³

In early December she returned to France to commence her undergraduate studies in philosophy at Lyons in January 1924. Her academic courses embraced a wide range of humanities, and she was fortunate in being able to study under several renowned scholars. In June 1924 she passed her first university examination in psychology. After studying logic under Professor Edmond Goblot, she took papers in this subject in February 1925. She passed her third examination in ethics and sociology and submitted an extended essay on the subject of progress in June 1925. In 1926 she passed her finals for the M.A. degree (license-ès-lettres). Her outstanding results throughout her undergraduate studies encouraged her and her parents to consider a scholarly career at a French university. In this case it was necessary to take a higher doctoral degree, for which the candidate was required to submit two theses. The continuation of her studies also combined with a desire to deepen her knowledge of Greece, and she decided to work on a Greek subject for her shorter complementary thesis.

The memories of her first visit to Athens had remained undimmed throughout Maximiani Portas's undergraduate years, and her Greek nationalism continued to burgeon in the mid-1920s. She wrote herself that she "chose" Greece on the attainment of her majority in September 1926. Portas finally renounced French citizenship and formally acquired Greek nationality from the Greek consulate in Lyons in early 1928.¹⁴ After some preliminary studies in modern Greek history, she chose as the subject of her first thesis the life and thought of the pious educator, reformer, and philosopher Theophilos Kaïres (1784–1853).¹⁵ This research project happily necessitated her residence in Athens, and she traveled once again to Greece in the early months of 1928. As a postgraduate student, she chiefly frequented the University, the Academy, and the National Library, a fine trio of neoclassical buildings designed by the Hansen brothers of Copenhagen between 1839 and 1891 on Panepistimíou Street between Omonia and Syntagma. Among the rich holdings of the National Library she found an abundance of sources on her subject. She now settled into her new scholarly life at Athens and remained there for almost two years before returning to France in November 1929.

Hailed by his admirers as Greece's new Socrates, Theophilos Kaïres was a gifted scholar and teacher whose dedication and tireless efforts on behalf of his countrymen were widely acclaimed but ultimately repaid with controversy, persecution, and excommunication from the Greek Orthodox Church. Born on 19 October 1788 on the island of Andros, he showed early promise in schools on Patmos and Chios and was ordained a deacon at the age of eighteen. He continued his studies at the University of Pisa and in Paris between 1802 and 1810, returning to teach at the Cydonian Academy in Asia Minor. The reputation of this college was greatly enhanced by his activities there from 1812 until 1820. When the Greek War of Independence broke out in 1821, Kaïres fought under Prince Alexander Ypsilantis, receiving serious wounds in the expedition to Olympus. Following his recovery, he became the political representative of Andros and the Cycladic Islands in the National Assembly of the newly liberated country. However, in 1826 he conceived a project to assist the numerous orphans of the war, which became his life's work. After a successful fund-raising campaign among his circle of international acquaintance in Europe, Russia, and Asia Minor, he established an orphan asylum and educational institute on Andros. Kaïres's new foundation swiftly developed into one of the foremost schools of Hellenic education in the embryonic state beset by chaos and factional strife during its first years of independence.

In 1831 Count John Capodistrias, the first president of Greece, who had helped Kaïres with suggestions and funding, was assassinated, and the country lapsed once again into near anarchy. To stabilize the situation, the Allied Powers (Russia, Great Britain, and France) offered the crown of Greece to Prince Otto von Wittelsbach, the son of King Ludwig of Bavaria. In the late 1830s King Otto conferred honors and a senior appointment at the University of Athens upon Kaïres, but he courteously declined both. Immersed in his own educational project on Andros and enjoying widespread national popularity, Kaïres failed to see that such conduct could easily be interpreted by unsympathetic observers as political hostility to the new regime. His charismatic status as a teacher and the success of his school had aroused envy, and his enemies lost no time in exploiting the king's uncertainty regarding his person.

When it was learned that Kaïres was giving courses on the history of mankind and comparative religion and, moreover, his own variety of theology called Theoseveia, charges of unorthodox teaching were soon brought against him by the renowned theologian Constantinos Economous. These charges were groundless because Kaïres had not set himself up as religious teacher but lectured mainly on philosophy and history. However, the political faction opposed to him was quick to incite the clergy against him, and he was arrested in October 1839 and brought before the Holy Synod in Athens. Neither charged nor convicted, he was exiled for a period of reflection to a monastery on the island of Skiathos, where he endured neglect and ill-treatment at the hands of the ignorant monks. He was later detained on the island of Thera and formally excommunicated from the Greek Orthodox Church in November 1841. Finally released in 1842, Kaïres went into exile by way of Constantinople, Malta, Paris, and London, where he was able to meet many old friends and received great encouragement for his advocacy of educational freedom.

When the new constitution of 1844 granted freedom of conscience, Kaïres decided to return to Greece and resume teaching at his orphan asylum in July 1844. He was not to be granted a lengthy respite from persecution. Once his schoolfriend and patron, Minister John Kolletis, had died in 1847, his old enemy Economous unleashed a new wave of religious accusation against him. In December 1852 Kaïres was charged with having instituted a religion contrary to that recognized by the kingdom and with being a proselytizer of unorthodox teachings. His trial took place on the remote island of Syros, where he faced a hostile audience of prejudiced clerics and political opponents who quickly found him guilty and sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, seven years' probation, and a heavy fine. He was immediately confined in a filthy and damp cell. Weakened by a bout of pneumonia earlier in the year, Kaïres soon suffered a nervous collapse, exhaustion, and other complications. He died in prison on 10 January 1853.

During the two years (1928–1929) spent working on her thesis at Athens, Maximiani Portas had ample opportunity to immerse herself in the history and culture of her fatherland, both in the classical age and in the era of independence and nation building that formed the background of her subject. The theological content of her thesis also deepened Maximiani's contact with the Greek Orthodox Church, which she attended regularly in the capital. Despite her mother's Anglicanism, Maximiani had always preferred to worship in the small Greek church at Lyons with her father and other members of the Greek community. She felt a great attraction for the Greek Orthodox Church and Byzantine culture, as expressed in the chanting and hymns of the Greek rite. Above all, she revered the Orthodox Church for its preservation of Greek national identity during the long centuries of Turkish domination. Indeed, much of her feeling for the church owed more to Greek nationalism and her enthusiasm for the neo-Byzantine aspirations of the Megali Idea than to Christian piety. Even as a child she had felt ambiguous about Christianity itself; as a student she increasingly questioned the apparent man-centeredness and relegation of nature implicit in Christian teachings. In this skeptical frame of mind she joined a Greek pilgrimage to the Holy Land during Lent 1929. She wanted to see for herself the people and places most intimately associated with the roots of Christianity.

Thanks to a thorough grounding in Scripture knowledge at her Catholic schools in Lyons, Portas knew her Bible well. She was well familiar with the history of Israel with its unfolding sense of election through the Exodus under Moses, the Sinaitic covenant, and the return under Joshua into Canaan. She knew the story of the early monarchy under Saul, David, and Solomon, followed by the division of the kingdom into Israel and Judah, their turbulent histories marked by rebellion, internecine strife, and recurrent relapses from the worship of Yahweh into pagan idolatry until the destruction of Jerusalem and the first Temple by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C. The exile of Israel in Babylon, the return of the Jews to Judaea, and their subsequent history under the Persian, Greek, and Roman world empires were an integral part of her educational background. Her mother's sister was also an avid Bible reader and had encouraged her niece in its study. However, this knowledge had not taught Maximiani to revere the Jews as "the chosen people." On the contrary, her Bible knowledge had instilled in her a repugnance for the Jews, in whose ethical monotheism she identified the original and ultimate enemy of her own pagan, pantheistic tendencies. She utterly rejected the Jewish emphasis on the one and only God, transcendent and wholly apart from nature. Above all, she resented in Judaism a national presumptiveness coupled with universal aspiration: the fact that Yahweh was the God of Israel yet entrusted them with a universal mission for mankind.

Her anti-Semitic prejudice was further strengthened by the political circumstances of modern Palestine. The Zionist movement to create a Jewish state had been gathering force since the latter decades of the nineteenth century, when East European Jews began settling in the country that had been under Turkish rule since the early sixteenth century. In November 1917 as the British army invaded Palestine, the famous Balfour Declaration was issued, promising that the British would facilitate the establishment there of a national home for the Jewish people. In July 1922 the League of Nations had given Britain a mandate to rule Palestine and charged it with a responsibility to secure that objective. However, the British were anxious to retain the goodwill of the Arab majority, which viewed these developments with misgiving and was greatly concerned at the increased level of Jewish immigration during the 1920s. Armed Arab attacks on Jewish settlements had become frequent by the end of the decade. However, the Jews were determined to redeem the earlier promises made and pursued a policy of continuing immigration and property acquisition, combined with shrill demands for more self-determination. Given the messianic background of Zionism, Maximiani Portas was antagonistic toward these trends, which in turn darkened her perception of the Holy Land as a national Jewish prize.

The pilgrimage party sailed from Piræus to Haifa in mid-March and proceeded, in the course of the next forty days leading up to Easter, to visit many of the places associated with the Bible and the life of Jesus. After passing through Bethlehem and Nazareth, the pilgrims made their way to Jerusalem, where they were able to see at first hand the stones that bore witness to more than two thousand years of Jewish history as well as the dramatic events involved in the birth of Christianity. As her fellow pilgrims reverently viewed the City of David and paced the stations of the Cross on the Via Dolorosa leading to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the reputed site of the Crucifixion, Portas felt repelled by what she regarded as their servile conduct before these alien shrines, seeing in such behavior a telling symbol of the Jewish-Christian overlordship of Europe. She dismissed the numerous sites of Christian association as a mere accumulation of legend and wryly recalled the story of the original pilgrimage of Helena, the mother of Emperor Constantine, who in A.D. 326 visited Jerusalem, where she found the True Cross and the Holy Sepulchre. Portas contemptuously rejected the subsequent proliferation of "Holy Places" as an invention of the credulous Christians who had been coming to Jerusalem ever since.

This Lenten pilgrimage to Palestine in 1929 cannot be underestimated for its influence on Portas's religious outlook. Her hostile confrontation with the Judaeo-Christian tradition at its fount and origin marks a crucial point in the development of her anti-Judaism, anti-Christianity, and general predisposition away from man-centered monotheism toward a nature-centered pantheism. At the same time, her encounter with large numbers of Jews in their national community transformed her political anti-Semitism into a lifelong article of faith. As Portas wandered in the Jewish quarter of the Old City, she felt overwhelmed and repelled by the exotic nature of the Jews, their attire, their customs, observances, and festivals. The strange dark men in broad-brimmed hats and long black coats hastening to prayers at the Wailing Wall; the apparent paradox of a national or tribal God claiming universal significance; and the ubiquitous references to the immemorial history of Israel and the fulfilment of Scripture all filled her with utter disbelief that the Jews were indeed "the chosen people," as her English aunt had so often insisted during her childhood. Against the background of her fierce Hellenistic nationalism and budding paganism, Portas heartily resented the central importance of this Jewish history in European thought and belief.

By her later account, she recalled the extraordinary paradox that she should have been reminded of Adolf Hitler's vehement nationalism and anti-Semitism at the heart of Jewry in Palestine. Suddenly, she related, it occurred to her that Hitler's campaign against Jewish influence in Germany was not just a German affair but an issue of international significance. She reflected that all the formerly pagan nations of Europe must throw off their superimposed Judaeo-Christian heritage and make renewed contact with their old ethnic religions. For the first time she realized that she was a National Socialist herself, indeed that she had always been a National Socialist. Henceforth her admiration for Hitler was complete. Although she now entertained thoughts of settling in Germany and joining the Nazi movement, she reflected that her French birth and recent adoption of Greek nationality might arouse suspicion there. She resolved instead to realize her newfound political philosophy closer to home by reviving Greek nationalism and paganism.

Returning to Athens after Easter, she attempted to develop a coherent alternative belief based on the gods of ancient Greece. Her background studies in antiquity and ancient history had furnished her with much material for a pagan-national conception of religion that would focus on a race other than the Jews. At this stage, she still identified this race as the Hellenes, the people of Alexander the Great. On the basis of its racial and military superiority such a people should enjoy a wide sphere of influence and regional hegemony. Many of her ideas were still obviously bound up with the irredentism of the Megali Idea. However, she soon discovered that her pagan ideas evoked little response among the Greeks, who remained intensely loyal to their Christianity and its Byzantine associations. She therefore spent the latter half of 1929 completing her thesis, which was appropriately prefaced with a memorial to Ión Dragoumis, the thinker and Hellenic patriot in Macedonia who had been assassinated in Athens in 1920. During the late summer she traveled all around the Peloponnese alone on foot and on horseback. The ancient sites of Arcadia, the ruins of Sparta, and the rugged beauty of the peninsula deepened her love of the country and its proud past. The thesis on Kaires was completed as a draft in the autumn and she returned to Lyons in November 1929.¹⁶

Portas now began work on her main doctoral thesis on a purely philosophical topic. The subject was the nature of simplicity in mathematics and natural science and had been suggested by her teacher in logic, Edmond Goblot. However, in order to write upon the philosophy of science, she realized that she would have to study science and accordingly began courses in the science faculty at Lyons University. This polymathic endeavor is all the more remarkable for its swift and successful conclusion. She took the university examinations in physical chemistry and mineralogy in July 1930, followed by papers in general chemistry in November 1930 and in biological chemistry in July 1931. She received her M.Sc. (license-ès-science) in 1931, whereupon she sat down to write her doctoral thesis. Professor Goblot had died in the meantime, and her new supervisor was Professor Étienne Souriau at the Sorbonne, who advised her to confine her subject to mathematical simplicity after all. She completed her five-hundred-page thesis La simplicité mathématique, including a discussion of the contemporary Sorbonne philosopher Léon Brunschvicq, by the end of 1931. These studies in mathematics and philosophy drew upon the work of George Boole, Gottlob Frege, and Bertrand Russell in symbolic logic, Henri Poincaré in topology and geometry, and Alfred North Whitehead in the philosophy of science. While remote from her interests in religion and history, this thesis has some bearing on her philosophical development toward a deistic cosmology of energy in nature. Meanwhile she had visited Athens once again in the early autumn of 1931 to revise her Kaires thesis.

Her aversion to the Jews and the Judaic origins of Christianity still remained a strong motive in her search for a pagan religion. Following her visit to Palestine in 1929, she had taken increasing note of the rise of the National Socialist movement in neighboring Germany. Occasional reports of Hitler's speeches had appeared in the French press since the mid-1920s, and she could not but be impressed by the central importance of anti-Semitism in his political view of the world. Having earlier regarded Hitler first and foremost as a German nationalist politician committed to revising the restrictive conditions of the Versailles Treaty, her view of him altered after reading a German edition of Mein Kampf. Here Hitler summarized his views on the race and the nation in terms of a Manichaean dualism between the Aryans and the Jews. Behind Hitler's commonplace eulogy of the Aryans lay more than a century of racial speculation in Europe. Portas decided to find out all she could about the Aryans and their pagan polytheistic religions. But who were the Aryans and where were they to be found in the modern world?

Given her prolonged periods of study in Athens, it would be surprising if Portas had not been influenced by the memory of the famous German archaeologist Heinrich Schliemann (1822-1890), the discoverer of Troy and Mycenaean culture. In the course of his pioneering excavations at Hissarlik in 1871-1875, he had uncovered the greatest treasure trove of gold, silver, and bronze objects ever found. His discoveries confirming the site of Troy, the Trojan War, and the events of Homeric poetry made a deep and lasting impression on the European mind. After his success Schliemann and his young beautiful Greek wife Sophia settled at Athens in a palatial mansion called the Iliou Mélatron (Palace of Ilion) built by Ernst Ziller in 1878-1879 at 12 Panepstimíou Street. Here they became the center of Athenian society, hosting lavish banquets at which Sophia presided wearing Mycenaean gold and the diadem that had once belonged to Helen of Troy. In due course much of Schliemann's Mycenaean treasure found a home in the National Archaeological Museum in Athens, and he donated much of the Trojan hoard to the German National Museum in Berlin.

At the Hissarlik site of Troy, Schliemann had also found hundreds of objects ranging from pottery fragments and terra-cotta whorls to ornaments bearing the sign of the swastika. He immediately recognized this symbol from similar signs on pots found near Königswalde on the River Oder in Germany and speculated that the swastika was a "significant religious symbol of our remote ancestors," which linked the ancient Teutons, the Homeric Greeks, and Vedic India.¹⁷ The extraordinary publicity surrounding Schliemann's finds at Troy guaranteed a wide European audience for his speculations about an ancient Aryan symbol bridging the mythological and religious traditions of East and West. His book Troja (1884) contained a dissertation identifying the Trojans as Thracians, who were in turn regarded as Teutons. Thanks to Schliemann's extensive scholarly contacts in Germany, England, and France the swastika was swiftly launched as the Aryan symbol in the European mind. Michael Zmigrodzki, a Polish librarian, addressed major international congresses of anthropologists and archaeologists on the subject of the Aryan swastika in 1889, attended by Schliemann, his anti-Semitic collaborator Emile Burnouf, and Professor Ludvig Müller of Copenhagen, who claimed that the swastika was the emblem of the supreme Aryan god.¹⁸ So great was Schliemann's fascination with this symbol that he adorned the external walls of his great house in Athens with a continuous border of decorative swastikas.

Almost every day during her student years in Athens Portas had walked past these swastikas on Heinrich Schliemann's Palace of Iliion (since 1927 the Supreme Court of the Appeal) in Panepistimíou Street, the thoroughfare that ran across the frontage of the University, the Academy, and the National Library. Given her profound interest in Greek antiquities, she was most likely familiar with Schliemann's reputation and work, as well as his speculations on the links between the Homeric myths and the Vedas of India in a common Aryan tradition. It is indeed tempting to speculate that Schliemann's Aryan swastikas were an important motivating factor, specifically present in Athens, that led her to think about the Aryan tradition in India. What is certain, in any case, is that Portas's pursuit of the Aryan myth in late 1931 led her beyond Greece and Europe to the cradle of the Indo-European race in Vedic India.

Following the recent death of her father in February 1932, Portas inherited a legacy that enabled her to visit India. She was now convinced that she could rediscover a living Aryan world only in contemporary India. In 1926 the renowned European Indologist Sir Charles Eliot had written: "Hinduism has not been made, but has grown. It is a jungle, not a building. It is a living example of a great national paganism such as might have existed in Europe if Christianity had not become the state religion of the Roman Empire, if there had remained an incongruous jumble of old local superstitions, Greek philosophy, and oriental cults such as the worship of Sarapis or Mithras."¹⁹ Her journey to the East was inspired by an interest in the Hindu caste system and a desire to learn more about eugenics. Above all, she hoped to find in the religious rites, customs, and beliefs of India something of a living equivalent to the old Aryan cults of Europe—both of ancient Greece and of the Teutonic North—which she believed Christianity had abolished and obscured as a result of the state edict of Emperor Constantine.²⁰ Her subsequent experience of Brahminical India during the 1930s laid the basis of her Aryan racial philosophy.

2

ARYAVARTA

Leaving aside Schliemann's Aryan swastikas, Maximiani Portas had long been attracted to the Orient by the poet Leconte de Lisle. Even in her early teens she had been thrilled by his evocation of the deified Aryan hero of India and the pride of the privileged godlike race:

"Rama, son of Dasharatha, whom the Brahmins honour, Thou whose blood is pure, thou whose body is white,"
Said Lakshmana, "hail, O resplendent subduer
Of all the profane races!"¹

Years later she would write that the music of these verses was destined, one day, after the failure of her great dreams in Greece, to drive her to the caste-ridden land as to the immemorial stronghold of natural order and hierarchy. While her delight in the icy idylls and scornful perfectionism of Leconte de Lisle go some way toward explaining her interest in Vedic India, the complex of factors that led her to search for the Aryan heritage in South Asia is deeply rooted in European myths of racial origin deriving from the Romantic period.

As if taking her cue from Sir Charles Eliot's image of India as an undisturbed pre-Christian pagan culture in the remote tropics, she claimed that she went to India "to seek gods and rites akin to those of ancient Greece, of ancient Rome, of ancient Britain and ancient Germany, that people of our race carried there, with the cult of the Sun, six thousand years ago, and to which living millions of all races still cling; and to witness, in the brahmanical élite of to-day, a striking instance of the miracle that racial segregation can work, and the triumph of an Aryan minority throughout the ages."² But her vision of Aryavarta, the traditional name of Aryan territory in India, was also strongly colored by her newfound enthusiasm for Hitler and German National Socialism. She went to India, she added, to see at first hand a civilization founded upon the idea of natural racial hierarchy. She imagined that Indian society could show how the world would appear around A.D. 8000 once the New Order of Nazism had prevailed for six thousand years.³

Now, in the early spring of 1932, Portas had her boat ticket for the land of her racial dreams. She was twenty-seven years old, had completed two degrees in the humanities and natural science, and written two substantial theses for her doctorate. She had traveled from France to Greece already several times, but now she was on the threshold of a new experience—the exotic world of Asia. In Lyons she bade her mother and college friends farewell and took a train down to Marseilles. The passenger liner was already waiting at the docks, and she embarked among a noisy throng of colonial administrators and their families, merchants, and missionaries bound for India and Southeast Asia. The long sea voyage took her across the Mediterranean and through the Suez Canal, down the Red Sea and across the Arabian Gulf, and she disembarked at Colombo in Ceylon. From the port she proceeded to Kandy, where she made offerings to Buddha in a temple and felt the distinctive allure of Oriental religion amid the incessant beat of drums. After a fortnight in Ceylon (Sri Lanka), she crossed the water from Talaimannar to Rameswaram over the sandbank shoals of Rama's Bridge between Ceylon and southern India.

Her arrival on the sacred island of Rameswaram in May 1932 coincided with the great spring festival celebrating the exploits of Rama described in the famous Hindu epic Ramayana, already familiar to her from the poetry of Leconte de Lisle. The main theme of the epic was the story of Prince Rama, the son of King Dasaratha of Ayodhya by Queen Kausalya. The second queen, Kaikeyi, wanted to secure the throne for her son Bharata, and Rama was driven into exile. Rama, his beloved wife Sita, and his half-brother Lakshmana share many adventures abroad, in the course of which Sita is abducted by Ravana, the demon king of Lanka (Ceylon). Rama and Lakshmana then mount a campaign against Ravana with the assistance of Hanuman, the king of the monkeys. After crossing the shallows of Rama's Bridge to Ceylon, the trio defeat Ravana's forces in battle and rescue Sita. The story ends happily with Rama and Bharata sharing the kingdom. The epic is generally held to be based on the kingdom of Kosala and its capital Ayodhya in the seventh century B.C. The campaign against Ravana reflects the contemporary penetration of the Aryan tribes into the Dravidian stronghold of South India and their victory over the darker races. The heroic legend was edited by Brahmins into a book of devotion that is so well known among Hindus that its hundreds of incidents form a repertoire of favorite folktales.

The rich and colorful spectacle of the Rameswaram spring festival offered Maximiani Portas her first encounter with the living world of Hindu myth and Aryan legend. In the tropical evening darkness she watched the pageant unfold before her eyes. Seven elephants with purple draperies hanging down from their backs were ridden by beautiful, dark young men who resembled bronze statues by the light of flaming torches. The elephants then began to follow the chariot of Rama and Sita as the procession circled the sacred tank. The spectators threw jasmine and other flowers into the passing chariot as a token of love and respect for Rama and his faithful consort. Surrounded on all sides by the rapt and enthusiastic crowds, chiefly Dravidians and Tamils of South India, Portas reflected on the devotion that these dark-skinned Indian races still showed toward the northern Aryan invaders of old, symbolized by the fair-skinned couple in their chariot. It gave her great encouragement to see dark people honoring the white people, even worshipping them as gods, thousands of years after the conquest. The Rameswaram ceremony appeared to Portas an allegory of Nazi dreams of Aryan world dominion.

Through her passage to India in search of the Aryan heritage Portas retraced the intellectual journey of many European philosophers and philologists who had begun to seek the origins of mankind in India from the mid-eighteenth century onward. During the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, European scholars had generally accepted the biblical account in the Book of Genesis that traced the descent of all the races initially from Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden and then from Noah and his sons, Shem, Ham, and Japhet. Their descendants were typically identified as the Semites (Jews and Arabs), the Hamites (Egyptians and other inhabitants of North Africa), and the remaining human race including the Europeans was reckoned to be Japhetites. However, the discovery of the Americas and many previously unknown aboriginal peoples placed an increasing strain upon this biblical explanation. During the Enlightenment the philosophes expressed the anticlerical and antibiblical mood of a rational age by dissenting from the old Hebraic account of human origins in favor of a more exotic yet universal source. The location of this source in India provided a background to this quest for a new Adam. The subsequent development of this post-biblical anthropogeny gave rise in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to the Aryan myth, which exercised a powerful and fatal influence on Nazi racial doctrine.

Both Voltaire and Kant, to take two leading figures of the Enlightenment, declared India the source of all arts and civilization. In a letter of 1775 Voltaire stated that he regarded the "dynasty of the Brahmins" as the nation that had taught the rest of the world: "I am convinced that everything has come down to us from the banks of the Ganges." Such ideas appealed to Kant, who suggested that mankind together with all science must have originated on the roof of the world in Tibet. The culture of the Indians, he asserted, came from Tibet, just as all European arts came from India. However, it was Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803), the court preacher at Goethe's Weimar and the pioneer of Romantic nationalism, who was most influential in introducing this Indophilia into the German-speaking world. Loyal to his Lutheran calling, he regarded the Bible as the most accurate copy of some "natural revelation" associated with the Indian birthplace of mankind. Full of admiration for India, he praised the Brahmin priests for educating their people to a degree of virtue and learning far beyond European standards.

In his major work Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (Outlines of a philosophy of the history of mankind) (1784–1791), Herder strongly opposed the Noachian or Jewish genealogy:

The pains that have been taken, to make of all the people of the Earth, according to this genealogy, descendants of the hebrews, and half-brothers of the jews, are contradictory not only to chronology and universal history. . . . [N]ations, languages and kingdoms were formed after the deluge, without waiting for envoys from a chaldean family. . . . Suffice it, that the firm central point of the largest quarter of the Globe, the primitive mountains of Asia, prepared the first abode of the human race.

...

Herder exhorted his European readers to dismiss the Middle East—“these corners of Arabia and Judaea, these basins of the Nile and the Euphrates, these coasts of Phoenicia and Damascus”—as the cradle of mankind and instead to scale the summits of Asia.

These thinkers of the Enlightenment thus broke with the biblical tradition and located the birthplace of the entire human race east of Eden between the Indus and the Ganges. In retrospect, it appears that the idea of an Indian source of mankind played the role of an intermediary traditional mythology between the biblical genealogy of creation and the modern evolutionary genealogy of Darwin. In the late eighteenth century, philosophers were ready to reject Adam as a common father and the conventional Noachian genealogy in their search for new ancestors but still clung to the idea of their origin in the mysterious Orient. It now remained for the new science of linguistics to take these ideas a stage further by suggesting that it was not the whole human race but one particular race—a white ancestral European race—that had descended from the mountains of Asia to colonize and populate the West. Although English writers were the first to make these philological discoveries, it was German Romantic scholars who matched linguistic with racial groups and eventually gave a name to these ancestors by opposing the Aryans to the Hamites, the Mongols, and the Jews.⁴

Although the close relationships between some European languages had been noted by the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Irish scholar James Parsons was the first to conduct a survey of basic words in a larger number of languages. In his study The Remains of Japhet, being historical enquiries into the affinity and origins of the European languages (1767), he first demonstrated the similarity between Irish and Welsh with an extensive (thousand-word) comparison of their vocabularies. He then expanded his inquiry to the other languages of Eurasia by comparing the words for the numerals in Celtic (Irish, Welsh), Greek, Italic (Latin, Italian, Spanish, French), Germanic (German, Dutch, Swedish, Danish, Old English, English), Slavic (Polish, Russian), Indic (Bengali), and Iranian (Persian). The clear relationship between the corresponding words was further underscored by the evident lack of any link with the words for the same numbers in Turkish, Hebrew, Malay, and Chinese. By showing that the languages of Europe, Iran, and India had all derived from a common ancestor, Parsons may be credited with the discovery of the Indo-European family of languages. However, his work was idiosyncratic in several important respects (for instance, he believed that Irish was the first language), so that this honor is usually reserved for Sir William Jones (1746–1794).⁵

The status of Hebrew as the original language of mankind had already been challenged by German philologists at Göttingen before English scholars suggested that the Hindu language of Sanskrit might be ancestor of the classical European languages. The study of Sanskrit had proceeded apace once the Brahmins of Bengal had been ordered, around 1780, to translate the ancient laws and sacred writings of India into English. After being appointed a justice of the High Court of Bengal in 1783, William Jones set about the study of Sanskrit and swiftly recognized its affinities with Greek and Latin. As founder of the Royal Asiatic Society, he was accorded widespread academic attention. In his third anniversary discourse to the Society on Indian culture in 1786, Jones made his famous pronouncement about the common origin of the Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Gothic, and Celtic languages. He also noted close analogies between Graeco-Latin and Indian mythology, including the names of their pagan deities. His discovery was soon disseminated into cultivated society at the beginning of the nineteenth century, thanks in large part to Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829), the brilliant author and critic.⁶

Friedrich Schlegel and his brother August Wilhelm had already distinguished themselves as the founders of German Romanticism by the critical and poetic works they published at Jena between 1796 and 1801. Friedrich Schlegel was recognized as an accomplished scholar of classical literature before he was drawn toward a study of the Orient. After studying Sanskrit at Paris in 1802–1803, he gave a series of lectures on universal history at the University of Cologne from 1805 onward. He was convinced that all culture and religion possessed an Indian origin and even declared that Egyptian civilization was the work of Indian missionaries. The Egyptians had in their turn founded a colony in Judaea, and he noted that Moses had intentionally not passed on ideas about metempsychosis and the immortality of the soul to the Israelites because of the gross superstitions that had become attached to them.

August Wilhelm Schlegel (1767–1845) also continued the Romantic tradition of Indian scholarship by learning Sanskrit and later publishing editions of the Bhagavad Gita (in Latin) and the Ramayana.

In his highly influential essay Über die Sprache und Weisheit der Inder (On the language and wisdom of the Indians) (1808), Friedrich Schlegel paid fulsome tribute as a philologist to the beauty, antiquity, and philosophical clarity of Sanskrit. But in the final part of the book he aired his anthropological ideas about a new masterful race that had formed in northern India before marching down from the roof of the world to found empires and civilize the West. In his view all the famous nations of high cultural achievement sprang from one stock, and their colonies were all one people ultimately deriving from an Indian origin. Although he wondered why the inhabitants of fertile areas in Asia should have later migrated to the harsh northern climes of Scandinavia, he found an answer in Indian legends relating to the tradition of the miraculous and holy mountain of Meru in the Far North. Thus the Indian tribes had been driven northward not out of necessity but by “some supernatural idea of the high dignity and splendour of the North.” The language and traditions of the Indians and the Nordics proved that they formed a single race.⁷

The new anthropogeny of the gifted white European races was complete by 1819, when Friedrich Schlegel applied the term Aryan to this as yet anonymous Indic-Nordic master race. The word had been derived from Herodotus’s Arioi (an early name for the Medes and Persians) and recently used by French and German authors to designate these ancient peoples. However, Schlegel’s new usage caught on as he linked the root Ari with Ehre, the German word for honor. Again, he was philologically quite correct because one also finds the same root with a similar meaning in the Slav and Celtic languages. However, the anthropological implications of the new word for the ancestral European race were much more exciting and flattering: as Aryans, the Germans and their ancient Indian ancestors were the people of honor, the aristocracy of the various races of mankind. It should be noted that Friedrich Schlegel was neither an extreme German nationalist nor an anti-Semite. He campaigned for the emancipation of the Jews in Germany and married the daughter of the distinguished Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. Nevertheless, his ideas in due course stimulated the boldest ideas about Aryan supremacy among German, French, and English scholars.

Throughout the first half of the nineteenth century famous and obscure German philosophers and philologists alike worked tirelessly to develop and refine the Aryan myth. Many more speculations were supplied by Julius von Klaproth (who coined the term Indo-Germanic), Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, Jacob Grimm, and Franz Bopp. In 1820 the geographer Karl Ritter described the Indian armies breaking through to the West across the Caucasus. As the originator of the famous dictionary, Grimm exercised a lasting influence on literary and historical textbooks. He described the arrival of the Greeks, Romans, Celts, and Germans in Europe in successive waves of immigration from Asia. However, the Aryans were not yet set against the Jews in these accounts. The outlines of the Aryan-Semitic dualism first became apparent in 1845, when Christian Lassen (1800–1876), the pupil and protégé of the Schlegel brothers, contrasted the Semites unfavorably with the Indo-Germans as unharmonious, egotistical, and exclusive. His emphasis on biology, the triumph of the strongest, the youthful and creative nature of the most recent species, and the superiority of the whites provided the basic ingredients of all subsequent thinking about the master race. Such notions were soon combined with a virulent anti-Semitism by the famous composer and author Richard Wagner (1813–1883), who enjoyed a fervent following in Germany and Austria.⁸

Through the lectures and books of the great philologist Max Müller (1823–1900) in Oxford and Ernest Renan (1823–1892) in France, the Aryan myth had become established dogma throughout European learned society by about 1860. From this time on most educated Europeans came to know that the European nations were of the Aryan race, which had come from the high plateaus of Asia. The common ancestors of the Indians, Persians, Greeks, Italians, Slavs, Germans, and Celts had dwelt in this region before migrating across Asia and Europe to found their respective ethnic groups, which in due course became the nations known to ancient and medieval history. The idea that the Europeans had an origin distinct from the Jews was also implicit and indeed survived any ensuing revisions of the Aryans' geographical origins. Linguistics, anthropology, and biology had combined with the cultural and political achievements of the European powers to underwrite their sense of confidence as world leaders. They were all Aryans and the Aryans were the superior race, the highest form of humanity.

From the mid-1870s onward the discoveries of archaeology and modern occultism each supplied further impetus to the development of the Aryan myth through the identification of the swastika as a racial symbol. Already in 1872 Emile Burnouf, the anti-Semitic director of the French archaeological school in Athens, had assimilated the swastika into the Aryan myth. He claimed that the old Aryan symbol depicted the laying of sacred fires in Vedic India and was later adapted into the cross by Christianity. Burnouf collaborated closely with Heinrich Schliemann during the latter's excavation of Troy at Hissarlik in 1871–1875 and offered extensive commentary on the swastika found on hundreds of artifacts and terra-cotta whorls unearthed at the site. By noting that the swastika had always been rejected by the Jews, Burnouf also recruited the Aryan symbol for anti-Semitism. Schliemann also regarded the swastika as a footprint of his remote racial forebears, linking the Trojans, Thracians, ancient Germans, and Vedic Indians in a common Aryan ancestry. The glamour of gold, silver, and Homeric legends had enabled Schliemann to popularize the notion that the swastika was a uniquely Aryan religious symbol whose spatial distribution mapped the racial continuities of the ancient West and the mysterious East. The swastika was henceforth launched as the Aryan symbol in the European mind.

Schliemann's later books Ilios (1880) and Troja (1884) further documented the swastika and other links between the Homeric myths and Vedic India, and the theme was soon taken up by others. In 1877 Ludvig Müller had already described the swastika as the emblem of the supreme Aryan god, and in 1886 Michael Zmigrodzki, a Polish anti-Semite, published a curious racist tract about the swastika entitled Die Mutter bei den Völkern des arischen Stammes. He also mounted an exhibition of more than three hundred drawings showing the swastika on artifacts at the Paris Exposition of 1889. In the same year Zmigrodzki addressed two international congresses on the subject of the swastika, one of which was attended by Schliemann, Burnouf, Müller, and other Aryanists and swastikaphiles from around the world. By the end of that decade the swastika was thus well established as an Aryan racial symbol.⁹ Ernst Ludwig Krause (1839–1903), a popular German writer on science, myth, and archaeology, first introduced the Aryan swastika into the current of German völkisch nationalism with his seminal book Tuisco-Land, der arischen Stämme und Götter Urheimat (1891), which carried commentaries on the Vedas, the Edda, the Iliad, and the Odyssey.

The Aryans and their sacred symbol the swastika were further popularized by modern occultism, in particular by the Theosophy of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891). The Russian adventuress and medium founded her Theosophical Society in New York in 1875, subsequently moving her operations to India in 1879. Initially inspired by spiritualism, hermeticism, gnosticism, the Jewish cabbala, and freemasonry, Blavatsky hankered after an Eastern source of wisdom. Once in India, she duly found this in the traditions of Hinduism and Buddhism. While Western esoteric traditions are prominent in her first book, Isis Unveiled (1877), the East dominates the mature Theosophy of The Secret Doctrine (1888). Here she wrote of human evolution through seven root races, the fifth and current one being the Aryan race. Familiar with the ideas of Burnouf and Schliemann, she attributed great mystical significance to the swastika as “Thor’s hammer,” and incorporated the symbol in the seal of the Theosophical Society from 1881.¹⁰ Theosophy appeared to transcend both science and organized religion and found many adherents in Europe once branches of the society were established in England, France, and Germany in the 1880s. Despite the universalism of Theosophy, its Aryans and swastika had a potent influence on mystical racism in Germany and Austria from the late 1890s onward.¹¹

But it was the location of the original Aryan homeland that continued to preoccupy scholars. Flushed with victory in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–1871, the Germans had evolved a highly chauvinistic version of Aryan origins that favored the idea of a northern European homeland. These nationalistic claims were strengthened by contemporary advances in racial anthropology. During the 1870s the blond, blue-eyed Nordic racial type, previously considered the mark of a dreamy, sentimental temperament, was identified with virility and conquest.¹² A number of German writers turned the whole theory of Aryan migration backward with the suggestion that the Aryans originated in Europe and migrated only later to Asia, a notion apparently supported by the observation that the Brahmins of India were lighter than the lower castes. Karl Penka claimed a Scandinavian origin for the Aryans in his books Origines Ariacae (1883) and Die Herkunft der Arier (1886). Already mentioned in the context of the swastika, Ernst Krause proposed a northern Aryan homeland in his book Tuisko-Land (1891), which launched the idea among the nationalists and völkisch racists of Germany. Popular anthropologists like Ludwig Wilser and Ludwig Woltmann, the racial mystics Guido von List and Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels, and the archaeologist Gustav Kossinna continued to discuss the Nordic Aryans after the turn of the century, and this idea became a basic tenet of Nazi racial doctrine as summarized by the party philosopher Alfred Rosenberg in Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts (The myth of the twentieth century) (1930).

Given the existence of entries for “Aryans” and “Indo-Europeans” in standard encyclopedias and textbooks in France, England, and Germany from the late 1860s onward, there is nothing remarkable about Maximiani Portas’s adoption of the racial Manichaeism based on an Aryan-Semitic dualism. However, her ideas about the original Aryan homeland owed more to European romanticism and native Indian scholarship than to the theories of German racist and nationalist authors. In this respect she was somewhat out of step with her Nazi models; instead of seeking out the heirs of the pristine race in northern Europe, she had traveled to India, “that easternmost and southernmost home of the Aryan race.” Her thinking was faultless, inasmuch as she based her speculations on traditional theories concerning the Aryans and their migrations. For example, Max Müller had believed that the purity with which the Hindus had preserved the Aryan language and religion showed that those Aryans who had migrated to India had been the last to leave their highlands in Central Asia. Portas’s enthusiasm for the Aryan Indians was thus firmly grounded in the Aryan myth as it had developed in Europe since the German Romantics.

Her ideas concerning the origins of the Aryans were drawn from the books of Bâl Gangadhar (Lokmanya) Tilak (1856–1920), widely acclaimed as “the father of Indian unrest.”¹³ Tilak was born into an orthodox Chitpavan Brahmin family at Ratnagiri in Maharashtra. His father was a schoolmaster and a good Sanskrit scholar, but in spite of its aristocratic heritage the family belonged to the lower-middle class at the time of Tilak’s birth. After completing his education at Poona University, Tilak spurned a career in government service and devoted himself to the cause of national awakening. From the first, his ideas of political emancipation were based on mass education and mobilization, and he was revered as a leading spirit in the fight for Indian independence. He joined forces with other nationalists in starting the New English School, the Deccan Education Society, and Fergusson College in 1885. After disagreements and his disassociation from the Deccan Education Society, Tilak acquired control over the Kesari and the Maharatta newspapers of the society, through which he fostered a spirit of popular resistance to foreign rule.¹⁴

While Tilak's anti-British views were strongly nationalist and revolutionary, his social and religious views were conservative and pro-Brahmin. Besides his radical political activities Tilak was an accomplished scholar of ancient Hindu sacred literature. As an Indian nationalist, he was particularly interested in the Vedas as the earliest document of the Aryan Indians and the oldest writings in the history of mankind. By these means Tilak sought to articulate an Aryan myth that would not only reawaken Indian pride in the glorious past but also confer legitimacy on the traditional institutions of Brahminism and caste society. In his first book, Orion, or Researches into the Antiquity of the Vedas (1893), Tilak related the positions of the heavens mentioned in the Vedas to the precession of the equinoxes. These astronomical calculations thus enabled him to date the oldest Vedas to around 4500 B.C. During a brief term of imprisonment for sedition in 1897–1898, Tilak immersed himself in further Vedic study and duly published his major statement concerning the age and original location of Vedic civilization, The Arctic Home in the Vedas (1903).

On the basis of astronomical statements in the Vedas, Tilak's later chronology went even further back than the dates advanced in Orion. He concluded that the Aryan ancestors of the Vedic writers had lived in an Arctic home in interglacial times between 10,000 and 8000 B.C., enjoying a degree of civilization superior to that of both the Stone and Bronze Ages. Owing to the destruction of their homeland by the onset of the last Ice Age, the Aryans had migrated southward and roamed over northern Europe and Asia in search of lands suitable for new settlement in the period 8000–5000 B.C. Tilak believed that many Vedic hymns could be traced to the early part of the Orion period between 5000 and 3000 B.C., when the Aryan bards had not yet forgotten the traditions of their former Arctic home. During the period 3000–1400 B.C., when later Vedic texts including the Brahmanas were composed, the Arctic traditions were gradually misunderstood and lost. Regarding Aryan prowess, Tilak concluded that "the vitality and superiority of the Aryan races, as disclosed by their conquest, by extermination or assimilation, of the non-Aryan races with whom they came in contact . . . is intelligible only on the assumption of a high degree of civilisation in their original Arctic home."¹⁵

Tilak's ideas of Aryan Arctic origins, together with the conventional Aryan myth, deeply influenced Portas's view of India, its culture, and its peoples. She imagined the Aryan invasions of India as having occurred over a longer period during the fourth and third millennia B.C. However, in common with European scholars, she preferred to view the Aryans as gifted barbarians whose military skills in horsemanship and use of wheeled chariots enabled them to dominate the Dravidians and other dark-skinned races they encountered in the more advanced Indus civilization in northwest India. From the Vedas it was possible to reconstruct a great deal about these light-skinned proto-Nordic invaders. After entering northern India through the passes in the Hindu Kush mountains, the Aryans had settled the Punjab and then gradually penetrated along the river courses throughout the Gangetic plain of northern India. They lived initially as seminomadic pastoralists on the produce of cattle. The cow was thus a very precious commodity and often an object of veneration. The Vedic hymns describe the Aryans as a vigorous warrior aristocracy more interested in fighting than in agriculture. Great prestige and pleasure was attached to battle, chariot racing, drinking the intoxicating soma, music-making, and gambling with dice.¹⁶

The Vedic hymns also show how important a role religion played in the life of the Aryans. The forces of nature were typically invested with divine powers and personified as male or female gods. As Sir William Jones had noted, several of their names betray common Indo-European linguistic origins. Indra was a weather and storm god, also the power of virility and generation. Later he became a mighty war god, a heroic ideal, and the protector of the Aryan race. There were several solar deities, including Mitra (identical to the ancient Iranian god Mithra), Surya (Sun), and Savitri (a female deity to whom Hindu prayers at sunrise are still offered). Varuna (compare the Roman god Uranus) was a patriarchal god presiding over the heavens. Dyaus (compare the Greek god Zeus) was a father god of declining importance; Soma the god of the divine drink soma; and Yama the god of death. The foremost god was perhaps the fire god Agni (whose name recalls igneus, the Latin word for fire) on account of the central importance of fire in domestic life and in sacrifices, a major feature of ancient Aryan life. So great was the reverence for Agni that the fire on the home hearth was never allowed to go out.

Portas was above all interested in the caste system of Hinduism, which she regarded as the Aryan archetype of racial laws intended to govern the segregation of different races and to maintain the pure blood of the light-skinned and fair-complexioned Aryans. When the Aryans first invaded India, they were already divided into three social classes: the warriors, or aristocracy; the priests; and the common people. The Aryans spoke contemptuously of the dark-skinned, flat-nosed folk of Dravidian and aboriginal stock whom they had conquered, calling them Daysus (meaning "squat creatures," "slaves," or even "apes"). A more exclusive development of the caste system followed this encounter; it involved both fear of the Daysus and anxiety that assimilation with them would lead to a loss of Aryan identity. The Sanskrit word for caste is varna, which actually means color, and this provided the basis of the original four-caste system comprising the kshatriyas (warriors and aristocracy), the brahmans (priests), and the vaishyas (cultivators); and the sudras, the Daysus and those of mixed Aryo-Daysu origin. Portas venerated the Aryan race for its racial purity as the zenith of physical perfection and for its outstanding qualities of beauty, intelligence, willpower, and thoroughness. She regarded the survival of the light-skinned minority of Brahmins among an enormous population of many different Indian races after sixty centuries as a living tribute to the value of the Aryan caste system.

Maximiani Portas's subsequent exploration of India and Hinduism was inspired by her quest for the Aryan heritage. From Rameswaram she journeyed northward. After ascending the famous Rock of Trichinopoly several hundred feet above the town, she was spellbound by the sight of the famous Golden Temple amid the jungle on a nearby hill. In the other direction she noticed the ugly modern building of the Jesuit Hospital. Then and there she resolved to do all in her power to maintain the Hindu traditions against Christianity and all other philosophies of equality. Maximiani henceforth regarded India as her home. With the exception of a brief period in the spring of 1934, when she returned to Lyons to pass her oral examination for her doctorate, she lived and worked in India. After extensive travels throughout India in the period from 1932 until the middle of 1935, she lived from July to December 1935 at Rabindrath Tagore's ashram in Shantiniketan at Bolpur in Bengal, renowned for its cosmopolitan membership. The negligible cost of living at the ashram outweighed her aversion to its liberal spirit and the presence of émigré German Jews. Here she learned Hindi and perfected her command of Bengali. She then taught English history and Indian history at Jerandan College not far from Delhi and worked in a similar capacity at Mathura, the holy city of Krishna during 1936. Ever more involved in the life and customs of Hinduism, she adopted a Hindu name, Savitri Devi, in honor of the female solar deity, by which we will henceforth refer to her in this account.

Savitri Devi came to know India well and loved it. She was indeed an unusual visitor in the 1930s. Unlike the British and French officials, the busy merchants, the zealous missionaries, and a mere handful of sight-seeing tourists, she had come as a pilgrim to admire and learn about India's proud past and its living religion. She richly evokes the colorful diversity of India in L'Etang aux lotus (The lotus pond) (1940), a book recording her early impressions of the country in the years 1934 to 1936. In the course of long train journeys to Benares, Lahore, and Peshawar, she was often rewarded by new Indian friends, interesting conversations, and invitations to their hometowns. She was invariably touched by their kindness, their dignity, intelligence, and harmonious spirit. She piously approached the sacred town of Brindaban, where legend describes how the god Krishna spent his pastoral youth surrounded by music, poetry, and amorous adventures with the milkmaids. She described the festival atmosphere of Mathura, Krishna's birthplace, as the crowds of pilgrims thronged its temples in memory of the divine avatar. She visited the great temples in Udaipur, Puri, and Benares on the holy river Ganges. Everywhere she went, she admired the timeless beauty of India and the spiritual poise of its many peoples.

By the end of 1936 she had settled in Calcutta, the capital of Bengal. In the great teeming metropolis she was particularly struck by the extraordinary contrasts of European colonial life and sophisticated Bengali culture. She described the English memsahibs smartly dressed for tennis walking on Chowringhee Road, the busy major thoroughfare of European Calcutta with its smart hotels, restaurants, cinemas, and hairdressers. But images of old, timeless India always strayed into the picture, often in the form of a wandering cow gazing into the shop windows or resting on the tramlines and stopping the traffic. Just around the corner stood the famous "Bengal Stores" that catered exclusively to Indian tastes. Its customers were elegant Bengali women, in groups of two and three accompanied by their husbands, from the wealthy native suburbs of Tollygunge with its cool lakes, Alipur and Ballygunge. These well-educated women in colorful saris made their purchases from among the fabrics and perfumes, before taking tea to the sound of Indian music. Savitri Devi marveled at their style and simplicity. In India she felt she had discovered a country that could be modern without being ugly.¹⁷

On Park Street and in other native quarters Savitri Devi encountered the other face of Calcutta, its grinding poverty amid the baking heat, dust, and squalor. The limbless dying on the filthy pavements, naked children, a blind man asking for alms at the windows of a halted bus. Beggars, bony cows, and thin dogs thronged the far northern districts of Shambazar and Baghbazar, the rundown congested areas around the Sealdah railway terminus, Bowbazar Street, College Street, Harrison Road, and beyond the bus station. But even here the population was unbroken in spirit, avid for beautiful things, and friendly. Savitri Devi described how she wandered through a maze of narrow alleys past old low houses, painted yellow or pink, to visit a Bengali family in Shambazar. Although their dwelling was poor and decrepit, the bookshelves held a yellowing Sanskrit edition of the Ramayana and classics of Indian literature and history. Returning around midnight, she passed by a fruit and cake vendor who, by the light of a flame, was reading aloud to two or three men the great Mahabharata epic. The Bengali love of learning and story, still spread by this traditional means among the illiterate, deeply impressed her. India might be poor, but, in her view, its ancient Aryan spirit was indomitable.¹⁸

From her base in Calcutta she imagined the prehistoric Aryan tribes' slow progress with their wooden-wheeled wagons down through the Punjab, the "land of the seven rivers," then along the courses of the Ganges and Jumna until the whole area between the Himalayas and the Vindhya from sea to sea was settled and recognized as Aryavarta or Aryan territory. But this was not just an ancient idyll. She was often asked by Europeans what she thought of British rule in India, to which she often wanted to counter what they thought of Roman rule in Europe. From her point of view, the legacy of Christianity in the West had proven much more enduring than that of colonial rule might ever be in India.¹⁹ For Savitri Devi, Hinduism was the custodian of the Aryan and Vedic heritage down through the centuries, the very essence of India. In her opinion, Hinduism was the sole surviving example of that Indo-European paganism once common to all the Aryan nations: "If those of Indo-European race regard the conquest of pagan Europe by Christianity as a decadence, then the whole of Hindu India can be likened to a last fortress of very ancient ideals, of very old and beautiful religious and metaphysical conceptions, which have already passed away in Europe. Hinduism is thus the last flourishing and fecund branch on an immense tree which has been cut down and mutilated for two thousand years."²⁰

Savitri Devi had left Europe to find the last living Aryan culture and found it in Hindu India. Whenever she recalled the spectacle of honors paid to the fair-skinned Aryan gods of old on the island of Rameswaram, a festival she revisited in May 1935, she thought that India of all places should be receptive to the new paganism of Nazism.²¹ At Shantiniketan she had met Margaret Spiegel (Amala Bhen), an émigré Berlin Jew working as Tagore's secretary. Spiegel was appalled by Savitri Devi and considered her a far worse Nazi than the provincial racists she had known in the Third Reich. Savitri Devi's global pan-Aryan doctrine and her recognition of Hinduism as an Aryan legacy certainly placed her apart from the narrow nationalism of most German Nazis.²² Years before in Palestine she had resolved to honor the pagan gods and fight the Judaeo-Christian legacy of the West. Her first concern now was the defense of Hinduism as the bastion of Aryandom against all encroachments by Christianity and Islam. In late 1937 she fulfilled her desire for practical engagement in this struggle by joining the Hindu Mission in Calcutta as a traveling lecturer in the states of Bengal, Bihar, and Assam. In the words of Camillo Giuriati, the Italian consul of Calcutta, she had become "the missionary of Aryan Heathendom."²³

3

HINDU NATIONALISM

Savitri Devi regarded Hinduism as the only living Aryan heritage in the modern world. In her eyes, Hinduism was a powerful ally in her campaign to confront and oppose the Judaeo-Christian heritage and its casteless, egalitarian challenge to the Aryan tradition. But her Aryan-Nazi championship of Hinduism also interacted with domestic political movements in India between the wars. These movements were concerned with varieties of Hindu nationalism, conceived as an upper-caste strategy to unify and strengthen Indian society against the threat of other cultures (Islam and Christianity), while seeking to emulate the confidence and authority of the British. These movements were strongest in northern India, where the Muslim threat was more acutely perceived, and originated in Maharashtra, where Brahmin prestige had been challenged by backward caste movements from the 1870s onward. When Savitri Devi became politically active in the late 1930s, such Hindu nationalist movements as the Hindu Mahasabha and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS—National Volunteer Union) were growing rapidly in an urgent response to Muslim ascendancy.

Both these movements had begun in the early 1920s against a background of massive communalization of Indian political life. The collapse of the Congress-Khilafat (Muslim) alliance after Gandhi's unilateral withdrawal of the Non-Cooperation movement in 1922 was followed by a great wave of riots, polarizing the Hindu and Muslim communities into conflicting camps. The same period saw the first organization of the Dalits (Untouchables or Scheduled Castes) as an anti-Brahmin movement in Maharashtra under Dr. B. R. Ambedkar. The Arya Samaj, a Hindu reforming sect of the mid-nineteenth century, championed the Aryans of the Vedic era, and the Hindu Sabha had already begun to channel these ideas into proto-Hindu nationalism in the Punjab by 1910. However, only with the launch in 1923 of the "Hindutva" idea by V. D. Savarkar, also from Maharashtra, did this ideology crystallize into an ethnic nationalism coupled with Brahminical authority. His idea inspired Dr. K. B. Hedgewar, a fellow Maharashtrian, to found the RSS, a youth organization intended to reinvigorate the nation through an awareness of India's glorious past, Hindu piety, paramilitary training, and sports.¹

At this time Hinduism in India was also directly affected by the political institutions of British rule. The principle of communal representation became general in the award of 1932, which made provision for Muslim representation in state legislatures by quotas based on the numbers of each religious group in the population. The new Hindu political organizations sought to address this problem of declining Hindu influence by seeking conversions among non-Hindus and the return to the fold of former apostates through Hindu Missions. After her arrival in 1932, Savitri Devi had sought such a Hindu agency in South India, notably without success due to the greater integration of Islam in this region. The situation was altogether different in Bengal, where the political balance was more acute. In early 1937 she presented herself to Srimat Swami Satyananda, the president of the Hindu Mission in Calcutta, and asked if she might offer her services to the Mission.

When Satyananda asked about her own religious beliefs, Savitri Devi declared she was an Aryan pagan and regretted the conversion of Europe to Christianity. She wanted to prevent the sole remaining country honoring Aryan gods from falling under the spiritual influence of the Jews. She also added that she was a devotee of Adolf Hitler, who was leading the only movement in this Aryan pagan spirit against the Judaeo-Christian civilization of the West. Satyananda was impressed by the young Greek woman with intense eyes and an outspoken manner. The Hindu Mission could certainly use such an ardent and educated fighter fluent in both Bengali and Hindi. In fact, Satyananda shared many Hindus' admiration for Hitler on account of his Aryan mythology and use of the swastika, the traditional sign of fortune and health. He told her that he considered Hitler an incarnation of Vishnu, an expression of the force preserving cosmic order. In his eyes the disciples of Hitler were the Hindus' spiritual brothers. With this meeting of minds, Satyananda engaged Savitri Devi as a Hindu Mission lecturer. Her duties involved speaking at the Mission headquarters in Calcutta and also traveling to give lectures throughout Bengal and the neighboring states of Bihar and Assam.²

By the late 1930s Savitri Devi was living in the "Ganesh Mansion" at 220 Lower Circular Road, a major thoroughfare running along the southern and eastern perimeters of the inner city. From here she had only half an hour's walk to the headquarters of the Hindu Mission in Kalighat. Her route passed by St. Paul's Cathedral with its soaring tower, the white marble walls and dome of the Victoria Memorial, the racecourse and polo ground, and beyond this the wide green expanse of the Maidan park and the bastions of Fort William. The smart Bengali residential suburb of Kalighat farther south made a proud native contrast to these splendid monuments of British India in their spacious settings. Across Tolly's Nala, a minor waterway running through Kalighat to the River Hooghly, lay the Italian Renaissance Belvedere residence of the British lieutenant governor in Bengal, and the Horticultural Gardens, various government offices, law courts, and the jails. The Hindu Mission occupied two houses at 31/2-3 and 32/B Haris Chatterji Street on the right bank of Tolly's Nala. Farther south stood the famous Kali Temple, dedicated to the angry incarnation of Shakti, the goddess of power. This sanctuary attracted a large number of pilgrims daily. Whenever Savitri Devi visited the temple, she received as a prasad (blessing) a blood-red vermillion paste, the symbol of Kali, to wear on her forehead.

By mid-1937 she was deeply involved with the Hindu Mission, which ran an active program of lectures and meetings from its headquarters at Kalighat throughout Bengal, Bihar, and Assam. Her work gave her an unparalleled opportunity to learn more about Hinduism, to observe its customs and beliefs across a large region, and to make the personal acquaintance of interesting and influential figures in Indian political life. Through the Hindu Mission she came into contact with other Hindu nationalist groups, including the youth movement of Dr. Balakrishna Shivaram Moonje, Dr. Hedgewar's Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), and the Hindu Mahasabha, whose president was the veteran Indian patriot V. D. Savarkar. His career of anti-British revolutionary extremism and his writings on Indian history, Hindu identity, and destiny exercised an important influence on Savitri Devi and the evolution of her Hindu-Aryan ideology.

Vinayak Damodar Savarkar (1883–1966) was born into a middle-class Chitpavan Brahmin family at the village of Bhagur near Nasik in the Maratha province of Maharashtra in western India. He was an early convert to the cause of Indian independence. Savarkar admired the Chaphekar brothers who had murdered a British administrator at Poona in 1897 and gone to their execution singing verses from the Bhagavad Gita; deeply impressed, he took an oath before his family goddess to fight for India's freedom. By 1899 he had begun his career of anti-British conspiracy with the founding of secret societies and went on to make patriotic speeches and organize demonstrations over the partition of Bengal in 1905. A high academic achiever, he won a scholarship in 1906 that enabled him to study in London, where he became a leading figure at the India House. Here he continued his revolutionary activities, raising political consciousness among other expatriate Indian students and learning how to make bombs. Savarkar published his first book, The War of Indian Independence (1908), to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Indian Mutiny but it was promptly suppressed by the British Government.

Meanwhile, a member of Savarkar's group was convicted of assassinating Sir Curzon Wylie in London, after his own brother Ganesh was sentenced to transportation in 1909 for terrorist activities. In 1910 the collector of Nasik was shot in revenge for the brother's sentence, and Savarkar was arrested in London for complicity in the murder. Extradited to India, he was convicted of treason and of being an accessory to murder and sentenced to two consecutive life-transportations. He served ten years in jail on the Andaman Islands, from 1911 to 1921, and three further years in prisons at Yervada, Nasik, and Ratnagiri. Savarkar used the period of his confinement for writing and became a prolific author, publishing thirty-eight books in the course of his lifetime. These included poetry, essays, and an autobiography in Marathi; the treatise on the Indian Mutiny and an account of his transportation and prison sketches in the Andamans were published in English.³

In Ratnagiri prison Savarkar wrote his famous short work Hindutva (1923), which set out his view of Indian history from a Hindu point of view and his conception of Hinduness. A preface posed the question "Who is a Hindu?" and stated, "A Hindu means a person, who regards this Land of Bharat Varsha, from the Indus to the Seas as his Fatherland as well as his Holy-Land." The work was inspired by a mythical spirit, bold generalization, and heroic quotation, which commended it to Savitri Devi and other Aryan enthusiasts. Tracing the origins of the Hindu nation, Savarkar eloquently recalled the prehistoric colonization of the Aryans:

The intrepid Aryans made [India] their home and lighted their first sacrificial fire on the banks of the Sindhu, the Indus. . . . [L]ong before the ancient Egyptians, and Babylonians had built their magnificent civilization, the holy waters of the Indus were daily witnessing the lucid and curling columns of the scented sacrificial smokes and the valleys resounding the chants of Vedic hymns—the spiritual fervor that animated their souls. The adventurous valour that propelled their intrepid enterprises, the sublime heights to which their thoughts rose—all these had marked them out as a people destined to lay the foundation of a great and enduring civilization.⁴

Savarkar's broad canvas of Indian history found a particular focus in the zenith and decline of the Mughal Empire between 1560 and 1760. The rise of Maratha power, first in Maharashtra, later throughout India, challenged and finally destroyed the Mughal Empire, ending the long period of Muslim rule in India. Savarkar regarded this Maratha ascendancy as the most important movement of Hindu liberation in Indian history: it laid the basis of a self-conscious Hindu and national identity in the entire country. His flattering view of the importance of the Marathas as the pioneers of Hindudom in modern India doubtless owed much to his own Maratha ancestry and upbringing in Maharashtra. The Maratha challenge to the impressive and long-standing edifice of Mughal authority also struck him as an inspiring precedent and prelude to his own campaign to drive out his British enemies, the founders of another secure and magnificent Indian empire. At the same time, the recent Muslim tensions and challenges to Brahmin authority in the province were an obvious factor in his ideology.

The sudden rise of the Marathas is one of the mysteries of Indian history. This race of small, sturdy individuals renowned for their hardness, perseverance, and industry lacked the grace and style of the Rajputs and other Indian tribes. The majority were Sudras or members of the cultivator class, and their leader (peshwa) was usually drawn from the small minority of an extremely intelligent and exclusive Brahmin class. The Marathas first entered history through their leader Sivaji (1627–1680), who began his career as a robber chief in the Bijapur and soon controlled a sizeable territory in defiance of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb. Sivaji killed the Muslim army chief Afzal Khan at a parley, and the Marathas destroyed his forces in 1659. The rich Mughal port of Surat was sacked by Sivaji in 1664. Now forced to take this local rebel seriously, Aurangzeb appointed his son, Prince Muazzam, to command the army in the Deccan plain against the Marathas. Associated with the prince in this campaign was the rajah Jai Singh of Jaipur, who made common cause with Sivaji and encouraged him to accept a treaty and surrender to imperial authority as an expedient in 1666.⁵ With deep approval, Savarkar quoted Sivaji's words of Hindu championship and martial resolve: "We are Hindus. The Mahamedans have subjugated the entire Deccan. They have defiled our sacred places! In fact they have desecrated our religion. We will therefore protect our religion and for that we would even lose our lives. We will acquire new kingdoms by our prowess and that bread we will eat."⁶

Periods of peace alternated with active hostilities, Maratha power increasing all the while. Continued successes involving the extortion of tribute from nominal Mughal provinces led Sivaji to assume the dignity of an independent king in a coronation at Raigarh in 1674. By the time of his death he had consolidated a small independent kingdom in western India. Although Sivaji's achievement certainly rested on military prowess, his intense devotion to Hinduism was a vital factor in arousing the defiant nationalism of the Marathas against the Mughal power. He thus welded his people, both caste-conscious Brahmins and independent farmers, into a new nation proud of its identity and Hindu religion.⁷ Savarkar overlooked Sivaji's robber state and asserted that Maratha ascendancy was no parochial movement, "The Hindu Empire . . . was the great ideal which had fired the imagination and goaded the actions of Shivaji while he was but within his teens" and commented that "the rise of Hindu power under Shivaji had electrified the Hindu mind all over India. The oppressed looked upon him as an Avatar and a Savior."⁸

Savarkar traced the subsequent expansion of Maratha power across India in the generations of Baji Rao and Nanasahab. During the rule of the second peshwa Baji Rao (1720–1740), the Marathas succeeded in making themselves masters of Gujurat, Malwa, and Bundelkhand and briefly invaded the outskirts of Delhi in 1737. The powerless and corrupt state of the Mughal Empire invited foreign intervention, first from the Persians in 1739, then from the Afghans. By 1758 the Marathas had occupied the Punjab and it seemed that they were destined to become the rulers of all India. Their frontier extended in the North to the River Indus and the Himalayas and in the South almost as far as the tip of the peninsula. Sadashiv Bhao, the cousin of the third peshwa Balaji Rao, was an outstanding military leader and the real power in the Maratha government. In 1760 he renewed the invasion of Upper India and occupied Delhi, where the triumphant Marathas celebrated the eclipse of Mughal rule by hammering the imperial throne to pieces.⁹

However, in January 1761 Maratha power was broken at the mighty third battle of Panipat outside Delhi against the Afghans, in which more than 200,000 Hindus and most Maratha leaders were slaughtered. But the Afghan advantage was quickly lost through mutiny and the Mughal Empire was now defunct.¹⁰ Savarkar therefore exalted the Marathas as the founders of a Hindu national state. In his view, this battle marked the definitive close of the Mughal period and left the Marathas, though seriously weakened, as the dominant regional power in India until the advent of the British Empire in 1818: "The day of Panipat rose, the Hindus lost the battle—and won the war. . . . [T]he triumphant Hindu banner that our Marathas had carried . . . was taken up by our Sikhs. . . . In this prolonged furious conflict our people became intensely conscious of ourselves as Hindus and were welded into a nation to an extent un-known in our history."¹¹

Following this review of the Maratha period as the era of pan-Hindu liberation, Hindutva was devoted to a description and celebration of Hinduness. Savarkar defined a Hindu as an Indian national, with references to the geographical unity of the subcontinent, the bonds of blood, and the maintenance of its purity by the caste system. "The Hindus are not merely the citizens of the Indian state," he asserted, "they are united not only by the bonds of love they bear to common motherland but also by the bonds of a common blood. . . . All Hindus claim to have in their veins the blood of the mighty race incorporated with and descended from the Vedic fathers" and "[N]o word can give a full expression to this racial unity of our people as the epithet Hindu does. . . . [W]e are all Hindus and own a common blood."¹² However, besides their shared ancestry, Savarkar claimed that Hindus were culturally united by Hindu civilization through a common history, a common literature, a common art and architecture, a common law and jurisprudence, common fairs and festivals, rites and rituals, ceremonies and sacraments. India was not only a Hindu's fatherland but also his Holy Land, for it was the land of the Vedas, Hindu mythology, god-men, ideas, and heroes.¹³

Savarkar's "Hindutva" idea thus assimilates territorial-cultural determinants into a concept of nationalism that stresses the ethnic and racial substance of the Hindu nation. It is most probable that he emphasized this racial criterion in order to minimize the importance of internal divisions in Hindu society, which he as a Brahmin wanted to preserve. He evidently rejected a liberal concept of the nation-state based on a social contract between individuals within a state's administrative borders. Here his thought was in keeping with German political theory gleaned from reading the Swiss jurist Johann Kaspar Bluntschli (1808–1881) during his years of imprisonment. Significantly, Bluntschli's concept of German ethnic nationalism influenced both Savarkar and the second leader of the RSS, M. S. Golwalkar, in their exposition of Hindu nationalism.¹⁴

Between 1924 and 1937 Savarkar was not permitted to leave the Ratnagiri district. Once this restriction was lifted, he resumed political activity, translating his philosophy of "Hindutva" into extreme Hindu nationalism. He was immediately elected president of the All India Hindu Mahasabha at its nineteenth session held at Ahmedabad in 1937 and presided over its next five annual sessions. Although the Hindu Mahasabha had been founded as a social organization in 1915, it now became a vigorous lobby group for Hindu interests under Savarkar's leadership. In his presidential speech of 1937, Savarkar described the Mahasabha as a pan-Hindu organization with the task of "the maintenance, protection and promotion of the Hindu race, culture and civilization for the advance and glory of Hindu Rashtra . . . a national body representing the Hindu Nation as a whole" and cast a watchful eye at the antinational designs of the Muslims in India.¹⁵

At the twentieth session of the Hindu Mahasabha held at Nagpur in 1938, Savarkar attacked the Indian National Congress. In his view, its secular Indian patriotism had denied the Hinduness of the Indian majority but still failed to embrace the Muslims, who jealously defended their religious community. The Congress was but a hostage of Muslim intransigence, constantly seeking to appease the Muslims to the disadvantage of the Hindu majority. Savarkar railed at the British for denying the Hindus political representation in proportion to their population through the Communal Award of 1932—in his view an unjust system of weightages and preferences—and for breaking up the Hindu electorate into such constituencies as to prevent the growth of Hindu political solidarity. He protested against the operation of quotas favoring Muslims in the government services (as high as 60 percent in Bengal, for example), and the curtailment of Hindu recruitment to the army and police with the result that the Muslim minority was predominant in these forces. Besides these political grievances, Savarkar drew a grim picture of Hindus subject to religious and racial persecution in the Muslim states of Hyderabad and Bhopal, and as the hapless victims of riots and tribal frontier raids.¹⁶ These grievances and the fear of permanent political subserviency had indeed haunted the thinking and emotions of many caste Hindus throughout the 1930s.

Savarkar concluded that the Indian National Congress had failed the Hindus; its Indian patriotism was a secular sham, and only the Hindu Mahasabha could properly represent the Indian Hindu nation. Savarkar exhorted his followers to abandon the false ideas that had prevailed since the birth of the Congress in the 1880s. Hindu nationalism was the only effective form of Indian nationalism. After a brief review of the Maratha era of Hindu nationalism and the foundation of a Hindu empire, Savarkar demanded that the self-conscious Hindu nation must again be revived and resurrected.¹⁷ At this 1938 session of the Mahasabha it was clear that Savarkar was advocating Hindu radicalism as the only effective response to Muslim provocation and ascendancy in national affairs. His extreme Hindu nationalism now tended toward a Hindu communalism that paralleled Muslim defensiveness and thus accentuated the polarization of Hindu-Muslim enmity.

Savitri Devi's involvement with the Hindu Mission in Calcutta drew her into the vortex of this Hindu nationalist movement in the late 1930s. In her writings she shared V. D. Savarkar's political concerns about Hindu disadvantage and Muslim ascendancy. She endorsed his demand for a revival of Hindu national consciousness as the only real form of Indian patriotism. She agreed with the thesis of Hindutva that Hindu nationalism must derive its strength from a sense of shared history, culture, and an awareness of India as one's Holy Land. And in return she was recognized as a valuable supporter by the nationalists themselves. Ganesh Savarkar praised her in a cordial foreword he wrote for her first book on Hinduism: "She has one advantage over the usual worker from within the Hindu fold. She was Greek by nationality. It is owing partly to her appreciation of Hindu art, thought and 'dharma,' and partly to deeper reasons that she was drawn to our society and that she adopted what we call 'Hindutva' for the rest of her life. But, naturally, being a European, she could, though from within, study the condition of the Hindus in a detached manner."¹⁸ Such recognition placed her in that tiny minority of elective Hindus, who have gained acceptance as compatriots.

Her new book, A Warning to the Hindus (1939), was published under the auspices of the Hindu Mission after she had worked there for some eighteen months. The book was evidently highly regarded by the mission, for it was also published in six Indian languages, including Bengali, Hindi, and Marathi. The first chapter, "Indian Nationalism and Hindu Consciousness" echoes V. D. Savarkar's rallying cry of "Hindutva" with her main thesis that Hinduism is the national religion of India and that there is no real India besides Hindu India. She was similarly contemptuous of Congress's secular patriotism and asserted that "there is no such thing as an Indian civilization which is neither Hindu nor Musulman. . . . [T]he only civilization for all India is Hindu civilization. The only culture for all India is Hindu culture. Indian national consciousness is nothing else but Hindu national consciousness," and again "[A]s nothing is more necessary to India, to-day, than a strong national consciousness and national pride . . . nothing is more necessary, to-day, than to revive, to exalt, to cultivate intelligent Hinduism through the length and breadth of India."¹⁹

Her work at the Hindu Mission had familiarized her with the grievances of Hindus and their sense of embattlement in the increasingly Muslim culture of some provinces. In a chapter entitled "The Defence of Hindudom: A Danger Signal," she produced statistics on the relative numerical strengths of Hindus and Muslims in various Indian states. She conceded that the Muslim minority was still negligible in the Far South (3 percent), Orissa (2 percent) and Bihar (10 percent), the United Provinces (13 percent), the Central Provinces (5 percent) and West Bengal (6 percent). However, on turning her attention to the Punjab, "the cradle of Aryan culture in India," and Bengal, her own adopted province, she saw cause for grave concern. Estimating the Hindu population of Bengal at 22 million and the Muslim population at 28 million, with a further 2 million in the border district of Assam, she found that the Muslim population of Bengal was practically half the entire Muslim population of British India. She commented that this Muslim population of Bengal alone was already more than double that of Turkey and that the Muslim population of just one of the Bengal districts (Mymensingh) was more than half that of all Arabia.²⁰ countryside and not meet a single Hindu who was consciously cultivating the religion of his forefathers with worship, devotions at a family shrine, observances and the celebration of festival days. She dwelt fondly on the now all too rare encounters with learned Brahmins in Bengali villages, marveling at their refinement and culture, their pleasure in philosophical debate, and their ready Sanskrit quotations from Holy Scriptures. "They have the sweet temper and amiable manners of people who have been aristocrats since the beginning of the world" and "by coming into contact with them, one feels like discovering an untouched spot of ancient India."²¹ But they now seemed a tiny threatened minority, while Muslims became ever more numerous in rural areas.

Already, she complained, one could walk through miles of Bengali

She was relieved to observe that the proportion of Hindus was greater in towns than in villages and took solace in the company of educated Hindus, who were numerous and kept Hindu tradition and Hindu culture alive in their homes. "While sitting with them, you feel you are in India; in fact, you are in India still," she reflected, while noting that the masses were getting day by day more Mohammedanized. Indeed, the threat of Muslim submergence and cultural alienation was becoming ever more apparent: "There are quarters in Dacca and Chittagong, where the number of bearded men that you cross in the streets, wearing a red 'tupi' upon their head, makes you feel as if you were in Cairo or in Bagdad, not in India."²²

She considered that the usual upper-caste Hindu response to this sense of decline was complacent, namely, that it was "quality" rather than "quantity" that mattered, that the existence of a small minority of educated Hindus was worth more than a mass of ignorant Hindus. She argued that it was not the tenets of Hinduism that were in danger; they would always hold true irrespective of the numbers of Hindus. It was the Hindus, as a nation, who were in danger of extinction, at least in some parts of India. She defended Hindudom, not Hinduism. She recalled that the truth in Plato's writings was still true, but that it did not keep ancient Greek society and civilization from passing away. Similarly, "[T]he value of Hinduism will not save Hindudom, if Hindudom is not strong, numerically and politically."²³

But why was the numerical strength of Hindudom and the whole notion of "Hindutva" so important to her? The relative numbers of Hindu and Muslim populations in the various Indian states, the need for a strong national consciousness and national pride in India, what significance could these issues possess for her, a Greek national who had first arrived in India only half a decade earlier? The answer to these questions is the elaboration of her Aryan cult, which is also to be found in the pages of A Warning to the Hindus. The chapter entitled "Indian Paganism: The Last Living Expression of Aryan Beauty" provided a philosophical interlude between those more prosaic sections of the book devoted to Indian nationalism, population censuses, the threat of Mohammedanization, and the need for a radical Hindu revival in the style of V. D. Savarkar. This cult of Aryanism alone represents those deeper reasons, mentioned by Ganesh Savarkar, that drew her to Hindu society and led to her lifelong adoption of "Hindutva."

Savitri Devi had come to India in 1932 to find a living equivalent of the old Aryan cults of Europe. Once she had stepped outside the bounds of Christian and secular civilization, she beheld "a cult, one of the immemorial Pagan cults, surviving in the midst of the modern world." She loved the Hindus as one of the few modern civilized people who were openly pagan and revered their country since "[India] remains the last great country of Aryan civilization, and, to a great extent, of Aryan tongue and race, where a living and beautiful Paganism is the religion both of the masses and of the intelligentzia." Her quest for the lost Aryan world, once wistfully admired in the dead culture of classical Greece, had at last found an object in a living culture. A golden age had become the present for her in exotic India and she could exclaim with delight: "We like this word 'Paganism' applied to the Hindu cults. It is sweet to the ears of more than one of the fallen Aryans of Europe, accustomed to refer to 'Pagan Greece,' and to 'Pagan Beauty,' as the most perfect expression of their own genius in the past."²⁴

Savitri Devi celebrated Hinduism for its open cult of visible beauty. This beauty, this ritual, this ceremony, she believed, had once been current in the Aryan cults of Europe, but now this cult could be found only "in its last sunny home: Hindu India." Her own experience of this cult of beauty shines through her radiant description of Indian festivals, rich with vivid colors, sumptuous magnificence, and exotic splendor:

Just go to Madura or to Rameswaram, nowadays, and see a real Hindu procession there, with elephants bearing immemorial signs of sandal and vermilion upon their foreheads, and draperies of silk and gold flowing over their backs, down to the ground; with flutes and drums, and torches reflecting their light upon the half-naked bronze bodies, as beautiful as living Greek statues; with chariots of flowers, slowly going around the sacred tank. Just see the pious crowd (hundreds and thousands of pilgrims, gathered from all parts of India), throwing flowers, as the chariots pass. And above all this, above the calm waters, the beautiful crowd, the mighty pillars, the huge pyramidal towers, shining in the moon-light . . . above all this, behold the one, simple, phosphorescent sky.

Just watch an ordinary scene of Hindu life: a line of young women walking into a temple, on a festival day. Draped in bright coloured sarees, sparkling with jewels, one by one they come, the graceful daughters of India, with flowers in their hair, with flowers and offerings in their hands. In the background: thatched huts, among the high coconut trees and green rice-fields all around,—the beauty of the Indian countryside. One by one they come, . . . like the Athenian maidens of old, whose image we see upon the frieze of the Parthenon.²⁵

The religion of beauty was not confined to the forms and colors of the popular Hindu cults. Savitri Devi deeply admired Hinduism's conception of God, in both his creative and destructive aspects, as the expression of a broad artistic outlook on life and on the universe. She dismissed Christianity and other creedal religions for their exclusive concentration on man: "[T]heir centre of interest is man, the background, man's short history, man's misery, man's craving for happiness; the scope, man's salvation." In Hinduism this anthropocentric view had no place. The center of interest was the eternal universe of existence, in which man was only a detail. The dancing succession of birth and death and rebirth in all things, over and over again, was a form of play, which in its millions of manifestations was simply beautiful. She approved of the Hindu idea that the fate of all species and individuals is to grow more conscious of the beauty of that play and eventually to experience their own identity with the force (the Godhead) playing with them. This force is adored and worshiped solely because it offers a beautiful if amoral view of existence.²⁶ For Savitri Devi, this philosophy represented the esoteric heart of the Aryan cult.

The Aryan cult she had admired in Greece had died centuries ago. Here in Hindu India she had rediscovered that lost Aryan world. However, her work at the Hindu Mission and exposure to the ideas of V. D. Savarkar and the Hindu Mahasabha suggested that this last living example of Aryan culture in the world was itself under threat. Hence her alliance with the radical Hindu nationalists, her anxious scrutiny of population censuses, and her appeal for a devotional nationalism of home and hearth to revive the memory of Sivaji and other heroes of Indian history.

Savitri Devi saw ominous parallels between the fate of pagan classical Greece and the endangered Aryan cult of India. She compared the experience of beleaguered Hindus in Muslim-dominated provinces to that of Greek pagans in their own country during the early Middle Ages. She recalled the oppression of the last pagans by the Christians: works of art destroyed, festivities stopped, schools of philosophy shut down, wise men exiled. She characterized the period from Emperor Constantine I until the accession of Emperor Julian (A.D. circa 331–363) in terms of “the growing tyranny exercised by the Christians . . . upon the declining minority of Pagans, in the towns and villages of Greece, Asia-Minor, Egypt, Italy.”²⁷

This alarmist comparison between late ancient Greece and present-day India was extended to indicate the dreadful possibility that Hindu India might itself become a dead civilization. In the context of a threatened Hindu world, her memories of the sun-bleached ruins of Athens and the Attic peninsula were no longer just relics of a golden age but omens for India: “Greece is covered with gorgeous ruins. Upon steep promontories, there are still rows of white columns, looking over the blue sea, full of isles. There are blocks of sculptured marble, and old statues to be found even in the market place. But living life all around, runs on different lines. The national Gods have become objects of admiration in museums. . . . But nobody worships them. There are no Panathenian processions, in pomp and glory, going up the Acropolis today.”²⁸

She warned that Hindu complacency and inaction were a clear sign of weakness, that Hindudom was yielding every day to hostile forces, losing its numerical advantage, its political rights in the country, and its place as a nation. The fate of pagan Greece could easily overtake the Hindus and become the fate of pagan India tomorrow. She painted a desolate picture of India without Hindus: “A swarm of mosques will be built here and there, in the place of minor shrines. Mohammedan life and European life combined, will make unrecognisable India look much like modern Egypt. Cultured Indians will look upon their national Gods, as Christian Europeans look upon Greek ‘mythology.’ And the Ganges will still be flowing. But there will be no ritual bathing in its waters, no pilgrims, going up and down its ‘ghats,’ no garlands of flowers thrown into it as an offering. India . . . will no longer be 'our' India."²⁹

Savitri Devi followed the Hindu nationalists in her recommendation of measures for a revival of Hindudom. In her chapter devoted to social reforms, she identified the major causes of numerical losses in Hindudom as the denial of elementary social rights to the minority of Hindus; the strictness of social rules within the Hindu fold, leading to the easy outcasting of transgressors; and the refusal of the Hindu fold to accept those who wished to return, let alone those who wanted to convert to Hinduism. Again she drew a parallel with the ancient world. The triumph of Christianity was largely attributable to the rigidity of the Graeco-Roman social order. Although ancient Greek and Roman society was not as complicated and caste-ridden as Hindudom, there was a wide gulf between the freeman and the slave. The universal appeal of Christianity to all men exploded such division and hierarchy. Echoing the fierce antichristian invective of Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900), she regarded the victory of Christianity as a widespread revolt of the slaves and barbarians against the existing social order of the Roman Empire. Mindful of this historical Aryan failure in Europe, Savitri Devi advised the relaxation of the caste system with its rights and privileges, in order to develop a Hindu populism. Here she was reflecting the ideas of V. D. Savarkar, who regarded the caste system as a brake on the development of Hindu solidarity and nationalism.³⁰

She foresaw naturally that the upper-caste Hindus would fiercely defend their rights and their exclusiveness but asked what good such reactionary attitudes would achieve if all was swept away with the extinction of Hinduism. She pointed out that the noble families of ancient Greece and Rome had been lost, and no single modern Greek or Roman could now be sure that there were neither slaves nor barbarians among his ancestors. Their defense of family privilege had not addressed the universal challenge of Christianity and, in consequence, the vigor and endurance of the old Aryan cult in Europe was lost. Unless the Hindus now made a desperate effort to overcome the disadvantages of Hindu society, there would be no future for all Hindus, let alone for the precious privileges of the Hindu elite.³¹

Her recommendations were both social and national, rehearsing key aspects of the "Hindutva" agenda. Hindudom should unite into one firm, invincible bloc, trained in the art of self-defense; it was vital to keep all Hindus, without distinction of caste or creed, within that bloc; and it was important to bring within that bloc as many converts from Islam and Christianity as possible by attracting them to Hinduism as their own national cult. Caste privilege and prejudices should be given up in order to ensure a united Hindu consciousness. Moreover, all Hindus should consider the Hindu heritage of art, literature, and scripture their own as a matter of national pride and self-assertion. Women should play an important part in fostering a family education in devotional nationalism with domestic shrines for Sivaji and other national heroes. Her emphasis on unity over caste echoed Savarkar's strategy of protecting Brahminism in an inclusive form of ethnic nationalism. But her wish for a patriotic bloc trained in the art of self-defense was inspired by a certain divergence between the Mahasabha and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS—National Volunteer Union) in the late 1930s.

As early as 1925 Dr. Hedgewar had founded the RSS to foster "Hindutva" activism among the Maharashtrian youth. Born into an orthodox Deshastha Brahmin family in Nagpur, Keshavrao Baliram Hedgewar (1889–1940) qualified as a medical doctor but devoted his whole life to the struggle for Indian political freedom. By 1910 he had been initiated into the national struggle by Balakrishna Shivaram Moonje (1872–1948), a former aide of B. G. Tilak and leader of the Hindu Sabha in Nagpur. Hedgewar learned terrorist techniques from the Bengali secret societies, after joining the inner circle of Anushilan Samiti (Society of Practice) during his college years. Back at Nagpur in 1916–1919, he organized anti-British activities through the Kranti Dal (Party of the Revolution) and participated in Tilak's Home Rule Campaign of February 1918. He brought to all his political activities a deep religious sense. After reading Savarkar's Hindutva and meeting the author in March 1925, he founded the RSS, a Hindu nationalist sect that has proved a vital factor in Hindu politics right up to the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) of the 1990s.³²

How could a vast country like India be so easily ruled by a small group of colonial administrators? Recognizing that Indian subjection was due to lack of unity, vitality, and physical strength, Hedgewar promoted Hindu self-consciousness, high morale, and athletic prowess through the RSS, founded at Nagpur on 27 September 1925. The date of its inauguration was chosen because it was the date of the festival commemorating Rama's defeat of Ravana in the epic. Hindu religious ceremonial played a large part in this youth movement with its own ritual calendar and obeisance to the saffron flag of Rama, which was said to have served as Sivaji's battle standard. Swayamsevaks (volunteers) wore a uniform of black forage cap, khaki (later white) shirt, and khaki shorts. The shirt and shorts were adopted in conscious emulation of the British police. The paramilitary style extended to sports and weapons training with the lathi (bamboo staff), sword, javelin, and dagger. The combination of native Hindu observance with a tough image of British authority was intended to build character and an awareness of India's glorious past. Initially, the movement restricted itself to young boys aged twelve to fifteen years in Maharashtra. Its public tasks involved protecting Hindu pilgrims at festivals and confronting Muslim prohibitions on music before a mosque.³³

B. S. Moonje was a cofounder of the RSS, and Ganesh Savarkar, Savitri Devi's patron, helped the organization expand in western Maharashtra by merging his own Tarun Hindu Sabha (Hindu Youth) and Mukteshwar Dal (Liberation Organization) into the RSS.³⁴ In 1927 Hedgewar instituted the Officers' Training Camp (OTC) in order to build a corps of pracharaks (preachers), who formed the leadership of the RSS. Celibate and leading an austere life of devotion to the cause (even today), members of this elite acted as military-group leaders and gurus to the young Hindu men. Lacking trained cadres of its own, the Hindu Mahasabha regarded the RSS as a valuable asset for youth politics. At its 1932 Delhi session the Mahasabha commended its activities and emphasized the need to spread its network all over the country. The RSS shakha (local branch) network expanded from 18 in the Nagpur area in 1928 to about 125 (with 12,000 volunteers) throughout Maharashtra in 1933. By the late 1930s, with sharpening Hindu-Muslim conflict in North India, the RSS had covered many provinces with some 40,000 volunteers in 400 shakhas in 1938, rising to 60,000 in 500 branches by 1939.³⁵

Nehru and other commentators have seen the RSS as an Indian version of fascism. By the late 1930s the Hindu nationalists were taking note of European fascism. Savarkar approved the German occupation of the Sudetenland on the grounds of common blood, and the Nazi Party paper, the Völkischer Beobachter, carried a feature on him.³⁶ When Madhav Sadashiv Golwalkar, shortly to succeed Hedgewar as RSS leader, published his book We, or Our Nationhood Defined (1939), the RSS message of ethnic nationalism was unequivocal. Golwalkar rejected Congress's liberal concept of nationhood and quoted Bluntschli at length. The Anschluß of Austria and annexation of the Sudetenland were "logical," conforming with "the true Nation concept."³⁷ Race was the most important ingredient of nationality for Golwalkar, who was deeply impressed by Hitler's ideology:

German national pride has now become the topic of the day. To keep up the purity of the Race and its culture, Germany shocked the world by her purging the country of the semitic races—the Jews. Race pride at its highest has been manifested here. Germany has also shown how well nigh impossible it is for Races and cultures, having differences going to the root, to be assimilated into one united whole, a good lesson for us in Hindusthan to learn and profit by.³⁸

In contrast to his mentor Hedgewar, Golwalkar advocated a strongly racial concept of the Hindu nation and urged Hindus to regard themselves at war with both the Muslims and the British.

The RSS was the crucible of Hindu national identity by the time Savitri Devi was penning her book. But Hedgewar was primarily concerned to build up Hindu solidarity and saw a Hindu state only as a long-term goal. He was reluctant to deploy the RSS in political action as the troops of the Mahasabha.³⁹ This explains why Golwalkar and Savitri Devi urged its further militarization along fascist lines. During 1938 and 1939 violent anti-Hindu riots became more frequent in Muslim-dominated provinces, and many Hindus were apprehensive about security. V. D. Savarkar dwelt on these riots in his presidential addresses to the Hindu Mahasabha in both years. Savitri Devi also referred to the riots and expressed anxiety about the future maintenance of order in an independent India without the British presence. Satyananda, her mission boss in Calcutta, had already called for young Hindu men to organize in pledge-bound military cadres.⁴⁰

Savitri Devi applauded Satyananda's idea, seeing military organization as an ideal means of educating the Hindus in a new mentality of unity, brotherhood, and cooperation. She agreed that the Hindus should be rid of their long-suffering image and reputation for unlimited forbearance. For her, the national cult of India was rather a cult of strength and youth, the cult of the fair Aryan warriors, worshipers of Dawn, who settled in India ages ago. All members of the new military cadres should take an oath that they would place the welfare of Hindudom above any considerations of personal welfare; that they would treat any Hindu as they would treat a man of their own caste; that they were responsible for the defense of the wider Hindu community throughout India; that they would unconditionally obey their leader. Savitri Devi was certain that such militant Hinduism could most effectively forge the new Hindu nationalism, since "military life creates a new society, with a new type of relationship, a new brotherhood: the brotherhood of those who share the same hardships and the same dangers, who obey the same orders, and fight on the same side."⁴¹

Just as the decline of Hindudom threatened the extinction of this last surviving Aryan cult, so the promise of its military and nationalist revival conjured the vision of a global Aryan renaissance. Savitri Devi invoked the memory of Emperor Julian "the Apostate" (reigned A.D. 361–363), who renounced Christianity and attempted a revival of paganism and the Olympian gods in the Roman Empire. She dreamed of a martial and powerful India turning the clock back some fifteen hundred years and even reintroducing the old Aryan cult of paganism anew in Europe:

Hinduism, once, used to extend over what is now Afghanistan, over Java, over Cambodia. . . . Powerful Hindu India could reconquer these lands and give them back the pride of their Indian civilisation. She could make Greater India once more a cultural reality, and a political one too. . . . She could teach the fallen Aryans of the West the meaning of their forgotten Paganism; she could rebuild the cults of Nature, the cults of Youth and Strength, wherever they have been destroyed; she could achieve on a world-scale what Emperor Julian tried to do. . . . And the victorious Hindus could erect a statue to Julian, somewhere in conquered Europe, on the border of the sea; a statue with an inscription, both in Sanskrit and in Greek: What thou hast dreamt, We have achieved.⁴²

Her apocalypse of a global Aryan revival by means of Indian imperialism envisaged the total eclipse of Christianity and secular humanism. A new Aryan-Hindu-classical pagan order would arise in the West. Her Aryan ideal formed the link between her admiration of ancient Greece and her hopes of Hindu India. She would later write she had done her best for the Aryan cause in "the two old hallowed centres of Aryan culture: Greece and India."⁴³ A Warning to the Hindus had drawn frequent parallels between the decline of pagan Greece and the vulnerability of Hinduism in modern India. At the same time, hopes of a resurrected Hindu Indian empire presaged an Aryan Europe. It was therefore only fitting that the book should link Julian and India in a dedication of hopeful prophecy: "Dedicated to the Divine Julian, Emperor of the Greeks and Romans. May future India make his impossible dream a living reality, from one Ocean to the Other."⁴⁴

The year 1939 had seen massive demonstrations of Hindu nationalists in the Muslim Nizam state of Hyderabad. This Nizam Civil Resistance movement led by the Arya Samaj and the Hindu Mahasabha fielded more than fifteen thousand supporters. Punjabis, Madrasis, Sindhis, Bengalis, Beharis, Marathas, Sikhs, Jains, Brahmins, and Bhangis, rich and poor, the Hindus joined in marches and protests for a six-month period under a common Hindu banner. The orange pan-Hindu Mahasabha flag with its immemorial Vedic symbols of green swastika, lotus stem, and curved sword beneath the holy word AUM flew triumphantly over the massed ranks of demonstrators throughout the Nizam state. V. D. Savarkar saw the movement as a Hindu crusade and paid a fulsome tribute to all participants in his presidential address to the Mahasabha later that year.⁴⁵

Perhaps such scenes of huge demonstrations marching under the swastika of the pan-Hindu flag encouraged Savitri Devi to see the modern Hindus as the victorious soldiers of a future Aryan world empire, which would fulfill Emperor Julian's dream of a pagan revival in the West. And yet, India was still part of the British Empire in 1939; even she must at times have doubted the truth of this vision. Already she was searching for another, more forceful agent of Aryan revival. The Hellenes of Greece, the Hindus of India, both were fighters in the Aryan cause. But neither nation had the power to challenge the Western democracies and their colonial world order. The rhetoric of A Warning to the Hindus might serve to foment Hindu nationalism, but her hopes for a global racial renaissance were now increasingly linked to the Third Reich in Germany.

Savitri Devi's alliance with the Hindu movements was chiefly due to Hindutva nationalism's intimate involvement with Brahminical culture. Its concept of ethnicity was rooted in upper-caste racism, and this helps explain why both the Mahasabha and the RSS were unable to tap more mass support before the war. The subsequent success of Hindu nationalism after the Second World War does not form part of Savitri Devi's story. But it has remained a powerful and enduring factor in Indian politics right up to the present day. Following Indian independence in 1947, the RSS with about 600,000 volunteers nationwide entered national politics. Briefly banned after Gandhi's murder, Golwalkar's RSS network successfully forged a coalition with the new Jana Sangh in 1951, which became the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) in 1980. In the early 1990s, with Muslim confrontation and the bid to restore upper-caste authority, the BJP reenacted the urgency of the situation in the 1930s. New plans for a magnificent Rama temple in the holy city of Ayodhya were mooted. The demolition of the great Babri Masjid mosque on the proposed site by RSS extremists on 6 December 1992, an image flashed worldwide by news agencies, was but another climax in the long history of Hindutva politics.⁴⁶

4

THE NAZI BRAHMIN

Since the mid-1930s observers of the international scene could note that Italy, Japan, and Germany had each embarked on campaigns to extend their spheres of influence and to revise the balance of power in their favor. Italy attacked Abyssinia in October 1935, in order to create an East African empire including the Italian colonies of Eritrea and Somalia. In March 1936 Germany had occupied the Rhineland in a flagrant challenge of the Versailles Treaty; France and Britain stood by; the League of Nations merely expressed condemnation. Germany's prominent military support for Franco in the Spanish Civil War, the creation of the Axis with Italy in autumn 1936, followed by the Anti-Comintern Pact with Japan in November all served to confirm the impression that the Third Reich was a new power to be reckoned with.

Between 1935 and 1938 there was considerable escalation in the use of military force in the world and a corresponding decline in the authority of the League of Nations. A war was already being fought in the Far East, following the Japanese attack on China in 1937 and the subsequent occupation of Peking and the eastern provinces. In Europe Germany was putting great pressure on its neighbors with German-speaking populations, leading to the Anschluss of Austria in March 1938 and the resultant encirclement of the Sudetenland provinces of Czechoslovakia. The Munich Conference of September 1938, attended by the German and Italian dictators, and the British and French prime ministers, ratified the cession of the Sudetenland to Germany, stripping Czechoslovakia of its mountainous border defenses and preparing the way for an invasion of Prague and the establishment of the German protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia in March 1939. Hitler had effectively forced Britain and France to agree to the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, the state they themselves had created in late 1918 and sanctioned at the Versailles Peace Conference. Nazi Germany had clearly emerged from the Munich Conference as the most powerful state in Europe.

As a rival and potential opponent of Britain, the Third Reich was of interest to extreme Indian nationalists in their quest for independence. However, it was a major drawback to them that the Nazi view of India was generally disparaging. In Mein Kampf (1925) Hitler made no secret of his contempt for anticolonial movements. He characterized Indian freedom fighters as "Asiatic jugglers" and denied any parallel between Germany's desire to shake off the postwar Versailles system and anticolonial rebellion in India or Arab nationalist movements. For him, the oppressed nations were simply racially inferior.¹ Moreover, his racialist ideas were subject to considerations of foreign and colonial policy. As long as he hoped for an arrangement with Britain regarding Germany's continental expansion, Hitler thought that it was best that India should remain under existing British control. Even later, when his policy toward Britain became hostile, Hitler did not modify this view. He believed that India must stay under white man's dominion; considered British rule to be exemplary; and feared only its possible replacement by Soviet Russia. In his many later wartime references to India, he frequently cited British rule in India as the model for Germany's future domination of eastern Lebensraum in Russia.² Alfred Rosenberg, the chief Nazi ideologue, shared these racial and political views on India. He was also contemptuous of the Indians as racially unconscious "poor bastards" and refused to regard them as proto-Aryans. Any Nordic blood in the tropics, he believed, had long since been dissipated among the huge numbers of the dark-skinned races. Like Hitler, he thought British rule in India must be supported.³

Much Indian public opinion was hostile toward Nazism owing to this negative racial view. There had been widespread indignation at racialist attacks against Asians in the Nazi media and at physical assaults against the small Indian community in Germany. Although a cell for Nazi members had been founded in India in July 1932, growing into a territorial group (Landesgruppe) by 1937, there was also the active Anti-Nazi League that successfully encouraged the boycott of German goods by publicizing the racist statements of Nazi leaders. In December 1938 there was official condemnation of Nazi Germany with an anti-German declaration by the Congress, mainly in response to the nationwide attacks on Jewish shops and property in early November known as Kristallnacht. Both diplomatic and commercial pressures were brought to bear upon the Reich government to tone down its disparaging views on India, but no flexibility was forthcoming since the Nazi leadership considered the preservation of good relations with Britain to be paramount. When the Indian nationalist leader Subhas Chandra Bose spent several months in Germany between July 1933 and the spring of 1936 and again in the autumn of 1937, his efforts to achieve a better Indo-German understanding were fruitless at a governmental level; both Hitler and Ribbentrop declined to meet him before the war.⁴

But Bose and many extreme nationalists still had hopes of Nazi Germany. In their profound hostility toward British rule, they were eager to explore any prospect of finding anti-British allies among the dictatorships in Europe. In their zeal they either completely overlooked the evidence of anti-Indian Nazi racism or thought it a mere cover for diplomatic policies still working toward a misguided arrangement with Britain, which would surely be rejected in due course. After the German invasion of Prague in March 1939, Indian opinion on Germany polarized sharply into two camps: those who would be loyal to Britain in the event of a war between Britain and Germany and those who would not. The Hindu Mahasabha adopted a particularly strong pro-German position, assuming a close congruence between the Aryan cult of Nazism and Hindu nationalism. As one Mahasabha spokesman declared:

Germany's solemn idea of the revival of Aryan culture, the glorification of the Swastika, her patronage of Vedic learning and the ardent championship of the tradition of Indo-Germanic civilization are welcomed by the religious and sensible Hindus of India with a jubilant hope. . . . Germany's crusade against the enemies of Aryan culture will bring all the Aryan nations of the world to their senses and awaken the Indian Hindus for the restoration of their lost glory.⁵

These pro-Nazi views of the Mahasabha would have impressed Savitri Devi in early 1939 when she was close to the Mahasabha and in the final stages of writing A Warning to the Hindus. However, she had already made earlier pro-Nazi contacts in Calcutta. She had already met Subhas Chandra Bose, probably at some stage in 1937, when the latter had returned to Indian political life after some five years' absence due to travel in Germany, Austria, and Italy and intermittent detention by the British authorities. She admired Bose's uncompromising Indian nationalism but swiftly understood that he was more an Indian politician than a dedicated Nazi. His interest in the Third Reich was largely tactical, based on the old maxim that my enemy's enemy is my friend: that closer links between India and Hitler's Germany could help nationalists in some future bid for independence from British rule. In common with most educated Indian nationalists he was impressed by India's Vedic past, but these interests were principally a means of bolstering Indian self-esteem and fostering patriotic pride in a great pre-colonial civilization. In these respects his views would have appeared politically helpful to Savitri Devi, even if she could not recognize in Bose a Nazi ideological comrade.

She was to meet just such an admirer of Aryan racism and Adolf Hitler in early January 1938, when a Greek acquaintance in Calcutta gave her an introduction to Asit Krishna Mukherji, a Hindu publisher with strong pro-German sympathies. He was the editor and proprietor of The New Mercury, a fortnightly National Socialist magazine published with the support of the German consulate in Calcutta from 1935 until 1937, when it was suppressed by the British government. She had already noticed this publication, which was the only Nazi paper in India, during her earlier travels around Bengal and read its contents with great interest. Mukherji's editorial line was unabashedly pro-German and pro-Nazi, yet he also stood for a pan-Aryan racism with a strong Indian element. The articles in the magazine were written by Mukherji, his coeditor Vinaya Datta, and others. Their subjects ranged from Hitler's views on the nation and architecture, and translated excerpts of Mein Kampf to studies on the original Aryans, the origin of the swastika, and the Arctic homeland of the Aryans.

A. K. Mukherji assiduously cultivated cordial relations with the German consulate at 3 Lansdowne Road in Calcutta and was on excellent terms with the consul, Baron Edwart von Selzam (1897-1980); the consul-general, Baron Wernher von Ow-Wachendorf; and his successor Count von Podewils-Durnitz. In return Mukherji received for his publication a stream of news and other features highly favorable to Hitler and the Third Reich. On the eve of his departure for a new assignment in 1938, Baron von Selzam wrote in a secret communiqué to all German legations in the Far East that no one had rendered services to the Third Reich in Asia comparable to those of Sri Asit Krishna Mukherji's.⁶

At their first meeting on 9 January, Savitri Devi and A. K. Mukherji made a strong impression on each other. Mukherji came from an old Brahmin family, whose ancestors had come from North India to Bengal in the twelfth century at the invitation of King Balamicen, who had converted the country from Buddhism back to Hinduism and wished to reintroduce the caste system. Under Buddhism the Bengali population was a mixture of aborigines and Dravidians, and it had therefore been necessary to import a new ruling caste of priests from the northern Hindu states. As a scion of such ancient Aryan stock, Mukherji was noticeably fair and light-skinned. His family comprised six brothers and two sisters, and following the early death of his father, his elder brother Asoka took responsibility for their affairs. Asoka decided that Asit Krishna should complete his education in Europe in view of his scholarly distinction at school. Mukherji attended London University, subsequently taking a doctorate in history with a thesis on the "Third Rome," the millenarian conception of Moscow and the Russian Empire as the successor of Byzantium. These interests in Russia and wider questions of religious and cultural influence provided the starting point of Mukherji's odyssey through the ideologies of the modern world.⁷

Like many other Indian nationalists, he was initially attracted to Russia as a potential ally against Britain. Following his graduation from London University, he spent two years studying and traveling in the Soviet Union. The Soviet authorities were eager to recruit Indian supporters and feted Mukherji with privileges and special visits to show-piece achievements in order to gain a promising communist sympathizer and agent for political work in India. But Mukherji was unimpressed by the proletarian paradise and its materialist ideology. On returning to India, he turned down numerous offers of work from communist newspaper editors. Once this became known, he was approached by liberal and anticommunist publishers, eager to secure the services of an educated Indian who had seen the Soviet Union at first hand and rejected its system. But Mukherji was having none of it. Unknown to all, he was profoundly convinced that economic interpretations of society were flawed. In his opinion, it mattered little whether capitalism was organized for the benefit of the individual, as in the Western democracies, or for the state, as in the Soviet Union. His view of history and politics was colored by a racial perspective: states rose and fell in accordance with the vigor of their racial stocks. He thus surprised everybody when he commenced publishing The New Mercury with its self-proclaimed support of Nazi Germany and Aryan racism.

Mukherji admired the growing might and influence of the Third Reich. He was deeply impressed by the Aryan ideology of Nazi Germany, with its cult of Nordic racial superiority, anti-Semitism, and race laws. He approved of the German emphasis on the Hellenic ideal of physical strength and beauty, so well displayed in the Olympic Games held in Berlin in the summer of 1936. He recognized the Nazi flag—a black swastika upon a white circle on a red background—as a close relative of the pan-Hindu flag with its ancient Aryan symbols of swastika, lotus, and sword. Likewise, he saw the parallels between the martial spirit of the Third Reich and the old Hindu warrior tradition of the Marathas and other Indian races, between K. B. Hedgewar's Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) boys in their khaki shorts and the uniformed Hitler Youth. When M. S. Golwalkar succeeded Hedgewar as leader of the RSS in 1940, Mukherji was surely pleased to note the latter's open admiration of Nazi Germany. Just as the Hindu nationalists were protesting against colonial rule, Germany was also on the march in defense of Aryandom and had already challenged Britain and France, its sworn enemies, for an end to the ignominious Versailles settlement and more, for the leading position in Europe.

Savitri Devi's encounter with Mukherji was a pivotal event in her life. She had at long last found someone with pan-Aryan convictions who shared her belief in the Aryan revival of India. She was astonished at his knowledge of European and particularly Byzantine history (a topic dear to her own heart) but recognized him as a master and teacher in matters relating to Nazism and the Third Reich. At their very first meeting Mukherji asked what she thought of Dietrich Eckart, the bohemian poet, famous playwright, and racist publisher who had acted as Hitler's mentor and introduced him to influential and moneyed circles in Munich after the First World War. Dietrich Eckart (1868–1923) had also frequented the Thule Society, a clandestine German nationalist group founded in early 1918 by the mysterious Rudolf von Sebottendorff to propagate Aryan racism in the Bavarian capital. Mukherji saw the Thule Society with its pan-Aryan ideas as the secret initiatory society behind the open political movement of National Socialism.⁸ Savitri Devi knew nothing about Eckart or the Thule Society and was dazzled by this educated Brahmin's knowledge concerning the esoteric inspiration of the Hitler movement. The two became firm friends and comrades-in-arms for the Nazi cause in India.

The meeting with Mukherji also provided a strong impetus for Savitri Devi's return to Europe. As she had declared in 1937 to the president of the Hindu Mission, she was a devotee of Hitler. During the early September days of each year she spent in India during the 1930s, she had fervently listened to the crackling radio broadcasts from the Nazi Party rallies in Nuremberg. Thus she had shared the overwhelming enthusiasm of the German crowds for their adored Führer amid the waving flags and vast tribunes. Mukherji knew and understood her passion but was convinced that she could achieve more for Nazism in Germany than in her Hindu Mission work. He urged her to work for Hitler and Aryan rebirth at the German center: "What have you been doing in India, all these years, with your ideas and your potentialities? Wasting your time and energy. Go back to Europe, where duty calls you!—go and help the rebirth of Aryan Heathendom where there are still Aryans strong and wide-awake; go to him who is truly life and resurrection: the Leader of the Third Reich. Go at once; next year will be too late."⁹

But Savitri Devi considered her work in India to be more pioneering; there seemed no need for haste in view of waxing German power and its territorial expansion. However, with the outbreak of war between Britain and Germany in September 1939, the situation quickly changed. All pro-German activities in British India were proscribed, and she could no longer risk lacing her Hindu Mission lectures with praise of Hitler and Nazism. Mukherji's early advice now seemed highly appropriate, and she considered various ways whereby she could join the German war effort by making Nazi broadcasts in French, Greek, and Bengali back in Europe. A direct journey from India to a belligerent state was out of the question. However, because Italy had not yet entered the war, a voyage to Naples seemed to offer prospects of entering Germany. She had planned to sail from Bombay on an Italian vessel in late June 1940, but the unexpected Italian declaration of war against the Allies on 10 June left the ship stranded at Bombay.¹⁰ Now she was trapped and powerless in India. In later years, after the defeat of Nazi Germany, she would often bitterly reproach herself for having failed to take Mukherji's advice.¹¹ problematic. The holder of a Greek passport, she was known to the British authorities as a Hindu Mission lecturer with Nazi sympathies. As a suspected alien, she ran a clear risk of deportation or detention. But as a British passport holder, she would still be able to travel without restrictions. In early 1940 Mukherji therefore proposed that they marry, in order that she become the wife of a British subject and so return to Europe.¹² It was, she claims, not a romantic match but one based on their cordial friendship and shared ideals. The date set for the wedding coincided with news of the British evacuation from Dunkirk and the imminent fall of France. Resplendent in her best gold-and-scarlet sari, Savitri Devi was married to Asit Krishna Mukherji in a Hindu ceremony on 9 June 1940 in Calcutta. Her hopes of a later passage to Italy and broadcasting for the Reich were rudely dashed the following day when Italy entered the war, eager for the spoils of France. She was now to remain in India for the duration of the war.

After September 1939 Savitri Devi's position in Calcutta had become

Their marital home was an apartment at 1 Wellesley Street, an inner city road running parallel to Chowringhee Road, while Mukherji's office was located in the center of smart white Calcutta at 8 Esplanade East. The Esplanade itself was the thoroughfare running from west to east in front of Government House, the residence of the governor of Bengal between the wars. This imposing Georgian mansion had been commissioned at exorbitant cost by Lord Wellesley (1760–1842), the elder brother of the Duke of Wellington, on the model of Lord Curzon's ancestral home, Kedleston Hall in Derbyshire, and was completed in 1805. Until 1911, when Delhi superseded Calcutta as the administrative capital of India, this had been the residence of the governor-general (later the viceroy) during the Raj, and thus the focus of sumptuous festivities and splendid military displays. Just across the Esplanade stretched the cool green expanse of the Maidan park crossed by graceful avenues of mature trees, with views of the Ochterlony Monument, the Eden Gardens, and Fort William in the distance. Other grand representative buildings in the Esplanade area included the Old Town Hall in Grecian style and the Imperial Library. Across from Mukherji's office lay the Curzon Gardens, while further to the southeast ran Chowringhee Road, the most fashionable precinct of Calcutta, where shops, hotels, and restaurants occupied the old palaces and mansions dating from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. A brief memoir provides a portrait of Savitri Devi in early wartime Calcutta: "Walking down Chowringhee Avenue [sic] under my bright-coloured parasol, feeling happy; boasting of Germany's lightning victories and talking of the coming world New Order in Indian tea-parties."¹³

With the notable exception of extremist pro-German nationalists, India remained loyal to Britain in its war against Germany. However, because the war was represented as a war of democratic and freedom-loving peoples against Nazi tyranny and the German appetite for conquest, Indian politicians were quick to demand assurances from the British government regarding the future of their country. It was expected that Allied war aims would also provide for Indian independence and self-government once the war was over. International hostilities thus tended to rally the Indian Congress in support of its goal of self-determination and this had the effect of defusing communal strife between Hindus and Muslims. The Hindu Mission took a softer line after the outbreak of war, and in the summer of 1940 Savitri Devi penned another Mission publication intended to join the two great religious groups in a spirit of nationalist reconciliation. During a visit to South India in July 1940 she was inspired by the words inscribed upon the tomb of Sultan Tippu (1753–1799), the Muslim ruler of Mysore, near Seringapatam. Its prayer for perfect peace reminded her how India's religious conflicts had long prevented its political unity. In her book The Non-Hindu Indians and Indian Unity (1940) she wrote that India must forget social prejudice and communal hatred in order to achieve national independence.

Both Asit Krishna Mukherji and Savitri Devi undertook clandestine war work on behalf of the Axis powers in Calcutta. When Savitri Devi met Mukherji in early 1938, The New Mercury had already been closed down by the British government. Although the magazine appeared under the auspices of the German consulate, Mukherji was the editor and as a British subject he could claim no diplomatic immunity. With a fine sense for diplomatic and political allegiances, Mukherji began publishing a new magazine called The Eastern Economist in collaboration with the Japanese legation in Calcutta at 5–6 Esplanade Mansions, not far from his office. Mukherji was also on calling terms with K. Yonezawa and T. Yoshida, successive Japanese consul-generals between 1937 and 1940. Although this pro-Japanese editorial activity offered less scope for his pan-Aryan articles and Teutonic enthusiasm, he was at least working with a close ally of Germany in the Anti-Comintern Pact and its future military partner. Savitri Devi claimed that Mukherji knew Subhas Chandra Bose, the firebrand Bengali Congress nationalist leader, who escaped from India in early 1941 and reached Germany where he set up the "Free India Center" in Berlin and recruited for an Indian Legion from among captured Indian POWs in the Third Reich. She also stated that Mukherji used his position with the Japanese legation to put Bose in contact with the Japanese authorities, with whom he collaborated between 1943 and 1945 in organizing the Indian National Army (INA) in Burma.¹⁴ Bose's long and notorious career in Indian nationalist politics, his vehement opposition to the British, and his readiness to seek allies among Britain's enemies in order to achieve independence for India are the subject of the next chapter.

During the first two years of the war, domestic life continued at the Mukherji household in Wellesley Street much as before. Savitri Devi and Mukherji typically spent their evenings reading and discussing Vedic traditions, racial ideology, and Hitler's Mein Kampf. Alongside her work with the Hindu Mission, she spent some time at a club learning about Indian cuisine and practicing yoga, which she had originally been taught in 1936 by a Brahmin at Lahore. Although the Indian Congress was loudly demanding assurances from the British government concerning self-rule in the context of a war fought by the democracies against the dictatorships, the streets of Calcutta were unchanged from peacetime. The Bengalis were not among the "martial races" recognized by the British and thus not usually subject to recruitment for the Indian Army. However, once Britain moved to secure its position in the Middle East by sending troops to Persia and Iraq in 1941, large numbers of the Indian Army were deployed and recruitment was stepped up. However, it was not until the entry of Japan into the war in December 1941 that Calcutta was put on a proper wartime footing. Once the Japanese forces had overrun Thailand, the city was within range of Japanese bombers and there were sporadic airraid alerts.

From late 1941 onward considerable numbers of British and American servicemen were stationed in Calcutta. Their presence and this closer involvement of the city in hostilities enabled the Mukherjis to play their small part in military espionage activities. Every Wednesday Savitri Devi invited Allied officers from the East and West Club in Chowringhee Terrace to come and meet her husband at their home.¹⁵ Bottles of whisky provided by a relative lightened the mood and loosened the tongues of their Allied guests. The Americans in particular were delighted by Mukherji. No doubt flattered by an invitation to a Brahmin's home, they were interested to learn something about Hindu lore and astrology from this knowledgeable and engaging Indian. As Mukherji ingeniously laced his discussions of the war with derogatory references to Hermann Goering and other Nazi leaders, they never once suspected his pro-German sympathies and Nazi convictions. One American Jew, Savitri Devi recalled with relish, was a particularly good source of indiscretions concerning strategic information and military plans. Whatever useful information Mukherji gleaned from his American guests was then passed to four Indians who regularly crossed the Burmese frontier every fortnight to reach Japanese intelligence officers. As a result of this information several top-secret Allied aerodromes in Burma were blown up and some Allied units were encircled and captured. Burma fell to the Japanese in the spring of 1942.

From May 1942 onward Savitri Devi spent most of her time working on a book about the religion of the coming New Order based on her studies of the solar cult of the Egyptian pharaoh Akhnaton.¹⁶ The outbreak of the "Quit India" movement in summer 1942 had sparked anti-British riots and again raised the hopes of the pro-German nationalist factions. Up until the end of 1942, when the Axis military expansion had reached its greatest extent, Asit Krishna Mukherji and Savitri Devi exulted in the heady expectation of British India's defeat. In this respect, their vision of the Axis conquest and partition of the world reflected the division of Eurasia agreed between Germany, Italy, and Japan in the Secret Military Convention at Berlin on 18 January 1942. She had already formed a vivid mental picture of the mechanized Wehrmacht divisions, armored corps and infantry, noisily rattling through the resounding rock walls of the Khyber Pass following the Nazi conquest of the Soviet Union, Iran, and Afghanistan. The victorious German army would thus follow in the historic footsteps of the first Aryan invasions of southern Asia and the later incursion of the Greeks under Alexander the Great. Both she and her husband imagined the German and Japanese forces meeting in Delhi and the tumultuous victory celebrations that would be held in Hitler's honor at the Red Fort in the former heart of British rule.

The retreat of German forces in the Soviet Union during 1943 suggested that the Indian invasion might be postponed for some time. However, Savitri Devi's confidence in an ultimate Axis victory over the Allies, while unshaken by major German defeats at Stalingrad and in the North African desert in late 1942, received an enormous boost from the renewed assault by Japanese and Bose's INA forces across the Indo-Burmese frontier in March 1944. As soon as the news of the Japanese breakthrough into the Imphal plain reached them in Calcutta, the Mukherjis were again convinced that an Axis invasion was now close at hand. Once the INA had entered India, they hoped there would be a general rising against the British. Between March and June 1944 the Japanese and INA launched attacks on Imphal and Kohima in eastern Assam and the INA tricolor flag was even raised on some briefly held Indian territory. However, the Japanese supply lines across the difficult country of hills and rivers were inadequate, and the invading forces were compelled to retreat by the summer months. The rest of 1944 saw the steady advance of British forces across Burma. The Mukherjis' hopes of a renewed Japanese offensive withered.

This was the beginning of the end for Savitri Devi's bold hopes of an Aryan revival in India on the back of Nazi triumph. By the beginning of autumn 1944 the German position in Europe had greatly deteriorated. Following the successful Anglo-American landings in Normandy in June 1944, Germany found itself once again fighting on both east and west, as in the First World War. The Red Army continued to press the German armies back across Eastern and Central Europe, taking Romania in August and Bulgaria in September 1944. At the same time the Poles rose against their German occupiers, and by the end of October 1944 Soviet forces had broken into the German Reich in East Prussia. Unable to bear hearing further news of German retreats and defeats, Savitri Devi decided to leave Calcutta. In October 1944 she took her Akhnaton manuscript and traveled down into South India, hoping somehow to evade the announcement of Germany's final defeat in anonymity and unfamiliar surroundings. One day she happened to see a man on a train reading a newspaper with the headline "Berlin is an inferno." She recoiled as if receiving a physical blow. Now she avoided newspapers, kept to small towns and frequented only temples and native Hindu company on her lonely trail across India in a desperate attempt to avoid learning of the inevitable collapse of the Third Reich.

But of course she could not escape. At the end of May 1945 she found herself in Sringeri, a small town on the Western Ghats overlooking the Malabar Coast. The town is celebrated as the birthplace of Shankara, who in the eighth century drove Buddhism from India, developed the Vedanta philosophy, and revived the Hindu caste system.

It seemed to her a cruel irony that it was here she should overhear two Muslims talking in a café about the German surrender three weeks earlier. Despondent, she made her way back to Calcutta at the end of July. During her absence Mukherji had been working on a book of his own, A History of Japan, which was published in August 1945. Back home in the flat on Wellesley Street she heard from her husband that Germany was to be divided into four zones of Allied occupation. However, Mukherji tried to comfort her by saying that the Hindu cycle of the ages must continue and that the present dark age would end in due course. As a Hindu Brahmin, Mukherji took a long philosophical view, but she was devastated by the fall of her idol and the betrayal of the Nazi Aryan revival.

In October 1945 Savitri Devi joined in the annual festival of Kali, the dark blue goddess representing the consort and strength behind Shiva, the Hindu god of destruction. At the great Kalighat temple, not far from the Hindu Mission where she had earlier worked for a Hindu-Aryan revival, she beheld the familiar figure of the goddess, holding in two of her arms a sword and a severed head, while her other two arms were raised in a blessing. According to Hindu belief, Kali is the author of earthquakes, volcanoes, and all that is destructive. Savitri Devi threw herself into the festival in a mood of frantic desperation, imploring the goddess to avenge the defeated Reich and the defendants in the Nuremberg trials that had just begun. She decided that she could now no longer remain in India so far away from these momentous events in the wake of Nazi defeat. She wanted to take part in whatever resistance might exist against the Allied victors in occupied Germany. She gave her twenty or so beloved cats into the care of a friend and prepared for her departure into an uncertain future. Asit Krihna Mukherji had meanwhile begun to practice as a Hindu astrologer in the absence of journalistic prospects owing to his pro-Nazi reputation. It was a sad parting from her husband at Calcutta in November 1945. More than thirteen years had elapsed since she had witnessed the Rameswaram festival on her arrival in India and her hopes of a global Aryan renaissance had been in the ascendant. Now her career as an underground die-hard neo-Nazi was beginning.

5

THE DUCE OF BENGAL

Mysterious Indian agents and their involvement in Western affairs have always offered rich material for European adventure stories. Wilkie Collins's The Moonstone (1868) described stealthy Hindus in Victorian London; Somerset Maugham included in Ashenden (1928) the tale of an Indian spy working for the Germans in Switzerland during the First World War. The extraordinary career of Subhas Chandra Bose, the Indian nationalist leader with whom the Mukherji couple had political contact, shows how life can often surpass literature in terms of idealistic ambition, dramatic incident, and tragedy. The Mukherjis' espionage for the Japanese in Burma was but one cell in the extensive network of Bose's clandestine efforts to supplant British rule in India, if necessary by treason with Britain's enemies Germany and Japan during the Second World War. The story of this remarkable man's struggle for Indian independence throws valuable light on the Mukherjis and their world in wartime Calcutta.

Subhas Chandra Bose was born in 1897 in Cuttack, the sixth son of a respected Bengali lawyer who acted as government pleader and was later appointed to the Bengali Legislative Council in Calcutta.¹ The Boses were a large family and several of the sons attended college in Calcutta, where a home was established in Elgin Road in 1909. Subhas attended a secondary school in Cuttack, where he was strongly influenced by his headmaster, who taught Indian religion and literature, laying emphasis on an Indian cultural revival. During his teens Bose was also deeply impressed by the modern Hindu teachings of Ramakrishna (1836–1886) and his disciple, Vivekananda (1863–1902), who said that the West was spiritually backward and needed India's religious guidance, while India had lagged in material achievements and needed the West's energy, technical skill, and organization. At this time Bose became very conscious of his Indian heritage; he changed to Bengali dress and was less attracted to English ways than was his father.²

In 1913 Bose entered Presidency College in Calcutta University to study philosophy. The period of his studies saw a further ripening of his Indian consciousness against a background of widespread undergraduate admiration for Aurobindo Ghose (1872–1950) and the Swadeshi movement in Bengal between 1905 and 1910. Aurobindo had been associated with Bâl Gangadhar Tilak, the nationalist leader and author of learned books about Aryan origins, in the minority Extremist group within the Congress, which, in contrast to the majority Moderates of the Congress, openly called for a rapid end to British rule. When the government under Lord Curzon decided on the partition of Bengal in 1905, the Swadeshi movement erupted with a boycott of British goods, protests, and demonstrations. Aurobindo returned to Calcutta and led the Extremist Party within the Congress for the next five years. He developed the idea of passive resistance, called for immediate independence, and saw Indian liberation in religious terms, believing that India had a special spiritual mission to fulfill. In 1910 he retired from active politics and set up an ashram in Pondicherry, where he remained for the rest of his life. Although the Extremist group had left the political scene by 1913, Aurobindo was a popular hero among the students, the more so because the Congress was dominated by the Moderates loyal to the Raj through the years of the First World War.³

Bose was particularly attracted by Aurobindo's combination of the sacred and the secular, which formed a bridge between his earlier interest in Vivekananda and the cultural and political revival of his motherland. In the long summer vacation of 1914 Bose and a close friend traveled in northern India seeking spiritual truth and contact with gurus. To this same friend Bose wrote later about Aryan power and creativity while contemplating the revival of the Hindu race. A sharpening of his political awareness occurred during his third year at Calcutta University, when he was suspended in February 1916 for the physical assault of an Anglo-Indian professor renowned for chauvinist and disparaging remarks about the Indians. He was allowed to resume his studies at another college in the university from July 1917 and graduated with a First in the summer of 1919. Bose was also a zealous recruit in the University Volunteer Corps, which he joined in 1917, gaining a valued sense of physical prowess and military competence.⁴

Bose's father now offered him the opportunity of going to England to continue his studies and to sit for the India Civil Service (ICS) examination, which promised admission to the exalted administrative elite of the Raj. Bose faced a dilemma. He dearly wanted to study in England, again proving his equality with the British, but was uncertain that he wanted to serve the Raj as a career. He sailed for England in September 1919, began studying for the Tripos at Cambridge and also passed the ICS exam in August 1920, but then took the unprecedented step of resigning from the ICS while still at Cambridge in April 1921. Bose had finally decided that his future career lay in the service of his country, not as a privileged civil servant loyal to the old British order but as a politician in the nationalist Congress movement in Bengal under the leadership of Chitta Ranjan Das. Once he had completed his course at Cambridge, Bose returned home in June 1921.⁵

During the 1920s and 1930s Bose achieved high prominence and senior office in the Congress movement, both in Bengal and later on the national stage. In common with other nationalist leaders, he was also subject to repeated terms of imprisonment under repressive government regulations. In the early 1920s there was often a strong note of socialism and a concern for the working classes in his newspaper articles, which contrasted with the bourgeois nationalism of Congress moderates. In April 1924 he was appointed chief executive officer of the Calcutta Corporation, where he pursued a policy of communal rapprochement between Hindus and Muslims in line with C. R. Das's Bengal Pact. Bose always subscribed to the territorial patriotism of the Indian National Congress and knew that communal sectarianism was a political handicap in the mixed province of Bengal. Following a long term of imprisonment, Bose took a seat on the Bengal Legislative Council and was elected president of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee in 1927. He also served as president of many youth and student conferences, headed a number of trades unions, and was president of the All-India Trades Union Congress in 1930–1931. In August 1930 Bose was elected mayor of Calcutta. In his inaugural speech, he spoke of a "synthesis of socialism and fascism," whereby he wished to combine the justice, equality, and love of socialism with the efficiency and order of fascism in an Indian context.⁶

In January 1932 all Congress organizations were declared unlawful. Together with many other Congress members, Bose was arrested. He was sentenced to a further term of imprisonment and not released until February 1933 on the condition that he leave India. In the eyes of the government, he was a radical revolutionary nationalist and considered much less dangerous outside the country. In this enforced exile from India, Bose now embarked on a long period in Europe, which he used to meet many European politicians, discussing the problems and issues of municipal and national government. He was also a busy ambassador, presenting the case for Indian independence in speeches and articles, establishing Indian cultural and student exchange organizations in several countries, and writing his first book, The Indian Struggle 1920–1934.

In March 1933 he arrived in Vienna, which became a preferred base for his subsequent stay in Europe. From there he visited Czechoslovakia, where he met the foreign minister, Dr. Eduard Beneš, and then Poland. In July 1933 he reached Berlin and met several senior officials in the Foreign Ministry and the director of the German Academy at Munich. In December 1933 he went to Rome, where he had a couple of cordial meetings with Mussolini and received encouragement in his struggle for Indian independence. A second tour of Europe took Bose back to Germany in March 1934, where he again met officials to protest negative German views of India and racial insults in the Nazi press and speeches. He argued that German-Indian relations would swiftly improve if these hostile statements and the racial legislation were dropped. Bose's desire for friendly relations with Germany as a potential ally evidently outweighed his disgust at Nazi racism. Following some further travels in Italy, Hungary, the Balkans, and Turkey, Bose returned in June 1934 to Vienna, where he worked on his book until the late autumn.⁷

The Indian Struggle recorded Bose's view of the recent political history of India. While praising Gandhi for many positive attributes, Bose highlighted the divisions of Congress during the 1920s as a clash between an older, reformist group of nationalists, backed by capitalists and owing loyalty to Gandhi on the one hand, and those radical, militant nationalists with whom he identified himself on the other. In this analysis, Bose seemed to view Gandhi, the Gandhian reformers and moderates, and the government of India collectively as oppressive forces and a brake on the genuine protagonists of nationalism and independence, who included himself, his political allies, and the Indian masses. Bose could only shake his head at the reverence in which the masses actually did hold Gandhi and accused many members of the Congress of a blind loyalty toward their leader. Bose declared that India needed a strong, energetic, and military kind of leader in its bitter struggle against British domination, and he gave Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin as examples. As in his mayoral speech of 1930, Bose proposed a combination of communism and fascism as an effective ideology for the new India.⁸

After a short stay in India for his father's funeral, Bose had to resume his European exile and returned in January 1935 to Italy, where he saw Mussolini and presented him with a copy of his new book. Having suffered from illness persisting since his first imprisonment, he underwent surgery to remove his gallbladder in Vienna and spent the rest of the year convalescing. He continued to write articles dealing with the situation in Europe. In these pieces he condemned the Italian invasion of Abyssinia and speculated on the possibility of internecine conflicts between the older imperialist powers and the new dictatorships of Germany and Italy, and on the opportunities such a war could bring to India. In early 1936 Bose again visited Beneš in Prague and went on to Berlin, where he protested Nazi racism and anti-Indian propaganda in an address to the Indian students' organization. He called for a boycott of German goods in India in order that German business interests might lobby the Nazi regime to soften its line on India. Again, he failed to meet any senior German leaders and left to tour Belgium and France and to meet leaders in Ireland; he felt a particularly strong affinity with the Irish due to their long struggle against British rule. In France he attended an anti-imperialist conference and made a forceful speech, linking India's fight for independence with the struggle against Western and Japanese imperialism. In late March he sailed from Italy for India, having spent nearly three years in Europe.⁹

Detained on arrival in Bombay, Bose was not released until March 1937. For more than five years he had been effectively removed from the Indian political scene by imprisonment, exile, and detention. After being feted by a huge crowd on All-Bengal Subhas Day convened in April to welcome him back to public life, Bose spent several months recuperating in the hills at Dalhousie. In October he briefly attended Congress committee meetings in Calcutta and took his seat as an alderman on the Calcutta Corporation, but a relapse sent him back to Europe for more convalescence. He now worked in the spa resort Badgastein on his autobiography, An Indian Pilgrim, in November and December, when it became known that he would succeed Jawaharlal Nehru as the next president of Congress. With his new office in prospect, Bose next visited Britain for the first time since his Cambridge days in 1921 and met leaders of the national government, the Labour Party, intellectuals, and the Indian community. In his speeches and conversations Bose stressed his socialist views and disowned fascism, earlier admired as an aggressive form of nationalism, as another expression of imperialism.¹⁰

Returning to India, Subhas Chandra Bose now reached the peak of his career in Congress politics. As president of Congress at its session at Haripura in February 1938, Bose made his most important speech, in which he linked capitalism and imperialism, quoted from Lenin, and praised the British Communist Party. Addressing himself to the future of an independent India, he called for socialist reconstruction involving planning, land reform, and the state ownership of industry. These policies clearly identified him with the left wing of Congress. However, Bose found himself isolated in the new Working Committee, which was dominated by moderate right-wing Gandhians, while the Gandhian framework was preserved with the former secretariat remaining based at Allhabad. The Gandhians were opposed to Bose over several vital issues: they were bourgeois nationalists close to wealthy Indian capitalists and the middle classes; they favored a reformist route to independence rather than Bose's preference for confrontation with the Raj; and they were suspicious of his dealings with the dictatorships, which they regarded as greater evils than British imperialism.¹¹

During 1938 Bose continued to reach out to foreign powers in his drive to advance Indian independence. Through Asit Krishna Mukherji he met Mr. Ohisa, a senior Japanese Foreign Ministry official in Calcutta, and two years later in 1940, he sent an emissary to Japan to meet the émigré Indian revolutionary Rash Beshari Bose (no relation) and Japanese officials. In December 1938, in Bombay, Subhas Chandra Bose met Nazi officials, including Dr. Oswald Urchs, the leader of the NSDAP (German Nazi Party) organization in India. Bose stood again for the presidency of the Congress against the wishes of the Gandhians and was reelected with broad left-wing support in January 1939. Once more he was denied support by the Gandhians in the Working Committee and he resigned in April 1939. Bose then founded his own "Forward Bloc" party within the Congress, and organized protests at Congress resolutions, which resulted in his being disqualified as president of the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee. It was quite clear that the Gandhian clique in Congress also wanted to destroy his own power base in Bengal. With the outbreak of war in September 1939, their differences in foreign policy became more apparent, as Gandhi, Nehru, and their followers stood with the Allies against the Axis powers, while Bose and the radicals were prepared to exploit the war situation for India's advantage.¹²

By the end of 1940 Bose had recognized that he had failed to convert Gandhi and the mainstream Congress members to his point of view. He began making plans to leave India and to seek help abroad. Between 1938 and 1940 he had already sent out feelers to Germany, Japan, and the Soviet Union. However, in early 1941 only Germany was at war with Britain. Although he had received a much warmer reception in Italy during the 1930s, Bose knew that Germany was by far the superior in military might. Nazi Germany had to be his destination. Who else in India other than his family knew of his plans? Some have claimed that V. D. Savarkar, leader of the Hindu Mahasabha, who had plotted abroad before the First World War, encouraged him to take this course of action. Despite his long-standing aversion to communalist movements, Bose had indeed briefly sought an alliance with the Mahasabha in 1940 as his own leftist support crumbled.¹³ Asit Krishna Mukherji, a passionate admirer of the Third Reich, would have known of Bose's earlier interest in fascist Italy and Nazi Germany, and it is possible that he urged Bose to go over to the Germans.

Although under house arrest during January 1941 at his home in Elgin Road, Bose managed to elude the police in the night of 16/17 January and traveled secretly from Calcutta to Kabul, where he received assistance from the Italian and German legations. Journeying on by car and rail to Moscow, he reached Berlin by early April. From the outset Bose sought to elicit from the Axis powers a declaration of Indian independence as one of their war aims. He initially proposed to the Germans that a Free Indian Government should be established in Berlin, financed by a loan to be repaid at the end of the war. The chief activities of this government would be propaganda through radio broadcasts to India and the organization of strikes, sabotage, and revolts in India in conjunction with the arrival of a military force of some fifty thousand soldiers to destroy the British Raj. At a meeting with Joachim von

Ribbentrop, the German foreign minister, in late April in Vienna, Bose reiterated his wish for a German declaration for a free India and also suggested that Indian POWs in German or Italian captivity could be used as the invading liberation forces.¹⁴

Bose's proposals interacted with German strategic thinking in several ways. In the first place, Hitler had no sympathy with the notion of non-European provisional governments in Berlin.¹⁵ But the idea of a nationalist rising in India seemed interesting in the context of the pro-Axis coup in Iraq in late March. There was support in the German Navy and Foreign Office for an Axis thrust from the eastern Mediterranean through Vichy Syria and Iraq to Iran, in order to seize oil reserves, to put further pressure on Britain at the gate of India, and to beckon to Japan.¹⁶ Throughout May 1941 Bose was exultant at the German readiness to issue a declaration for a free India. However, the failure of Germany to support Iraq and Syria adequately against Allied invasion postponed any realization of an Axis strategy for the Middle East. The declaration on India was shelved, in any event, for as long as Bose remained in Germany. Military planners now devoted themselves first and foremost to Hitler's overriding obsession with his anti-Bolshevik crusade. Operation Barbarossa for the invasion of the Soviet Union was launched in June 1941.¹⁷

The invasion struck a major blow at Bose's plans in Europe. The Soviet Union was widely admired in India as an anti-imperialist power and thus an ally of India against Britain. The German attack now placed Nazi Germany in the camp of imperialist aggressors. But Bose was persistent and in early July he emphasized to the Foreign Office that a declaration on India was even more pressing to clarify German intentions to Indians now apprehensive about the prospect of approaching German armies. But the Germans thought such a declaration would be premature with no prospect of Axis military action in the Middle East until the subjugation of the Soviet Union was complete.¹⁸ Bose was demoralized by the complications created by the invasion and may already at this time have thought he would be better off in Asia.¹⁹

However, the Germans did accept Bose's proposals for radio propaganda and the raising of an Indian military force. The German Foreign Office was keen to foster Indian nationalist propaganda as a means of discouraging Indian youth from fighting in the Indian Army for British interests, especially in North Africa and the Middle East.²⁰ During the summer of 1941 Bose recruited a number of Indians in Axis-controlled Europe for the purposes of journalism and broadcasting. In November 1941 the Free India Center (Zentralstelle Freies Indien) was formally instituted on the Lichtensteinallee in the Tiergarten district of Berlin. The center made broadcasts to India in more than half a dozen Indian languages and also prepared magazines and books on nationalist topics. These nationalist broadcasts, produced entirely by Indians with no German censorship, were a great success and became much more popular than the more sober BBC programs among Indian audiences.²¹

By early 1942 the Wehrmacht had begun training Indian POWs at two camps in Germany. These trainees for an Indian Legion were drawn from POWs originally captured by the Italians in North Africa and eventually numbered some three thousand. Bose's recruiting speech included the words "Hitler is your friend, a friend of the Aryans, and you will march to India as your motherland's liberators." An oath of loyalty to Adolf Hitler with reference to Subhas Chandra Bose was established and the title "Netaji" (Leader) was adopted for Bose. The Indian Legionnaires wore German uniforms with eagle-and-swastika badges, in which they recognized their own religious symbol. The German High Command anticipated that the Indian Legion would be used for commando-type operations in the Middle East, and eventually in Afghanistan and in the North-West Frontier Province of India.²²

The international situation was dramatically changed by Japan's entry into the war with its attack on Pearl Harbor on 7 December 1941 followed by swift moves against the Philippines, Hong Kong, Malaya, and the Dutch East Indies in Southeast Asia. Within a matter of days the British were at war with Japan, and the United States was at war with Germany and Italy as well as Japan. India now assumed some importance in Japanese strategy. Since October 1941 the Japanese had been putting out feelers toward the Indian community in Thailand. Major Fujiwara Iwaichi, a gifted intelligence officer, developed contacts with Pritam and Amar Singh, leading Sikhs of the Indian Independence League (IIL) in Bangkok. When the Japanese invasion of Malaya began, Fujiwara and members of the IIL mounted a propaganda offensive among captured Indian troops, which numbered more than sixty thousand at the fall of Singapore in February 1942. Already in mid-December Fujiwara had met a captured Indian Army officer, Captain Mohan Singh, who offered to raise a liberation army from Indian POWs. The Japanese government gave cautious encouragement to these developments through Rash Behari Bose, the elderly émigré Indian revolutionary living in Tokyo, who convened several conferences of the Indian nationalists in March at Singapore and Tokyo and again in June 1942 at Bangkok, where it was decided to raise the Indian National Army (INA).²³

Throughout 1941 Subhas Chandra Bose had repeatedly tried without success to obtain a declaration for a free India from Germany and Italy. With the entry of Japan into the worldwide conflict, he now began to look eastward for new opportunities of action on behalf of Indian nationalism. On 17 December he had met the Japanese ambassador Oshima in Berlin and asked for his transfer to Southeast Asia, where he would organize the Indian independence movement under Japanese protection.²⁴ Captain Mohan Singh had long spoken of Bose to Fujiwara as an essential leader, and in January 1942 the Indian nationalists in Bangkok requested that Bose be brought in from Europe as their leader. Ribbentrop hastily approved of Bose's transfer to East Asia, but without first obtaining Japanese approval.²⁵ Although there were further delays and misunderstandings between Germany and Japan regarding their policy on a free-India declaration and Bose's transfer, the latter was agreed in principle in April 1942.

Subhas Chandra Bose had now spent almost a year in Germany, posing as an Italian under the cover identity of "Mazzotta." He had refused to go public in the Axis media or make any broadcasts himself through the Free India Center until the Axis powers issued a declaration on India. However, the fall of Singapore on 15 February 1942 represented such an enormous blow to British prestige in Asia that Bose decided to speak out. In his first broadcast on 27 February Bose declared that it heralded "the collapse of the British Empire . . . and the dawn of a new era in Indian history." The German Foreign Office also believed that the fall of Singapore signaled an opportune moment for an Axis declaration on India. But this momentum was soon lost due to a lack of information on Japanese intentions at this critical juncture. Most important, Hitler himself was consistently reluctant to give any encouragement to a declaration on free India. Not only did he admire British rule in India and see it as a model for the German domination of Russia but he always felt ambiguous about fighting the English—a fraternal Germanic people—and still held out hopes of a settlement with Britain and its empire.²⁶

The Axis powers had attempted to achieve some measure of strategic cooperation following Japan's entry into the war. The Secret Military Convention of 18 January 1942 between Germany, Italy, and Japan proposed that the demarcation line of the German and Japanese operational zones should lie along the 70° east longitude, thus passing across western Siberia, through Afghanistan and down the River Indus to the Indian Ocean, leaving most of India in the Japanese sphere. Both the German and Japanese navies were eager to cooperate in a joint strategy to achieve mastery of the Middle East and the Indian Ocean. However, this truly global approach foundered owing to Hitler's view that the conquest of the Soviet Union was the sole precondition for regaining the strategic initiative. The campaign there was also now taking much longer than expected. The Japanese, for their part, were divided over their future plans. Some Japanese planners considered an attack on the Soviet Union and an advance into Siberia as far as Omsk, but Japanese naval successes in Southeast Asia tended to sideline the army's ambitions in the Soviet Far East. Ultimately, neither Germany nor Japan was able or willing to exploit the political opportunities in the Arab and Indian world.²⁷

Bose was granted his one and only meeting with Hitler on 27 May 1942. Bose addressed the Führer as "an old revolutionary," which recalled both Hitler's days of struggle in the Weimar Republic and his own against the British Raj. Hitler soon launched into a long monologue, declaring his preference for military might over mere propaganda. The German armies were still fighting north of the Caucasus and therefore not yet in a position to support Arab rebellions, let alone an Indian uprising. The time for a declaration would come only once it could be endorsed by immediate military support. Moreover, the Japanese would be in a position to offer this help far sooner than Germany. Hitler finally shifted the responsibility for Bose and the Indian declaration onto the Japanese by offering him submarine transport to East Asia.²⁸

Bose was profoundly disillusioned by this final rejection. Having first sought German support for a free India on his arrival at Berlin in April 1941, the intervening fourteen months had brought him only limited success in the establishment of the Free India Center and the Indian Legion. No formal guarantee of Indian independence had been forthcoming from Germany. Bose undoubtedly felt that he had wasted his time by going to Germany in the first place. However, because only Germany and Italy had been at war with Britain in April 1941, he had made his choice. With Japan on the Axis side since December 1941, Bose felt that he was losing further time remaining in Europe during 1942. Moreover, while the strategic options for Axis cooperation over India were at their most favorable, Germany and Japan seemed neither to trust each other nor to understand each other's objectives.

Bose's desire to reach Asia mounted following the outbreak of the "Quit India" movement with widespread rebellion and disturbances in India in August 1942. Initially, he hoped to travel by air with the help of the Italians, who had in July completed the first nonstop flight between Europe and the Far East. Bose made his farewells in Berlin and went to Rome in October, but the flight was delayed, rescheduled, and later canceled. Eventually, an agreement between Tokyo and Berlin was reached that Bose would travel by submarine. On 8 February 1943 Bose and a companion from the Free India Center boarded the German submarine U-180 at Kiel. Their voyage took them around the British Isles and southward down the Atlantic. On 24 April contact was made with the Japanese submarine I-29 in the Indian Ocean at a point 25° south latitude 60° east longitude east of Madagascar. The two Indians were transferred by dinghy in rough seas from one submarine to the other. The exchange was an apposite symbol of the fragile link between the two Axis powers in a global context. On 6 May Bose arrived at the Japanese naval base of Sabang off the northern coast of Sumatra and flew on to Tokyo, where he arrived in mid-May.²⁹

Bose had waited long for this opportunity to fight for Indian independence in East Asia. Ever since his days as a student volunteer in 1917 and leading the Bengal Volunteers as the military guard of the Calcutta Congress in 1928, he had dreamed of commanding a national army of liberation against the British. He made a powerful impression on members of the Japanese ruling military group and received firm backing from Prime Minister Tojo for a free India. A new lease of life for the Indian National Army (INA) began with Bose's arrival at Singapore in June 1943. The "first" INA had fallen into disarray by the end of 1942 owing to fundamental disagreements between Captain Mohan Singh and the overbearing Japanese authorities. The pro-Japanese Rash Behari Bose was able to retain only eight thousand men. The leadership of the IIL and command of the INA now passed cordially from the old émigré revolutionary to his younger namesake, who was received with acclaim by the Indians of Southeast Asia. Subhas Chandra Bose's "second" INA soon reached a strength of more than forty thousand men and three divisions, including a women's regiment. In October 1943 Bose also announced the Free India Provisional Government, based at Singapore, which was recognized by Germany, Japan, and their allies.³⁰

Bose wanted a full combat role for the INA in the major Japanese assault across the Indo-Burmese border in March 1944. He believed that once the INA had entered India, there would be a general rising against the British. Between March and June 1944 the INA fought extremely bravely in the Japanese attacks on Imphal and Kohima in eastern Assam, and succeeded in planting the Indian tricolor on some briefly held Indian territory. But overextended supply lines across the dense and hilly jungle and superior British forces under General Slim forced the Japanese and the INA to retreat. Throughout the rest of 1944 and the first part of 1945, the British continued to push the Japanese back through Burma. Bose and the INA remained loyal to the Japanese until the bitter end, taking part in the defense of Malaya. As the Japanese began considering their terms of surrender following the atomic bomb attacks on Hiroshima and Nagasaki on 6 and 9 August, Bose decided to reach out to the Soviet Union as a power not too friendly with the British. He planned to take members of his cabinet to Manchuria and there to make contact with the advancing Soviet army. On 17 August he boarded a bomber at Saigon bound for Dairen, which crashed the next day on taking off from Taipei in Formosa. Subhas Chandra Bose, the samurai of Indian independence, died of his injuries on 18 August 1945 in an army hospital.³¹

How likely is Savitri Devi's claim that her husband knew Bose and introduced him to the Japanese authorities? Since Bose did not set foot in India in the period between his escape via Kabul to Berlin in January 1941 and his arrival at Tokyo in May 1943, any personal introduction can only have been made by A. K. Mukherji in the interval from January 1938 when Bose returned from Europe to assume the presidency of Congress to July 1940 when he was arrested. We have already noted Bose's overtures to German and Japanese officials during 1938 in India, and it is therefore possible that A. K. Mukherji effected an introduction in the latter case. Moreover, while Bose was in the political wilderness following his resignation from the presidency of the Congress in April 1939, he did explore an alliance with both Jinnah of the Muslim League and V. D. Savarkar of the Hindu Mahasabha. Contact with Savarkar, who may himself have advised Bose to go to Germany, could imply an association with Mukherji. But because Japan was not at war with Britain until December 1941, it seems unlikely that anyone in India could have introduced him to the Japanese authorities for the purposes of raising the INA. For this he had his own contacts in Berlin.

Although both Bose and Mukherji were radical nationalists, they would have disagreed about ideology. Bose was always consumed with the struggle for Indian independence and interested in Germany and later Japan only as strategic allies in his campaign against British rule. In the early 1920s his political views were inspired by a left-wing, anti-imperialist ideology in opposition to the reformist bourgeois Gandhians in the Congress. Although he extolled a "synthesis of fascism and socialism" in 1930, he had distanced himself from the imperialist aggression of Germany and Italy by the end of the 1930s. His admiration for fascism essentially concerned its cult of nationalism, which he wished to emulate in India. Last, Bose always held true to the secular, territorial nationalism of Congress and was opposed to any communalism dividing Muslims and Hindus in Bengal and India.

Bose's heroic reputation in India remains a legend. His figure was touched by the popular Hindu belief that all great leaders, but especially national heroes who challenge enemies, are manifestations of the avatar. This divine immanence is scarcely reconciled with mortal status. Thus it was hardly known, still less believed, that Bose had secretly married an Austrian woman, Emilie Schenkl, his companion in Europe until 1943. Many Indians today do not believe that Bose perished in the plane crash at Taipei. Stories of his reappearance in India, or the likelihood of his being in the Soviet Union or China have always circulated as an oral tradition and in the press. One persistent myth in 1959-1964 identified him as the sadhu at an ashram in North Bengal. As late as 1970 the Indian government set up a second inquiry into his "disappearance." It is still widely rumored that he escaped, was hidden in the Soviet Union, or secretly lives in some redoubt within the Himalayas. An avatar is immortal and thus Bose cannot age. He is simply awaiting the moment when he will reappear at the head of his troops to liberate his Indian people from hardship or international crisis.³²

A. K. Mukherji and Savitri Devi looked elsewhere for redemption. They harked back to the Aryan origins of the Hindus and wanted a Hindu India, in which Muslims would be second-class citizens. Their enthusiasm for Adolf Hitler and German National Socialism revolved around the Aryan mystique of Nazism and was absolute and unconditional. Bose had witnessed Nazi contempt for Indians in Germany and also knew that Hitler and Alfred Rosenberg disqualified the Indians as proto-Aryans in their writings. Mukherji and Savitri Devi ignored these points; their conception of the Third Reich was fundamentally utopian. Last, Bose had actually met Hitler and been disappointed in his efforts to secure a German guarantee of Indian independence. He even challenged Hitler about the derogatory passages about Indians in Mein Kampf. Savitri Devi's attitude toward Hitler was fundamentally one of religious adoration: for her Hitler was the avatar.

6

AKHNATON AND ANIMAL RIGHTS

“You cannot ‘de-nazify’ Nature!” protested Savitri Devi, when confronted by Allied policy toward the defeated Germans.¹ Her superhuman ideal of the proud, hard Aryan type was essentially rooted in a view of nature that was pantheistic, romantic, and rhapsodic. Some years before she wrote her outspoken Nazi books, she authored eulogies of nature that address the contemporary interests of Greens, anarchists, and the New Age. Her potential appeal to these modern dissidents lies in a cult of nature that rejects the centrality of man and man’s material convenience. Her book on the solar cult of the Egyptian pharaoh Akhnaton involved a utopian rejection of all politics that promote man’s interests at a cost to the beauty and abundance of nature. Her spirited defense of animal rights was rooted in a total rejection of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, which she believed raised man to false theological status and cut him off from the rest of creation.

Her Akhnaton book, A Son of God (1946), was written in wartime India between May 1942 and January 1945, while her eulogy of animal rights, Impeachment of Man (1959), was written in the immediate aftermath of the German surrender, begun in Calcutta in July 1945 and completed after her return to Lyons in March 1946. Mindful as she was of the general opprobrium attaching to the Third Reich in the postwar years, these books make only coded references to her idol Hitler and National Socialism. Free of any obvious Nazi taint, both books have been recently republished for new audiences interested in mysticism and the occult, Green issues, vegetarianism, and the New Age. However, because her Nazi ideas are rooted in a misanthropic cult of nature and animal worship, her rediscovery by mystical, left-wing, and Green readers poses a clear danger of Nazi entryism within new ideological alliances. Both these books are examined here; the current revival of interest in her ideas is reserved for the final chapter.

In the spring of 1942 Savitri Devi had every confidence in a forthcoming Axis victory and the partition of Eurasia between Germany and Japan. In this exultant mood she directed her thoughts toward the kind of religion that might accompany the new Nazi world order.² In common with German theorists of "blood and soil," she conceived of this religion as allied to life and nature in bold, vitalist terms eschewing any notions of a transcendent God derived from the Judaeo-Christian tradition. However, given her earlier inspiration from the Aryan myth, Hellenism, and radical Hindu nationalism, one must wonder what lay behind her newfound enthusiasm for the sun cult of Akhnaton, king of Egypt in the fourteenth century B.C. Who was Akhnaton and what was his significance for a Nazi religion of nature?

The Egyptian pharaoh Akhnaton (circa 1395–1366 B.C.) is best known for his radical religious reforms, his beautiful consort Queen Nefertiti, and the founding of a new capital city called Akhetaton, which was intended to serve as the center of a new solar world order. He was born at Thebes, the son of the pharaoh Amenhotep III and Queen Tiy, and succeeded his father in 1383 B.C. as Amenhotep IV, the tenth pharaoh of the Eighteenth Dynasty, which had opened the magnificent New Kingdom in ancient Egypt. By this time Thebes had become the southern capital of the New Kingdom; its huge temples and palaces, towers and pylons, paved courts, and long ceremonial avenues reflected the wealth and power of the ruling Ahmoside dynasty after its victory over the alien Hyksos rulers in the sixteenth century B.C. Thebes was also the holy city of the sun god Amon, who traversed the sky in the solar bark from dawn to sunset. The social and economic life of Egypt revolved around the worship of Amon, who was served by a rich and powerful priesthood. The reign of Amenhotep III recorded the zenith of Thebes's power and prestige as the center of the civilized world.

All this was to change as a result of Akhnaton's reforming zeal. Early in his reign Amenhotep IV was inspired to worship solar energy as the ultimate power and parent of all earthly things. He introduced the reformed sun cult of Aton (the Disk), from which he rigorously excluded Amon and all other gods as mere idols. Although he began by building a temple to Aton in Thebes, the ubiquity of Amon's name and image in the capital soon drove the king to extreme measures. Once he had changed his name from Amenhotep (meaning "Amon is at rest or pleased") to Akhnaton (meaning "Joy of the Sun"), he sailed down the Nile in 1375 B.C. to found his new capital Akhetaton ("City of the Horizon of the Disk") as the center of his new sun cult. For the next decade Egypt underwent a religious revolution and political upheaval. Akhnaton proscribed any reference to the plural "gods." He caused all inscriptions and images of Amon in the kingdom to be defaced or destroyed, and dispossessed the powerful Amon priesthood of its great wealth and estates. The former revenues of the priesthood now passed directly to the pharaonate, thus greatly strengthening royal power against the professional priesthoods. Furthermore, Akhnaton emphasized the absolute divinity of his royal person by identifying himself with the solar energy of the Disk.

The new city was hastily built on the east bank of the river within a semicircle of enclosing cliffs, and its boundaries were marked with stelae bearing carved reliefs. Here Akhnaton and Nefertiti removed their court, together with a population of some eighty thousand persons. Henceforth the burning sun was worshiped with offerings of flowers, fruit, and animals at altars under an open sky in colonnaded courtyards, which distinguished the new monotheistic cult of Aton. Numerous reliefs showed Akhnaton and his queen Nefertiti with their children, attended by their followers, adoring the rayed Disk of the sun and its life-giving beams. This art was also remarkable for its naturalness and vitality; the informality and joyful zest of its subjects bore witness to a new era. The royal figures were often sculpted in a style reminiscent of the Fourth and Fifth Dynasty in the Old Kingdom (2705–2230 B.C.), which suggests that Akhnaton might have invoked the ancient sun cult of Ra practiced at On (Heliopolis) to support his reforms.

Akhnaton's new solar world order was a theocracy in which the king was identical with one God—the Aton—and ruled as its divine representative on earth. But the celebration of an immanent deity on earth incurred a high material cost. The construction of the new capital Akhetaton, together with new temples to Aton in Memphis and Heliopolis and elsewhere in the Egyptian Empire, drained the land of its labor and resources and ruined the economy. Because tax collection was no longer in the hands of local priesthoods, the king relied on the army, a novel practice that led to corruption and mismanagement. There were also uprisings against Egyptian rule in Syria and Palestine, which the king neither could nor would suppress. Last, plague was raging through the land and claimed members of the royal family and possibly Akhnaton himself, who died in 1366 B.C. The Amon priesthoods were swift to lead a religious restoration: the neglect of Amon was blamed for all Egypt's woes; Akhetaton was swiftly abandoned; the images of the royal family and Akhnaton were defaced, their tombs desecrated; their memory was expunged from the chronicles. The reign of Tutankhamen saw the return of the traditional ways and drew a veil of oblivion over Akhnaton and his brief era.

So complete was this anathema that Akhnaton was forgotten for nearly three thousand years. The site of Akhetaton lay some 190 miles south of modern Cairo at Tell-el-Amarna on the east bank of the Nile and was first rediscovered by European travelers and amateur archaeologists in the 1820s. These early visitors were intrigued by the unique nature of the reliefs on the tombs at Tell-el-Amarna. These large compositions were devoted to the activities of a royal family, consisting of a king and queen and several of their infant daughters. Almost every scene showed above the royal family an image of the sun as a disk shooting forth a dozen or more rays, each ending in a ministering hand. This rayed disk was clearly a symbol of veneration and had a close connection with the royal couple. Its hands brought the ankh, or sign of life, to their nostrils, or appeared to offer support to their limbs and bodies.

Until the royal couple had been identified as Akhnaton and Nefertiti, the people in the reliefs were known by scholars as "Disk worshipers." Since the figures of the king and queen, together with their names and that of the disk god, had been evidently defaced by iconoclasts in practically all the accessible reliefs, it was supposed that the "Disk worshipers" were regarded by their successors as heretics. Their names were not only excised on these tombs but also omitted from all lists of pharaohs known at the time. The riddle of the Tell-el-Amarna tombs attracted systematic exploration by Sir Flinders Petrie in the last two decades of the nineteenth century. Further work was undertaken by the Egypt Exploration Society under the direction of successive field directors, including Leonard Woolley and John Pendlebury, from 1920 into the mid-1930s.³

The mystery of Akhnaton's disappearance from history and the poignancy of his fate guaranteed him an active afterlife in the modern imagination. Interpretations of Akhnaton and his sun cult began with Sir Flinders Petrie's Tell el-Amarna (1894) and then A History of Egypt (1899), in which he paid a magnificent tribute to Akhnaton as a great religious reformer who anticipated modern scientific knowledge; James Breasted identified him as the world's first idealist and individual in his History of Egypt (1906); and Arthur Weigall admired the young king, seeing him as a precursor of Christianity in the pagan world.⁴ The interest in Akhnaton received fresh impetus from the excavations following the First World War. Arthur Weigall's popular prewar book, The Life and Times of Akhnaton, was published in a third and revised edition in 1922; James Baikie updated his earlier classic, The Story of the Pharaohs, and published The Amarna Age (1926) as a "study of the crisis of the ancient world"; Ethel Bristowe wrote an accessible book about the Amarna discoveries and a best-seller about Akhnaton entitled Naphuria (1936). Sigmund Freud went so far as to suggest that Jewish monotheism was derived from Akhnaton's sun worship in his widely read work Moses and Monotheism (1939).

Within a few decades, the figure of Akhnaton had risen from complete obscurity to familiarity, even fame. The story of an Egyptian pharaoh, a progressive and a heretic, whose memory had been erased for several thousand years, held a certain appeal in the interwar period marked by the quest for new ideals and authority. Although Savitri Devi had visited Egypt during a brief visit to the Middle East from India in 1937, she could just as easily have encountered the widespread reputation of Akhnaton in Europe or India.⁵ She was in quest of a universal religion that could link East and West in the celebration of this world and nature rather than a transcendent deity; above all, a religion that was fit for the new Aryan order. She accordingly constructed her own highly positive interpretation of Akhnaton and his sun cult on the basis of the wide range of specialist and general books that had been published on the heretical pharaoh from Petrie up until the Second World War. The fruits of this research were a short booklet Akhnaton's Eternal Message (1940) and Joy of the Sun (1942), an account of Akhnaton's life for children, which were both published in Calcutta; her major study of Akhnaton's life and philosophy appeared after the war in London as A Son of God (1946).

Savitri Devi's description of ancient Egypt was richly evocative. She swiftly drew her readers into a resplendent world of powerful pharaohs, cultural brilliance, and sumptuous luxury. Her glowing prose bore el-loquent witness to the beauty, wealth, and prestige of Thebes, the birthplace of Akhnaton:

On the western bank of the Nile, upon a site which to this day retains its loveliness, was built the Charuk palace, the residence of the Pharaoh Amenhotep the Third. . . . From the terraces of the palace one beheld to the east, beyond the Nile and its palm-groves, white walls contrasted with dark shadows, flat roofs of different levels, flights of steps, broad avenues and gardens and monumental gates: all that glory that was Thebes. In the foreground, the towering pylons of the great temple of Amon emerged above the outer walls of the sacred enclosure that stretched over miles. And the gilded tops of innumerable obelisks glittered in the dazzling light or glowed like red-hot embers in the purple of sunset. One could distinguish many other temples dedicated to all the gods of Upper and Lower Egypt, temples with doors of bronze and gates of granite. . . . To the west, the eye wandered over the vastness of the desert. It is in that palace that Akhnaton was born.⁶

The bathos of this last sentence set the tone of A Son of God: this work was the gospel of a new religion, complete with a pious account of the life of its founder.

Her account of Akhnaton began with an imaginative reconstruction of the young prince's birth and upbringing. Savitri Devi regarded Queen Tiy, Akhnaton's mother, as the greatest and most lasting influence on the royal prince. She claimed that the queen worshiped Aton—the Disk—the oldest sun-god of Egypt, whose seat was at On (Heliopolis) in Lower Egypt. Although the priesthood at On was trying to revive the cult of Aton, Aton was still only a secondary god among many at this time. Queen Tiy was no monotheist but she must have taught her child to render homage to the sun at sunrise and sunset and so prepared him to love the sun as a living and loving god who brought light, warmth, and vitality to all things on earth. Savitri Devi pictured the young prince's wonder at the reflection of the sun on his mother's face, the joyous singing of the birds at first light, the opening of waterflowers in the sunshine, and the delight of birds, beasts, and butterflies that feel the sun's caress. These early impressions of childhood laid the emotional and psychological basis of Akhnaton's receptivity to the idea of the sun's divinity.⁷

Savitri Devi also speculated about the influence of Aryan ideas on Akhnaton's religious development. These were attributable to the Mitnians, a Hurrian people ruled by an Aryan aristocracy who worshiped

Mithra, Indra, Varuna, and other well-known Vedic gods. The Mittanians inhabited the land of Nahrina, the watershed of the River Euphrates, which placed them on the northeastern flank of the Egyptian world at this time. Alliances with foreign princesses were not uncommon in the Eighteenth Dynasty, and Thutmose IV, Akhnaton's grandfather, had taken Mutemuya, the daughter of Artama, king of Mitanni, as his chief wife. Amenhotep III, Akhnaton's father, had married, besides his chief queen Tiy, at least two Mitannian princesses, with whom Akhnaton was familiar. While allowing that the young prince may have gleaned from these ladies some notion of the Aryan sun god Surya that anticipated his worship of Aton, Savitri Devi thought the similarity of these deities was due to the fact that Akhnaton was himself partly Aryan (as the grandson of Mutemuya).⁸

A list of the king's titles on the earliest known inscription of his reign combined traditional titles with new appellations relating to his new religious ideas. This text described him as "the High-priest of Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons rejoicing in his horizon in his name 'Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk.'"⁹ Savitri Devi suggested that, while Akhnaton had earlier associated the divine attributes of the sun with the material Disk, he had by this time conceived a more subtle idea of godhead by considering the "Heat" or "Heat-and-Light" (Shu) inherent in the Disk. Savitri Devi approvingly quoted Sir Flinders Petrie's conclusion that the young pharaoh had discovered the principle of equivalence of heat, light and other forms of energy, which is the basis of modern physics. She suggested further that Akhnaton, by identifying the energy of the sun with the material Disk, had anticipated the equation of energy and matter in the modern theory of relativity.¹⁰ The radiant energy he and his followers adored in the sun also animated the flying birds, the running beasts, and all human achievement.

This religion of the Disk was no cold abstraction, Savitri Devi claimed, but a religion of love. This was not a personal love, such as that of a parent for his or her offspring, nor that of a tribal deity for his chosen people. The love of a God that has brought forth millions and millions of lives from himself is a love that expresses itself in two modes: the active, productive principle and the passive, receptive principle. This love is a bond of physical and logical unity between energies in nature. This love is also a relation of intention, not a personal love of a god made in the human image, but as a sign of God's beneficence toward all living things; as a tendency toward well-being that nature encourages and assists; as an inexhaustible and indiscriminate goodness underlying the whole of creation.¹¹

The energy of the sun bestowed its benefits upon all things. This universality was particularly important to Savitri Devi, who decried the existence of gods made in the human image. She compared this universality favorably with the "childish" partiality of man-made gods toward their authors. Savitri Devi did not accept a demarcation line between man and the rest of the living world. She criticized monotheistic creeds from Judaism onward for positing a god who gave special rights to man to use all other creatures for his own benefit. In her opinion, the concern of Jehovah with his chosen people, the Jews, typified the limitations of a tribal or local deity. Christianity, she maintained, was no more than a globalized tribal religion; the Christians had raised Jesus Christ to the deity of an extended tribe, namely, mankind, which was no more than one species among many others in the endless variety of nature. She detested Christianity and other creedal religions for making man, and not life, the center of their creation myths and the basis of their scale of values. Savitri Devi celebrated an impartial immanent deity in all nature.¹²

If nature offered such an abundance of wonders, man had no need of myths and supernatural explanations of existence. Savitri Devi saw Akhnaton's cult as "pagan" in the same sense as she admired ancient Greek and Hindu notions of beauty and reality. In her view, all three philosophies expressed joy in the visible created world; they each regarded healthy sentient life as "the actual masterpiece of universal Energy and the supreme beauty." According to her "pantheistic monism," the single cosmos of nature composed of divine matter-energy was itself an immanent deity. There was no other supernatural or transcendent reality beyond the natural world. Denying any dualism or transcendence, she celebrated this pagan religion of nature as the authentic Aryan worldview, age-old, still surviving in India, and destined to become the philosophy of a new Nazi order.

In the final chapter of A Son of God, Savitri Devi considered the history of the Western world since Akhnaton's reign. From her standpoint in the present, the young pharaoh's gospel shone like a beacon across the intervening centuries of gloom. "With Tutankhamen [Akhnaton's successor] began for the Western World an era of spiritual regression which is lasting still."¹³ With this apparent paradox she set out to expose Christianity and its secular legacies as the bane of the West. In particular, she sought to demonstrate that the history of Western thought witnessed an ever-widening gap between its recognized religions and rational thought, as well as an increasing divorce between such religions and life, especially public life. She regarded this gap, essentially one between religion and science, between the church and secular society, as the cause of intellectual conflict and moral unrest throughout the history of Western culture.

The earliest evidence of this mental unease occurred in ancient Greece. After the false dawn of scientific imagination in Akhnaton's reign, rational thought was reintroduced to the West by the physiologoi of Ionia in the sixth century B.C. This time such ideas took root. Generations of Greek philosophers from Pythagoras to Plato developed the deduction of ideas and the rational explanation of facts, combined with logic, mystical insight, and mathematics. These thinkers thereby rose above the narrow religious outlook of their age. However, the Greek world still remained loyal to its rich mythology and traditional gods, which resisted the challenge of reason. Indeed, there was widespread conflict; Socrates was put to death "for not believing in the gods in whom the city believed." Savitri Devi also drew attention to the incongruity of the rumbustious antics of the all-too-human Greek gods with the high intellectual achievement of classical Greek philosophy.¹⁴

She saw Christianity as "the next great wave in the history of Western consciousness" but had few words to say in its favor. There was scarcely "a greater contrast between the clear Hellenic genius and the spirit of the creed destined to overrun Hellas, Europe, and finally America and Australia. As preached by St. Paul, it was an irrational and unaesthetic creed, fed on miracles, bent on asceticism, strongly stressing the power of evil, ashamed of the body and afraid of life." But she did concede that its God was a universal God and a God of love. Nevertheless, in her view this Christian God still retained some characteristics of Jehovah, the tribal deity of the Jews. It was a God who gave man, alone among all living creatures, an immortal soul, which was infinitely precious in His eyes, for He loved man in the same partial way that old Jehovah loved the Jewish nation. For Savitri Devi it was a democratic God who hated the rich, the high-born, and those who put their trust in human reason rather than accepting the authority of His Gospel.¹⁵

The universalism of Christianity was a major advance over the older popular and national religions. But Savitri Devi caviled at the love and mercy at the heart of Christian teaching as but a wan reflection of the universal love implicit in the Buddhism and Jainism of India. She held that Christianity appealed to the intellectually uncritical, the emotionally unbalanced, and the socially oppressed or neglected. Parroting Nietzsche's maxims, she claimed that Christianity offered redemption to the barbarians, women, and slaves—"the majority of mankind"—and this ensured its triumph in the Roman Empire. In the medieval and modern period Christianity continued as a religion of plebeian salvation, first throughout Europe and later to the subject peoples of its colonial empires.

Savitri Devi maintained that the Aryan world could not indefinitely forget its classical heritage, centuries of rational thought, nor "that avowed ideal of visible beauty, of strength, of cleanliness—of healthy earthly life . . . of the ancients." The Renaissance witnessed the rediscovery of Greek metaphysics and polytheism in European philosophy, literature, and the arts. The celebration of man as a creative individual, even the coequal of God, the enjoyment of song and pleasure, the deification of the human body in painting, sculpture, and life all indicated the dissolution of the Christian medieval order and the emergence of a new independent spirit. The scientific revolution and the Enlightenment in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries continued the historical process of Western man's emancipation from the authority of Christian dogma. Ever true to her own Greek origins, Savitri Devi regarded this intellectual development as "the tardy reaction of the bold critical spirit of classical Hellas against judeo-scholastic authority . . . the triumph of Euclid over Moses."¹⁶

Rationalism and the scientific worldview now coexisted with Christianity in the modern West. Intellectual discourse and scientific investigation were no longer subject to theological authority. Morality was more a matter of legality and social sanction than the expression of a divine imperative such as the Ten Commandments. While Savitri Devi welcomed this decline of Christian religious authority, she detected a profound ambiguity in modern Western values and beliefs. Although reason and science were triumphant in the intellectual domain, man still adhered to the charitable and democratic ideals of Christianity. Shorn of their transcendent meaning in a secular society, these ideals now simply expressed a man-centered conception of the world and moral behavior. Man no longer believed in his own immortal soul but spoke of the sanctity of human life. Man no longer believed that God had created the world for man, but he exploited and even destroyed the natural world as if it were his own.

The Western world was in a state of spiritual and moral crisis. Despite the triumph of a rational worldview, man still hankered after a simple faith. He regretted the absence of scientific evidence for Christian beliefs. As for the moral teachings of Christianity, these had value as social regulations but did not necessitate a belief in God. But if man had lost his faith in God, he had not found one in science. Science did indeed offer intellectual certainty about the physical world, but the laws of thermodynamics and the periodic table of elements were hardly objects of worship and veneration. During the Enlightenment man had actually tried to create new religions. However, the cult of the Goddess Reason in the French Revolution and Auguste Comte's cult of Humanity had failed to inspire men. Savitri Devi concluded that "science, without the advantages of religion, is no more able to satisfy us than religion without a basis of scientific certitude."¹⁷

In her view, the religion of man, that is, secular humanism, was an unstable hybrid of rationalism and Christian ethics devoid of a belief in God. In a coded reference, she paid tribute to the Nazi religion of race and nation, now defeated and reviled:

And the bold ideologists who, in recent years, in Europe, have endeavoured to wipe out altogether the spirit if not the name of Christianity and to raise the Nation—based on the precise physiological idea of race—as the object of man's ultimate devotion, those ideologists, we say, may seem wiser and more honest than their humanitarian antagonists.¹⁸

If Christianity and secular humanism failed to serve the interests of life, she declared that it would be better to brush aside two thousand years of errors and return to the pagan gods. However, she did recognize that the secular religions of racism and nationalism represented a narrower moral ideal than the universal ideals of Christianity and humanism and that it was perhaps retrograde to return to the worship of local and national gods. Nevertheless, she banished these doubts from her mind by asserting that the religion of race was the true expression of the religion of life in the minds of its best exponents.¹⁹

These intimations of her latent admiration for Hitler and Nazism remained a mere undertone in A Son of God. At this time it seems that her principal targets were Christianity and secular humanism; nationalism and racism were chiefly invoked to prove hypocrisy or bad faith in the dominant Western religious tradition. Savitri Devi claimed that the Western world was yearning for a religion based on rationality, for a love extended to all living things, and a conception of international relations that renounced war and aggression. The twentieth century was witnessing a growing desire for some "all-embracing truth, intellectual and spiritual, in the light of which the revelations of experience and faith, the dictates of reason and of intuition—of science and religion—would find their place as partial aspects of a harmoniously organic whole."²⁰ In her opinion, this romantic ideal was realized by Akhnaton's religion of the Disk. Its revival could provide the basis of a new spiritual order grounded in the philosophical traditions of India and Greece and thus unite East and West.

In the second half of 1944 Savitri Devi corresponded with Aldous Huxley in California about the religion of the Disk. Huxley thought this a rather naive affair and declared his own admiration for Eastern religions, particularly Zen, which gave man experience of the divine through a sense of timelessness. Savitri Devi agreed that men could grow to timelessness along various religious paths. However, having experienced it herself for the past six years, she was sure that some could reach the "peace which is beyond all understanding" and which is connected with the consciousness of timelessness through direct, vital communication with the young Prophet of the Sun. So she wrote in the preface to her book, describing herself as "one who, despite obvious unworthiness, dares to call herself, after three thousand three hundred years, his loving disciple."²¹

By any standards, A Son of God is an extraordinary work of idealism informed by a selective command of secondary sources, incisive reasoning, and an original mind. But it is also flawed by a prejudiced hatred of Christianity and a contempt for the mass of humanity. Besides these antihuman sentiments, a major weakness of the religion of the Disk lies in its nebulous and romantic idealism: a general affirmation of life and energy, devoid of priorities, is no guide for human conduct whatsoever in a complex world. Savitri Devi once described her philosophy as "true to the earth" with a nod toward Friedrich Nietzsche. However, if she applauded the latter's superhuman morality beyond good and evil and shared his contempt of Christianity for seeking the protection and advantage of the weak and humble, she did not want a superman above nature. Nature and life were the center of her scheme. The injunction to live in accordance with nature was the single commandment of the religion of the Disk. Man should understand nature as a rational, beautiful, and loving order and not seek to superimpose upon it his own needs or ideas of right. Any philosophical or moral notions reflecting this "supernatural" worldview led to error.

The religion of the Disk is quite simply a romantic religion of nature, presented in the up-to-date scientific notions of matter-energy and traditional cosmology. Here Savitri Devi saw some correspondence with the amoral nature worship and biological monism of Nazi ideology. Her object of reverence was the cosmic dance of nature, wherein man occupied a marginal and unimportant role. From the towering perspective of cosmic impersonality, the lack of human imperatives and prescriptions might not seem to matter much, nor even man's survival as a species. The religion of the Disk actually transcended man, treating him as but one species among the millions on our biodiverse planet. In her opinion, Nazism was also a religion of integral truth, transcending man and based on a universal love of all nature, destined to supplant Christianity and humanism. She simply regarded the sun cult of Akhnaton as a cult of life and thought that her wartime writings on the subject would help to prepare the religious background of the dawning National Socialist world order, "of which the prototype is none else but the eternal Order of Nature."²²

Begun in July 1945 after her return to Calcutta in the bitter knowledge of Germany's defeat, Impeachment of Man initially pursues her relentless criticism of man-centered creeds to the detriment of "life" and nature in general. Once again she inveighs against the partiality and moral limitations of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam for celebrating only man's immortal soul and redemption, while considering animals and the rest of nature as mere spoil. The East again finds her favor. Thanks to the immemorial Indian belief in reincarnation, the life-centered creeds of Hinduism, Buddhism, and Jainism presuppose an unbroken continuity throughout the whole scheme of existence and an organic unity among all species. No one can know whether the mangy dog or the lame horse does not house the soul of a former friend or relative. However, since these religions ultimately aspire to a release from the cycle of rebirths, all individual existence is regarded as a sorrow. She regrets that this oriental pessimism does not actively foster the good treatment of animals.²³ interspersed with outrage at slaughterhouses and vivisection laboratories. The raising and killing of livestock for meat and their breeding to ensure a constant supply of fresh milk and tender young flesh are condemned wholesale. The trapping and killing of animals for their furs, feathers, and tusks, merely for the gratification of female vanity in fashion, are held up to scorn. Any kind of hunting for sport and use of animals for spectator sports she roundly rejects. She even welcomes the advancing mechanization of the world inasmuch as this will reduce the use of beasts of burden. With interim care these can be sustained until they are self-sufficient for a life in the wild. Even the keeping of pets, which live well in countries like England and Germany, where "Aryans" have a more developed appreciation of animals, is ultimately found to be a purely selfish indulgence on the part of humans. All too often, she bemoans, pets are regarded as a nuisance once they are old, inconvenient, or produce young.

Animals are her chief concern here. Much of this essay is devoted to sentimental images of neglected and ill-treated domestic animals,

Her aim in this book is much more radical than a mere attack on Christianity and an exaltation of nature. She effectively demands an end to man's exploitation of animals and living nature in any form whatsoever. Meat eating, the wearing of furs and feathers, hunting, bullfighting and circus performances, the use of animals in medical and scientific tests, even as beasts of burden are all categorically rejected as unworthy. Man is a superior animal, she concedes, by virtue of his reason and language, but so why should he, a noncarnivore by nature, prey on the rest of the animal kingdom in a manner no better than a ferocious brute? Again she adduces the moral limitation of the man-centered creeds of the West as the root cause of this lack of compassion for animals and their welfare. She complains that science and secularism, even after dismissing all metaphysics, still cling to the superstition of man-centered values: the "dignity of all men." Their goal remains the domination of the world in the hands of man, for man's benefit alone.²⁴

"The history of animal life has been . . . the history of one long and increasingly hopeless struggle against the pretension of man to have the whole earth to himself."²⁵ With this charge, Savitri Devi unconsciously unveils her basic motive behind the sentimental vision of a world of animals living for their own benefit. Her real target is mankind, or at least the universal humanity that disposes so freely over the natural realm as a result of his self-serving religions and morality. The liberal, international ideology of human solidarity against the partial doctrines of racism, nationalism, and fascism is the anvil upon which she wields this hammer of animal rights. In her preface she writes that she was inspired to write this work by the hatred she felt for the hypocrisy and cowardice of the West's outrage at Germany's "crimes against humanity" while still tolerating all this ill-treatment and exploitation of animals. This "false ideal" of human brotherhood against a naturally hierarchized mankind and "healthy race-consciousness" (her coded references to Nazi ideology) is her real enemy.²⁶

Indications of her misanthropic contempt for humanity in contrast to nature abound in this small volume. With an eloquence that matches the pessimism of Deep Ecology today, she documents the vicious, erosive encroachment of mankind upon the natural realm. She recalls that there were lions in ancient Greece and even wolves in seventeenth-century England, but man has taken their place and built his cities, spreading "the network of his ever-grabbling organised life."²⁷

As mankind expanded, forest-areas decreased in surface or vanished away altogether. . . . The forests of France and of the British Isles where stately priests and virgins worshipped the Principle of Eternal Life in the sacred Oak, gradually fell under the merciless axe. . . . The United States of America were a land of forests as late as the middle of the nineteenth century. . . . And there, in the place of the murdered trees . . . roads and railways, towns with endless suburbs, villages rapidly growing into towns, and vast expanses of cultivated land; more and more cultivated land to feed more and more people who might as well never have been born.²⁸

People as a plague. People merely conceived in terms of quantity and their expansion at the expense of all other creation. She contends that far too much is made of human life as a bare physical fact: the fight against disease, to prolong life, to save as many human beings from death.²⁹ She is in revolt against the whole utilitarian ethos of the West, which seeks the greatest good of the greatest number. In her view, people are simply not equal. She is convinced that this emphasis upon universal welfare at the expense of nature will ultimately degrade the planet into a crowded polluted slum. She seeks a qualitative improvement of the world, by which she understands the creation of a hardy, physical breed of superior Aryans inhabiting an aesthetic world of natural beauty. For her, racism is an ecological imperative to conserve the good in nature.

The full violence of her misanthropy is most apparent whenever the Third Reich's crimes are condemned by a liberal West that sees nothing objectionable in its own exploitation of animals. Such a "civilisation," she declares, does not deserve to live. She waxes lyrical in her hopes of the West's destruction so that a new elite of nature-loving supermen might again rise and rule upon its ruins for ever. Indeed, she would rather see all mankind destroyed if there was no hope for nature. She expresses fears that a pacified mankind might colonize the whole earth without limiting its own numbers. Aghast at this prospect, she imagines deliverance in international rivalries and war, which, aided with atomic weapons of mass destruction, might annihilate man together with nature for all time.³⁰ The depth of Savitri Devi's hatred for conventional humanity was matched only by the cloying sweetness of her love of animals, especially dogs, cats, and domestic mammals.

The dramatic sight of the great volcano Hekla in full eruption captured all that Savitri Devi felt about the violence of nature and its power to sweep away the paltry works and beliefs of man. While in Iceland she witnessed this major event on 5 April 1947. Entranced, she watched the seven craters of the erupting volcano as they flamed and smoked, while shooting out great white-hot rocks in flashes of pink light against the bright nocturnal sky. Gaping mouths of fire flickered in the dark crust of the molten lava stream that poured downhill. The unceasing tremor of the earth and roaring beat of the burning mountain seemed to repeat the sacred primeval vocal "Aum." "Ravished in religious rapture," she walked up to the lava stream singing a hymn to Shiva, the lord of the cosmic dance of creation and destruction. In her exultant rhapsody of nature's chaotic power the deep tones of "Aum! Aum!" fused with the great roar of "Sieg Heil!" from Germany's millions in the Third Reich. Later in prison and at her trial in postwar Germany, she would recall Hekla's eruption as a vision of future revenge: the crash of Christian civilization, the resounding Horst Wessel Song, the triumphant swastika flag above the flames and smoke.³¹

She continued writing Impeachment of Man throughout her return voyage to Europe and subsequent visits to London and Lyons in the winter of 1945–1946. Daily confronted by the victorious Allied world, she privately indulged her Nazi loyalties alongside fantasies of a violent overthrow of the liberal democratic West. This small book, whose text never once mentions the words "Hitler" or "National Socialism," may be regarded as her renewed declaration of war against the West, cloaked in the ideology of nature worship and a "life-centred creed." Any ecologically minded person casually reading the book today would note with approval her eloquent defense of the rain forests, her fears of soil erosion, overpopulation, and planetary degradation. It all seems quite in tune with current Green thinking, except perhaps for the viciousness with which she attacks mankind. Only a hint of Nazism, easily overlooked, remains. The work is introduced by a quotation from Josef Goebbels on the Führer's views on vegetarianism, and another from Alfred Rosenberg at the time of his Nuremberg trial: "Thou shalt love God in all living things, animal and plants."³² An avowal of pantheistic divinity combined with the practical rejection of Christian universalism: this remains the essence of Nazism's mixture of power worship and violence with sentimentality. It is the theology of Savitri Devi.

7

THE HITLER AVATAR

The organic growth of religious custom and belief throughout the Indian subcontinent from its origins in the Vedas of the Aryan invaders over a period of four thousand years held great appeal for Savitri Devi. Hinduism appeared to her as a great rambling and unreformed paganism true to its ancient sources and untouched by the imposed monotheism and priesthoods of the Judaeo-Christian tradition. It has already been shown how greatly she revered the Aryans as the most youthful, strong, and beautiful race, the highest expression of nature in the historical world. Given the Vedic origins of Hinduism, it is unsurprising that she should have felt an instinctive affinity for the pagan cults of India. But where did Savitri Devi find her particular inspiration in the immense variety of Hinduism and its long historical development, and more especially, how did Adolf Hitler fit into her Hindu-Aryan philosophy?

The Vedic deities and caste system of the Aryans, the Ramayana and Mahabharata epics, the Bhagavad Gita, the concept of the avatar, and Vaishnavite Hinduism as practiced in contemporary India formed the essential corpus of Hindu doctrine and scripture familiar to Savitri Devi by the end of the 1930s. From 1937 until the early 1940s, her work on behalf of the Hindu Mission involved her lecturing widely on popular Hinduism in Bengali and Hindi throughout the states of Bengal, Bihar, and Assam. This formal involvement with the traditions and texts of Hinduism, coupled with plentiful opportunity to observe and learn firsthand about Hindu customs and beliefs, leaves no doubt as to her knowledge of Indian religion. However, even at this time she was already developing her own Aryo-Nazi religion, sprinkling her lectures with references to Mein Kampf, and seeking correspondences between Hitlerism and Hinduism as supposed joint heirs of ancient Aryan wisdom.

She received encouragement in this project from a number of highly educated Hindus. During the 1930s, when India was chafing under British rule, the restrictions imposed on Indian nationalists led many to regard Soviet communism and the Third Reich with its Aryan racial doctrine and holy swastika sign as potent alternatives. Those who were religiously inclined even saw Stalin and Hitler as possible redeemer figures and made them the objects of bhakti devotion by displaying their photographs on the family shrine alongside the images of their personal deity, be this Vishnu, Shiva, or another god. It was with amazement and joy that Savitri Devi first observed pictures of the Führer on the household altar of Indian families. When she asked Srimat Swami Satyananda, the president of the Hindu Mission in Calcutta, if she might make reference to Hitler and Mein Kampf in her official lectures, he replied that Hitler was for them an incarnation of Vishnu, the god who keeps things from rushing to destruction, who keeps things back and goes against time. She was welcome to say what she liked in her lectures, provided that she said it from a Hindu point of view. Satyananda repeated this view of Hitler in 1942, adding that they needed National Socialism in India. She encountered similar pro-Hitler attitudes among many other educated Brahmins besides Asit Krishna Mukherji, and even among illiterate Sudras.¹

Satyananda's references to Hitler as an "incarnation of God" and the "Saviour of the world" were in fact commonplace among high-caste Hindus. Writing of his impressions of university life in India during the 1950s, Aghananda Bharati declared that the active Hindu loves all dictators due to incurable hero worship. This he attributed to the avatar idea—that in every powerful man there is some cosmic power that manifested itself in the god-kings and heroes of the epics and mythology. But Hitler was especially popular, particularly with the aggressive nationalists, for he trounced the British in the early years of the war. Also, Hitler proclaimed the superiority of the Aryan, which is how the Hindu sees himself. Last, the memory of Max Müller's Aryan researches was still fresh: Hitler was the leader of the Sanskrit-knowing Germans.² Bharati was exceptionally well placed to observe this sympathy. Born Leopold Fischer in 1923, he spent his youth in Vienna and embarked early on the scholarly study of India. During the war he was a member of Bose's Indian Legion, serving mainly in France and Germany. Embracing Hinduism, he became a monk in the Dashanami Order, originally founded by Shankara in 800, and pursued an academic career at Benares Hindu University after the war. He has also written on Golwalkar's Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) and Hindu fascism.³

Back in Europe during the early postwar years, Savitri Devi began to write the first major statement of her Aryo-Nazi philosophy, which drew together her own long-held convictions, her enthusiasm for National Socialism, and those elements of Hinduism that she regarded as the legacy of immemorial Aryan tradition. This work, entitled The Lightning and the Sun, was eventually published in Calcutta in 1958 after her return to India following thirteen years in Europe. She began writing the book in April 1948 in Edinburgh while employed as the wardrobe manager of a traveling dance company, continuing work on it during her propaganda missions and in prison at Werl in the summer of 1949. She returned to the manuscript while living at Lyons in 1951 and 1952, and then, after her pilgrimage to Germany, she completed it between 1954 and spring 1956 while staying as Katja U.'s guest at Emsdetten in Westphalia.

The most important inspiration from Hinduism in her Aryo-Nazi doctrine is the cyclic view of history, according to which the whole of creation commences at a point of perfection, but then declines through successive stages into final decay, until everything once more regains its pristine state and the cycle begins anew. Hindu thinkers had evolved a cyclic theory of time in the Mahabharata epic and similar ideas about the cycles also appear in the Vishnu Purana, a book of legends dating from the first few centuries A.D. These ancient Indian notions of cosmology and chronology offered a perspective upon the nature of time and its influence on the created universe. The latter work describes the Puranic divisions of time in the cycle of the ages in terms of the four Yugas, or ages. The Sanskrit names for the four ages refer to their relative duration: Krita or Satya (four units), Treta (three), Dvapara (two), and Kali (one). Thus, the Krita Yuga lasts some 1,728,000 years, the Treta Yuga 1,296,000 years, the Dvapara Yuga 864,000 years, and the Kali Yuga 432,000 years. Accordingly, their sum of ten units makes up a Mahayuga equivalent to 4,320,000 years.

The Hindu chronology of the Vishnu Purana made provision for even longer periods and cycles, including a thousand Mahayugas or a Day of Brahman, also known as a Kalpa, equivalent to 4,320,000,000 years. A Year of Brahman was composed of 360 such Days and Nights (i.e., two Kalpas), and the life of Brahman was deemed to last for a hundred such years, yielding the astronomic total of 311,040,000,000,000 years. Such a figure was deemed to define the period of the universe through a complete cycle of creation, development, and collapse. But even this figure was itself just one cycle within a limitless and unending sequence of cycles. However, such large cycles all repeated the basic tenfold pattern of the four Yugas, corresponding to the Golden, Silver, Bronze, and Iron Ages, which determined the nature of life and society from prosperity to decay.⁴

In the Mahabharata these ages are described in some detail. The Krita Yuga is characterized as an age in which righteousness is eternal. In this most excellent of Yugas everything had been done and nothing remained to be done. Duties did not languish, nor did the people decline. There was no buying and selling, no efforts needed to be made by men, the fruits of the earth were abundant. No disease or decline of the organs of sense arose through age, there was no malice, weeping, pride, or deceit, no contention, lassitude, hatred, cruelty, fear, affliction, jealousy, or envy. All creatures were devoted to their duties, all the castes were alike in their functions, they were devoted to one deity and used one rule and one rite. During the Treta Yuga righteousness decreased by a fourth. Men now acted with an object in view, seeking rewards for their rites and gifts, while still being devoted to their duties and their ceremonies. The decline became more marked in the Dvapara Yuga, when righteousness was diminished by two quarters. The Veda became fourfold, and with this proliferation of rules, rites, and ceremonies people no longer knew unity. Once men had fallen away from goodness, many diseases, desires, and calamities assailed them and these in turn drove men to practice austerities.⁵

The Kali Yuga, or Iron Age, represented the cosmological and moral nadir in the Hindu cycle of ages. Only a quarter as much righteousness prevailed in comparison with the Krita Yuga. Sacred practices were neglected. Calamities, diseases, fatigue, and faults such as anger, distress, anxiety, hunger, and fear became commonplace. Political and social order collapsed, cities became violent, civilization receded. Evil was everywhere evident and triumphant. The Vishnu Purana describes many aspects of this moral and social decay in the Kali Yuga. The observance of caste and order is neglected with promiscuous intermarriage among all classes and peoples; women are unfaithful and consort with worthless men; the family and other blood ties lose their meaning; the acquisition of wealth, commerce, and money govern all men's actions and aspirations; liberalism and moral relativism prevail so that any idol or authority is revered on the basis of popularity and individual choice. The rulers oppress and plunder the masses, who then desert the intolerable cities and settle in remote places. There they live in scarcity and want, suffering exposure, and subject to decreasing vigor and longevity. In due course, the entire race is destroyed.⁶

Savitri Devi believed in the former existence of the Golden Age, the most recent Satya, or Krita, Yuga, which had passed away more than two million years ago. In terms reminiscent of the account in the Mahabharata, she described the social and political order on earth in that "Age of Truth" as a perfect replica of the eternal order of life:

There was, then, nothing to be changed; nothing for which to shed one's own or other people's blood; nothing to do but to enjoy in peace the beauty and riches of the sunlit earth, and to praise the wise Gods—the "devas" or "shining Ones" as the ancient Aryans called them—Kings of the earth in the truest sense of the word. Every man and woman, every race, every species was, then, in its place, and the whole divine hierarchy of Creation was a work of art to which and from which there was nothing to add or to take away.

The end of the Golden Age began with the self-exaltation of a man-centered spirit at the expense of living nature and its naturally superior individuals and races. From then on, violence became unavoidable, "the very law of Life in a fallen world."⁷

The Hindu cycle of ages supplied an implacably deterministic philosophy of history, according to which each Golden Age was followed by successively less righteous ages until evil prevailed and no good could come of anything. Savitri Devi was profoundly impressed by these ancient cosmological notions, for they confirmed some of her earliest convictions. Even as a child in France, she had been contemptuous of the bold progressive idealism of the French Revolution. The ideas of 1789, those man-centered beliefs in liberty, equality, and fraternity, had early struck her at best as a wan secular reflection of Christianity, at worst as an expression of the superficial intellectual optimism of the modern age, which had lost all sense of tradition and man's rootedness in nature. Inspired by her vision of the former glories of the beautiful, strong, and warlike Aryan race at the dawn of the present cycle, she could not but regard recorded history as a slow process of Aryan corruption and decline. As a cultural pessimist and devotee of Leconte de Lisle, she had no doubts that the world had long been passing through the gloomy Kali Yuga.

In her view early postwar Europe with its grim austerities, ruin, and exhaustion, and, above all, the defeat of Nazi Germany, the focus of her hopes for regeneration and the start of a new Satya Yuga, only served to confirm that the world had yet further to go through the era of gloom. Writing in April 1948 in Scotland, she described the decadence and banality of the modern age as characteristics of the Kali Yuga, which included selfishness, conceit, hypocrisy, and false ideas of human equality and liberty. The Western belief in progress was her especial target and she roundly dismissed its advocates' celebration of literacy, individual freedom, equal opportunities, religious toleration, and humaneness. According to her view, universal education and literacy only rendered the masses more suggestible to the mass conditioning and control of the media and vested interests; the individual could revel in the exercise of trivial choices concerning consumer goods and services while remaining enslaved by the whole commercial system of exploitation and profit and ignorant of any traditional wisdom. Equal opportunities she regarded as no more than a mendacious myth that flew in the face of natural hierarchies, while tolerance and humaneness were for her mere liberal humbug.⁸

As she restlessly traveled around postwar Europe, confronted by Nazi atrocity exhibitions in London, daily reminded of the trial of her heroes at Nuremberg, or seeking escape from the overwhelming evidence of Nazi defeat in remote Iceland, she saw a world that was still rushing onward through the downsweep of the Kali Yuga:

There is no hope of "putting things right," in such an age. It is, essentially, the age . . . described in the . . . Book of books—the Bhagavad Gita—as that in which "out of the corruption of women proceeds the confusion of castes; out of the confusion of castes, the loss of memory; out of loss of memory the lack of understanding; and out of this, all evils"; the age in which falsehood is termed "truth" and truth persecuted as falsehood or mocked as insanity; in which the exponents of truth, the divinely inspired leaders, the real friends of their race and of all the living,—the god-like men—are defeated, and their followers humbled and their memory slandered, while the masters of lies are hailed as "saviours"; the age in which every man and woman is in the wrong place, and the world dominated by inferior individuals, bastardised races and vicious doctrines, all part and parcel of an order of inherent ugliness far worse than complete anarchy.⁹

Armed with the Hindu cyclic theory of time, Savitri Devi believed that "human history, far from being a steady ascension towards the better, is an increasingly hopeless process of bastardisation, emasculation and demoralisation of mankind; an inexorable 'fall.'" ¹⁰ Against the dismal cosmological background of the Kali Yuga, she developed her own doctrine of Men in Time, Men above Time, and Men against Time. These three types of historical actors represented three quite distinct responses to the bondage of time as understood in the cycle of the ages. Of the three types, Men in Time are the essential and most active agents of the Kali Yuga. Their conduct and aims typify the dark age and all its vicissitudes. Men above Time are properly at home in the perfection of the Satya Yuga, or Golden Age, and Men against Time act with ruthless violence in an attempt to restore the conditions of the Satya Yuga at the end of the Kali Yuga. By violent means, these martial heroes work to redeem the world from the thrall of the dark age and to initiate a new time cycle.

Men in Time, according to Savitri Devi, are those few strong individuals who wholeheartedly accept the iron law of history and act entirely in their own narrow self-interest. Whether in lust for personal enjoyment, in greed for gold, or in the search for honors, position, and power, this selfish drive is shameless and undisguised by such "noble" ends as the ideas of 1789 or the solidarity of the international proletariat. In seeking only their own personal ends with the utmost intelligence, unscrupulousness, and energy, these Men in Time are "the most thorough, the most mercilessly effective agents of the Death-forces on earth . . . working without hesitation and without remorse in the sense of the downward process of history and, for its logical conclusion: the annihilation of man and all life."¹¹

Men in Time represent the most naked and powerful expression of egoism in the benighted era of the Kali Yuga, an age that is given over to the play of atomistic individual wills striving for their materialistic gratification with no understanding of the wisdom or higher collective goals of happier ages. By seeking their own individual advantage in a constant war of wills, Men in Time drive history along that oppositional path that is the hallmark of the dark age and its decline. Their gains, profits, or victories are entirely personal; even if they bring wider fortune and prosperity, this is quite incidental to their motive of self-gratification. And all the while they are fighting and struggling and winning, the world around them is violated, thereby growing older, wearier, and less abundant until it is exhausted and reaches the end of the time cycle.

Savitri Devi regarded Genghis Khan (1157–1227) as an outstanding example of a Man in Time. The Mongol leader who rose from a fatherless outcast to the uncontested master of a vast Eurasian empire stretching from the Danube to the Yellow Sea acted only to extend his power. He followed no ideology, no other ends save survival and more power. Although an agent of the dreary Kali Yuga, he also hastened its consummation and end; Genghis Khan was thus a personification of the divine destroyer Mahakala, or Shiva, possessing the awful splendor of the great devastating forces of nature. Due to his powerful and destructive participation in the world, he represented the “lightning” in the title of her book.¹² But because he espoused no higher cause than his own personal gain and power, his empire scarcely survived him. Indeed, Savitri Devi attributed the later rise of European colonialism in Asia under the Portuguese, Dutch, French, and British and its commercial, money-worshipping spirit to the very failure of Genghis Khan to found a more enduring state in this region. The self-seeking and destructive force of the Mongol Empire was thus linked to the rise of Jewish international finance, the great adversary of Aryan rule.¹³

Men above Time are those individuals who have attained the highest enlightenment described in the Upanishads. In recognizing the fundamental unity of the divine Self (Atman) and the all-pervading God (Brahman), they represent the spiritual authority in the Satya Yuga, or Age of Truth, in which complete perfection and righteousness prevail. In ancient India the Brahmins were the counselors and mentors of kings and warriors who were anxious to act in accordance with the commands of timeless wisdom. However, as the world proceeds through the time cycle with increasing disorder and decay, such Men above Time enjoy less and less authority. During the Kali Yuga they just seem to be unworldly mystics whose entire outlook and conduct barely equips them to survive in a world of struggle and conflict, let alone to act as guides and rulers of men. These lonely ascetics abstain from all violence and cannot change the collective conditions of mankind. At best they can offer personal salvation in breaking the time bondage of individual souls; it is not within their power to re-create the Golden Age before its due time.¹⁴

Savitri Devi described Men above Time as “exiles of the Golden Age in our Age of Gloom,” who live in their own inner world, while renouncing or simply forgetting the nature of the real world around them. In her view, both Buddha and Jesus Christ (whom she regarded as a genial mystic quite unlike St. Paul, the founder and organizer of Christianity) were Men above Time, too good for the fallen earth. Her chief example was Akhnaton, the Egyptian pharaoh of Aryan ancestry, whose ill-fated attempt to institute a golden-age state in the fourteenth century B.C. ended predictably in chaos and failure. Already in A Son of God (1946) she had described Akhnaton as a Man above Time “who had tried to impose his lofty ideals upon this Dark Age (both his and ours), without taking into account the fact that violence is the law of any revolution within Time, specially in the Dark Age (the Kali Yuga of the Hindus).”¹⁵ He came already thousands of years too late for his solar theocracy to have succeeded. But like the sun, his symbol, he shed the last rays of the long-forgotten Satya Yuga while the downsweep of time continued in the ancient world.

In Hindu chronology the Kali Yuga suddenly and momentarily gives way at its lowest point of degradation, suffering, and evil to the opening of a new Satya, or Krita, Yuga, which begins the cycle anew. According to Savitri Devi, Men against Time play a crucial role in the struggle to restore the Golden Age as the Kali Yuga nears the completion of its term. Although possessed of the sunlike qualities and mystical ideals of the Man above Time, the Man against Time employs the practical means, ruthlessness, and violence of the Man in Time for the achievement of collective salvation and the regeneration of the world. In her scheme of things, Men against Time combine the qualities of “Lightning” and “Sun” as the real heroes of history, the builders and defenders of all new churches who devote their whole life and energy to the reshaping of tangible reality on the model of their vision of truth. These divinely inspired militant mystics are rare individuals who suddenly intervene in the downsweep of time with the promise of redemption and the return of the Golden Age. The revolutionary implications of the Man against Time are obvious. Like a fiery comet from the heavens he bursts through the gloomy pall surrounding the earth in the Kali Yuga to herald the spreading sunshine of a new order of perfection, divine justice, and righteousness.

In Savitri Devi's opinion, the greatest Man against Time in all recorded history was Adolf Hitler, the Führer of the Germans, and the divinely appointed leader of the Aryan world in the West. His demand for German national unity in a strong new Reich in defiance of the humiliating Versailles Treaty clearly identified him as a champion of the old tribal principle against the degenerate capitalist and cosmopolitan world of the Allies. His adoption of racist ideas, his anti-Semitism, and the Nuremberg race laws forbidding intermarriage and sexual relations between Aryans and Jews convinced Savitri Devi that he intended the revival of the Aryan caste system on a global basis. An avid believer in Hitler's propaganda image, she saw his love of children and animals, his domestic modesty, vegetarianism, and abstention from alcohol as typical traits of the kindly ascetic. His ruthless use of military violence against his enemies in a resistant fallen world, no less his uncompromising plan to exterminate the Jews, the age-old adversary and counterimage of the heroic Aryans, identified him as the essential Man against Time.

Savitri Devi's notion of the Man against Time is derived from the Hindu idea of the periodic descent of the Deity, typically Vishnu, in a human, superhuman, or animal form. This mediator between God and men is known as the avatara (avatar), or divine incarnation, and represents a development from the extrahuman gods of the Vedic period.¹⁶ The origin of the concept of avatar is obscure, and precursors have been traced to Aryan Iran in the Bahram Yasht, a Zoroastrian text, which may even show traces of Chinese influence and mythology. However, in none of these beliefs does the concept play such an important part as it does in the post-Vedic Hindu thought of the epics and the Bhagavad Gita. Both the Ramayana and the Mahabharata describe the descent of avatar in the form of Rama and Krishna, who both reappear as the favorite incarnations of Vishnu in the Puranas, ancient legends forming a further part of popular Hindu scripture.

In the Mahabharata, Vishnu incarnates ten times successively as a swan, fish, tortoise, boar, man-lion, dwarf, Rama (twice), Krishna, and Kalki. The Bhagavad Gita (a section of the Mahabharata) tells how Krishna, posing as a charioteer, manifested as an avatar to Arjuna on the battlefield of Kurukshetra during the war of the Koravas and Pandavas in 3102 B.C. Krishna's advice to the warrior prince concerning his martial duties and divine wisdom comprise the full text of the Bhagavad Gita. Puranic avatars also catalyze the cycle of ages as the Yuga avatars: in the Treta Yuga, Vishnu appears as Rama, and as Krishna at the end of the Dvapara Yuga and the beginning of the Kali Yuga. The Kalki avatar appears as the tenth and final incarnation of Vishnu: he arrives in the form of a sword-bearing rider on a white horse to end the dark age and initiate a new golden Satya Yuga.

Savitri Devi is unquestionably the first Western writer to identify Adolf Hitler as an avatar. In a manner suggestive of bhakti devotion, she frequently quotes Krishna's verses from the theistic Bhagavad Gita with reference to Hitler. One particular couplet appears as the motto of her book Pilgrimage and elsewhere in its pages: "When justice is crushed, when evil is triumphant, then I come back. For the protection of the good, for the destruction of evil-doers, for the establishment of the Reign of Righteousness, I am born again and again, age after age."¹⁷ Her eulogy of Hitler's life and political career in The Lightning and Sun begins with the incarnation of the divine collective Self of Aryan mankind as "the late-born child of light" in Braunau am Inn in 1889. Her description of the youth and his dawning sense of mission is based on August Kubizek's account of their adolescent friendship in Linz and Vienna during the years 1904 to 1908. Whether enthusing over the magical power of Wagner's music or boldly outlining plans for new cities, buildings, and monuments, Hitler is for her the true friend of his people, ever inspired by the inner vision of a healthy, beautiful, and peaceful world, a real earthly paradise reflecting cosmic perfection.¹⁸

Savitri Devi was sure that Hitler had realized he was an avatar while still a youth. She found compelling proof of this in Kubizek's account of young Adolf's dramatic reaction to a performance of Wagner's Rienzi they had seen together during November 1906 in Linz. Both boys were caught up in the great epic of Rienzi's rise to become the tribune of the people of Rome and his subsequent downfall. When the performance ended, it was past midnight. Hitler, usually very talkative after an exciting opera, was silent and withdrawn. He led his friend through the cold, foggy streets up the Freinberg hill on the western side of the town. Kubizek recalled how Hitler strode on, looking pale and sinister, until they reached the summit. They were no longer engulfed by the fog and the stars shone brilliantly overhead. Then Hitler began to speak, his words bursting forth with hoarse passion. Kubizek was utterly amazed. Hitherto he had always understood that Hitler wanted to become an artist, a painter, or an architect. None of that mattered now. It was as if another Self spoke through him in a state of ecstasy or complete trance. "In sublime, irresistible images, he unfolded before me his own future and that of our people. . . . He now spoke of a mandate that he was one day to receive from our people, in order to lead them out of slavery, to the heights of freedom." With perfect recall of this starry hour in a conversation with Winifried Wagner and Kubizek at Bayreuth in 1939, Hitler solemnly added "In that hour it began."¹⁹

Savitri Devi believed that Adolf Hitler was the western Aryan counterpart of Rama and Krishna among the eastern Aryans of India. She visited Linz and Leonding on her pilgrimage of 1953 in the selfsame spirit that had drawn her in the 1930s to Ayodhya where Rama, the miraculous conqueror of South India, had lived and ruled, and to Brindaban, where Krishna, the immortal teacher of the doctrine of detached violence, had spent his early youth. Both these avatars personified to her the warlike wisdom and the territorial expansion of the hallowed race, and each of them inaugurated a new epoch in the history of the awakening of Aryan consciousness in antiquity.²⁰ Just as Rama and Krishna were Yuga avatars, she so could invoke Hitler, the race savior, as the perennial avatar of the Bhagavad Gita. Sitting in the garden of Hitler's former classmate's in Leonding, she visualized the beloved features of her Führer suddenly merging into the impersonal Essence of the many-featured One, who spoke Krishna's words to Arjuna. She was certain that she had sought him for centuries, in life after life, until she realized that the founder of the Third Reich was indeed he—the one who comes back, whenever he should "to establish the reign of Righteousness."²¹

Savitri Devi believed that it was impossible to understand National Socialism apart from the cyclic conception of history suggested by Hindu tradition. She considered that Hitler's vision ultimately transcended even Germany and the Aryan race. The Nazi philosophy set at nought man's intellectual conceit, his naive pride in "progress," and his futile attempts to enslave nature and instead made the mysterious and unfailing impersonal wisdom of forests, oceans, and outer space the basis of a global regeneration policy for an overcrowded, over-civilized, and technically overdeveloped world at the end of the Kali Yuga. She saw Hitler embodying that eternal nature wisdom against the false science, false religion, false morality, and false political ideas of a decadent age. He made Germany's struggle for freedom, healthy living conditions, and power part of a broader struggle for the liberation of mankind from the Kali Yuga. He made Germany, "the holy Land of the West, the Stronghold of regenerate Aryandom."²²

Savitri Devi also found the faithful echo of ancient Sanskrit wisdom in the institutions and organizations of the Third Reich. Her enthusiastic description of social life in Nazi Germany dwelt on the high moral tone, new housing, and sports and leisure facilities in a sunlit world of energetic purpose. Hitler's measures for the physical and moral protection of his predestined people were intended to foster the natural leaders of the Aryan race. His new laws for the welfare of mother and child, for the creation of ideal living conditions for workmen's families, and for the education of a healthy, self-confident and self-reliant, proud and beautiful youth, and his Nuremberg race laws, all promoted the regeneration of the pure-blooded Germanic race and arrested the threatening tide of inferior humanity, whose rise is always the index of an advanced stage of the Kali Yuga.²³

But Savitri Devi neither ignored nor denied the dark side of Nazism. For her the SS was the supreme Nazi organization, the physical and moral elite of awakening Aryandom, the living matrix in which a new race of gods on earth was to take shape and soul. She dwelt lovingly on the harsh rigors of its discipline and on its high standards of cleanliness, presentation, and drill. Purity of blood and flawless physical perfection were the conditions of admission to the SS: prospective members were obliged to submit a family tree of exclusive Aryan-Germanic descent back to 1750, and superiors took great care in vetting the future spouse of each SS man. Savitri Devi recalled that SS men always gave their religion as gottgläubig (believer in God) rather than any denomination. This had nothing to do with Judaeo-Christian notions of universalism but embraced the idea of a natural and biological hierarchy, in which the SS would form a blood aristocracy to rule over the rest of mankind. The SS knew nothing of meekness and humanity; its watchwords were strictness and pride. The black uniforms and ominous death's-head insignia symbolized the harsh forces "in Time" employed for the achievement of a golden age.²⁴

Savitri Devi regarded the SS attitude toward war as the living expression of that ancient Aryan wisdom of detached violence necessary to overcome the dark age. Rigorous selection and training guaranteed the SS man's complete self-mastery and military skill. However, National Socialism was pitted against all the forces of darkness and decay in a fallen world, and this great cosmic battle required terrible deeds on the part of its elite military vanguard. The SS was involved in the liquidation of Jewish ghettos and the administration of concentration camps; after the Wehrmacht attack on the Soviet Union, the SS Einsatzgruppen shot hundreds of thousands of Jews and communist officials in mass executions; millions of Jews were murdered in the extermination camps in occupied Poland. Savitri Devi saw the SS as the living enactment of the ancient Aryan warrior code described in the Bhagavad Gita: "Perform without attachment that action which is duty, desiring nothing but the welfare of Creation."²⁵ And again, "Taking as equal pleasure and pain, gain and loss, victory and defeat, gird thyself for battle." With frightful logic, she saw the embodiment of this Aryan kshatriya warrior spirit in Otto Ohlendorf, the commander of an SS Einsatzgruppe, condemned to death as a war criminal at Nuremberg.²⁶

In her millenarian expectation of the end of the Kali Yuga, Savitri Devi combined the Hindu cyclic theory of time with more Manichean and dualistic notions of Judaeo-Christian apocalyptic prophecy. Savitri Devi saw the Jews as the embodiment of the Kali Yuga. Her broad surveys of ancient history often touched on the rise of the Semites, initially in the overthrow of the Mitanni by the Assyrians and the migration of the Hebrews into Palestine during Akhnaton's reign. While the Aryans were refining the caste system in India and their western cousins were first settling as Teutons and Mycenaean Greeks in Europe, the Jews, she believed, were elaborating a cunning strategy for world dominion. Strictly adhering to their own tribal identity, the Jews encouraged racial mixing, cosmopolitanism, liberalism, and skepticism among all other peoples to promote their disintegration and downfall. Scattered by the Romans in the first century A.D., the Jews entered Europe in the early Middle Ages and became in due course the ferment of its nations. During the modern period the atomistic self-seeking individualism of money capitalism served their purposes as much as Marxism, another Jewish doctrine intended for Gentile consumption, which cynically preached international raceless brotherhood.²⁷

Savitri Devi presents a metaphysical anti-Semitism, according to which the Jew is the expression of the downsweep of the time cycle, and whose purpose is the dissolution of all races, all nations, all communities, and ultimately all life upon the planet. From the fourth century B.C. onward until the time of Philo, she argued, hellenized Jews had begun blending their cabbalistic notions with Greek ideas to create that religion of man opposed to all other living creatures. This exaltation of man over nature led, either through capitalism or communism, to a general bastardization of the whole human species and its exponential proliferation as producers and consumers at the expense of all other creatures in "a reign of quantity" characterized by money, rational calculation, and the growth of human numbers. However, such philosophical falsehood was matched by its ecological folly. Mankind would simply create one vast international slum in which he completed the exhaustion and destruction of nature itself. In her account the Jews are thus the epitome of the death forces in the era of gloom.²⁸

Certain passages in Hitler's Mein Kampf do indeed possess a strange cosmic quality. Especially when writing of the Jews or Marxism as the enemies of the Aryan race, Hitler often raises Nazi ideology to the level of a principle of order in the universe. Terms like the "planets," the "world ether," "destiny," "millions of years," and all "creation" lend a cosmological note to his accounts of nature, the struggle for life, and the survival of the fittest.²⁹ Hitler also identified the human conquest and transcendence of nature as a dangerous illusion of Jewish origin. Should the Jew, with the aid of Marxism, prevail over mankind and the laws of nature, Hitler prophesied that "the planet will go its way, void of human beings, through aetherial space, as it did millions of years ago. . . . [B]y defending myself against the Jew, I am fighting for the work of the Lord."³⁰ Savitri Devi seized upon such passages as striking evidence of Hitler's divine mission to eradicate the man-centered faiths in the Judaeo-Christian orbit of the modern Western world in favor of that doctrine "in the interest of the Universe."³¹

She regarded Hitler as an avatar like Rama and Krishna, the most widely remembered Aryan heroes of ancient India, who also knew that the end of the Kali Yuga can be achieved only by responding to the decay of the dark age with yet greater violence.³² Savitri Devi glorified Hitler for his avataric intervention against the forces of death and disintegration in a battle for the future of the universe. At the mass meetings and rallies of the 1920s and 1930s "he spoke with the wild eloquence of emergency, knowing that the struggle he was about to start had to take place then or never."³³ He knew that his German people and the whole Aryan race "were threatened in their existence by the agents of the Death-powers; cornered; and that their definitive downfall and disappearance would mean the definitive downfall of higher organised Life upon this planet, with no hope of resurrection."³⁴ She extolled the mystical insight, elemental logic, and violence of Nazism as the collective expression of Hitler's own iron will, militant brutality, and fanatical faith.

The Yuga avatar was a harbinger of the apocalypse and the onset of the next age. The Hindu mythology of the Puranas foretold the advent of Kalki, the tenth and final avatar of Vishnu as the divine incarnation who will end the Kali Yuga and initiate a new Krita Yuga.

When the close of the Kali age shall be nigh, a portion of that divine being who exists of his own spiritual nature in the character of Brahma, and who is the beginning and the end, and who comprehends all things, shall descend upon earth: he will be born in the family of Vishnuyasas, an eminent Brahman of Sambhala village as Kalki, endowed with the eight superhuman faculties. . . . [H]e will destroy all whose minds are devoted to iniquity. He will then reestablish righteousness upon earth; and the minds of those who live at the end of the Kali age shall be awakened, and shall be as pellucid as crystal. The men who are thus changed by virtue of that peculiar time shall be as the seeds of human beings, and shall give birth to a race who shall follow the laws of the Krita age, or age of purity.³⁵

The critical and final nature of the Kalki avatar in the cycle of the ages has led to speculation that this is a borrowing from Christian apocalyptic prophecy concerning the Second Coming of Christ. This particular myth in the Vishnu Purana has been dated to the first couple of centuries A.D., and scholars have wondered whether this idea entered India with the Parthian invasions in the same period. Kalki is always portrayed in Hindu iconography as a sword-bearing warrior mounted on a white horse, which would again suggest a link to the redeemer figure or warrior Christ in the Book of Revelation. This close parallel between Christian and Hindu ideas of the savior, in the first case as one who ends all history, in the second as one who restores perfection for the period of a new cycle, go some way to explaining the peculiar attraction of Kalki to the Western millenarian mind. Savitri Devi devoted the final part of The Lightning and the Sun to the coming of Kalki and the end of the age of gloom.

Did Savitri Devi believe Adolf Hitler was Kalki? She almost certainly did during the heyday of the Third Reich and the first half of the Second World War. As Hitler's avataric battle escalated into a global conflict with the declaration of war against the Soviet Union followed by the United States, she shuddered at his colossal challenge to the combined dark age forces of Jewry, Marxism, and international capitalism. However, by late 1944 even she and her husband could no longer have expected an Axis victory; it was clear that Hitler had not ended the Kali Yuga. But her hopes for its ending remained undimmed, and she also clung to the belief that Hitler was still alive, awaiting the right moment to resume hostilities against the world. It was only certain that Kalki would come and Hitler might indeed reappear as Kalki at this final Armageddon. But even if Hitler himself did not return, Kalki would combine the qualities of the Krishna avatar on the Kurukshetra battlefield in the Bhagavad Gita with those of Adolf Hitler and of all Men against Time who come back to reestablish the reign of righteousness.

In the meantime, she believed that Hitler had offered not only himself but his beloved German people in sacrifice, for the fulfillment of the highest purpose of Creation: the survival of a superior mankind. Krishna's words appeared as the second motto of Pilgrimage: "I am the Oblation; I am the Sacrifice . . ." (Bhagavad Gita IX, 16). In early 1956 when Germany was divided and Nazism reviled, Savitri Devi fondly imagined that Hitler would survive in songs and symbols: "[T]he Lords of the new Time-cycle, men of his own blood and faith, will render him divine honours, through rites full of meaning and full of potency, in the cool shade of the endless re-grown forests, on the beaches, or upon the inviolate mountain-peaks, facing the rising sun."³⁶ For Savitri Devi the place of Adolf Hitler in the future Aryan pantheon was quite secure.

8

DEFIANCE

In May 1945 Europe lay in ruins. Because of the sustained Anglo-American bombing campaign since 1943, countless German cities were reduced to shells and rubble. Hitler's reckless policy of "no surrender," coupled with his wild hopes of miracle weapons, a falling-out among the Allies, or other freak reversal in the grinding defeat of the German armed forces had brought the war deep into the Reich. By the end, whole industries were destroyed; basic amenities and transport systems shattered; food and fuel scarce. The soldiers were demoralized, captured, or dead. The ragged civilian survivors searched for the missing amid a wasteland of defeat and enemy occupation. This burden of defeat, loss, and death was compounded with horror and disgrace. The Allied discoveries of the concentration camps, notably Belsen and Dachau, revealed the depravity of the Third Reich to the world at large. The emaciated victims and piles of corpses became the symbol of Nazi bestiality and German shame. Hitler and the Third Reich were reviled; Germany was an outcast among the nations.

Savitri Devi returned to this war-ravaged Europe in late 1945 to make her belated contribution to the Nazi cause. She knew she had left this mission too late; that while the Third Reich was martial, ebullient, and expansive, she had been far removed from action in India. Now, the defeat of Hitler and disgrace of Germany reduced her from a triumphant votary of the New Order to a quasi-gnostic sectary of Nazism in a world of Western ascendancy. Her sense of frustration at missing the "great days" of the Third Reich were overwhelming. Whenever she met Nazi loyalists, former SS men, and Wehrmacht veterans in occupied Germany, her admiration and compassion for these people was matched only by regret that she had failed to stand beside them during the heyday of Nazi rule. She was always repining that she had not shared with them the excitement and inflationary sense of power amid the thunderous applause of the Nazi crowds. Now she could only join them in their suffering, losses, and martyrdom. This desire to identify belatedly with the defeated Nazi cause and its devotees propelled her into a quixotic and hopeless mission on behalf of the Third Reich. Her subsequent detention as an Allied prisoner fulfilled her burning desire to share the fate of the Nazi faithful.

She approached her Nazi mission by degrees, not entering Allied-occupied Germany until the spring of 1948. But the total defeat of Germany cast its long shadow over her return to Europe. In November 1945 she had sailed on a passenger liner bound from Bombay to Southampton. During the several weeks on board there was no other conversation among her English fellow passengers but the defeat of Nazism. After a brief stay in London she traveled to France to visit her mother in Lyons, only to learn that she had been active throughout the war in the French Resistance against German occupation. Reunited for the first time since 1934, mother and daughter now found that a bitterly fought war as well as an ideological gulf divided them, and their relations were duly strained. However, Savitri Devi stayed on in Lyons, completing her classic misanthropic book Impeachment of Man there in March 1946.

Back in London, she arranged for the publication of A Son of God by the Theosophical Society at its press on Great Russell Street in London. This publication under the auspices of the society is understandable given its promotion of esoteric and Hindu ideas throughout Europe and America from the late nineteenth century onwards. But while Theosophists were interested in the subject of ancient Egypt and its mysteries, Savitri Devi had no time for their cosmopolitan and universal philosophy. The book led to some public lectures on the mystical pharaoh and his sun cult. She soon found new friends with similar interests in the capital. Muriel Gantry, a young theater costume designer, had long been interested in Minoan Crete and they spent many hours absorbed in the history of the ancient Mediterranean world. Muriel Gantry never shared Savitri Devi's Nazi interests but remained a loyal, lifelong friend. Through her own contacts in the theater world, she was able to obtain employment for Savitri Devi, who thus secured a livelihood during her time in London.

Wherever she went in London, Savitri Devi felt oppressed by the constant barrage of anti-German sentiment and propaganda, the suspicion and hatred of National Socialism. On Oxford Street she saw a photographic exhibition of Nazi atrocities and newsreels of the liberation of the concentration camps. She hurried on. But everywhere, in milk bars and cafes, in railway station waiting rooms and private houses, the radio ceaselessly recounted the horrors of Hitlerism and impugned all that Savitri Devi stood for. She stayed in cheap accommodations and suffered the conversation of fellow boarders. At the supper table in Mrs. Ponworth's boardinghouse at 37 Wood Lane, Highgate, she endured a Jewish woman's account of Nazi infamies and general support for the Nuremberg trials that were then nearing completion. The only dissenting voice came from a black Christian, whose plea for mercy enraged the Jewess and earned Savitri Devi's cynical approval.¹ These and many similar discussions about the terrible deeds of the Nazis and the overwhelming case for prosecuting the leading war criminals only hardened her extremist convictions.

The fearful prospect that her heroes would shortly be sentenced by the International Military Tribunal now filled all her waking hours. A few days later, while staying at a nurses' hostel at 104 Grosvenor Road in Pimlico, she dreamed one night that she entered the Nuremberg cell of Hermann Goering. He saw her and was rather astonished, but she reassured him that she was a friend. She declared that she wished she could save all the Nuremberg defendants from the ignominy of the trial, but the heavenly powers had granted her leave to save only one man. She had chosen Goering because of his kindness to animals. (She understood that Goering, as Reich Forestry Commissioner, had established extensive conservation areas in the Third Reich.) She then felt something small in her hand, and although she did not know what it was, she handed it to the former Reichsmarschall, saying, "Take this, and do not allow these people to kill you as a criminal." She bid the surprised prisoner a farewell "Heil Hitler" and then vanished. The next morning she overslept until ten o'clock, which was most unusual. It was the sixteenth of October and a rainy day in London. Outside the hostel at a newspaper kiosk she read with amazement the headlines "Goering found dead in his cell at 2.30 A.M. No one knows who gave him the poison. Potassium Cyanide." This experience of astral travel in her subtle body was her only contact with the top leadership of the Third Reich.²

Still she hesitated to travel to Germany and witness the defeat of the Third Reich. Wishing to escape the constant reminders of Germany's disgrace, she seized an opportunity to lecture on Akhnaton in Iceland. On 28 November 1946 she sailed from Hull to Iceland, arriving seven days later at Reykjavik with only five pounds in her pocket. Following her lecture engagement, she stayed on, found employment, and began learning Icelandic. In the hard winter of early 1947 she worked as a maid on a farm outside Reykjavik. Later she took a job as a French tutor to an Icelander's Austrian wife. Although she found the Icelandic people splendid specimens of the Aryan racial type, she was bitterly disappointed by their general hostility to Nazism. Even on this remote island in the Arctic Circle it proved impossible to escape the general abhorrence of the Nazi creed. She consoled herself by writing a play about Akhnaton and the persecution of his sun cult, which was a thinly veiled allegory of the defeat of Hitler.

The barren, austere landscape of Iceland mirrored the iron in her soul as she contemplated the defeat of her ideals. But this strange world of glaciers, geysers, and volcanoes also offered a rich pageant of nature, that amoral power that she worshiped in Shiva and his dance of creation and destruction. On the night of 5 April 1947, she rapturously watched the full eruption of Mount Hekla, Iceland's most famous volcano, which had already erupted eighteen times before 1845. At other times her mood was reflective. On 9 June she visited the Godafoss (Waterfall of the Gods), where a priest had once thrown the images of the old pagan gods as a demonstration of his conversion to Christianity about the year 1000. Deeply moved, she stood beside the waterfall, thinking of Odin, Thor, and Baldur, whom her Viking ancestors had once worshiped, lying for more than nine hundred years at the bottom of the icy waters of the Skjálfandafliót and still waiting for the "great Heathen Renaissance." In one of her ritual acts she recited the verse of Lecote de Lisle, which a Norse god addresses to the child Jesus:

Thou shalt die in thy turn!
 Nine times, I swear it by the immortal Runes,
 Thou shalt die like I, god of new souls!
 For man will survive. Twenty centuries of suffering
 Will make his flesh bleed and his tears flow,
 Until the day when thy yoke, tolerated two thousand years,
 Will weigh heavily upon the necks of the rebellious races;

When thy temples, standing in their midst
Will become an object of mockery to the people;
Then, thy time will be up . . .³

Invoking the Aryan gods, she implored their aid in her struggle to restore the Nazi cult of youth, health, and strength, before casting the paper into the roaring cataract.

She remained in Iceland until the end of 1947, when she returned to England. Once again she found theatrical employment as the wardrobe manager of the Randoopa Dancing Company, which traveled around England, Scotland, France, and Scandinavia giving performances of Indian dance. By early April 1948 she was in Edinburgh, beginning work on her final statement of Aryan doctrine and Nazi witness, The Lightning and the Sun. She next accompanied the group from Scotland across the North Sea to Sweden, arriving in May. In Stockholm she chanced to meet an old acquaintance from 1946 in London, a zealous English Nazi sympathizer, who introduced her to a number of Swedish Nazis, including the famous explorer Sven Hedin, then eighty-three years old.

By the first decade of the century Sven Hedin (1865–1952) was regarded as one of the world's leading Asiatic explorers. Immediately after leaving school he had traveled three thousand kilometers on horseback through Persia and Mesopotamia. In 1890 he was attached to King Oscar's embassy to the shah of Persia and then visited Khurasan and Turkestan. His later expeditions in the Pamir, China, and Tibet between 1893 and 1897, 1899 and 1902, and 1906 and 1908, recounted in his numerous books of adventure, brought him international recognition and honors. A lover of the desert and remote places, Hedin was a political reactionary. He detested the liberal government in Sweden and was a great admirer of Wilhelmian Germany. During the 1914–1918 war he had met the kaiser, Hindenburg, and leading commanders at the western front and was bitterly disappointed by the German defeat. After the rise of the Nazis, he became a loyal supporter of the Third Reich, frequenting the dining tables of Hitler, Goering, and other top Nazi brass throughout the war. His last major political work, Amerika im Kampf der Kontinente (1942), condemned Roosevelt's intervention in European affairs, recalled the 1918 "stab-in-the-back" legend beloved of German militarists, and generally followed the Nazi Foreign Office line. After

1945, Hedin's reputation was severely tarnished by these associations and writings.⁴

Hedin's aura of heroic adventure, his daring and hazardous travels across Asia, his triumphant homecomings to receive the tribute of monarchs and the adulation of crowds had been the stuff of legend. But now in 1949 all this was past. Expelled from various international societies, he bemoaned the modern world. His Nazi enthusiasm had rendered him a political pariah. A meeting at a Stockholm reception with the liberal Thomas Mann on 24 May remained at the level of small talk. On 4 June Hedin penned his thoughts on the defeat of communism and the unbreakable spirit of the Germanic race to Johannes Lehmann, editor of a Danish journal.⁵ Two days later he received Savitri Devi, a fellow diehard in the Nazi cause. On 6 June they conversed for four hours about the fate of Germany and the chances of a Nazi revival. The old Swede evidently gave her fresh hope, alluding to Germany's immense resources of courage and strength despite defeat and hinting that Hitler might indeed still be alive. Thus encouraged, she decided to set forth on what was to be the first of three sorties into occupied Germany as an agent of the vanquished Nazi cause.⁶

She prepared for her mission by laboriously writing out her own German text on five hundred slips of paper—a task that took two entire nights.

Men and women of Germany, in the midst of unspeakable rigours and suffering, hold fast to our glorious National Socialist faith, and resist! Defy the people, defy the powers, which work to denazify the German nation and the whole world. Nothing can destroy whatever is built on truth. We are the pure gold which can be tested in the furnace. The furnace may glow and crackle. Nothing can destroy us. One day we will rebel and triumph again. Hope and wait! Heil Hitler!⁷

Thus armed, she boarded the Nord-Express in Stockholm bound for Germany on 15 June and distributed her leaflets in cigarette packets and other small gifts of sugar, coffee, sardines, cheese, and butter from the train as it passed through stations from the frontier at Flensburg via Hamburg, Bremen, Duisburg, Düsseldorf, and Cologne to Aachen. The railway journey across Germany lasted fifteen hours and it was a rite of initiation for Savitri Devi. The sight of the devastated cities, the twisted wreckage of industrial installations, the misery and hunger of the defeated Germans made a deep impression on her, confirming her love for Germany and her hatred of the Allies. There was also opportunity for political exchange: in Duisburg two German railway policemen boarded the train and expressed their appreciation of her gesture; three Jews in the theater company traveling with her were outraged. This minor mission completed, she returned to London for a short stay.

Later in the year she repeated the operation on a larger scale. A military permit to visit Germany for a longer period was obtained from the Bureau des Affaires Allemandes in Paris through the good offices of a former schoolfriend who had influence in Free French circles and knew nothing of Savitri Devi's political convictions. Savitri Devi stated that she intended to write a book about Germany as her reason for visiting the occupied country. Returning through France and the Saarland to enter the French Occupation Zone of Germany at Saarhölzbach, she spent some three months between 7 September and 6 December 1948 distributing a further six thousand leaflets in the three Western zones and the Saarland. In the course of this extended visit, she had many opportunities to acquaint herself with the Germans and their conquerors. A long conversation with a French occupation official at Baden-Baden only confirmed her contempt for the Allies' hypocrisy, their policy of reeducation, and the sham of democracy. In Koblenz she was introduced to a group of Nazi loyalists, including Fritz Horn, whose health had been broken by mistreatment in Allied POW camps on German soil after the war. In Bonn she met an unrepentant Nazi veteran whose fulminations against the Allies and fantasies of future revenge warmed her heart.⁸ This more substantial operation behind her, she returned to London to spend Christmas with friends before mounting her third and final propaganda mission to the defeated Reich.⁹

"Gold in the Furnace," the phrase used in her first propaganda leaflet to typify the endurance of the Germans even in the hardest trials of their defeat and subjection, became the leitmotif and title of her book describing her travels and reflections during 1948 and early 1949 in postwar Germany. She had begun writing Gold in the Furnace in early October 1948 at Alfeld an der Leine in Lower Saxony, shortly after entering occupied Germany on her second, longer propaganda mission, and three chapters were already completed by the time of her arrest in February 1949. A further three were finished while she was in investigative custody, and the final eight chapters were written secretly while she was imprisoned at Werl. She completed the book in her prison cell on 16 July 1949, a month before her release. She called the book "her favourite child" and it is evident that she poured out her soul in these descriptions of the staunch Nazi loyalists she had met in the course of her autumn 1948 mission. Her heroes were set against a bitter and crushing background of urban ruin and rubble, the pressures of denazification, and other Allied impositions, restrictions, and economic reparations involving the dismantlement of German industrial plant and deforestation.

The encounters are interspersed with lengthy avowals of National Socialism and denunciations of the futile and declining Western world of democracy and Christianity. These verbatim records of her contacts with Germans in the early postwar years are especially interesting for the light they throw on the attitudes and expectations of defeated people unable to make sense of the catastrophe of defeat following the collective excitement and national pride of the Third Reich. Conversations with these individuals followed a regular pattern. If Savitri Devi's credentials were already established by personal introductions or clandestine recommendations, the exchange would usually provide mutual comfort and encouragement concerning the temporary nature of defeat, the imminent prospect (two to three years) of a Nazi revival, and on occasion the assertion that Hitler was alive in hiding and simply waiting for the opportune moment. When striking up a casual acquaintance, Savitri Devi would often mention that she was writing a book about Germany. Whenever admonished by a Nazi sympathizer to write the truth and eschew prejudice, she would protest delightedly that she was herself a staunch Nazi.

A chance encounter at Koblenz railway station with an old shopkeeper, Fräulein E., led Savitri Devi to Herr M. He ridiculed the Allied policy of reeducation, declaring that the Führer gave them a sense of life that was eternal, not to be believed in but seen with one's own eyes. Everything that had occurred since 1945 only served to convince them that the Nazi doctrine was right in all respects, namely, on the Jewish question, the rule of the fittest, and the racial principle. Even more Germans believed this now than during the Third Reich.¹⁰ Herr M. in turn introduced her to two more Nazi loyalists, with whom she stayed for several days. Friedrich Horn and his companion, Fräulein B., occupied a cramped garret room at the top of a house amid the ruins of Koblenz. Savitri Devi was particularly impressed by Horn, whom she revered as a model Nazi and a martyr to the cause in consequence of his ill-treatment by the Allies. She related his story with reverence and pathos.

Horn was an architect by profession and an ardent Nazi Party member, having held the office of Ortsgruppenleiter from 1932 onward during the Third Reich. Arrested as a prominent local Nazi by the Americans at the end of May 1945, Horn was first held at Diez before being transferred by rail to a concentration camp at Schwarzenborn near Treysa, together with nine or ten thousand other National Socialists. Detained in a former cavalry stables, Horn shared a stall with two other men. The conditions were appalling: no blankets, no running water, and only half a bowl of thin watery soup and three hard biscuits to eat each day. One in twenty of the internees died of starvation within a fortnight. By the end of December 1945 Horn, had lost sixty-five pounds, could hardly stand up, and was admitted to the camp hospital. In February 1946 he was transported by cattle truck to a concentration camp in Darmstadt, where the temperature in the unheated cells fell as low as -25° C during the harsh winter of 1946–1947. After several nights, Horn was hospitalized once more for three months and finally released in December 1947. His health was permanently ruined as a result of his ill-treatment in the camps, where he had spent nearly three years.¹¹

The case of Friedrich Horn simply illustrates the chaotic postwar conditions in the American and French concentration camps, both in their zones of occupation in Germany and in France.¹² But in her hatred of the Allies, Savitri Devi latched onto any such instances of suffering, hunger, and torture among Nazi prisoners. In the little garret with Horn and his companion, she was in the presence of such a martyr. She lovingly described Horn's open face, his proud bearing, above all the calmness and cheerfulness of a warrior-sage whose quiet faith and confidence in the ultimate victory of the Nazi idea transcended his own suffering. Horn fetched his copy of Mein Kampf, while Fräulein B. showed Savitri Devi a glass etching of Hitler's portrait on a pendant and pressed her to accept it as a gift. Savitri Devi was greatly moved by this gesture. All three spent the rest of the evening reading and commenting on passages of Mein Kampf, exchanging their views on the necessity of a heathen outlook, and the incompatibility of Nazism and Christianity. Gathered under the steep attic roof somewhere in French-occupied Koblenz, the new friends celebrated their secret Nazi gnosis in devotional exercises like members of a persecuted sect. At their final parting in August 1949, Horn presented Savitri Devi with his only copy of Mein Kampf with the words "Go wherever you might be the most useful and wait. Hope and wait . . . if, being alone, you feel powerless, you have your burning faith,—our common Nazi faith—to sustain you. And you have this: our Führer's immortal words; a remembrance from Germany." As if concluding a religious rite, they exchanged the Hitler salute.¹³

Earlier in September 1948 on a fine early autumn day Savitri Devi had walked in the forest adjoining the Harz mountains with another Nazi stalwart, Herr A. She had never met him before and owed her introduction to Nazis living abroad. Mindful of spies and thin walls at home, Herr A. suggested that they wander in the forest in order to talk freely. Amid the golden foliage and birdsong, Savitri Devi told Herr A. something of her life, her visit to Palestine in 1929 and repugnance at the Jews, her search in India for a traditional Aryan culture, and her unending regret at not coming to Germany during the Third Reich. After all, she would have seen the Führer. Herr A. understood her perfectly. Hitler was alive, Herr A. knew where he was, although he could not tell her now. He assured her she should see Hitler and hear him tell her how pleased he was that she was among the Germans during their darkest days in 1948. However, he cautioned her to be more guarded in her enthusiasm, for she could easily betray her real feelings to the enemy in this land of fear and occupation. Herr A. confided to her his plans to build a sun temple as a Nazi shrine, a project that found her wholehearted support.¹⁴

Another encounter took place in a café in Bonn. Here Savitri Devi's attention was caught by a pair of German men at a neighboring table. One of these was unlike any of her earlier contacts: an elemental and fearsome fellow, whose head and shoulders reminded her of a bison in the ancient Germanic forests. Energy and will power were written all over his broad forehead, red angular face, and powerful chin. He was the tough beer-hall-fighter type, the representative of the Nazi crowd. Savitri Devi thrilled at the sight of this "warrior of Hermann in a shabby modern suit"—she saw in him a symbol of Germany's resurrection. The beer-hall fighter struck up a conversation with her and was soon telling her the story of his war. As a Wehrmacht soldier in France, he had marched through the Arc de Triomphe, and his troop had proceeded as far as the Spanish border. Jawohl, they had had a great time. They had eaten and drunk but always remained gentlemen. They had brought order to the countries they ruled, maintained a strict code of honor and been generous and merciful to the conquered. But when they lost the war, many Wehrmacht soldiers were unable to leave France in good time and were severely mistreated in concentration camps, some even deported for many years to the tropics and Indochina. He himself had been interned in France until 1948.

Continuing his narrative to postwar conditions in occupied Germany, the old fighter's face darkened. "Nice people to talk about freedom and justice, these damned democrats! They have tied us hand and foot, so that we cannot move, they have muzzled us, so that we can offer no resistance, while they plunder our country left and right, dismantle and carry off our factories piece by piece, cut down our forests, take our coal, our iron, our steel, all that we have, and into the bargain make people believe that we were to blame for the war—these confounded liars!" He lusted for revenge. He longed for the day when the last Allies ran for their lives to escape Germany, when Paris would lie in ruins at its next German occupation; next time he would show neither mercy nor good humor. Savitri Devi felt a sense of mounting excitement as his mood became ever uglier and he began to describe in a raised voice how he would kill his enemies: this was the spirit she sought, the rolling eyes of a wounded animal, a war god of the Stone Age thirsting for blood, barbaric magnificence. It was a perfect meeting of minds: the violent resentful German and the Aryan prophetic of revenge. The day of reckoning seemed already nearer.¹⁵

In preparation for her third propaganda sortie to enemy-occupied Germany she had printed in London a small German-language handbill, headed with a swastika, exhorting the Germans to remain true to their Führer, who was reputed to be still alive, and to rise up against the Allied forces now stationed throughout the country. Her sense of mission, her Nazi piety, and her self-proclaimed membership in a tiny gathered remnant of Hitler loyalists are evident from the text:

German People

What have the democracies brought you?

In war time, phosphorous and fire.

After the war, hunger, humiliation and oppression;

the dismantling of the factories;

the destruction of the forests;

and now,—the Ruhr Statute!
 However, "Slavery is to last but a short time more."
Our Führer is alive
 And will soon come back, with power unheard of.
 Resist our persecutors!
 Hope and wait.

Heil Hitler!

S.D.

This fervent appeal, coupled with apocalyptic hopes surrounding the reappearance of Hitler, was followed by a stanza of the well-known Nazi marching song:

Wir werden weiter marschieren
 wenn alles in Scherben fällt;
 denn heute gehört uns Deutschland
 und morgen, die ganze Welt.¹⁶

Given the utter defeat and demoralization of postwar Germany, its shattered industries, depleted work force, the hungry cities, and the growing dependence on the occupying forces, such an appeal was at best symbolic. It chiefly served Savitri Devi's burning need to demonstrate her solidarity with Nazism, her loyalty to Adolf Hitler, and her loathing of the West and its supposed superiority. She began distributing the handbill on the night of 13/14 February 1949 in Cologne and soon found a comrade to help her. His name was Gerhard Wassmer, a former SS man who in 1945 had been transported by the French as a POW to work in hard-regime camps in the Congo. The German prisoners had been subject to black overseers, and conditions had been intolerable. Of the 11,000 sent out to the Congo, only 4,800 survived to see Europe again. Wassmer was receptive to Savitri Devi's mission, and they agreed to meet again after a week.

By this time she had successfully distributed 11,500 leaflets and handbills in West German cities during five months' clandestine activity. However, Wassmer was caught by British military police, who were waiting for her when she inquired after him at his Catholic Mission address in Cologne on 20 February. She was remanded in custody, initially in Cologne before being transferred to Düsseldorf on 7 March, when the hearing was postponed for a week. On 14 March she was driven by car through Dortmund and Duisburg to Essen for an initial court hearing. Pleading a call of nature among the ruins of Essen, she briefly left the car and chalked "Heil Hitler!" on a wall in a further act of defiance. At the hearing her accomplice denied any interest in her propaganda mission. But this did not surprise nor disappoint her. She recognized that most Germans were now exhausted by the long war and the occupation that she had missed far away in India; she alone now had the energy for this ritual defiance of the Allies. This was her duty and her destiny.¹⁷

At the hearing it was decided that Savitri Devi had a case to answer under Article 7 of Law No. 8 of the Occupation Status, which forbade the promotion of militarist and National Socialist ideas on German territory subject to the Allied Control Commission. The maximum penalty for the breach of this law was the death sentence. She was to be detained at the British military prison for women at Werl until her formal trial, which was fixed for 5 April 1949. During the ensuing three weeks she was further questioned by British officers about her motives and inspiration, chiefly in order to establish if she was acting on behalf of a renegade Nazi organization or underground network in Germany. Regularly interrogated by military intelligence officer Hatch, she supplied details of her first visit to India in 1932 on account of her interest in eugenics, the caste system, and Hinduism as a living survival of the old Aryan cults of Europe. Hatch probed in vain for political links and was simply confronted by her unabashed Nazi piety: she attributed her National Socialist conviction to her philosophy, her essentially aesthetic attitude to religious and social problems, and her interpretation of world history.¹⁸

Throughout her interrogation by Hatch and other British officers and in discussions with prison wardresses, Savitri Devi displayed aloofness and political contempt for the values of the West. Despite the evident military and economic might of the occupying powers, she clung fast to her Nazi faith and its ultimate victory. Her response to any challenge concerning the inhumanity of Nazism was haughty disdain for the trivial, secular man-centered values of Western democracy, liberalism, and Christianity. Her truths were wholly impersonal and cosmic; her vision rested on the life-centered pageant of nature, the great wheel of creation and destruction, beside which man's concerns, comforts, and rights appeared trifling and insignificant. Utopian images of natural beauty, racial purity, and flawless perfection underlay her conception of Nazi spirituality; man himself and his notions of comfort and mutual benefit she regarded with icy scorn. Arrogance and hatred defined her attitude.

As the date of the trial approached, she indulged in fantasies of martyrdom for the Nazi cause. In a conversation with her lawyer, she expressed her wish that she could receive the death sentence, noticing in her own voice the unmistakable accent of sincerity, the yearning of years, the burning regret of wasted time in India, and the thirst for redeeming martyrdom:

There would be, also, the joy of the last sunrise upon my face; the joy of the preparation for the greatest act of my life; the joy of the act itself. . . . Draped in my best sari—in scarlet and gold, as on my wedding day in glorious '40 (I hope they would not refuse me that favour)—I would walk to the place of execution singing the Horst Wessel Song. I, Savitri Devi, the ambassador of southernmost and easternmost Aryandom as well as a daughter of northern and southern Europe. And, stretching out my right arm, firm and white in the sunshine, I would die happy in a cry of love and joy, shouting for the last time, as defiance to all the anti-Nazi forces, the holy words that sum up my life-long faith "Heil Hitler!" I could not imagine for myself a more beautiful end.¹⁹

These absurd, romantic, and self-dramatizing effusions are entirely characteristic of Savitri Devi's passionate need to affirm her loyalty to Hitler and National Socialism following their demise. Confronted with the painful facts of Allied victory and the total defeat of the Third Reich, she sought relief in ritual acts of devotion, prayers to a universal deity, and whimsical ideas concerning her valiant but isolated witness to the Aryan ideal. A picture of Adolf Hitler, which hung like an icon on her cell wall, was frequently clasped to her breast as she whispered with devotion. She bitterly regretted the absence of a similar talisman, an Indian gold swastika lost in London in November 1947. Her breathless prayers reveal the extraordinary sense of election and mission she felt as an Allied prisoner:

Lord of Life, Thou hast raised the everlasting Doctrine under its modern form; Thou hast appointed the Chosen Nation to champion it. Lord of Death, Thou hast allowed the forces of death to prevail for a while. Lord of Order and Harmony, Lord of the Dance of appearances, Lord of the Rhythm that brings back spring after winter; the day after the night; birth after death; and the new age of truth and perfection after each end of an age of gloom, Thou shalt give my beloved comrades and superiors the lordship of the earth one day. If I survive this trial, I shall take it as a sign from Thee that this will be in my life-time, and that Thou hast appointed me to do something in our coming new struggle.²⁰

This prayer to Shiva fuses Hindu fatalism with Nazi apocalyptic.

The day of the trial arrived. Following lunch at the Stahlhaus, the British Police Headquarters in Düsseldorf, she was taken to the court in the Mühlenstrasse. In her heightened state of Nazi enthusiasm she was particularly annoyed by her husband's attempts to intervene on her behalf. Just prior to her trial Asit Krishna Mukherji had written from Calcutta to the chairman of the Military Tribunal at Düsseldorf, but she was angry at his diplomacy and exculpations, his attempts to minimize the political significance and motivation of her fanatical conduct, his embarrassing claims about how she was causing him so much worry. She dismissed the letter proudly with the assertion that she had come to court to bear witness to the greatness of her Führer. Taking the oath on "the sacred Wheel of the Sun," she swiftly turned the courtroom into an auditorium for a long and impassioned speech about the eternal value of National Socialism. "It is not only the military spirit, but National Socialist consciousness in its entirety that I have struggled to strengthen, for, in my eyes, National Socialism exceeds Germany and exceeds our times."²¹ Her outspoken advocacy of Adolf Hitler and his Aryan worldview confirmed her standing as an unregenerate die-hard Nazi loyalist to her Allied prosecutors. There was no question of her guilt, though her sentence hardly gave her the martyrdom she so craved. Three years' imprisonment or deportation to India. Predictably, she chose imprisonment in order to prolong her Nazi mission and remain among her fellow sufferers in Allied captivity.

In the event, Savitri Devi served barely six months of her sentence. She was released on 18 August 1949 but expelled from the British Occupation Zone of Germany for five years. However, her few months in the Allied women's prison at Werl near Soest in Westphalia offered her an initiation into the Nazi world. Although she was kept in accommodations separate from the "political" prisoners in D wing, she was allowed to receive visits from these hardened Nazi women who had been variously convicted as abettors of the euthanasia program and overseers and wardresses of concentration camps. Only through her imprisonment at Werl was Savitri Devi enabled to join the Nazi movement as a comrade, to match her enthusiasm for the Aryan doctrine with passionate attachments to individuals who had played their full part in the Third Reich. The intense atmosphere of the women's prison with its emotional dependencies and fierce loyalties, a hothouse of political rumor and speculation among the inmates, was the reward for her defiance of the Allies. Here she entered a world of Nazi comradeship that would remain her supporting network in Germany for many years to come. Savitri Devi truly discovered the Third Reich at Werl.

Once behind bars in Werl, she met practitioners of the Nazi regime. Earlier conversations with Germans in the Western zones during autumn 1948 had revolved around sentimental avowals of Nazi loyalty and hopes, the glowing achievements of the Third Reich, and the terrible adversities of the occupation. By comparison, her prison notes record exchanges with convicted Nazi criminals. The female political prisoners she befriended at Werl were among those found guilty in the notorious Belsen war crimes trial, which was held at Lüneburg in the British zone in October and November 1945. These conversations are particularly odious because they confronted Savitri Devi with the most gruesome and inhuman aspects of the Nazi regime that generally attracted worldwide opprobrium and disgust. Her reaction was quite the reverse. Nazi war criminals accused of atrocity and inhumanity were in her eyes the higher functionaries of a noble Nazi doctrine and now the hostages of the blinkered and hypocritical West.

Belsen was a concentration camp in the northern part of Germany that had been liberated by British armed forces advancing toward Lüneburg and Hamburg in mid-April 1945. When they arrived, the camp was in the grip of a full-blown typhus epidemic among the inmates. The SS camp commandant Josef Kramer, a former Auschwitz camp commander, and his forty or so staff held sway over some 40,000 prisoners in terrible conditions. Of these, 25,000 were women, 18,000 of them Jewish women who had been evacuated in great haste from Auschwitz and other camps before the advancing Soviet armies. The 15,000 men consisted of Jews, antisocial and political prisoners, some of them German, and a small number of British and American POWs. Belsen had originally been a Wehrmacht prisoner-of-war camp holding Soviet captives, and many thousands had already perished there. From 1943 the camp had also served as a "short-stay" camp for Jews with neutral passports awaiting repatriation, but at the end of 1944 Kramer arrived and a hard regime began. By April 1945 the British forces were confronted by scenes of human suffering and misery that defied description. This was the first major concentration camp to be discovered by the Western Allied forces. Although the Soviet armies had overrun German death camps in the East as early as late 1944, the British were the first to ensure the publicization of such Nazi atrocity to a world audience.

Although Belsen was a forced labor camp in the center of Germany far removed from the dreadful extermination camps situated in German-occupied Poland, a number of factors combined to make it one of the most bestial examples of the Nazi regime uncovered during the liberation of Germany. Because Belsen had become an emergency overflow camp for the evacuated inmates of other forced labor and extermination camps in early 1945, its population was largely drawn from the worst camps of the East, people broken mostly in body and spirit; the chaotic conditions due to Allied bombing raids and the rapid encirclement of Germany had prevented regular food supplies from reaching the camp for many weeks; and a short while before the liberation of the camp, typhus had broken out, accounting for seventeen thousand deaths. Ten thousand corpses were still unburied when the British arrived. The stench of decay from piles of bodies, the prisoners dying amid their own excrement, the pallor and terrible emaciation of the survivors, and the death rate of hundreds each day made Belsen an unforgettable horror for those officers and men who took charge of the camp. Pictures relayed worldwide established its name as synonymous with Nazi inhumanity and depravity.²²

Savitri Devi did not believe a word of it. She regarded the horrors of Belsen as a masterly exercise in Nazi atrocity propaganda on the part of the Allies. Whatever hardship, suffering, and death had occurred at Belsen she attributed to the disruption of food and medical supplies due to Allied saturation bombing; the overcrowding, lack of sanitation, and typhus epidemic she deemed likewise the consequence of wartime chaos. She was utterly convinced that it was the Allies and enemies of Germany who were persecuting the Nazis. She found evidence for this in the vengeful treatment of the Germans once the tide had turned and Allied armies were sweeping through formerly Nazi-occupied territory. She cited the beating of wounded and exhausted Wehrmacht soldiers in retreat from France, the sadistic outbreaks against the German population in Poland and Czechoslovakia, and above all the mockery of the show trials of purported "war criminals." She had nothing but contempt for the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg and related the story of Julius Streicher's abuse and ill-treatment by his jailers (notably British Jews) with shock and revulsion.

She conceded the existence of the concentration camps. They were necessary, she said, for the detention of enemies of Nazism, for those who opposed the establishment of a new Aryan world order. However, she was certain that violence was used only against those who broke camp rules willfully; the majority was treated in a friendly fashion.²³ She was therefore delighted to meet concentration camp wardresses in Werl prison and thereby confirm her own opinions that it was the Allies and not the Nazis who were guilty of any atrocities. She established warm and friendly relations with three Belsen wardresses, who gave her graphic accounts of their alleged abuse and humiliation at the hands of the British forces that liberated Belsen. Frau Hertha Ehlert, who became her best friend and to whom she dedicated her book Defiance, had spent many years in the Nazi concentration camp system. Since 1935 she had served in four Nazi camps as a female overseer and in another as a supervisor. She had latterly worked at Auschwitz for three years and been assigned to Belsen on 13 February 1945, only some nine weeks before its liberation. As one of the major defendants in the Belsen trial, she was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment for ill-treating camp inmates. Other Werl confidantes of Savitri Devi included Frau Herta Bothe and Frau H. (either Anna Hempel or Irene Haschke), both Belsen wardresses, who each received ten-year sentences.²⁴

Savitri Devi first saw Hertha Ehlert working in the infirmary, when she was there for an examination. Her reaction to this strong, blond woman was at once idealizing, dramatic, and almost erotic. "I could not take my eyes off that prisoner," she recalled. Wearing her shabby blue prison uniform, Ehlert still had "the classical beauty of a chieftain's wife in ancient Germany." Her full figure was made for the comfort of warriors and birth of heroes, while in her face Savitri Devi detected strength, pride, dreams, authority, and inspiration. She wondered at her glossy blond hair, shining in the light, and her large blue eyes that, she thrilled, could often be as hard as stone.²⁵ The Belsen trial picture of Ehlert shows a heavy, tough woman and one can only speculate on the mixture of sentiment, sexuality, and fascination with violence that attracted her admirer.

Unless she was lying at her trial, Hertha Ehlert may have exaggerated her Nazi credentials to Savitri Devi. When examined under oath by Major Munro at the Belsen trial on 13 October 1945, she stated that she was a Berlin bakery assistant who had been called up for the SS through the labor exchange in November 1939. She was first assigned to Ravensbrück camp, with responsibility for working parties outside the camp. She claimed that she was thought by her superiors to be too kind to the prisoners, who were generally treated very severely. After three years at Ravensbrück, she was sent by way of a punishment transfer to Lublin, where the prisoner regime was even harsher. In the spring of 1944 she went to Cracow and in November 1944 to Auschwitz, where she swore that she remained only two months in the gardening unit at Raisko, which had no connection with the death camp at Birkenau. At the beginning of February 1945 she had arrived at Belsen and found the conditions worse than in any camp she had seen. In her subsequent cross-examination Ehlert claimed she had made several attempts to improve the conditions of the prisoners, but her dismal record of punishments, brutal beatings, and arbitrary acts of violence toward the wretched camp inmates was undeniable. Since she admitted to being at Auschwitz for only a very short time, the Auschwitz charge was dropped by the prosecution, but she was duly convicted for her crimes at Belsen.²⁶ Several of her fellow defendants, including Irma Grese, the notorious "Bitch of Belsen," who had literally whipped her victims to death, received a capital sentence.

The women at Werl barely mentioned the terrible conditions at Belsen in their long conversations with Savitri Devi. Given Hertha Ehlert's long service in various camps, including the extermination camp Auschwitz, this omission is all the more striking. Instead of describing their time in the camps when in authority, their self-serving stories all began with the misery and humiliations they had suffered at the hands of the British following the relief of Belsen. Allegedly tricked into returning from another camp to Belsen to maintain order, the wardresses claimed they were encircled by a screaming crowd of men bearing fixed bayonets, who drawing ever nearer, inflicted puncture wounds upon them. After being completely undressed and submitted to the most humiliating searches amid coarse comments, they were again attacked with bayonets, flung around by the hair, or beaten with rifle butts. Robbed of all their belongings, they were next thrust into the camp mortuary, where they remained for four days and nights in complete darkness without food, water, and sanitation. On their release they were forced at bayonet point for several days to bury the thousands of bodies still lying around the camp. Dead prisoners en masse aroused no compassion in the wardresses, but their shock and outrage knew no bounds when they discovered the mutilated and disemboweled corpses of SS comrade warders, apparent evidence of British atrocities committed during their four-day captivity.²⁷

The Nazi women prisoners' self-pitying accounts of their experiences conjured an orgy of violence meted out upon them by their persecutors. They claimed that lorries full of frenzied, shouting Jews were sent specially to Belsen after its liberation in order to inflict all manner of ill-treatment upon the camp staff. Frau Bothe and Frau F. (either Ida Forster or Gertrud Fiest) claimed they had seen SS men disemboweled alive by men wearing the uniform of British military police, whom they took to be émigré Jews serving in the British forces. Again they recalled the screams of fear and pain they had heard from the camp while they were held in the mortuary. In an extraordinary inversion of their experience, these women had no recall whatsoever of the provenance of the thousands of bodies they were ordered to bury, no memory of the treatment they had meted out to their charges during the long grim years of the Third Reich; they projected their own inhumanity and brutality upon their own hate figure, the Jew, and indulged fearful scenes of their own abuse, torture, and killing at his hands in an act of wholly unjustified revenge. It was all music, however, to Savitri Devi's ears. "They have thrown you to the Jews," she exclaimed with an image of Kali before her mind's eye, "revenge them, o unforgiving, irresistible power. Mother of destruction, revenge them!"²⁸

Bonds of affection and respect linked Savitri Devi to the female war criminals in Werl. One woman, identified as L. M., had been the head of a small work camp holding five hundred to six hundred Jewish women; another, Frau S., had received the death sentence, commuted to life imprisonment, for killing unwanted non-German children. Condemned by the world at large following the defeat of Nazism, these prisoners and the Belsen convicts represented to Savitri Devi the fearless, unflinching loyalty of committed Nazi womanhood dedicated to the creation of a wonderful, beautiful Aryan world of the future in accordance with the vision of Adolf Hitler. Their disgrace, ill-treatment, and imprisonment only confirmed their status as martyrs to the Nazi cause in Savitri Devi's eyes. These allegedly maligned and imprisoned women were outstanding examples of "Gold in the Furnace," the expression Savitri Devi used to characterize the loyal Nazis in the hell of Allied-occupied Germany. She was proud to be associated with them and to share their hardships at Werl.

In Savitri Devi's view, British military officialdom, Allied restrictions, the disabilities of former Nazis, the moral pressures of reeducation, democratic brainwashing, and denazification procedures had turned the whole of Germany into one enormous jail. Allied victory and occupation had overturned the former Nazi order to the extent that the diehard loyalists were transformed from a proud elite into martyrs or furtive sectaries keeping the flame of their Nazi faith alive in secret groups. This was Savitri Devi's mental world in trizonal occupied Germany in 1948 and 1949. However, her own martyrdom at Werl came to an end sooner than expected. Her husband had sent a petition for her release and deportation to India. When summoned by the prison governor, Colonel Vickers, she agreed that this was what she wanted. Cursing her own apostasy and weakness, she begged that the manuscript for her book be returned to her.²⁹ In possession of her papers, she was discharged from Werl on Thursday, 18 August 1949, after tearful farewells among her dearest friends, Hertha Ehlert and Herta Bothe. Expelled from the British zone for five years, she was driven to Andernach behind the French zonal border. The French authorities knew nothing of her case and she simply boarded a train to Koblenz to see her friends, eventually leaving Germany for Luxembourg.³⁰ Her defiance on behalf of Nazism had run its course, she had fulfilled her quixotic crusade.

9

PILGRIMAGE

In August 1949 Savitri Devi returned to France satisfied she had at last borne witness to her Nazi faith. She spent the next three years, besides visits to England and Greece, in her old hometown Lyons, engaged in the writing of new pro-Nazi books. Within two years she had published under her husband's imprint in Calcutta two books devoted to her experiences in occupied Germany. Defiance (1950) was largely an autobiographical account of her last ill-fated propaganda mission, and her ensuing arrest, trial, and conviction for "maintaining the military and Nazi spirit in Germany." The greater part of this book recorded her period at Werl prison with admiring descriptions of her new friends among the female Nazi war criminals and their life in the Third Reich. Gold in the Furnace (1952) was a more general essay about the condition of postwar Germany, in which she extolled the defeated Germans for their enduring loyalty to the ideals of National Socialism. Again, this book was interspersed with her firsthand experiences and encounters during her undercover missions in 1948 and 1949. She also continued work on her major statement of Aryo-Nazi doctrine, The Lightning and the Sun. During these years in France, she was eager to revisit her newfound Nazi loyalist friends. In late 1952 she decided to travel back to Germany in defiance of the five-year ban imposed on her at the time of her release.

An early return to Germany necessitated new personal documents. With this in mind, she returned to Greece in January 1953. In Athens she managed to secure a Greek passport in her maiden name of Maximiani Portas on the basis that her marriage in India had not taken place according to Christian rites and was not recognized in Greece.

She trusted this would be sufficient cover for her illegal reentry to Germany. In late April her journey then continued by air from Phaleron to Campini, culminating in her arrival in Rome. Here there were fond memories of fascism, and she paid a call on Camillo Giuriati, one of Mussolini's former state ministers, whom she and her husband had first met when he was Italian consul in Calcutta. From Italy she traveled by railway northward toward the Brenner Pass and into Austria. The train rolled on amid the splendid forested and Alpine scenery of the Tyrol through Innsbruck and Salzburg. In her view, of course, Austria was an inseparable part of Germany—as it had been following its Anschluss into the Greater German Reich in March 1938—but she was traveling to Linz for a very special reason.

In 1953 Savitri Devi visited Germany not as a missionary but in the spirit of a pilgrim. Her desperate desire to identify belatedly with the Nazi cause was relieved to some small degree by the penance of her brief imprisonment at Werl several years before. Although she was never to lose those dreadful pangs of remorse that she had failed to experience Germany during the Third Reich, she had through her propaganda missions exorcized the wretched sense of being a mere onlooker at German defeat and suffering. By 1953 Germany was recovering, its cities and industries were being rebuilt and beginning to flourish. Although Allied occupation in the western zones would continue until 1955, some three years of political normalization had elapsed since the founding of the Federal Republic of Germany in May 1949 when Savitri Devi was sitting behind bars in Werl prison. Her earlier sense of anguish at the horrors of devastation and oppression was no longer acute. This time she could return to Germany as a member of the silent, invisible and intransigent resistance to Allied suzerainty. Now she intended to make a personal pilgrimage to those places in the "Aryan Holy Land most hallowed by association with Adolf Hitler and the National Socialist movement."

Her pilgrimage began with the towns and villages where Adolf Hitler had spent his childhood and youth—Leonding and Linz in Upper Austria—followed by a highly charged visit to his birthplace at Braunau am Inn on 20 April 1953, the sixty-fourth anniversary of his birth. From here she traveled to Berchtesgaden, where she wandered among the ruins of Hitler's Alpine retreat on the Obersalzberg. Her route then took her to Munich, the birthplace of the Nazi movement, where she was able to pay her respects at such shrines as the Feldherrnhalle and Königsplatz. She sought the spiritual proximity of Nazi war criminals through a visit to Landsberg am Lech. Here she paced around the prison where Hitler was jailed following the abortive putsch of November 1923 but which now served as the principal penitentiary for convicted Nazis in the former American zone. Her next station of remembrance was Nuremberg, the scene of the zenith and nadir of Nazi fortunes. At the Luitpoldarena and Zeppelinwiese she recalled and imagined the exultant Nazi Party September rallies of the 1930s; in a more somber mood she visited the Palace of Justice, where the surviving members of the Third Reich's leadership were tried from late 1945 until October 1946. Through all these stations she felt as if she had recapitulated the "great days" she had missed and drawn nearer in spirit to the Third Reich.

In its concluding stages her pilgrimage embraced a wider mythical and pagan conception of the "Aryan Holy Land" with visits to the Hermannsdenkmal in the Teutoburger Wald and the prehistoric solar temple and rock cliffs of the Externsteine, traditionally identified as an ancient Germanic sacred site. At all places of pilgrimage there was rich opportunity for reflection on the meaning of the Nazis' mission and their Aryan racial utopia, besides the comfort of pious exchanges with sympathetic Germans encountered along the way. Germany and the Germans were no longer an overwhelming novelty to her, nor was she constantly provoked into outbursts by the omnipresent signs of defeat, dismantlement, and occupation, as in 1948 and 1949. Through her visits to the shrines of Nazism and ancient Germany she evoked her love of Nazi Germany and her hopes for a future Aryan world order. By comparison with her first two postwar books about Germany, Pilgrimage (1958) is a more reflective and more revealing memoir of pious Nazi gnosis in a hostile world.

On the evening of 18 April 1953 Savitri Devi arrived at Linz railway station. Lying on the southern bank of the River Danube, the city just fell within the American zone of occupation in Austria, facing the Russian zone on the northern bank. The capital of Upper Austria, the city had long possessed a certain provincial grandeur with its Gothic cathedral, opera house, museum, and other impressive public buildings, surmounted by the Kürnberg Castle, where the famous medieval Nibelungenlied was said to have been composed. As she left the station and walked across a square and then a public park before joining the broad, well-lit Landstraße—the city's main promenade—Savitri Devi felt a constant sense of excitement that she had arrived at a place so closely associated with her idol and savior. “‘Can it be true that I am in Linz, the town in which our Führer has lived?’ It had all seemed to me—and it still seemed to me—like a dream.”¹

Adolf Hitler had first come here as a nine-year-old, when his father, a newly retired customs official, had bought a house next to the churchyard in the outlying village of Leonding some three miles west of Linz in January 1899. After a carefree year in the village Volksschule, where he assumed the role of a natural leader among the peasant boys in their endless games of cowboys and Indians, the young Hitler began attending the Linz Realschule in September 1900. Until he finally left to seek his fortune as an artist in Vienna in February 1908, Linz was the focus of Hitler’s youth. Following his father’s death in January 1903, Adolf lodged in Linz during the week to save the long walk to school. He was confirmed in Linz Cathedral in May 1904, and in late June 1905 his mother sold the house in Leonding and moved to a flat at Humboldtstraße 31 in Linz. Having completed his final year of secondary school at lodgings in Steyr, Hitler returned to live with his mother the following month. For the next two and a half years he led a life of leisure in Linz, indulging his dreams of becoming an artist and attending performances of Wagner operas that fired his imagination with notions of Germanic myth and national redemption.²

A sympathetic hotel maid called Luise K., the widow of an SS man, was greatly moved by Savitri Devi’s journey all the way from Athens to Linz to see the place where Adolf Hitler had lived. The next morning Savitri Devi took a local bus out to Leonding and alighted beside the village church, where she knew Hitler’s parents were buried. Inside the empty church, sunlight poured through the narrow plain-glass windows upon the polished wooden pews and altar rail. Early afternoon, restful silence, an atmosphere of peace. She imagined how Hitler’s mother had come to pray here after her household chores, her eyes lit with a longing for perfection and infinity within the frame of her Catholic faith. At Klara Hitler’s side, she visualized a thoughtful, blue-eyed child, “a child in whose face the light of boundless love and the flame of genius already radiated: her son, Adolf Hitler, the Chosen One of the Invisible Powers.” Overcome with emotion, the inveterate pagan Savitri Devi even crossed herself in memory of the mother of her leader and wept for a long time.³

Outside in the bright spring sunshine she walked around the graveyard until she found the grave of Alois and Klara Hitler. A few fresh flowers in a tin can were the only recent adornment to a grave decked with a withered wreath of fir twigs and overgrown with creeper. On a slab of black marble set in a rough block of stone, she read the simple memorial to the couple, while reflecting on the enormous significance of these simple Austrian country folk: "our Führer's parents; the last link in that endless chain of privileged generations destined to give Germany the greatest of all her sons, and the Western world, the one Saviour of its own blood."⁴ Going in search of flowers to lay on the grave, she met Frau J., who could offer only forget-me-nots from her garden. Savitri Devi expressed her disappointment, saying that she wanted dark red roses for a very special grave. Frau J. guessed her purpose and warned her that it was forbidden to adorn Hitler's parents' grave. Once Savitri Devi had given vent to her anger against the occupation authorities, Frau J. declared her own Nazi loyalty, mentioning that her husband was an SS man, and invited her into her home. Frau J. indulged her own hopes that many Austrians who had earlier rejected Nazism, were coming round to the Hitler doctrine now that they had a taste of the occupiers' democracy.

Frau J. then offered to introduce Savitri Devi to Hitler's old tutor and a former classmate a little further on in the village. Savitri Devi found the tutor, a friendly old gentleman of more than eighty years, sitting at his doorstep facing an open space where a beautiful old tree was growing. In reply to her request that he tell her something about Hitler, the old man declared that he was a healthy, clean-minded, loving, and lovable child, the most lovable he had ever met. "All I have to say is contained within these few words. The grown man retained the child's goodness, honesty, love of truth. The world hates him only because it does not know him." Savitri Devi could not be other than most gratified by this witness of Hitler's youth, still more by the biblical allusion to the national savior. She then asked whether the young Hitler loved animals, to be told that he loved every living creature that God had made and that he never did harm to any. The old man became absorbed in his reverie, describing how the child Hitler used to come and go from this very house, greeting them with his frank face and his bright loving eyes. "We all loved him. The wide world that has brought ruin on us would have loved him too, if only it had known him as he really was." This pious and sentimental memory evidently owed more to the adulation Hitler received from Austrians at the time of the An- schluß rather than as the boisterous ringleader of war games at Leonding that other witnesses have recalled.⁵

Under the fruit trees in the garden of Herr H., Hitler's former classmate, Savitri Devi was shown photographs of the Führer laying a wreath upon his parents' grave and another of him shaking hands with Herr H. from a car. These pictures had been taken on the morning of Sunday, 13 March 1938, when Hitler visited Leonding after staying the night at Linz on his triumphal progress from Munich to Vienna over the weekend when German armed forces invaded Austria and he was welcomed everywhere by enthusiastic and cheering crowds. Savitri Devi confessed to Herr H. that she envied him these memories of the "great days." She spent a further hour talking with him and his wife, happy in the thought that she was among those who had known Hitler and been among his friends. Leonding in the late afternoon sun with its innocent memories of the young Hitler seemed a safe refuge from the postwar world that so oppressed her. These friendly elderly people with their happy stories of the child Führer amid this soft, hilly landscape gave Savitri Devi solace. In this idyll it seemed possible to forget the Second World War and all the atrocities, ruin, and wreckage it had brought in its wake.

The sun was setting when she returned to the village churchyard with her forget-me-nots. She planted the humble flowers carefully, happy in the knowledge that they would still be alive in months to come. Kneeling before the grave, she saw Hitler's face in her mind's eye. Once again her thoughts turned to his present whereabouts and she asked, "Will you ever know how much I have loved you?" The face of her vision spoke back: "Live for my Germany! And you shall never part from Me, wherever I be."⁶ It was a religious experience, a fitting climax to the day spent in Hitler's childhood home. Outside the churchyard she saw the little house where he and his parents had lived between 1899 and 1905. A light was lit behind the closed windows and she thought of the boy who had sat, played, and read in the garden. Later that evening, having returned to Linz, she visited the Realschule and walked up to the third floor at Humboldtstraße 31, where Hitler and his mother had lived from July 1905 to May 1907. Leaning against the windowsill on the staircase between the second and third floors she gazed out on the garden full of fruit trees in blossom, other houses, and in the distance a church spire dark against the evening sky. She was happy in the thought that his eyes had also rested on this view just less than fifty years before.⁷

Early the next day, 20 April 1953, she took a train to Braunau am Inn, Adolf Hitler's birthplace. From 1871 onward Alois Hitler had served as an Austrian customs official in this town on the river frontier between the Habsburg Empire of Austria-Hungary and the new German Reich. It is indeed symbolic that Hitler whose nationalist policy set so much store by the incorporation of German Austria into Germany should have been born at a border town between Germany and Austria. He himself described the place of his birth as a lucky sign of destiny on the first page of his political testament Mein Kampf. Alighting at the railway station, Savitri Devi walked along a sunny street to reach the town square surrounded by high, picturesque old houses. Through the archway of a town gate she entered the Vorstadt and the street in which the Pommer Inn stood along a terrace of early nineteenth-century facades. Here in lodgings on the second floor of the inn Adolf Hitler had been born to the third wife of Alois Hitler on 20 April 1889 at 6:18 in the afternoon.

Taking a seat in a Café-Konditorei on the opposite side of the street, Savitri Devi observed with pleasure the unhurried, placid life of the market town in the spring sunshine. Around her, mothers and children drank coffee and ate cakes. Elderly matrons conversed at a nearby table. Through the window she surveyed the neat and homely shops, the freshly whitewashed house fronts, the great blossoming chestnut tree just beyond the former inn and reflected that the scene had probably not been so different on that spring day, sixty-four years before, when Hitler came into the world. The small town idyll contrasted strangely with a feeling of awe as she let her mind wander back to that "Day of Destiny," imagining a cosmic nativity in which the savior of the Aryan race came down to earth.

Alois Hitler, a custom-officer well over fifty, and twice a widower, lived in that house . . . with his third wife, Clara, who was then twenty-nine. The child to which the latter was about to give birth was neither her first one nor her last one. Just another baby in the family. . . . But the unseen Powers, Whose inscrutable Play lies behind the mystery of heredity, had ordained that all the intelligence and intuition, and all the will-power and heroism of generations and generations,—all the virtues and genius of the privileged Race, fated to rule—should find in that Child their highest expression; that the Babe should be a god-like one: whose consciousness was, one day, to be none other than the deeper consciousness of his people and of the race at large, for all times to come, and whose dream was to inspire a new civilisation. And far beyond the clear blue sky of the little town and the thin atmosphere of this little planet, in the cold, dark realm of fathomless Void, the unseen stars had very definite positions; significant positions, such as they take only once within hundreds of years. . . . And at the appointed time—six o'clock 18 in the afternoon—the Child came into the world, unnoticed masterpiece of a two-fold cosmic Play: of the mysterious artistry of Aryan blood in infinite time; of the mysterious influence of distant worlds in infinite space. Apparently, just another baby in the family. In reality,—after centuries,—a new divine Child on this planet; the first one in the West after the legendary Baldur-the-Fair and, like He, a Child of the Sun; a predestined Fighter against the forces of death and a Saviour of men, marked out for leadership, for victory, for agony and for immortality.⁸

She wandered back through the arch into the large square and out onto the long bridge over the wide, swift, bluish-green River Inn, tributary of the Danube. This was the site of Alois Hitler's office in the Imperial Austrian customs service. Throughout the nineteenth century this river had formed the frontier between Austria and Germany until Hitler's Anschluss in 1938 had swept away this division of the nation. But now eight years after the fall of the Third Reich, when Savitri Devi came on her pilgrimage, Austria and Germany were again separate states, and a customs house and striped barrier stood once again on the bridge over the Inn as if in mockery of Hitler's achievement of German unity. Railing at the inconvenience, futility, and national outrage of the reimposed border to long-suffering customs officials, she was surprised to find that they too regarded their office with irony and resented the border themselves. When they lamented their powerlessness, Savitri Devi urged them to think of revenge day and night and to wait as she did. She was amazed at their outspoken agreement and exulted in this confirmation of Hitler's dictum: "Gleiches Blut gehört in ein gemeinsames Reich."⁹

She spent the afternoon wandering around the small town, pausing to buy buns in a baker's shop, posting a card showing Hitler's birthplace to Luise K. at Linz, sitting on a bench in a public garden and watching the children play, as she thought of the infant Adolf in this very place, and then entering a church where she supposed that his baptism might have taken place. At length she retraced her steps to the Vorstadt until she came to the three-storied house near the chestnut tree where Hitler had been born. It was now a library and a school. She passed through the entrance into the rear court and walked up the stairs to the first and second floors, then along the passage flanked by massive, white-washed stone arches with a view onto the court, trees, and other houses beyond. The arches shone, dazzling white, against the deep-blue spring sky. A woman looked out from one of the doors along the passage and cut off her inquiry with a curt and dismissive "There is nothing to see here." Bitterly disappointed and bewildered, Savitri Devi gazed out at the pure blue sky and thought of Hitler, the constant companion of her heart. It mattered only that she was here in the Pommer Inn on his birthday. Out on the street again, with one last backward glance, she returned to the railway station.¹⁰

Leaving these gilded scenes of Hitler's early years in Austria, Savitri Devi traveled on by rail to Germany. Crossing the border at Salzburg, she changed trains at Freilassing and took a local service bound for Berchtesgaden in the southeasternmost corner of Bavaria. A few kilometers east of the town lay the Obersalzberg, which had become world famous as Hitler's country residence. He had first come here for a spring break in 1923 and found the outstanding Alpine scenery with views of the Watzmann and Untersberg mountains a source of inspiration and recreation after the hectic politics of Munich. Following his imprisonment after the putsch, he returned to complete the first volume of Mein Kampf in spring 1925 and established his auxiliary headquarters, first at the Pension Moritz on the Obersalzberg, then in Berchtesgaden. He also completed the second volume here in July 1926. In 1927 he was able to rent the Haus Wachenfeld on the Obersalzberg from a Nazi Party supporter and installed his half sister, Angela Raubal, as his housekeeper.¹¹ During the 1920s the Obersalzberg still retained the atmosphere of a traditional Alpine settlement with the Haus Wachenfeld and some two dozen or so similar farmhouses scattered over the hillside and meadows in the midst of the most beautiful Bavarian countryside, which also included the Königssee and the lakeside monastery of St. Bartholomä.

After Hitler became chancellor in 1933, the Obersalzberg witnessed dramatic changes. As Hitler's popularity grew, thousands of Germans would travel to Berchtesgaden to glimpse him and pay their respects to the restorer of the nation's fortunes. Hitler had always enjoyed long mountain walks around the Obersalzberg and mixed freely with the local population, but the enormous numbers of admirers eventually posed problems of organization and security. The development of the Obersalzberg from rural idyll into government enclave now began. Hitler bought Haus Wachenfeld and began to enlarge it through several stages into the Berghof. Other party leaders, including Martin Bormann, Hermann Goering, Josef Goebbels, Rudolf Hess, and Albert Speer, were drawn to the area and rented or bought properties that were converted and expanded into large country houses. First Hess, then Bormann, was entrusted with the overall planning of the Obersalzberg, which involved compulsory purchase and the creation of a "Führer territory" of some ten square kilometers and a circumference of twenty-seven kilometers. Most of the old farmhouses were cleared and the new pompous residences of the Nazi top brass arose, as well as extensive barracks for the SS guard and accommodations for the hundreds of employees and building workers. The former Pension Moritz, renamed the Platterhof, was also enlarged as a hotel for visiting Nazi bigwigs. An extensive system of underground tunnels and air raid shelters honeycombed the entire site. By the early war years Bormann had established himself as uncontested master of an enormous development project.¹²

The Berghof was transformed from the rustic farmhouse Haus Wachenfeld through three major conversions into the spacious mountain residence of the Führer arranged on three extensive floors. An open flight of steps led to a gothic hall decorated with old-master paintings and pieces of sculpture, which led into the famous conference room with the huge picture window framing views of the Untersberg. This large room's walls were hung with beautiful Gobelins and its floor was laid with a thick red carpet. There were three further reception rooms on this floor besides a large kitchen and dayrooms for staff and the adjutants' offices. Upstairs were Hitler's private living quarters as well as guest rooms. Here at the Berghof Hitler received prominent visitors from abroad, including the Duke and Duchess of Windsor, Neville Chamberlain, David Lloyd George, Mussolini, Edouard Daladier, Kurt von Schuschnigg, and Admiral Miklós Horthy. The coming and going of high officials and summit meetings contrasted with the cosy routine of the Führer's inner circle at mealtimes and the regular showing of a film in the evening. Obersalzberg was also a link between the public life of the Führer and his provincial Austrian origins: on a clear day

Hitler could look from the gigantic window of the conference room over the mountains as far as Braunau am Inn.

On 21 April 1953, Savitri Devi awoke in her hotel room in Berchtesgaden and threw open the window to gaze with rapture at the beautiful Alpine scenery all around: the steep fir-clad hills, then more distant hills, blue green in color, and beyond these the snowy peaks shining like silver against the radiant blue sky. The fragrance of the pine woods and the keen mountain air invigorated her as she set off on the road leading to the Obersalzberg. All was quiet save the call of birds, the lowing of cattle on the meadows, and the rushing sound of the river beside the road. She knew that little remained of the numerous Nazi houses on the Obersalzberg. On 25 April 1945, 318 Lancaster bombers of the Royal Air Force had led an air raid over the Obersalzberg, dropping 1,232 tons of bombs in an action aimed at preventing the use of the complex as an alternative government center for the last-ditch defense of Germany (the so-called Alpine Redoubt). The Berghof received three direct hits, the Bormann and Goering houses were destroyed, the SS barracks were leveled, and the Platterhof was badly damaged. The rubble and ruins had remained amid the greenery of the hillsides for several years until the Bavarian government finally blew up the surviving ruins in the spring of 1952. The shell of the Berghof was dynamited at 5:05 P.M. on 30 April 1952.

The peaceful surroundings served as a poignant reminder to Savitri Devi that the "great days" of the Third Reich were long past. At length, on the right side of the road, she came upon an enormous heap of sand, gravel, and pulverized blocks of mortar from which the cornerstone of a ruined wall projected. Tears welled into her eyes and her mouth quivered with emotion at the sight of this devastation. "Here the Berghof had once stood in all its loveliness, in the midst of lawns and flower beds and trees; this was what 'they' had reduced it to, so that no trace of it should be left; so that men should forget!" She shuddered at the hatred that urged men to work this systematic destruction seven years after the end of the war and asked herself how long the world would execrate the Führer and all he had stood for and created. Recalling the destruction of Akhnaton's new solar city in ancient Egypt, she reflected that the "money power" would forever persecute those it could neither buy nor frighten. However, she took comfort in the thought that the "Shining Ones," the Aryan powers of light and truth, would nevertheless prevail in the cosmic struggle of Manichaeian opposites. "The sight of the desolation of this place, glaring sign of the victory of the evil forces for the time being, filled me with resentment, with hatred, with grief; once more, with the awful awareness of defeat."¹³ She lay down and sobbed desperately at her sense of loss.

A soft warm breeze calmed her and she began to imagine Hitler at the Berghof in these magnificent natural surroundings as the hero of the new aeon:

I pictured him on a spring day like this, letting his star-like eyes, athirst of infinity, rest on those meadows and woods, those dark-green and violet hills, those shining white ranges. . . . I pictured him alone, in tune with the Soul of this land that he so loved, breathing its power and its beauty, communing with it and through it, with the Essence of himself and of all things—immanent Godhead. . . . I pictured him . . . all-loving, all-knowing, above happiness and sorrow, detached in the midst of worldwide action, looking over this dream-like scenery on the border of that extended Germany, which he had reconquered, into the realm of eternity that was—and is—his impregnable realm; into that intangible world in which success and failure fade into nothingness before the one thing that counts: timeless Truth; sure that he was right whatever men might say, whichever events might occur, sure that Germany's mission was . . . (in the words of the most ancient Aryan Book of wisdom) "the interest of the universe." Sure, and therefore serene. Sure, and therefore sinless,—perfect.¹⁴

In her opinion this was the real Adolf Hitler, the Aryan savior, the one of whom no newspaper had ever spoken, and whom no man had ever understood. This was her adored leader, the only one she had loved, life after life, for millions of years.

Her reverie was broken by the arrival of three men come to explore the site. Joining the group, she was told they were standing just above the conference room whose huge window once overlooked the Untersberg with views beyond Salzburg. The men soon betrayed their Nazi loyalties and there was general denunciation of the Bavarian SPD government's desecration of this Nazi monument. When the men dejectedly referred to the defeat of Germany, she compared the Nazi doctrine to the rise of Christianity. She reminded them that their era had begun twenty years ago when Hitler became the master of Germany. Hitler himself had been born sixty-four years ago. How did the Roman world appear in the year A.D. 20 or 64? Christ was dead and his followers a small persecuted sect in the vast Roman Empire. Who would have then believed that Christianity was to become the dominant religion of the West for the next two thousand years? She had given them fresh hope. Together they all gave the Hitler salute. Alone again in the sunset, she sang a Nazi battle song after writing one of its lines upon the ruined wall of the Berghof: "Einst kommt der Tag der Rache." She then viewed the ruins of other Obersalzberg properties and took coffee in the restored Hotel Türken beyond the Berghof site that had served as quarters for the SD intelligence during the Third Reich. Late in the evening, under a bright moon, she walked back to Berchtesgaden.¹⁵

A highly introverted communion with the absent and the dead was the leitmotif of her solitary pilgrimage in these early stages. Arriving on 23 April in Munich, "the birthplace of National Socialism," she hastened to the Feldherrnhalle, an open loggia built in the early 1840s at the southern end of the Ludwigstraße and containing bronze statues of two great Bavarian commanders, Tilly and Wrede. It was here that the police had opened fire on the Nazi marchers in the putsch of 9 November 1923. Savitri Devi repeated the names of the sixteen martyrs who had fallen in the hail of bullets in an act of remembrance of their heroism and sacrifice for the resurrection of their country. Her next stop was the famous Hofbräuhaus, a roomy beer hall rebuilt after 1890 in neo-Renaissance style, where Hitler had begun holding the first mass meetings of the early Nazi Party in autumn 1919. It was here also that Hitler presented the twenty-five points of the new party program to a packed audience of some two thousand on 24 February 1920. These were the amazing days of growth, when Hitler's oratory transformed a tiny backroom club into a powerful political movement. Savitri Devi visited the great vaulted hall where the historic meeting had taken place. She saw her savior speak, young and confident, with the burning eloquence of love, hate, and despair; she saw the crowd, grateful and enthusiastic, listening to his message of German salvation.¹⁶

Returning to the present with a jolt, she saw workmen in the hall busily putting up decorations, colored streamers and a clown's face, for the Americans' May Day party. She angrily imagined the frivolous, mindless crowd of people who would shortly be amusing themselves, wearing paper hats and dancing to a jazz band, in this historic place. The grinning clown's face over the platform where Hitler had spoken seemed to her an eloquent symbol of the postwar West with its fatuous concerns for the individual and democracy, for peace and security.¹⁷

Elsewhere in the city she found the Nazi heritage had been covered and erased by the victorious Americans. She sought out the Bürgerbräukeller. In this fourteenth-century beer cellar Hitler had launched and masterminded the putsch; it also had witnessed his return to public life following imprisonment with a frenzied speech before the tumultuous applause of a four-thousand-strong audience in February 1925; here, on 8 November 1939, a communist assassin planted a bomb that exploded shortly after Hitler had left following his speech. Her disappointment was great when she was informed that the great hall had been destroyed by bombing in 1943 and rebuilt by the Americans as a recreational facility. The prospect of GIs playing table tennis in such a heroic setting was but another galling reminder of defeat. She was not surprised to find that the Brown House, the former national headquarters of the Nazi Party, was razed to the ground. The Königsplatz, the major center of Nazi ceremonial in the Bavarian capital, with its mighty neoclassical Glyptothek and Propylaea by Leopold von Klenze, recalled her memories of Athens and the common Aryan ancestry of Greek and German art. The twin colonnaded shrines of the sixteen Nazi martyrs on the stone-paved square had been blown up in 1947 but she touched their foundation-stones as a Christian pilgrim might revere the tomb of a saint.¹⁸

The next day she traveled fifty-five kilometers west to Landsberg am Lech to view the Allied prison for convicted Nazi war criminals. Throughout the early postwar years the Landsberg fortress had received substantial numbers of war criminals. Those detained or sentenced to death in the secondary Nuremberg trials held between 1947 and 1949 and the U.S. Army's Dachau trials of late 1946 had been brought here. Every week, from mid-October 1948 until the beginning of February 1949, executions took place at Landsberg, sometimes fifteen on a single day, bringing the total to more than one hundred in this period. The fate of the Nazis still awaiting execution had become the subject of international concern in early 1951. The newly established German government began putting pressure on the Americans to commute such sentences as a condition for supporting Western defense planning and the raising of a new German army. At that time there were twenty-eight remaining "red-jackets" on death row in Landsberg. Fourteen of these had been condemned in the Einsatzgruppen and SS Main Office trials at Nuremberg; the remainder had been sentenced at the Dachau trials, having been found variously guilty for their part in the massacre of U.S. soldiers at Malmédy, the murder of Allied airmen, and involvement in thousands of murders at Dachau, Buchenwald, and Mauthausen concentration camps.

In January 1951 the growing East-West conflict had just erupted in the Korean War, and the creation of a German military force in Europe was a crucial factor in the defense policy of the United States. Meanwhile numerous German lobby groups bombarded John McCloy, the U.S. high commissioner in Germany, and President Truman with appeals for clemency in the case of the "red-jackets" and the many others serving long sentences in Landsberg. Following a drastic reduction of prison sentences and numerous commutations for those facing execution, there was a huge campaign to save the final seven, whose death sentences still stood. The German lobbies rushed more than 600,000 signatures by airmail to the White House. Savitri Devi had herself written from Lyons to McCloy and sent a telegram to Truman. After five months of delaying tactics in the American courts, the last seven "red-jackets" were hanged at Landsberg on 7 June 1951. The seven were Otto Ohlendorf, the commander of Einsatzgruppe D, who admitted murdering at least 90,000 civilians in the Soviet Union, as well as Erich Naumann, Werner Braune, and Paul Blobel from the Einsatzgruppen trial; Oswald Pohl, who had directed the Final Solution from Berlin; and two Dachau SS guards. Their deaths brought the total number of Nazi war criminals executed in this prison to 257.¹⁹

At the time of Savitri Devi's visit to Landsberg, some 160 prisoners still remained in custody. These included Sepp Dietrich, the former Waffen-SS general, reputedly Hitler's favorite, and Jochen Peiper, who had ordered the Malmédy massacres. Besides the top brass there were the numerous concentration camp sadists, such as Andreas Schilling, an SS corporal at Mauthausen who had injected inmates in the camp hospital with motor oil, and Horst Dittrich, who had dispatched Soviet POWs with a bullet in the neck as they stood against the wall during a fake medical examination. As Savitri Devi walked around the outer enclosure of the prison, a long white wall surmounted by several rows of barbed wire, she centered her thoughts on her brothers in faith behind the barred windows. The sound of the prison siren punctuating the inmates' interminable day reminded her of the dreary routine and rations at Werl. "Avenge my Führer's faithful people," she prayed. She completed her vigil for those languishing inside the prison with a Nazi marching song and the Hitler salute. "My loved ones, my superiors, from behind the barred windows of your work-rooms and cells, did you hear my voice? Or did you at least, on that afternoon,—24th April, 1953—feel . . . the certitude of our coming dawn?"²⁰ Unbeknown to her, at this very time Chancellor Konrad Adenauer was in Washington discussing with President Eisenhower the Landsberg inmates. Releases began in May 1954, and all were out by Christmas 1956.

The following two days spent in Nuremberg represented the climax of her tour of Nazi remembrance. After sadly inspecting the ruined streets and gutted houses of the historic old town, once famed for their gabled roofs, and elaborate gilded facades and doorways, she made her way out to the party-rally grounds to the south. Alone on the vast stone-flagged parade grounds, now sprouting rank weeds, and before the gigantic terraced tribunes of the Luitpoldarena and the Zeppelinwiese, she imagined all the glories of the huge Nazi pageants she had missed while far away in India during the 1930s. Before her mind's eye arose the enormous crowds gathered to witness the annual September rally. She saw the endless ranks of party formations, the SA, the SS, and the youth organizations, bearing their flags and standards into the arena. Above the tribune hung the great red, white, and black swastika banners. At the Zeppelinwiese the sun shone down upon the brilliant white monumental walls of the colonnaded tribune that stretched over the 400 meters between two huge pylons bearing great bronze eagles. Day after day the crowds came to give ritual expression to their shared belief in Hitler, Germany, and its world mission. She recalled the martial music and heard the cadences and rhythms of the Führer's speeches before 200,000 party faithful, the speaking choruses and the exhilarating climaxes when the frenzied swaying crowd joined in the chant of "Sieg Heil!"

She imagined the scene by night when Hitler addressed the crowds on the Zeppelinwiese illuminated by special lighting effects. All around the huge enclosure, at 40-foot intervals, 130 powerful anti-aircraft searchlights with a range of 25,000 feet threw up great pencil beams of light into the dark night sky, conjuring the spectacle of the "cathedral of light." Above the tribune flames flickered in three great bronze vessels, casting a glow upon the pylon walls, the deep-red swastika flags and the upturned faces of the crowd. There was tumultuous applause as Hitler's speech ended and then, after a momentary hush across the great darkened space, the periodical thunderclap of the repeated "Sieg

Heil!" resounded again and again. She remembered that this was where the thousands had heard the proclamation of the Nuremberg race laws in defense of mankind's Aryan elite in 1935 and saw herself listening to it all on the radio in faraway Lucknow. Again she felt the bitter sense of regret and self-reproach: Why, why had she missed all the glory of the "great days," why had she missed her real duty and spoiled her life? The moonlight gleamed on the white tiers and walls of the deserted monuments. Where the thousands and tens of thousands had gathered, she was now alone.²¹

At the Palace of Justice she viewed the courtroom where the International Military Tribunal had opened on 18 October 1945 and continued in session for just less than a year. At the trial seven defendants had drawn prison sentences: Deputy Führer Rudolf Hess, Grand Admiral Erich Raeder and Reich bank President and Minister of Economics Walther Funk for life; Minister of War Production Albert Speer and Hitler Youth Leader Baldur von Schirach for twenty years; Foreign Minister and "Protector of Bohemia and Moravia" Baron Konstantin von Neurath for fifteen; Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz, Hitler's successor as head of the Third Reich in its last days, for ten. Eleven of the top leadership received the death sentence. In the early morning of 16 October 1946, Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop mounted the gallows in the execution chamber of the adjoining prison, followed at short intervals by Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel; SS-Lieutenant General and Chief of the Reich Security Main Office Ernst Kaltenbrunner; Ministers Alfred Rosenberg, Hans Frank, Wilhelm Frick; the former Nuremberg Gauleiter, a fanatical antisemite, and editor of the Jew-baiting Stürmer magazine, Julius Streicher; Reich kommissar for the occupied Netherlands Arthur Seyss-Inquart; Gauleiter Fritz Sauckel, in charge of all forced labor programs; and General Alfred Jodl. Hermann Goering cheated the hangman by swallowing a smuggled cyanide cartridge hours before his turn. The same day their ashes were cast into a small stream in a Munich suburb by American soldiers. Not a trace of their power nor a place of remembrance was to remain.

Savitri Devi now surveyed the benches where her idols had once sat and touched the polished wood where their hands had rested. Asking her guide where each individual had sat, she angrily imagined the endless stream of lies poured out against them and her own Nazi faith in this place. Her thoughts were with the eleven martyrs: "March in spirit within our ranks, and live in us for ever, great Ones, whom I have never seen, alas, but whom I love; close collaborators of our immortal Führer, live in me as long as I live!"²²

Her pilgrimage of remembrance ended in Nuremberg. After her communion with the absent and dead at shrines of the past, she sought out her new Nazi friends. Traveling north to Homburg vor der Höhe she visited the husband of Hertha Ehlert, her best friend still imprisoned at Werl as a convicted overseer at Belsen, and learned that she was shortly to be released. In early May she was reunited at Koblenz with her old friend Fräulein B. Together they stood before the grave of Fritz Horn, who had given her his copy of Mein Kampf with words of encouragement for her mission. His health broken by his treatment in Allied concentration camps, he had finally succumbed in December 1949. At Hoheneggelsen she walked along a country lane beside the widow of Otto Ohlendorf to visit his grave. One of the last seven "red-jackets" executed at Landsberg, Ohlendorf aroused her special admiration as a modern Aryan hero. With fearless detachment before the Allied judges at Nuremberg he had explained his role as commander of a dreaded Einsatzgruppe responsible for the summary execution of some ninety thousand Jewish and Soviet prisoners in the wake of the Wehrmacht invasion of the Soviet Union: "[I]n war as in peace individual life does not count. Duty alone matters." This ruthless spirit reminded her of the warlike wisdom of the ancient Aryans she attributed to the Bhagavad Gita.²³

A highpoint among reunions took place at the Fischerhof convalescent home near Uelzen. Here Hertha Ehlert had been sent on her release from Werl prison on 8 May. Savitri Devi was introduced to her fellow residents Leo B., a SS-Oberscharführer just out from Werl; Heinz G., another SS man from Werl; and Erich X., who had recently returned from captivity in the Soviet Union. An air of jollity animated the group as they met at the station and drove off in a cramped car. There were many stories to exchange in a café. Ninety-seven men and five women remained in the cells at Werl, but several hundreds still sat in Landsberg according to Hans F., a SS-Sturmführer released from there just two months before. Back at the Fischerhof, she met Lydia V., condemned to death by the French but recently released from Fresnes; listened approvingly to Hans F. justify the extermination camps of Auschwitz and Treblinka as the dispassionate defense of Aryandom; and talked with a young SS man from the Oradour reprisals trial. On

30 May she went with her friends to a dancing party at Uelzen organized by the Heimkehrerverband (Homecomers' League) to celebrate the homecoming of German POWs from the Soviet Union and Nazi war criminals released from Landsberg, Werl, and other Allied prisons. These were happy and hopeful days for Savitri Devi. Surrounded by those she loved and admired, she enjoyed the fleeting experience of the world in which she had so much wanted to live, where she felt she belonged.²⁴

Through her stay at the Fischerhof, Savitri Devi also found a new home in Germany. One of the residents was Leokardia ("Katja") U., a twenty-six-year-old German woman born in the Soviet Union, who overheard her pro-Nazi views and was duly impressed as a former member of the Bund Deutscher Mädel. She invited Savitri Devi to stay and write at her home at Emsdetten in Westphalia, where she lived with her husband and two children. This proved a most satisfactory arrangement and Savitri Devi stayed for at least two years in Emsdetten, where she completed Pilgrimage and wrote most of The Lightning and the Sun, her final statement of Nazi faith. Westphalia with its open heaths and mountainous forests became Savitri Devi's elective German homeland. Above all, she was impressed by the Teutoburger Wald's historic role in the defense of ancient Germanic independence, once in antiquity, when Hermann the Cherusker (Arminius) defeated the legions of Varus in A.D. 9, and again in early medieval times, when Charlemagne destroyed the pagan shrines of the Saxons and converted them on pain of death to Christianity in his campaign between 772 and 787. A visit to the Teutoburger Wald in late October 1953 represented the final station of her pilgrimage.

On a fine early autumn day she took the tram from Detmold to Hiddesen, marveling at the magnificent brown, orange, yellow, and red colors of the forest. Her first destination was the Hermannsdenkmal, the gigantic copper statue of the liberator mounted on a gothic base, which stands more than 160 feet high and towers above the trees on the Grotenburg hill. Built over thirty-seven years with funds raised by subscription, the monument represented the lifework of the indefatigable architect Ernst von Bandel (1800–1876) and was finally completed in 1875. The inspiration and symbolic importance of the statue are attributable to the development of German national feeling and the movement toward unification in the nineteenth century. Savitri Devi gazed upon the copper colossus with his winged helmet and upheld sword with feelings of awe and admiration. Hermann personified to her "the spirit of joyous defiance, the aggressive pride of a young, strong, healthy, beautiful Nation, jealous of her freedom and conscious of her invincibility."²⁵ In Savitri Devi's view, Hermann's victory had forestalled Roman colonization. Germany had thereby retained its ancient language, avoided the racial mixing prevalent throughout the cosmopolitan Roman world, and avoided early Christianization. Thus Germany remained the "kernel of militant Aryan mankind in the West," implacably opposed to all forms of artificial internationalism, until the Third Reich emerged as the leader of a pan-Aryan world order.

She reached the Externsteine near Horn before sunset on the same day. These bizarre great sandstone rocks, four in number, have long been identified as an important religious site. A flight of steps leads up the third rock to a small bridge giving access to the upper chapel perched high upon the second rock. Through a circular aperture in its wall the rising sun may be observed at the summer solstice. The first rock, standing beside a dark lake, is hollowed by caves and decorated with various Christian reliefs believed to represent the site's reconsecration to the new faith. One relief shows the pagan Germanic Irminsul or world pillar bent beneath figures supporting Christ; such an Irminsul belonging to the pagan Saxons was destroyed nearby at Altenbeken by Charlemagne in the late eighth century. At the edge of the lake stands the so-called Tomb Rock containing a hollowed-out cavity not unlike a stone coffin for a recumbent human body. Anyone lying in the coffin experiences complete silence and isolation, and some think that this "tomb" was used by pagan priests or shamans for initiations into mysteries and a new life. During the years of the Third Reich the völkisch archaeologist Wilhelm Teudt had published several books devoted to the pagan solar cults of the Externsteine that had been read by Savitri Devi.²⁶

She had seen other sun temples, Delphi and Delos in Greece, Karnak and the pyramids in Egypt, and the Black Pagoda near Puri in India, but this was the first time she had visited a putative prehistoric solar temple in Germany. She climbed up the steps to the "chamber of the sun" upon the second rock and there imagined old Aryan sages celebrating the solstice rites at a time when the Twelfth Dynasty pharaohs were building their temples in Egypt, the Minoan sealords ruled the Aegean, and the eastern Aryans were invading the Middle East and India. She pictured the destruction of the old shrine by Charlemagne and his Frankish Christians, and the imposition of their alien creed opposed to natural and racial hierarchy upon the healthy and fearless Aryan warriors. It seemed to her that this assault upon the Saxons in 772 had been worse than the defeat of 1945, for it had taken Germany more than a thousand years to recover its natural heathendom in the Third Reich. Charlemagne and Eisenhower were both apostate Germans who, forgetting their racial origins, had persecuted the old faith and their kinsmen.²⁷

At all stations of her pilgrimage Savitri Devi had experienced a thrill at being in a place closely linked with the growth or conquest of the Aryan spirit. But a feeling of sadness was also ever-present. Hitler's birthplace, the Feldherrnhalle in Munich, the Nuremberg party-rally grounds all evoked memories of the promise of Nazism to restore the Aryan world and a bitter sense of its recent defeat. Time after time, in place after place, she nevertheless took fresh hope from her surroundings to imagine the coming Reich, Hitler's return in even greater glory, the establishment of a worldwide Aryan order. Her thoughts and feelings at the Externsteine rehearse this passage from reminiscence through despair to new hope. Alone in the sun chamber on the evening of 23 October she saw the circular aperture lit by the moon. Struck by its deathly symbolism, she was reminded how Nazism had been obliterated and was seemingly dead since 1945. But through her solitary rituals she was certain that she could help speed its resurrection.

Returning a week later before daybreak on 30 October to the rocks, she performed further rituals for the resurrection of Nazism. Descending to the Tomb Rock beside the lake, she climbed into the stone coffin beneath its semicircular arch and saw a small violet spark flash from the rock vault above her head. The uncanny silence associated with the interior of the coffin made a deep impression on her. She was removed from the world like some ancient shaman undergoing an initiatory ordeal for personal transformation. While her limbs grew cold and heavy, she fervently prayed for spiritual rebirth and a Nazi revival. "How long did I remain in the attitude of death, at the bottom of that stone coffin? I could not tell. It was no longer dark when I stepped out." High up in the Chamber of the Sun she shouted the ancient Sanskrit words in invocation of the Vedic deities: "Aum Shivayam! Aum Rudrayam!" followed by "Heil Hitler!" It was still cloudy and raining at the Externsteine, but she knew the sun had risen. Her spirits soared, she could already see the swastika flag flying once again above the rocks of the sun. The celebration of her lonely Nazi gnosis made her certain of Aryan victory.²⁸

10

THE ODESSA CONNECTION

The complete and utter defeat of the Third Reich, the exposure of its crimes and atrocities, and the accompanying programs of denazification and reeducation of the German people combined to vilify Adolf Hitler and National Socialism throughout the Western world. After 1945, Savitri Devi had exchanged her former isolation in India for the marginal role of a die-hard Nazi agent in occupied Germany and elsewhere in Europe. In the late 1940s and early 1950s she was an obscure figure inhabiting a twilight world of bewildered Nazis filled with bitterness, revanchist ideas, and wild hopes of Hitler's return. We have seen her distributing leaflets amid the ruined cities of the fallen Reich, meeting secretly with small conventicles of unrepentant Nazis, and offering comfort to fellow prisoners at Werl, war criminals' widows, and other devotees of the defeated idol. The quixotic and sectarian nature of her postwar activity is highlighted further by her pilgrimage to Austria and Germany in 1953. Throughout this tour she regularly invoked the gods and performed solitary rituals at such places as the Nuremberg rally grounds and the Externsteine in a passionate if desperate attempt to reverse the Allied defeat and urge the resurrection of an Aryan Germany.

This situation of isolation and helplessness was soon to change. Through her reckless and outspoken advocacy of Hitler's cause, she was becoming known in clandestine Nazi circles. She had undertaken her one-woman propaganda crusade in the British zone of occupied Germany without the involvement or knowledge of any Nazi support organization, much to the frustration of several interrogators following her arrest. But the story of her mission and imprisonment soon spread among the inmates of Werl prison and she became a trusted comrade of these and other detainees following their release from Allied prisons. Many of these new friendships offered her an introduction into the political organizations dedicated to a nurturing and revival of Nazism. Above all, this network of Nazi organizations was itself growing and becoming more securely established at the time of her release from Werl.

Once denazification had been sacrificed to the Allies' fresh interest in wooing the Germans for the Cold War against the Soviet Union, new political parties began to spring up in Germany that owed much of their inspiration to National Socialism. One of the earliest was the Sozialistische Reichspartei (SRP) founded in October 1949 and led by Otto Ernst Remer, who had been promoted to general following his role in foiling the bomb plot of disaffected high military and aristocrats against Hitler on 20 July 1944. In the May 1951 Land elections the SRP polled 11 percent of the vote and won sixteen seats in the Lower Saxony diet. The Nazi affiliation of the SRP was manifest in Remer's trenchant attacks on the Americans, whom he accused of constructing fake gas chambers at Dachau to discredit the Germans, and on the Adenauer government together with the "criminals of the 20 July." Such overt Nazi political activity was deemed illegal under the Basic Law of the newly founded German Federal Republic and Remer was sentenced to three months' imprisonment. The Karlsruhe supreme court declared the SRP unconstitutional in July 1952 and the party was banned. Meanwhile Adenauer's Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and other parties scrambled to pick up the 367,000 votes of the outlawed SRP, and the CDU succeeded in boosting its share of the vote in Lower Saxony from 17 to 33 percent. However, considerable numbers of SRP voters and supporters were not long in expressing their nostalgic Nazism through a successor party, whose activities were in the ascendant by the time Savitri Devi returned to Germany in April 1953.

The Deutsche Reichspartei (DRP) traced its origins to a merger of two small far-right parties first launched in the aftermath of defeat in November 1945. After 1952 the DRP was the most influential electoral force on the extreme right with some sixteen thousand paid-up members, a few seats in the Land diets, and about half a million votes across the country in federal elections. Led by Adolf von Thadden, the DRP boasted such former celebrities of the Third Reich as Werner Naumann, a former Nazi secretary of state and Hitler's choice to succeed Goebbels;

SS General Wilhelm Meinberg; a number of Wehrmacht generals; and the Luftwaffe ace Hans-Ulrich Rudel. However, the DRP was only the most prominent of the neo-Nazi organizations that flourished in Germany during the 1950s. According to the Ministry of Interior's annual report on neo-Nazism, there were at least a hundred parties, leagues, movements, and associations, each claiming a Nazi succession, and whose total membership amounted to about eighty thousand persons in 1954. While the great majority of former Nazi supporters, careerists, and businessmen made their way in the new Germany under the auspices of the CDU—Adenauer had several former Nazi ministers in his own government—it was a hard core of Hitler faithful and inveterate Nazis who joined the political fringe of the far right. After her return to Germany in 1953, Savitri Devi made numerous contacts in this revanchist and nostalgic milieu of Nazi diehards.

Foremost among these was Colonel Hans-Ulrich Rudel (1916–1982), whom she frequently visited at Hanover and came to know well. The son of a village pastor in Silesia, Rudel had been fascinated by airplanes and flying from an early age, and joined the expanding Luftwaffe in 1936 during Hitler's buildup of the armed forces. By the spring of 1938, the newly developed Stuka dive bombers were rolling off the production lines in readiness for Germany's blitzkrieg campaigns, and Rudel volunteered to train as a Stuka pilot. At the time it was an unfashionable choice, for most of the young Luftwaffe bloods wanted to be fighter pilots, but it was the foundation of the Rudel legend. From the outbreak of war onward he was almost constantly engaged on bombing missions in Poland, in the Balkans, and above all in the campaign against the Soviet Union. He was the first pilot ever to sink a battleship, the Soviets' Marat, and also dispatched 2 cruisers, one destroyer, 70 landing craft, and more than 500 Russian tanks. By January 1945 he had 2,530 wartime operational flights to his credit and was regarded as Germany's greatest war pilot ever, and possibly the foremost air ace of all time. He was the first and only recipient of Germany's highest military decoration—specially created for him by Hitler in December 1944—the Iron Cross with Golden Oakleaves, Swords, and Diamonds.

Rudel believed that "an officer has a vocation in which he does not belong to himself but to his fatherland and to the subordinates committed to his charge. . . . [H]e must therefore . . . show an example to his men without regard for his own person or his life." He was not known to have taken any leave and when in April 1945 he lost his right leg below the knee, he returned to his unit and continued flying immediately after surgery. Rudel's military achievements and his reputation for courage and patriotic self-sacrifice were a living legend among the German public during the war. This legend enjoyed an even wider appeal because Rudel was not a member of the Nazi Party nor identified with any other political organization of the Third Reich. He was, quite simply, a hero of the fatherland for whom loyalty, duty, and obedience were the ultimate virtues. His bravery was also recognized by the enemy. After the German surrender, he met top pilots of the Royal Air Force in June 1945 at Tangmere to discuss operational tactics and technical matters. One of them, Group Captain Douglas Bader, wrote in his foreword to the English-language edition of Rudel's war memoir Stuka Pilot (1951) that he was a gallant chap and wished him luck.

When Rudel received his unique Iron Cross from Hitler in person, the Führer had praised him as the greatest and bravest soldier the German people had ever produced. Nor was this mere rhetoric. Hitler had boundless admiration for Rudel. He regarded him as the paragon of German soldierly virtue whose courage and devotion to Germany were unaffected by the political jockeying, placemanship, and hunger for power that permeated the party and the political organizations. According to Hitler's architect, Hermann Giesler, Hitler wanted Rudel to succeed him as Führer when the time came. His youth, his qualities of leadership, his powers of communication, his ability to remain calm and logical under stress, his unquestioned character, crowned by his wartime record, all combined to make him a worthier successor in Hitler's view than anyone else in the party.¹ Rudel knew nothing of Hitler's musings, but he did know that after the surrender of Germany, things could never be the same again. He could not forget that it was the Third Reich and Hitler's war that had made his reputation. A hostage to the aura of his own heroism, the selfless patriot became a Nazi die-hard.

After the war Rudel had fled to Argentina, where he became a popular and prominent member of the country's large Nazi community, which enjoyed the protection of the Perón government. Rudel formed a close link with Juan Perón (1895–1974), whose own successful political career owed much to his study of Italian fascism. The wartime hero now turned his mind to devising plans for assisting Nazi fugitives and war criminals to escape from Europe and became the head of such a rescue organization called the Kameradenwerk. He also founded the Rudel Klub as a mutual aid society in Argentina to help former Nazis establish themselves with new livelihoods. Throughout his stay abroad Rudel acted as a leading contact man between Nazis in exile and those still in Germany. On his return to Germany in 1951, he became the patron of the ultranationalistic Freikorps Deutschland, a right-wing extremist group founded that year whose name and aims recalled the private armies and revanchist squads set up by disgruntled soldiers after the First World War. Newspaper reports in January 1952 fueled suspicion that Rudel and former SS Colonels Otto Skorzeny and Eugen Dollmann were leading members of a Madrid-based Nazi center that cultivated close links with another Nazi center in Cairo directly involved in Nasser's anti-British plot that ended with the ousting of King Farouk.²

As soon as he had returned to Germany, Rudel publicly declared his undying admiration for Adolf Hitler and his vision of a resurrected, strong Germany. This outspoken loyalty to the Third Reich backed by the wartime legend of his Luftwaffe exploits firmly established him as the idol of the reviving neo-Nazi movement. His nationalist views found a regular outlet in the Deutsche Soldaten-Zeitung (est. 1951), which was edited by former officials of Goebbels's propaganda ministry and SS officers. Besides his support of the Freikorps Deutschland, he became a committee member of the Deutsche Reichspartei (DRP). When Savitri Devi first met Hans-Ulrich Rudel, he was already perhaps the most popular and visible figure of the neo-Nazi scene in the young German republic. His contacts among old Nazis in South America were extensive and he was a key player in the Nazi clandestine groups in Spain and Egypt. Although an activist by nature, Rudel could not help but be impressed by Savitri Devi's praise of Nazism as an international racist movement, a notion well suited to the clandestine and dispersed nature of postwar Nazi conspiracy. She met him several times at Hannover, completing her manuscript of The Lightning and the Sun on the occasion of a visit in March 1956.

Later that year Rudel returned to South America, living in Brazil and Paraguay, where he befriended President Alfredo Stroessner (b. 1912), the vintage dictator of German origin. By the early 1970s he had returned to Europe and settled in the Austrian Tyrol, but he remained in close touch with many wanted Nazis in South America, including Klaus Barbie, the Gestapo chief of Lyons; Josef Mengele, the Auschwitz doctor; and Walter Rauff, who had planned the early extermination facilities for East European Jewry. All these men, and hundreds of others, including Martin Bormann according to Rudel, owed their new lives abroad to the postwar Nazi escape organizations in which the Luftwaffe ace had earlier played a key role. He later befriended President Augusto Pinochet (b. 1915) in Chile, where Rauff died at liberty in 1984. Hans-Ulrich Rudel's immense network of old Nazi survivors, South American politicians, and businessmen was as great a legend as his Luftwaffe record. Through her encounter with Rudel and his warm response to the propagandist value of her pro-Nazi books, Savitri Devi was properly launched into the international network of escape organizations, mutual aid groups, and new Nazi parties. Thanks to introductions provided by Rudel, she was subsequently able to meet leading Nazi émigrés in the Middle East and Spain.

The emergence of the Middle East as a haven for old Nazis during the 1950s had its roots in the anti-British and pro-Axis attitudes of Vichy Syria, Rashid Ali in Iraq, Mohammed Amin al Husseini, the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, and even King Farouk of Egypt during the war. United by a common hatred of Jewry, the Third Reich had taken the Palestinian mufti under its protection following the Allied invasion of Iraq and he had lived throughout the war in a luxurious suite at the Hotel Adlon in Berlin. Hitler had enjoyed quite a following among the nationalist youth of Egypt during the war, after Nassiri Nasser, the later president's brother, had published an Arab edition of Mein Kampf in 1939, describing its author as the "strongest man of Europe." Even after the defeat of the Third Reich, Arab feelings remained very warm toward the Germans, who were still regarded as potential allies against British colonial power in the region.

Egypt became a favored destination for old Nazis in search of responsible jobs and high office. King Farouk had been impressed by his palace garage mechanics recruited from Afrika Korps POWs and wondered what he might achieve with officers from the elite units of the Gestapo and SS who had fought so hard against the hated British. A number of Nazi experts who had escaped the Allied dragnet were hired by the king as military, financial, and technical advisers. This Nazi influence in Egypt was to survive its royal patron, for the young Egyptian officers who planned the military coup d'état that ousted King Farouk in January 1952 were themselves great admirers of the Germans and availed themselves of further large-scale imports of ex-Nazi expertise. Thus it came about that the former Gestapo chief of Düsseldorf, Joachim Däumling, later actively engaged in SS operations in Croatia, was employed to set up the Egyptian secret service along the lines of the SS Reichssicherheitshauptamt (Himmler's Reich Security Main Office), while the former Gestapo chief of Warsaw organized the security police.³

Hans-Ulrich Rudel and his fellow conspirators Otto Skorzeny and Eugen Dollmann played an important role in recruiting large numbers of former Nazi fugitives from Argentina for key posts in the new republican regime. As early as January 1952 they were in contact with influential Egyptian army officers and the former Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, who had lived in Egypt since the fall of the Third Reich. According to Israeli and French intelligence reports, the Egyptian secret service and political police were staffed by such men as SS General Oskar Dirlewanger, chief of the infamous SS penal brigade; SS Major Eugen Eichberger, battalion-commander in the Dirlewanger brigade; SS Colonel Leopold Gleim, chief of the Gestapo department for Jewish affairs in Poland; SS Lieutenant Colonel Bernhard Bender, Gestapo official in Poland and the Soviet Union whose knowledge of Yiddish enabled him to penetrate Jewish underground organizations; SS General Heinrich Selimann, chief of the Gestapo in Ulm; SS Major Schmalstich, Gestapo liaison officer to French collaborationists and organizer of Jewish transports from Paris to Auschwitz; SS Major Seipel, Gestapo official in Paris; and SS General Alois Moser, a war criminal who was involved in the extermination of Ukrainian Jewry.⁴

Wehrmacht General Wilhelm Fahrmbacher took over the central planning staff in Cairo, while a number of former Nazi officials and sixty military experts, mostly former Waffen-SS men, assisted in the organization and training of the Egyptian army. Several of these were reported in 1958 as closely associated with the then Algerian exile government. These included SS Colonel Baumann, a participant officer in the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto; Willi Berner, an SS officer at Mauthausen concentration camp; and Erich Alter, implicated in the murder of Professor Theodor Lessing at Marienbad and later commissioner for Jewish affairs in Galicia. Economic and ideological advisers followed fast on the heels of their military colleagues. Financial specialists from Goering's Four Year Plan and the German Labor Front were soon employed in Egyptian ministries.

President Gamal Abdel Nasser's anti-Jewish and anti-Zionist propaganda apparatus discovered an ideological treasure trove among Nazi émigrés. Supervisory among these was Johannes von Leers, who had been responsible for anti-Semitic campaigns at Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry, together with Franz Bünsch and Alois Brunner, who had held top jobs in Adolf Eichmann's "Jewish department" of the SS Reich Security Main Office. The Egyptian propaganda ministry also employed Walter Bollmann, Nazi espionage chief in Britain before the war and later, as SS major, active in antiguerrilla and anti-Jewish operations in the Ukraine; Louis Heiden, an SS official transferred to the Egyptian press office during the war; Franz Bartel, an "old fighter" of the early Nazi Party and Gestapo officer; Werner Birgel, an SS officer from Leipzig; Erich Bunz, SA major and expert in the Jewish question; Albert Thielemann, a regional SS chief in Bohemia; and SS Captain Wilhelm Böckler, another participant in the liquidation of the Warsaw ghetto.⁵

Nasser himself was well disposed toward the Germans, but all the more because these asylum seekers wished to join him in the destruction of Israel. Around 1958 Egypt began to arm itself with new supersonic planes and rockets. At least two hundred German and Austrian scientists and other personnel were deployed in the new aircraft and missile center at Helwan, where rockets were aimed at Israel. The two production units were under the supervision of Austrian experts, Hans Schönbaumsfeld and Ferdinand Brandner. The latter, a former SA colonel and notorious Nazi, appointed Dr. Hanns Eisele, SS captain and medical torturer in Buchenwald, as staff physician at Helwan. By October 1962 the presence of German scientists at Helwan had been exposed in the world press. In April 1963 these matters precipitated a government crisis in Israel (whose secret service had made attempts on the lives of several Germans). There was also consternation in Bonn over this German contribution to Egypt's military potential against Israel.⁶

Savitri Devi left Europe to return to India in the spring of 1957. Under cover of her maiden name she had illegally spent four years in West Germany, completing her books Pilgrimage and The Lightning and the Sun while staying with her friend Katja U. at Emsdetten and otherwise traveling around the country to make contact with old Nazis. The supply of Indian gold and jewelry that she had brought with her to cover her costs of subsistence was now all but gone. She decided to return home by the overland route through the Middle East. In May 1957 she sailed across the Mediterranean to Egypt with a warm personal recommendation from Hans-Ulrich Rudel to leading Nazi personalities in Egypt. Her first stop was in Cairo, where she made contact with Johannes von Leers. He was a well-known senior Nazi placement in Nasser's new administration, having arrived with his family from Argentina in 1954 through Rudel and Skorzeny's recruitment consultancy. At the time of his meeting with Savitri Devi, Leers was a specialist in Zionist affairs with top responsibility for Cairo's anti-Israeli radio broadcasting.

Although the door of his ministry office bore an assumed Arab name, Professor Dr. Omar Amin von Leers could only have been taken for a German. The pink-cheeked, white-haired man with bright-blue marblelike eyes rose to greet Savitri Devi with old courtly Prussian charm. Of course, he had heard of her and her splendid books on behalf on the international Nazi cause. Colonel Rudel had spoken warmly of her. Would she accept his invitation to stay for a while and see what the Germans were now doing in Egypt? He lived a short distance to the south of Cairo in the town of Méadi (El-Maâdi) on the east bank of the River Nile. However, the Leers house was full at present, and he would arrange for her accommodation at the house of a neighbor, a Palestinian Arab called Mahmoud Sali with a great admiration for the Führer. This gentleman would be greatly honored if Savitri Devi accepted his hospitality. She was delighted. Leers suggested that she come and dine with them that evening.

Johannes von Leers (1902–1963) had very high qualifications for his Egyptian assignment. A Nazi university professor and an SS officer, Leers had also held a senior appointment in Goebbels's Ministry of Propaganda, where he specialized in vicious anti-Semitic campaigns targeted at both domestic and overseas audiences. His long publication list of anti-Semitic diatribes included 14 Jahre Judenrepublik (14 years Jewish republic) (1933), the sinister photo album Juden sehen Dich an (Jews look at you) (1933), Blut und Rasse in der Gesetzgebung (Blood and race in legislation) (1936), and twenty-four other books. Leers's entire literary output revolved around the concepts of race, blood, and soil. During the Third Reich his two titles Geschichte auf rassischer Grundlage (History on a racial basis) (1934) and Der Weg des deutschen Bauern (The way of the German peasant) had both been published in large popular editions by Reclam. In the first work he described Hitler as "absorbing the powerful forces of this Germanic granite landscape into his blood through his father." From 1933 onward he and wife jointly edited Nordische Welt, a monthly periodical published by Herman Wirth's Gesellschaft für germanische Ur- und Vorgeschichte (Society for Germanic Prehistory), and after 1935 he wrote regular articles for the SS-Leithefte published by the SS Race and Settlement Office under the auspices of Richard Walther Darré. Leers's racial ideas were saturated with ideas of the Aryan polar homeland, sun worship, and the power of the native soil. During his Argentinian exile Leers published a vicious attack on the anti-Nazi resistance as Traitors of the Reich (parts 1 and 2).

Over the next few days Savitri Devi spent many hours in the company of Johannes von Leers. The professor could trace his learned interests in völkisch and racial anti-Semitism back to the late 1920s and recalled the people he first met while living in Munich at that time. These included Darré, the pioneer of Nazi "blood-and-soil" doctrine and, after 1933, Reichsbauernführer (national peasant leader) and minister of food and agriculture in the Third Reich. Before her marriage, Gesine von Leers had been the personal secretary of Herman Wirth, the renowned if controversial Dutch-German scholar of Nordic traditions and ancient Germanic institutions. She believed herself the reincarnation of a Bronze Age priestess and affected barbarous gold jewelry. Another member of their Munich circle was Karl Weisthor, an Austrian racial occultist who claimed ancestral-clairvoyant memories of the distant Germanic past. Savitri Devi was thrilled to hear Leers's account of the fashionable parties he and his wife had given for Nazi top brass in Berlin in the early 1930s. Here he had introduced Herman Wirth to Heinrich Himmler, who had henceforth become his patron and created the SS Ahnenerbe (Ancestral Heritage Office) under Wirth's direction. The elderly Weisthor also found favor with Himmler and became a valued member of his personal staff, advising his chief on ancient Germanic religion, runes, and the mysteries of race.⁷

Thrilled as Savitri Devi was at these reminiscences of the Third Reich, she was even more excited by Leers's account of the new international Nazi mission against Jewry and communism. He told her of his successive escapes from Soviet and Western detention camps in Germany; of how the secret escape organizations had sent him and his family to safety in Argentina by 1946; and of the web of international Nazi conspiracy that in turn had brought him and many other highly qualified Germans to Egypt to participate in Nasser's new assertion of Arab power against Britain, France, and Israel, culminating in the recent Suez crisis of 1956. The Third Reich may have gone down in flames in Berlin more than a decade ago, but here in the Middle East, in Latin America, and Spain the old Nazis had new schemes for global racketeering and political resurgence. He impressed upon her that Germany had not lost its friends among those who resented the old colonial powers. Germany was rearming itself economically at home, diplomatically and ideologically abroad. In proof of his assertions, Leers offered her further introductions to senior SS officers now ensconced in Damascus and Baghdad, whom she might like to meet as she continued her journey to India.

She walked with Leers from his home in Méadi along the palm-tree-bordered esplanade beside the wide stream of the Nile, across which stood the ancient pyramids of Giza in the parched desert landscape. In Egypt she was daily reminded of the immemorial sun cults and the young idealistic pharaoh Akhnaton's ill-fated utopia so many centuries before, about which she had written in Calcutta in the early 1940s. But meeting Johannes von Leers and hearing about his numerous Nazi and SS comrades in Egypt also reminded her of her own self-imposed exile from the Third Reich in India. She had always regretted those years spent so far removed from her idol and the "great events" in Europe. Here she found herself again in a foreign setting, outside Europe, only this time she was accompanied by Nazi loyalists who were emerging across the world to prepare for Germany's resurrection. The din and squalor of downtown Cairo recalled her memories of wartime Calcutta, and once again she felt that her years of lonely witness, her passionate prophecies of Aryan revival, and the end of the Kali Yuga had a universal significance. The Third Reich had passed, but the Fourth Reich was surely coming. Now there were devotees of the Aryan faith throughout the world in such places as this.

After visiting Tell-el-Amarna, the site of Akhnaton's solar city some 190 miles south of Cairo, she returned to Méadi to bid farewell to Leers and his family and took a Greek ship from Alexandria to Beirut. She traveled on to Damascus by car but found to her disappointment that her Nazi contacts there had decamped for the hot summer months. She then continued her journey across the desert by bus, first to Baghdad, and thence to Teheran, where she spent three weeks. From the Iranian capital she traveled out to Pahlevi to see the Caspian Sea and then continued by road from Teheran through Mashhad to Zahedan on the Iranian-Pakistan frontier. Here she waited for a week at a small Greek hotel that recalled the campaigns of Alexander the Great in this ancient Persian border country until she could board the train that would take her to Lahore. As the steam locomotive puffed across the burning desert of Baluchistan—one of the hottest places on earth—she suddenly felt a great sense of relief to be away from Europe and at long last back in Asia where she could once again flaunt her Nazi convictions without fear of incrimination or sanctions. She had left India at the end of that dark year of defeat in 1945 and since that time she had spent long years in occupied Germany as an undercover agent for Nazism, as an Allied prisoner, and again as a Nazi propagandist and sympathizer in the German neo-Nazi underground. But now India and Pakistan were independent, the British no longer ruled, and she was free to sing the Horst Wessel Song at the top of her voice out of the carriage window.

She arrived in Delhi on 30 July 1957 and within two days was back in Calcutta with her husband at the old apartment in Wellesley Street. The postwar years had not been easy for Asit Krishna Mukherji in view of his pro-German and pro-Japanese wartime activities, and he had found it difficult to find other sponsors for his editorial and journalistic work. However, during the 1950s he had been making a living as a Hindu astrologer and had raised sufficient money to pay for the printing of his wife's books and send her regular financial support. Savitri Devi now wanted to fund the printing of her latest books and for this she herself needed well-paid employment. In the late summer she found a job as field interpreter for three East German engineers who were building a funicular railway at the iron ore mines of Jordania-Barajonda in the Orisa province. When this project was completed, she returned to Calcutta to take up a post as a teacher at the French School in September 1958. The proceeds of her interpreting job covered the production costs of Pilgrimage and The Lightning and the Sun, which were both published in 1958.

Although she was free to publish Nazi books in Calcutta, she suffered once again from a sense of standing on the sidelines. Now independent, India was eager to emphasize territorial nationality to avert racial strife, and with the British gone, there was little interest in their former German enemy. By 1960 Europe beckoned to Savitri Devi once again as a more promising stage for neo-Nazi activity. Her mother had died at Lyons in March 1960 and there were affairs to be settled. In any case, she wanted to join forces again with her German die-hard friends in preparing for a Nazi revival. For the second time she bid farewell to her husband, in September 1960, and sailed via South India and Ceylon to Marseilles. After docking at the great French port, through which she had so often passed en route to Greece, India, and Egypt, she traveled directly into Spain. Once again Hans-Ulrich Rudel had secured her a top-level introduction into the neo-Nazi network by sending her books Gold in the Furnace and The Lightning and the Sun to his colleague Otto Skorzeny in Madrid.

SS Colonel Otto Skorzeny (1908–1975) was another archconspirator in Nazi escape organizations, and in political, and business intrigues, whose postwar adventures are as astonishing as his daring wartime exploits. He had been one of the first members of the Austrian Nazi Party in 1935 and had joined Das Reich Division of the Waffen-SS at the outbreak of war. Thanks to his close links with the Austrian SS police leader and later SS General Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Skorzeny took command of a new SS commando unit in 1943. Commando raids of breathtaking audacity and risk were the trademarks of Skorzeny's warfare. On 12 September 1943 he entered the history books when his special glider forces liberated the deposed Mussolini from a mountaintop hotel in the Gran Sasso, where he was being held prisoner by the new Italian government. In July 1944 he received a special secret authorization from Hitler and was effective commander in chief of all German home forces in the confusion following the bomb plot and played a crucial role in foiling its success. In November 1944 he was appointed head of the sabotage section of the SS Reich Security Main Office and led commando raids in U.S. uniform (thereby contravening the Geneva Convention) in the Ardennes during the Battle of the Bulge. Later he was involved in Operation Werewolf, a code name for the resistance fighters, guerrillas, and foreign agents who were to continue the war behind Allied lines.⁸

At the end of the war Skorzeny was apparently charged with creating a special corps to defend the Alpine Redoubt, supposed to provide a major bloc of military resistance and a refuge for Hitler and the Nazi leadership in a large mountainous area centered on the Austrian Tyrol, southern Bavaria, and the Alto Adige in northern Italy. From early 1945 Goebbels had mounted a journalistic campaign to produce stories about impregnable positions, underground supply dumps, elite troops, and mountainside factories. The entire operation was a myth, intended to create confusion among the invading Allies and distract them from the assault on Berlin. Skorzeny's actual task was to coordinate the escape and evasion networks of leading Nazis. Skorzeny is usually credited with the creation of the most famous network of all, the ODESSA (Organisation der ehemaligen SS-Angehörigen) and its Bremen-Bari (B-B) line, which provided a secure chain of some 250 friendly agents with safe houses, money, and documents across Europe. The B-B line was the preferred route for Nazi fugitives making their way southward through Germany, over the Alps, and into Italy to reach Mediterranean ports, where they embarked for Latin America. Thousands of war criminals had benefited from Skorzeny's highly reliable escape line between 1949 and 1952.

But Otto Skorzeny's ambitions and love of adventure extended far beyond the domestic operations of Nazi rescue organizations. He was an early recruit into Reinhard Gehlen's new West German intelligence organization (Bundesnachrichtendienst), itself a creation of the American CIA under Allen Dulles with its overriding concern to use the indispensable knowledge of the former German intelligence corps against the new Soviet enemy. Basing himself in Madrid from 1950, Skorzeny built up an international intelligence-gathering and mercenary-recruitment agency under cover of an engineering and import-export business. He was appointed security adviser to several right-wing dictatorships in Latin America and was a trusted consultant to Spain's Ministry of the Interior. Skorzeny was further credited with being the treasurer of enormous Nazi funds and gold reserves that had been salted away on behalf of major German industrial concerns (the so-called Circle of Friends) in neutral countries during the last year of the war. He also dealt in arms and sold the supplies of weapons cached by the SS at the end of the war in France, Austria, and Italy. Through his father-in-law, Hjalmar Schacht, Hitler's former finance minister, Skorzeny was invited by Dulles in 1953 to help reorganize the security forces of the new Egyptian Republic. In the course of his clandestine intelligence and commercial dealings, Skorzeny regularly traveled from Madrid to Cairo, Tangier, Buenos Aires, and Rome besides many towns in Germany and Austria.

Although principally a man of action and affairs, Skorzeny was well placed to take an interest in the political and ideological side of international neo-Nazism. Following the first postwar gathering of various neofascist and neo-Nazi parties and movements in Rome in March 1950, about a hundred delegates from these parties in Germany, Italy, Austria, France, Spain, and Sweden assembled in May 1951 at Malmö in southern Sweden. Among these were Sir Oswald Mosley, leader of the prewar British Union of Fascists and the Union Movement since 1948; Maurice Bardèche, brother-in-law of the French fascist Robert Brasillach and representative of the Comité National Français; Fritz Rössler of the Sozialistische Reichspartei; and Karl-Heinz Priester, a former leader of the Hitler Youth who had a close connection with Skorzeny and the SS international. The Malmö International was a milestone in the history of postwar fascism, for it created the first confederation of parties in the "European Social Movement," which advocated a third force in Europe against the superpower blocs of the United States and the Soviet Union. Its right wing subsequently founded the Nouvel Ordre Européen (NOE), an extreme anti-Semitic confederation, in Zurich in September 1951. These internationals joined about fifty national movements and numbered perhaps several thousand members worldwide. In his undercover operations Skorzeny was always able to access these extensive Nazi networks.

Skorzeny regarded Savitri Devi as an exceptional ideologist on behalf of a revived Nazi International and invited her to visit him in Madrid on her return to Europe. They evidently found plenty to discuss for she remained his guest for six weeks. Skorzeny was convinced that conditions were growing more favorable for a fresh wave of neofascist sympathy in Europe. The loss of the Congo had unleashed revanchist sentiments in Belgium, and now, in late 1960, French extremists were seeking to delay any settlement of the conflict in Algeria. There was a widespread hope among neofascists that the Algerian issue would repeat the ideological conflict of the Spanish Civil War on a European stage. The fascist organization Jeune Europe supported the Organisation Armée Secrète (OAS) in Algeria and later found safe hideouts for its leaders. The increased levels of colored immigration in Great Britain were leading to a racial backlash and further support for far-right groups. New German neo-Nazi groups and youth movements were being established, including the Bund Vaterländischer Jugend and the Notgemeinschaft reichstreuer Verbände, sponsored by Skorzeny's friend Karl-Heinz Priester. Skorzeny had read Savitri Devi's books and was impressed by their praise of German virtues in the general context of a revival of the white Aryan world. He felt she was someone to be encouraged, someone who should write more for the Nazi International.

Here in Madrid Skorzeny could show her something of the prestige and protection that notorious wanted Nazis enjoyed in their Spanish refuge. For instance, there was Ante Pavelić (1899–1959), the leader of the Nazi puppet state of Croatia between 1941 and 1944. Inspired by a tribal desire for an independent Croat nation, Pavelić's fascist Ustaše movement had waged a savage war of vengeance, which claimed more than 800,000 victims among the Serbs and Jews of Croatia. At the end of the war, the Croat dictator had been sent along the ODESSA escape lines to Spain. From here he had gone to live in Argentina, until he was shot by a Yugoslav enemy in Buenos Aires. He returned to Madrid, dying there in 1959, a short while before Savitri Devi's visit to Skorzeny. The list of foreign fascists in Spain also included Horia Sima (1906–1993), commander of the Romanian Iron Guard, and senior Nazi officers of the Condor Legion, who had earlier fought for Franco and destroyed Guernica in the Civil War. Besides Skorzeny himself, the most notable Nazi exile in Madrid at the time of her visit was Léon Degrelle (1906–1994), the former Belgian Rexist leader and commander of the Wallonie Waffen-SS division on the eastern front. During her stay Skorzeny introduced her to Degrelle, who greatly impressed her with rousing stories of his anti-Bolshevik crusade in Hitler's pan-European army. She would later quote from his book Hitler für ein tausend Jahre with warm approval in her own memoirs.⁹

Degrelle had begun his political career in 1930 with the foundation of a publishing house and an authoritarian Catholic and anticommunist political movement called Christus Rex. After the Rexistists had obtained 275,000 votes in the 1936 general election, which gave them twenty-seven seats in the lower house and seven in the Senate, Degrelle became a force to be reckoned with in Belgian politics but was interned by the government for his pro-German position at the outbreak of the war. After the German occupation of the Low Countries in 1940, Degrelle was freed and resumed his political activity. When Germany attacked the Soviet Union in June 1941, Degrelle volunteered to form a French-speaking Wallonian unit to fight alongside the Germans against Bolshevism. Thousands of young Belgians flocked to join his new unit from which the Wallonie and Langemarck Waffen-SS divisions were swiftly formed. Degrelle was involved in seventy-five direct combat actions on the eastern front and was wounded thirty-four times. By the end of the war he had risen to the rank of SS-Standartenführer as commander of the 28th SS Wallonie division. Refusing the unconditional surrender demanded by the Allies, Degrelle escaped from Oslo in Albert Speer's light plane, which crashed into the sea off the Spanish coast near San Sebastian.

Franco was greatly impressed by Degrelle and his Catholic anticommunist credentials. After the Belgian courts had sentenced Degrelle to death in absentia as a traitor on two occasions, Franco refused all demands from Belgium for his extradition from Spain. By way of further protection, the Spanish authorities also provided him with an armed guard in case of a kidnap attempt or assassination. Once he had recovered from his crash injuries, Degrelle established himself as a businessman in Madrid. Rumor linked Degrelle and his Falangist friends in Spain with the safehousing of Martin Bormann in Madrid en route to Argentina during 1947. However, Degrelle's chief contribution to the postwar Nazi cause was the ceaseless glorification of the Third Reich and the encouragement of a younger neo-Nazi generation. He published a dozen major books on Nazism, including Die verlorene Legion (The lost legion), Hitler — geboren in Versailles (Hitler—born at Versailles), Denn der Hass stirbt . . . (Because hate dies . . .), and Hitler für ein tausend Jahre (Hitler for a thousand years), and regularly wrote for the far-right European press. As a prewar Belgian fascist and a highly decorated Waffen-SS commander, Degrelle was a powerful symbol of the self-styled pan-European, anti-Bolshevik crusade of Nazi Germany. When the statute of limitations on his Belgian convictions lapsed, Degrelle became a considerable public figure in the neo-Nazi movement, receiving many visitors from abroad and addressing large international right-wing youth rallies from the 1960s onward until he was well into his eighties.¹⁰

In the course of her six weeks' stay with Otto Skorzeny, Savitri Devi was able to gather a great deal about the work of ODESSA and the other Nazi escape organizations, which had brought so many wanted Nazis and SS to safety abroad. She was excited to learn something of the far-flung intelligence networks that Skorzeny had expertly woven through the espionage and security needs of Germany, Egypt, Spain, and Latin America, often with financial support from the United States. She was greatly impressed by the clever interplay of his financial, commercial, and political activities on behalf of the "Circle of Friends" that had safeguarded German industrial and financial interests through surrender and defeat. But Skorzeny was not just a man with a Nazi past. His interests and influence reached far into the governments and councils of contemporary states. He played the part of a Spanish grandee to perfection, meeting his contacts at a restaurant where most of Franco's cabinet took their lunch. He lectured in Spanish universities on new military strategies and guerrilla warfare, and in 1960 he was a leading figure in the West German government's negotiations for Bundeswehr bases in Spain. Savitri Devi's admiration for Skorzeny was practically boundless; many years later in Delhi she would recall him as "one of the finest people I have ever met."

The bravado and mystique of Otto Skorzeny were notorious. Time and time again during the 1950s and 1960s his name was linked in the world's newspapers with Nazi plots and foreign intelligence services, above all with the ODESSA and its power to put former SS men in high places. So great was his aura of competence and intrigue that he was even tenuously linked to the planning of the Great Train Robbery in 1963. It seemed that Skorzeny's resources of daring and imagination could never be underestimated in view of his successes in the liberation of Mussolini, his bold guerrilla tactics, and the plans for Operation Werewolf in an enemy-occupied Germany.

And yet the myth always, perhaps necessarily, exceeded the man and his works. The Skorzeny myth was in turn part of the wider myth of the Fourth Reich. Adolf Hitler and the top Nazi leadership were long dead or imprisoned at Spandau; the Third Reich, the Nazi Party, and the SS had vanished in the inferno of a defeated nation; West Germany practiced parliamentary democracy under the watchful eye and tutelage of its victors. And yet, on the fringes of that safe, liberal Western world, in Spain, the Middle East, and Latin America, such figures as Otto Skorzeny, Hans-Ulrich Rudel, Léon Degrelle, and their countless confederates were powerful symbols of Nazi survival. Through her meetings with the men from ODESSA, Savitri Devi joined that world of regenerate Nazism.

11

INSIDE THE NEO-NAZI INTERNATIONAL

On leaving Spain, Savitri Devi returned to France and in January 1961 found a job as a supply teacher at Montbrison near Lyons. From here she followed Skorzeny's advice and continued to keep abreast of the growth of international fascism. During that year the larger neofascist parties in Europe were moving toward a new International, and the National European Party was founded by a convention of Mosley's Union Movement, the Deutsche Reichspartei, Jeune Europe, and the Movimento Sociale Italiano in Venice in March 1962. The National European Party clearly echoed Mosley's new postwar "Euro-Fascism." Its manifesto proposed the creation of a federal European state extending from Brest to Bucharest, the withdrawal of all American and Soviet forces from the old continent, and a scheme for white rule in parts of Africa. Its economic policies upheld the familiar fascist "third way" between capitalism and communism.¹

This Venice International, like the preceding ones in Rome, Malmö, and Zurich, was eager to promote new ideas for old causes in the post-war world. However, these Internationals were usually careful to avoid any embarrassing references to Hitler, the SS, Nazism, and the Holocaust. Such caution was completely cast aside in the spring of 1962 by Colin Jordan, the British neo-Nazi leader, who admired Hitler and revived all the Nazi props of brown shirts, breeches and jackboots, and swastika armbands, together with the slogans of "Sieg Heil!" and "Juden 'raus!" and the Horst Wessel Song. When Jordan founded the World Union of National Socialists (WUNS) as a self-proclaimed Nazi International in August 1962, Savitri Devi became a founding member and was closely involved throughout the 1960s.

John Colin Campbell Jordan (b. 1923) had begun his preparation for the role of "world Führer" soon after the war. Demobilized from the Army Education Corps, he went up to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, in 1946 with an exhibition in history awarded before his war service. He contacted a number of British nationalist and neofascist groups with a view to promoting the cause at Cambridge. Foremost among these leads was Arnold Leese (1878–1956), an inveterate anti-Semite who had founded the Imperial Fascist League in 1929, a small (two hundred members) party that was the most pro-German and openly anti-Semitic group in England during the 1930s. It had always remained independent of Oswald Mosley's British Union of Fascists. Leese had published the pro-Nazi magazine The Fascist (1929–1939) and been detained during the war under the 18B regulation against suspected German "fifth columnists." Upon his release he resumed anti-Semitic publishing with his scurrilous periodical Gothic Ripples (1945–1956) and was briefly imprisoned in 1947 for giving aid to two fugitive Dutch members of the Waffen-SS. Jordan regarded Leese as a mentor figure, and the two men remained close friends until the latter's death. Leese's widow was a staunch supporter of Jordan in his subsequent struggles on the far-right scene and gave him the personal right to use a house in Notting Hill as a political headquarters.

But anti-Semitism and Nazism were limited in their appeal to a few racist sectarians like Leese and Jordan. It was colored immigration to Britain that provided a new impetus to their racism and held out the prospect of a mass movement on the extreme right. The postwar shortage of labor in the economies of Western Europe had been met by importing workers from other countries, and in Britain's case these people typically came from colonies or former colonies, especially the West Indies, India, and Pakistan. The first group from the West Indies arrived in 1948 and from that year to 1954 some 8,000–10,000 immigrants came into Britain each year. In 1954 and 1955, immigration from the West Indies rose to more than 20,000 each year, while that from India and Pakistan rose to about 10,000. A total of 132,000 colored immigrants from the Commonwealth arrived in Britain between 1955 and 1957, of whom 80,000 came from the West Indies. The newcomers were widely perceived with apprehension, especially by those working-class communities in which they were expected to settle. Because all the major political parties wished to avoid making immigration a political issue, it was foreseeable that new groups would arise to demand immigration control.

The immigration issue was squarely confronted by the National Labour Party (NLP) and the White Defence League (WDL), which were founded, respectively, by John Edward Bean (b. 1927) and Colin Jordan in 1957 when they left the League of Empire Loyalists (LEL), a right-wing society begun in 1954 to reverse British policies of decolonization. In August 1958 there were race riots in Nottingham, and in September similar riots in Notting Hill in West London. Jordan ran the White Defence League from Arnold Leese House at 74 Princedale Road in Notting Hill, and organized nightly rallies in the streets of this immigrant neighborhood throughout the tense summer of 1958. He also published a local newspaper, Black and White News, and a flood of racist pamphlets to provoke strong feelings of resentment against the newcomers. In Jordan's view, the great importance of the immigration issue was that it forced people to think in terms of race and thus become more receptive for his primarily anti-Semitic convictions. In 1959 he was advocating the cause of Nordic racial unity through the publication of a small periodical The Nationalist. By February 1960 the WDL and NLP had merged as the new British National Party (BNP) under the motto "For Race and Nation," with Andrew Fountaine, a Norfolk landowner, as president; Mrs. Leese as vice president; Jordan as national organizer; and John Tyndall (b. 1934), also formerly in the LEL, as a founder member.²

The potential for the extreme right in Britain seemed very great in the years 1960 to 1962. In 1960 some 60,000 immigrants from the West Indies, India, and Pakistan were added to the population, three times as many as in 1959, and in 1961 the net increase exceeded 100,000 for the first time. It was BNP policy to send all colored immigrants back to their homelands and to impeach the Tory cabinet and the 1945-1950 Labour cabinet for "complicity in the black invasion." Despite its limited funds and small membership (about 350), the party's activities were highly sensational and headline-grabbing, including demonstrations at London railway termini to confront immigrants arriving from the ports, two public meetings in Trafalgar Square, and demonstrations against the parade of a Jewish lord mayor of London and the Anti-Apartheid Movement. To expand into the provinces and to attract younger members, an organization called Spearhead was started within the party.

It was early in the spring of 1961 that Savitri Devi made her first contact with the British neo-Nazis. She was spending her Easter holidays in England with Muriel Gantry, her old friend first met in 1946 through a common interest in the pharaoh Akhnaton. Once in Britain, Savitri Devi quickly noted the widespread publicity that the BNP was attracting as a result of its confrontational stunts and demonstrations over the ever-increasing levels of colored immigration into the country. The growth of this fringe movement committed to racism, virulent anti-Semitism, and folkish nationalism fired her enthusiasm.

She lost no time in contacting Andrew Fountaine, the president of the BNP. A spring camp, attended by twenty delegates from European nationalist groups, was held on Fountaine's estate at Narford, Norfolk, in May 1961. Those present included Robert Lyons, a young leader in the American National States' Rights Party, which violently opposed desegregation in the South; representatives from German neo-Nazi groups; and Savitri Devi. Another key figure was ex-SS Lieutenant Friedrich Borth. Born in 1928, this blue-eyed, blond Austrian Nazi had served in the Luftwaffe and the Waffen-SS. As a teenage officer, he had commanded an assault group and won the Iron Cross. After serving a three-year jail sentence in postwar Vienna, he published an SS veteran magazine, Das Kamerad, which was swiftly suppressed by the Soviet authorities. Thereafter he was connected with numerous extreme right-wing groups and attended most international fascist gatherings. He led the Bund Heimattreuer Jugend until its banning in 1959 and then ran the Legion Europa, the Austrian section of Thiriart's Jeune Europe, another international grouping inspired by the French OAS in Algeria and Belgian rancor over the loss of the Congo.³ After a busy schedule of lectures at Narford, the participants celebrated their Nordic racial identity with folkish songs and tankards of traditional ale around the campfire.

Savitri Devi was soon on friendly terms with John Tyndall and Colin Jordan, with whom she had first corresponded while staying with Skorzeny in Spain, and she kept in touch following her return to France. It was through this early contact that she was able to follow the subsequent wranglings in the BNP between Fountaine and Bean on the one hand and the brazen neo-Nazi tendency of Jordan and Tyndall. The latter commanded her instinctive allegiance and in due course she was their devoted supporter in the schismatic National Socialist Movement.

Despite the runaway success of the immigration issue for racial nationalism, ideological divisions were becoming apparent in the BNP leadership. In February 1962 Bean presented a resolution to its national council that "Jordan's wrongful direction of tactics is placing increasing emphasis on directly associating ourselves with the pre-war era of National Socialist Germany to the neglect of Britain, Europe and the White World struggle of today and the future." Bean and Fountaine clearly saw that Jordan's chief motive was admiration for Nazi Germany, whose example he wanted to translate, together with all the paraphernalia of swastikas, uniforms, and Hitler cult into contemporary Britain. What they wanted was a modern British nationalist movement addressing the issues of the 1960s. Jordan was defeated by a vote of seven to five, but he refused to stand down and reminded everyone that he held exclusive right to the use of Arnold Leese House. The BNP thereupon split, with Bean and Fountaine taking the party name, the magazine Combat, and more than 80 percent of the membership. Jordan retained the headquarters, John Tyndall and most of the Spearhead group, and the Birmingham and West Essex branches of the BNP.

The real issue behind the split was whether or not to make the BNP a self-proclaimed Nazi party. Colin Jordan wanted just this. Since 1960 he had edited a magazine called Northern European (1960–1962), which was flagged as the "voice of Nordic racial nationalism." He now called his rump faction the National Socialist Movement (NSM) and, together with John Tyndall and Denis Pirie, began to develop a British neo-Nazi party with all the forbidden trappings of Hitlerism. He launched the NSM with an inaugural party on 20 April, Hitler's birthday, with a swastika-decorated cake. Great excitement attended a transatlantic telephone call to Lincoln Rockwell, the leader of the American Nazi Party, to exchange congratulations, "Heil Hitlers," and "Sieg Heils." Jordan then made a speech about Britain's "loss and shame" for its role in the Second World War and the defeat of Hitler. However, he ended on an exultant note about the prospects of the NSM: "In Britain—in Britain of all places—the light which Hitler lit is burning, burning brighter, shining out across the waters, across the mountains, across the frontiers. National Socialism is coming back." In May he began editing a new magazine, The National Socialist (1962–1966), and published the NSM manifesto: "... the greatest treasure of the British people—the basis of their greatness in the past, and the only basis for it in the future—is their Aryan, predominantly Nordic blood; and that it is the first duty of the state to protect and improve this Island."⁴

Racial nationalism and the glorification of German National Socialism were distinctive features of Jordan's NSM which repeatedly seized the tabloid headlines in 1962. This year also witnessed a climax in the public concern over immigration, with some 212,000 colored immigrants having entered Britain over the eighteen months before the new Immigration Act was finally passed in July. On 1 July 1962 the NSM held a rally before a crowd of 4,000 in Trafalgar Square, at which Jordan declared: "More and more people every day are opening their eyes and coming to see that Hitler was right. They are coming to see that our real enemies, the people we should have fought, were not Hitler and National Socialists of Germany but world Jewry and its associates in this country." John Tyndall fulminated in a similar anti-Semitic diatribe that "in our democratic society, the Jew is like a poisonous maggot feeding off a body in an advanced state of decay." This open avowal of Nazi sentiments and vicious anti-Semitism quite overshadowed the precipitating factor of colored immigration. The NSM was true to the spirit of Arnold Leese and the interwar Imperial Fascist League. The rally ended in a riot with a mob of Jewish people, Communist Party members, and CND (Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament) supporters storming the platform. The NSM would claim that the rally unleashed the racialist strife that summer. Oswald Mosley's Union Movement held rallies during July in protest at colored immigration in Trafalgar Square, Manchester, and the East End, which were all met with uproar and disorder. In early August race riots lasted for three nights in Dudley near Birmingham, and again many arrests were made.

Secret military training had been a penchant of John Tyndall's ever since he began leading his Spearhead group in the provinces on weekends. The Special Branch had already started to take an interest in its activities in July 1961, when policemen found such slogans as "Race War Now" and "Free Eichmann Now" (Eichmann had recently been abducted by Israeli agents from Argentina to face trial in Jerusalem for his part in the Final Solution) on the wall of an old stable at Culverstone Green in Kent. Tyndall and his lieutenant Roland Kerr-Ritchie were subsequently observed drilling a squad of eighteen men, dressed in the Spearhead uniform of gray shirts, sunwheel armbands, boots, and belts. After the BNP split, Tyndall and Jordan continued to foster the paramilitary stormtrooper spirit in the NSM. During April and May 1962 Jordan was regularly watched by detectives as he led the Spearhead squad on military maneuvers involving mock attacks on an old tower on Leith Hill near Dorking in Surrey. Such paramilitary training was an integral part of the NSM ideology based on the rise of the Nazis in Germany during the 1920s, while Jordan and Tyndall especially were attracted to the swashbuckling romance of armed struggle in the event of a national crisis. But the Spearhead maneuvers were also intended to rehearse the prowess, drill, and discipline of the British contingent at the Nazi International camp that Jordan planned to host in England for August 1962.

Jordan had already announced before the ill-starred Trafalgar Square rally that the NSM would hold a summer camp, incorporating an international Nazi conference. Against a background of the Union Movement rallies, Mosley's inflammatory speeches, and the NSM's sensational incident, Parliament was seeking action on public disorders and there was demand for a debate on Mosley by the end of July. Labour and Jewish MPs and members of the Jewish community had meanwhile put pressure on the Home Office to refuse the Nazi delegates visas to attend the NSM conference. Once Jordan revealed that Lincoln Rockwell might be attending the camp, the authorities swung into action. On 1 August the home secretary announced that the foreign delegates would not be permitted to land in Britain, and all the airports and seaports were put on a special alert to watch for Rockwell and other known supporters of international Nazi intrigue. Unbeknown to the authorities, Jordan was already confident of Rockwell's attendance by the time he announced its possibility. On 29 July, several days before the Home Office ban was imposed, Rockwell had arrived at Shannon airport and been met by Jordan and Tyndall in Eire. There were no further immigration checks between Ireland and the British mainland, and they had traveled by ferry from Dublin to Liverpool. Rockwell was therefore already staying at a secret accommodation in London by the time that the ports were on the lookout for him. The belated official interest in Rockwell's entry to Britain also enabled most of the other delegates to arrive undetected.

By the time the Home Office ban was announced, Savitri Devi was also among those already in England. She had come to visit Muriel Gantry at her Drury Lane flat in London on 26 July, proudly bearing a large red, white, and black swastika flag for the camp. Miss Gantry did not share her friend's enthusiasm for Hitler and was very troubled when her unpredictable guest unfurled the Nazi flag with excitement at a large window overlooking the busy street. On Tuesday, 31 July the two friends made a long-planned visit to Stonehenge, where Savitri Devi surreptitiously consecrated her flag on the sarsens to the old Aryan gods of Europe. Aware of her friend's plans to attend the NSM international camp and now mindful of the recent reports of Home Office interest in the newspapers, Miss Gantry warned her of the risk that she might be banned from future visits to England. But Savitri Devi was already far too enthused by the prospect of the conference to consider withdrawal. She was determined to plant her Nazi colors on British soil.

On Friday, 3 August, she went to the NSM headquarters at 74 Princedale Road in order to receive instructions on how delegates were to reach the secret camp location. She was admitted to the shop-fronted premises and found a large number of people already present. The atmosphere of Arnold Leese House impressed her greatly. Here right in the midst of Notting Hill, an area of growing colored immigration, the NSM had raised its flag. Young men in uniform shirts with sun-wheel armbands, leather belts, and jackboots bustled from room to room with messages and commissions. Meanwhile documents, leaflets, and literature were being stacked in readiness for the conference. Looking around the headquarters, Savitri Devi felt that she was witnessing the emergence of a new Nazi Party, a faithful copy of its original at Munich in the early 1920s. Pictures of Hitler and Rudolf Hess hung on the walls, back numbers of Jordan's various racist and anti-Semitic newspapers and magazines lay around with their shouting headlines and provocative pictures of blacks, while uniforms and jackboots lay stacked in the basement ready for action. All that she saw conjured the image of the Brown House in the early years of the Nazi Party. She shivered with excitement when she recalled that the scene of this new activity was London in the 1960s.

Colin Jordan had two main purposes for holding this international Nazi conference. In the first place, it was important to him to boost the profile and membership of the NSM. At the time of the split with the BNP, he had been left with as few as twenty activists, including John Tyndall, Denis Pirie, and Roland Kerr-Ritchie. While the Trafalgar Square rally had kept the NSM in the spotlight, Jordan was aware that he had to attract more members, not least to compete with the BNP, which was now claiming a membership of one thousand active supporters. The BNP was again holding its annual summer camp over the weekend of 4-5 August on Andrew Fountaine's land at Narford, and Jordan felt that the NSM had to go one better. By convening and sponsoring an international Nazi conference under NSM auspices, Jordan was essentially outflanking the BNP's claims to be the major neo-Nazi party in Britain and placing himself and his party at the head of a new initiative to coordinate and liaise with other groups worldwide devoted to racial nationalism, anti-Semitism, white supremacism, and the glorification of German National Socialism. His chief motive for the NSM summer camp was to place himself at the head of an international Nazi movement.

Colin Jordan explained to her and other delegates that the camp was being held at a secret site in Gloucestershire and that strict security measures were being taken to ensure that as few people found out about it as possible. They would therefore leave NSM headquarters in small groups to attract minimal attention. Each group would make its way to Paddington railway station and take a train to Cheltenham, where a second rendezvous would be held. From there cars would take them to the camp in the Cotswold Hills. Savitri Devi's excitement mounted at these clandestine arrangements. Taxis set off in different directions to confuse any pursuers and she and several companions were soon steaming down the main line through Swindon to Cheltenham.

It was already evening when she entered the secret camp at Pinnock Cliffs on the edge of Guiting Wood, about a mile from the village of Guiting Power. The camp was sited in a secluded woodland glade beside the headwaters of the River Windrush amid the rolling scenery of the Cotswolds some ten miles east of Cheltenham. John Tyndall was already there with the Spearhead Landrover and about half a dozen large, brown bell tents had already been pitched. Savitri Devi's swastika flag was hoisted on a flagstaff, and several fires were soon alight for an evening meal. After supper the Nazis enjoyed singing German marching songs amid campfire camaraderie. Savitri Devi shared a tent with a Belgian woman, whose son was also attending. After nightfall the camp fell quiet as everyone got a good night's sleep in anticipation of next day's activities.

Soon after dawn on Saturday, 4 August, Savitri Devi awoke to hear John Tyndall's voice booming from one of the other tents. Determined to set a military example, he was calling out that only soft democrats lay abed in the morning. Feeling challenged, she arose and went for a cold bath in the nearby river. Over breakfast she began to make the acquaintance of some of the other foreign delegates, the majority of whom were Germans and Austrians, including former SS Lieutenant Friedrich ("Fred") Borth. There were also a number of Swedes, some Spaniards, one or two Frenchmen, one or two Italians, some Belgians and Dutchmen, and some Americans.

The first morning of the camp passed agreeably while the early arrivals settled in, describing to one another neo-Nazi activities in their various home countries, exchanging and reading their magazines and books. More delegates arrived from Cheltenham in the course of the morning. Meanwhile there were logs to be cut and lunch to be cooked. It was noted that both Jordan and Tyndall had vanished that afternoon and a mood of expectation spread through the camp. Savitri Devi described the general amazement and delight when Lincoln Rockwell was suddenly seen, accompanied by Jordan and Tyndall, as they approached through the woods from the direction of the river. The Horst Wessel Song struck up on a portable gramophone and there was loud applause for the arrival of the leader of the American Nazi Party. As she recalled, the newspapers and the British government had said that Rockwell would be banned, but here he was in defiance of all. It was a special moment of triumph for Jordan and his fellow activists in the NSM that they had secured his presence at the international camp.

Rockwell began by giving a speech about the conspiracy of Jewish interests that dominated world politics and had mobilized all its agents to exclude him from participating in the camp. But National Socialism was getting stronger every day throughout the world, indeed this international camp was proof of this fact. Just as he had got through to the camp, so the future of National Socialism was assured. Savitri Devi was thrilled to see Rockwell and thought him a great personality. He was already well known in Nazi circles from pictures showing a tall, athletic figure, with a dashing lock of hair falling over his forehead, who wore sporting blazers and smoked a pipe whenever not marching in the gray-shirt uniform of his movement. That Saturday evening, at the lamp-lit camp in the depths of rural Gloucestershire, Rockwell spoke about his life, the American Nazi Party, and the future of international Nazism. The ensuing questions and discussions went on deep into the night.

George Lincoln Rockwell had been born on 9 March 1918 in Bloomington, Illinois, the son of theatrical performers.⁵ His childhood years had been spent in Maine, New Jersey, and Rhode Island. In 1938 he began to study philosophy and sociology at Brown University, where he became politicized against the liberal, egalitarian tenor of social science and his teachers. He became convinced that liberalism was the "pimping little sister" of communism. Nevertheless, he was heavily influenced by the contemporary buildup of anti-German opinion and enlisted in the United States Navy in March 1941. He served as a naval aviator throughout World War II, commanded the naval air support for the invasion of Guam in August 1944, and was demobilized with the rank of lieutenant commander and several decorations in October 1945. Meanwhile he had married a girl he had known as a student at Brown. Rockwell spent the first five years after leaving the navy studying art and then taking a variety of jobs as a commercial photographer, a painter, an advertising executive, and a publisher, in Maine and New York. In 1950 with the outbreak of the Korean War, Rockwell returned to active duty, training fighter pilots in southern California.

It was here that Rockwell first became politically engaged. The anticommunist revelations of Senator Joseph McCarthy dominated this period, and Rockwell was suspicious of the motives of those wished to smear and discredit him. Through further reading in the San Diego public library, he became convinced of the existence of a Jewish-communist world conspiracy. Rockwell was staggered by the seeming magnitude of the conspiracy as well as the official and media silence concerning its existence. Down in the dark bookstacks of the library one autumn day in 1950, Rockwell experienced his political illumination and awakening. He had always felt that the world was out of joint, that mischief was afoot, but now he had the key to the past and the present. How could he fight against this monstrous and universal plot? The example of Adolf Hitler and his crusade against world Jewry and communism quickly came to mind. Early in 1951 Rockwell found a copy of Mein Kampf in a local bookshop, read it, and saw the world anew:

[Here] I found abundant "mental sunshine," which bathed all the gray world suddenly in the clear light of reason and understanding. Word after word, sentence after sentence stabbed into the darkness like thunderclaps and lightningbolts of revelation, tearing and ripping away the cobwebs of more than thirty years of darkness, brilliantly illuminating the mysteries of the heretofore impenetrable murk in a world gone mad. I was transfixed, hypnotized. . . . I wondered at the utter, indescribable genius of it. . . . I realized that National Socialism, the iconoclastic world view of Adolf Hitler, was the doctrine of scientific racial idealism—actually a new religion. . . .⁶

Thus was Lincoln Rockwell converted to the religion of National Socialism.

Some eight years were yet to elapse before he became an outspoken Hitlerite at the head of an American Nazi Party. Meanwhile, in November 1952, the navy had assigned him to a base at Keflavik in Iceland, where he spent two years, marrying for a second time and achieving the rank of commander. On returning to civilian life, he decided to enter magazine publishing, hoping to find both a livelihood and a forum for his political ideas. He was also active among conservative groups, planned some sort of confederation, and tried to advance by concealing his Nazi hard-core ideology behind a respectable front. But eventually he despaired of this strategy because it failed to attract dedicated racists and anti-Semites. Prompted by a series of recurrent dreams in the winter of 1957–1958 that always ended with his meeting Hitler, he decided to go public against Jewish power in the United States with the financial patronage of Harold N. Arrowsmith, a wealthy anti-Semite. They formed the National Committee to Free America from Jewish Domination in Arlington, Virginia.

Rockwell's first opportunity for confrontation was provided by the U.S. government's military aid in May 1958 for the Chamoun regime in Lebanon, which was unpopular with Lebanese Arabs but enjoyed the support of the Israelis. On 29 July 1958 Rockwell led a picket of the White House, protesting against Jewish influence on the government, and organized simultaneous demonstrations in Atlanta, Georgia, and Louisville, Kentucky. When a synagogue was blown up in Atlanta on 12 October, the police seized Rockwell's supporters there and newspapers around the world carried stories implicating Rockwell. Now he and his family were harassed and his home was attacked; Arrowsmith retreated from the glare of the publicity and withdrew his support.⁷

Rockwell's wife and children soon found the strain too great and returned to Iceland. Deserted by his family and former supporters, Rockwell faced a bleak and solitary future in the early months of 1959. One cold March morning in his house in Arlington, he found himself alone communing with a huge swastika banner and a plaque of Hitler. Following a "religious experience" involving a brief state of universal awareness, he felt he had attained "wisdom." Now he was utterly convinced he had to fulfill Hitler's mission in a total, global victory over the forces of tyranny and oppression. He would henceforth become an overt National Socialist and self-proclaimed devotee of Hitler, abandoning all thought of liaison with conservative groups and respectability.⁸ He proudly displayed his Nazi banner, recruited a handful of storm troopers, to whom he issued gray-shirt uniforms and swastika armbands, mounted an illuminated swastika on the roof of his house, and founded the American Party, later called the American Nazi Party. Besides the party headquarters at his house at 2507 North Franklin Road in Arlington, Rockwell also maintained a barracks in a nearby farmhouse for his growing detachment of storm troopers.

Once Rockwell had decided on a flagrant, open avowal of Nazism, his activity was wholly directed toward the provocation of the Jewish enemy and society at large, which he regarded as its passive victim. Besides the flaunting of Nazi uniforms and insignia, he and his storm troopers missed no opportunity to shock and outrage domestic opinion. From 1960 onward his brash and sensational exploits were designed to achieve maximum press coverage for an otherwise crackpot fringe group. Before curious crowds and eager reporters and surrounded by American and Nazi flags, Rockwell gave speeches advocating a national and then global program of eugenics to purify the Aryan race. He ceaselessly denounced the Jews as representatives of Marxism, unbridled capitalism, racial degeneration, and cultural bolshevism, and demanded their extermination by gassing. Rockwell effectively forced the media to give him publicity by concentrating on the distribution of inflammatory leaflets, creating public incidents, and haranguing crowds to provoke violent opposition. The American Nazi Party also pursued a racist policy toward blacks. In 1961 Rockwell and his storm troopers drove a "Hate Bus" through the southern states. Rejecting all race mixing and desegregation as Jewish wiles to mongrelize the American racial stock, Rockwell proposed to resettle all American blacks in a new African state, to be funded by the U.S. government.

By the time Lincoln Rockwell attended the NSM summer camp in August 1962, he was probably the most notorious neo-Nazi on the contemporary world scene. His intentional clowning tactics had won him international news coverage, in which he could regularly invoke the name of Adolf Hitler, quote Mein Kampf, and pay tribute to the Nazi racial crusade against the Jews and all non-Aryan races. It is possible that Colin Jordan noted his exploits in the United States from 1960 and decided to follow his example after the split with the BNP in April 1962. In any case he was in touch with Rockwell as soon as he had launched the NSM. Having convened this international Nazi conference, Jordan was eager to impress his guest of honor with his own credentials for Nazi world leadership. On Sunday morning Jordan demonstrated the military prowess and efficiency of the British Nazis to his guests by putting the Spearhead unit through its paces. Led by John Tyndall, uniformed NSM members were deployed down the valley and attacked sham strong points, rushed imaginary enemy concentrations, and fought off make-believe counterattacks, while Jordan, Rockwell, and Borth watched the maneuvers through field glasses from high ground.

The climax and real business of the camp took place that afternoon and involved all delegates, including Savitri Devi. A new neo-Nazi International called the World Union of National Socialist (WUNS) was set up under the terms of the Cotswold Agreement, whereby Jordan, Rockwell, and the leaders of the foreign National Socialist parties formed a confederation. The major objectives of the WUNS were defined as follows:

1. To form a monolithic, combat-efficient, international political apparatus to combat and utterly destroy the international Jew-Communist and Zionist apparatus of treason and subversion.
2. To protect and promote the Aryan race and its Western Civilization wherever its members may be on the globe, and whatever their nationality may be.
3. To protect private property and free enterprise from Communist class warfare.

Long-term objectives included the "unity of all white people in a National Socialist world order with complete racial apartheid." While much of this would have been quite acceptable to other right-wing and nationalist groups, paragraph 7 of the twenty-five-paragraph codicil formally established the Nazi credentials of the WUNS: "No organization or individual failing to acknowledge the spiritual leadership of Adolf Hitler and the fact that we are National Socialists shall be admitted to membership." Likewise, the long-term objective, "To find and accomplish a just and final settlement of the Jewish problem," identified the WUNS as a direct heir of Hitler's plans for a Final Solution. Jordan was elected world Führer and Rockwell his deputy and heir by the twenty-seven delegates, who with their respective parties became founding members of the WUNS.

But this rural Nazi idyll could not elude the press and public curiosity for long. The comings and goings at the camp, the military maneuvers of the Spearhead group, the constant shouts of "Sieg Heil!" and the strains of the Horst Wessel Song deep into the night inevitably drew the attention of local inhabitants and members of the press were informed. On Sunday evening Rockwell was quietly smuggled away from the camp and went to stay at Jordan's Coventry home. Meanwhile some reporters had arrived and a Daily Mail photographer, Ann Ward, was struck by an air-gun pellet. She later received an apology from John Tyndall. The press interest became more intense, and on Monday Jordan addressed journalists over a gate at the edge of Guiting Wood. He held up a film showing Rockwell at the camp on Sunday evening and offered it to the highest bidder. He also confirmed that the police had visited the camp that morning but had soon left. However, in the course of the afternoon a Bristol newspaper photographer, Eric Hanson, entered the camp and was set upon by a group of men and his camera was damaged. John Tyndall also held an impromptu meeting by the gateway leading to the camp and fielded questions from a crowd of youths about the uniforms, the flying of the swastika flag, and the liquidation of the Jews in Nazi Germany. Newspaper stories with such enticing headings as "Secret 'Nazi' Camp" and "Jackboots in an English Glade" appeared in The Daily Telegraph.⁹

Although the Cotswold Agreement had now been signed and Rockwell had left, it was intended that the camp should continue through the week. Another couple of delegates were still expected from America, and on the morning of Tuesday, 7 August, Savitri Devi volunteered to travel to London in order to collect them. However, on the same day the camp was plunged into crisis. Angry at the unwelcome publicity, a crowd of some twenty villagers from Guiting Power decided to storm the camp on Tuesday evening. After jeers and catcalls, a shot was fired at the swastika flag flying above the tents. This was quickly hauled down by the Nazis, but the villagers managed to grab it. The fighting lasted for about twenty minutes until police reinforcements arrived and the villagers were persuaded to leave the site. Later on, Superintendent Dennis Blick of Cirencester advised Jordan to close the camp in order to avoid further trouble. Meanwhile, the authorities were concerned about the emerging evidence of the American Nazi leader's presence in Britain. On Tuesday evening the home secretary signed a deportation order on Rockwell and asked the police to find him.¹⁰

Savitri Devi met the American couple at London airport on 8 August. They were concerned to read in that morning's newspapers that the camp had broken up after trouble with the local population and the police were involved. While the Americans decided to stay away, Savitri Devi felt she had no option but to return to collect her suitcase. With mounting anxiety she traveled back by railway to Cheltenham and then by car out to the campsite. Arriving in the early afternoon, she found the camp in turmoil but was able to recover her luggage from a pile of stowed equipment. However, Special Branch officers were present and demanded to see the identification papers of all aliens in the camp. Her Greek passport was examined and a stamp was inserted that she only later discovered barred her from reentry to Britain for a number of years. After returning to London to stay with Muriel Gantry, Savitri Devi was able to keep in touch with the events following the much-publicized Nazi International.

Rockwell and Jordan had talked by telephone with the police from their hideout in Coventry, and Rockwell had decided to give himself up once he had sold his story to the Daily Mail. However, the newspaper informed detectives of Rockwell's intentions and he was arrested near its offices in Holborn on Wednesday evening. Meanwhile, a NSM official, Roland Kerr-Ritchie, announced that a letter from Rockwell requesting an audience with the Queen had been delivered to Buckingham Palace. After being held overnight at Cannon Row police station, Rockwell was deported by a DC-8 airliner on a scheduled flight to Boston on Thursday morning. Halfway up the steps to the aircraft, Rockwell turned and raised his hand in a Hitler salute. Jordan was evidently kept in ignorance of these rapid developments, for he was still seeking legal advice on how to thwart the deportation order on Thursday afternoon.¹¹ Worse was to follow for the British Nazis. Just before 8:00 P.M. on Friday, 10 August, a truck covered with a green tarpaulin drew up outside the NSM headquarters in Princedale Road, whereupon a dozen Special Branch officers raided and searched the building for two hours. No arrests were made, but large quantities of documents, flags, uniforms, and weapons, together with portraits of Hitler and Hess, were seized. Jordan and ten other men were questioned by the police, and three women were also found in the building.¹²

The authorities' clampdown on the NSM effectively removed Colin Jordan from the center of WUNS activities at an early stage following its birth. On 16 August, Jordan, Tyndall, Kerr-Ritchie, and Pirie were charged under the Public Order Act with organizing and equipping a paramilitary force. On 20 August, Savitri Devi attended the magistrates' court at Bow Street, where the NSM leaders were sent to prison for a fortnight for petty offenses. When the main Spearhead trial was held at the Old Bailey in October, the prosecution rested on the more serious charge of the group's self-conscious emulation of the Nazi storm troopers, not least its possession of firearms and materials for making explosives. Jordan was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, Tyndall to six, and their lieutenants to three each. Leadership of the WUNS now passed to Lincoln Rockwell and the American Nazi Party. With its radical Nazi and anti-Semitic program, the WUNS soon succeeded in attracting many members of the Nouvel Ordre Européen (NOE), founded in 1951 at Zurich, into its own ranks. By the beginning of 1964, the WUNS announced that it maintained national sections in France, Germany, Great Britain, Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland, the United States, Argentina, Chile, and Australia. It was also under Rockwell's leadership of the WUNS that Savitri Devi ultimately became a more widely known figure in international neo-Nazi circles.

The initial contact with Colin Jordan's NSM and early involvement in the WUNS greatly extended Savitri Devi's range of contacts and ideological influence. Typical of these was her friendship with Françoise Dior, a wealthy French heiress and neo-Nazi whose sensational and subversive antics during the 1960s regularly guaranteed her newspaper coverage. Born on 7 April 1932, Françoise Dior was the niece of Christian Dior, the famous Parisian couturier. Growing up in France under the German occupation, she became an avid admirer of Hitler's new racial order; one of her sweetest memories was the compliment of an SS-man, "What a beautiful little Aryan girl." Her other abiding interest was pre-Revolutionary France and she believed, like Savitri Devi, that the ideas of 1789—equality, liberty, and fraternity—were nothing more than a cover for the activities of sinister international elites whose aim was national degeneracy. She was initially a fervent Royalist and married Count Robert-Henri de Caumont-la-Force, a scion of one of France's oldest noble families. However, their union was unhappy. Disappointed by traditional aristocracy, Françoise Dior reverted to her juvenile enthusiasm for a racial elite. As a result of the sensational reports of Colin Jordan's Trafalgar Square rally, she traveled to London and became a frequent visitor to the headquarters of the NSM in the summer months of 1962.

Jordan began courting Françoise Dior and introduced her to Savitri Devi, whereupon the two women became close friends in France. When the NSM began to revive after the release of John Tyndall, Denis Pirie, and Roland Kerr-Ritchie in the spring of 1963, Dior again became a fanatical supporter of the British neo-Nazis. Romance also blossomed, and she was successively engaged to Tyndall and then Jordan, following their respective releases from prison. She and Colin Jordan were married on 6 October 1963 in a bizarre ceremony complete with Nazi regalia at 74 Princedale Road. Standing at a candlelit table draped with a swastika flag, the couple swore over a dagger that they were of Aryan descent and exchanged their vows. Each then made a small incision in the ring finger, their two fingers were joined to symbolize the union of the blood, and a drop of their mixed blood was then allowed to fall onto an open page of Mein Kampf. The couple held hands, and Jordan declared the marriage enacted.¹³ The guests gave the Hitler salute and the Horst Wessel Song was played. Savitri Devi was bitterly disappointed that she was unable to be present at the wedding. She had been turned away by the immigration authorities at Dover on one of the several occasions that she tried to reenter Britain following her ban after the Cotswold camp.

Within three months the couple had separated, but they were reconciled once Dior was satisfied that Jordan had demonstrated his powers of leadership in the NSM, which had fallen prey to factionalism. This new split on the far right reflected the causes of the earlier division between the BNP and the NSM. John Tyndall wanted to develop a British form of National Socialism with due emphasis on patriotism, racial pride, and contemporary circumstances. He thought the overt Hitler worship and meticulous imitation of German Nazism so beloved of Jordan attracted ridicule and was a political liability. It is also likely that his humiliation over losing his fiancée to Jordan played a part in the break. In August 1964 Tyndall launched the Greater Britain Movement (GBM) with its own magazine Spearhead and some 130 members. Following their acrimonious rupture, Jordan and Tyndall each courted

Rockwell for his party to be recognized as the British section of the WUNS. But Rockwell instinctively sided with Jordan because Rockwell himself had long advocated brazen Nazism and was suspicious of Tyndall's plan to drop the swastika as a political symbol. After his failure to convince Rockwell, Tyndall cultivated contacts with rival U.S. white supremacist groups such as the National States' Rights Party and the National Socialist White Power Movement.¹⁴

Ever an extremist and the enemy of compromise, Savitri Devi supported the open Hitler cult of Jordan and Rockwell. She greatly regretted that Jordan and Tyndall had fallen out. By 1965, Françoise Dior had become the official WUNS representative in France, which in view of their close friendship, further cemented Savitri Devi's links with Lincoln Rockwell, his deputy Matt Koehl, and the American Nazi Party. Over and above the cause of its sectional European nationalisms, the WUNS was determined to present the racial idealism of National Socialism as a program of global Aryan power to a younger generation of new supporters. When, in the spring of 1966 Rockwell commenced publishing a new WUNS periodical entitled National Socialist World from his headquarters in Arlington, a new forum for her own international brand of Nazi ideology had at long last been created. This magazine was to play a crucial role in promoting Savitri Devi to the worldwide readership of the WUNS.

Rockwell had appointed as the periodical's editor Dr. William L. Pierce, a newcomer to the neo-Nazi movement. Pierce was a physicist by profession who had studied at Rice University and the California Institute of Technology, completed his doctorate at the University of Colorado, and then spent three years teaching at Oregon State University. From the outset National Socialist World cultivated its image and status as the leading international Nazi periodical with long articles and book reviews written for an educated and literate readership, as well as high standards of production. The magazine was intended as a quarterly, with each issue having more than one hundred pages. The first issue comprised a philosophical appraisal of National Socialism by Colin Jordan and an article by Lincoln Rockwell on the value of vulgar Nazi propaganda; pride of place was given to a condensed edition of Savitri Devi's The Lightning and the Sun. Pierce not only had decided to publish her alongside Rockwell and Jordan, the leaders of the WUNS, but had devoted nearly eighty pages of the inaugural issue to her.¹⁵

For Savitri Devi, this publication represented her literary debut in international neo-Nazi circles. Hitherto, her books extolling National Socialism had been published privately in Calcutta and in limited editions. These had then been given or distributed by means of personal contacts in England, France, and Germany, especially through her ODESSA contacts like Hans-Ulrich Rudel and Otto Skorzeny, as well as the numerous sympathizers and Nazi widows she regularly visited in the 1950s. But through Rockwell and Pierce, her ideas about National Socialism as a religion of nature, the Hindu cycle of the ages, and Hitler's world significance as an avatar were brought before a much wider readership in Western Europe, the United States, South America, and Australia. In the third issue, Pierce announced that the magazine had received such an enthusiastic response to its condensed version of The Lightning and the Sun that he had decided to offer its readers more of her writings; there followed excerpts from two chapters of Gold in the Furnace in 1967 and from Defiance in 1968.¹⁶ This new prestige and notoriety can be traced back to her attendance at Colin Jordan's NSM summer camp and her founding membership of the WUNS in August 1962.

It was also during this period that Savitri Devi began to influence Ernst Zündel in the direction of Holocaust denial, for which he has now achieved worldwide notoriety. Born in Germany in 1939, Zündel had emigrated to Canada in 1958 and settled in Toronto. After meeting Adrien Arcand, the elderly prewar French Canadian fascist leader, Zündel became an ardent German nationalist and apologist for Nazism. Savitri Devi first wrote to Zündel, possibly at Arcand's suggestion, in 1961. Her letters and books made a deep and lasting impression on the budding neo-Nazi. Here, at last, he found that eloquent, high-flown praise of Adolf Hitler and the German people that he so earnestly sought. Savitri Devi's extravagant eulogies of National Socialist doctrine, the Nazi Party, and the SS as the vanguard and bastion of a regenerate Aryan race confirmed his sense of national identity and the German world mission. So impressed was Zündel by Savitri Devi's Aryan idealism that he visited her several times at Montbrison in the 1960s and remained in close touch with her until her final years.

At the time of their first meeting Savitri Devi was interested in Holocaust denial, namely, the attempt to whitewash Nazism by questioning the genocide of the Jews. The French fascist Maurice Bardèche (b. 1907) had been the first to take this view in his trenchant critique of the Allied war crimes trials Nuremberg ou la terre promise (1948), which claimed that the genocide of the Jews was mere propaganda. Bardèche's ideas were then taken up by Paul Rassinier (1906–1967), a French socialist who had actually been interned by the Nazis during the occupation in the Buchenwald and Dora camps. Given his left-wing credentials and the fact that he had been a Nazi victim, Rassinier's denial of the genocide was even more attractive to neo-Nazis. The titles of his early books refer to Ulysses's tall stories on his return from legendary lands. That Rassinier was also a vehement anti-Semite was also evident from his writings. He published his denials in Le mensonge d'Ulysse (1950), Ulysse trahi par les siens (1962), La véritable procès Eichmann (1962), and Le drame des juifs européens (1964).¹⁷ The controversy over Rassinier's books in France was at its height during the early 1960s; his views would have instantly appealed to Savitri Devi as a neo-Nazi alibi.

Savitri Devi was the first to suggest to Zündel that the Nazi genocide of the Jews was untrue. Zündel went on to make a career out of Holocaust denial, publishing Thies Christophersen's notorious Auschwitz: Truth or Lie? (1974) and Richard Harwood's Did Six Million Really Die? (1974) in several languages in editions running into many hundreds of thousands. After his initial arraignment in 1983 under an old Canadian statute for publishing falsehoods, Zündel convened the leading theorists of Holocaust denial from across the world as expert witnesses for his appeal trial in 1988. This major revisionist lineup in court consisted of Ditlieb Felderer, Thies Christophersen, Bradley Smith, Mark Weber, Joseph G. Burg, Udo Walendy, Robert Faurisson, and the well-known British historian David Irving. Fred A. Leuchter, an American execution technology specialist, carried out a forensic investigation during the Polish winter on-site at Auschwitz.¹⁸ Thanks to the glare of world media, the existence of these hitherto sectarian neo-Nazi ideas became almost common knowledge. When she relayed this myth of French origin to the young Zündel in the 1960s, Savitri Devi could scarcely have imagined the world audience that he would gain for Holocaust denial through his court cases and appeals by the end of the 1980s.

Throughout the 1960s Savitri Devi continued to reside in France. Between January 1961 and November 1963 she taught in Montbrison and at the same time worked on a new book with the title Hart wie Kruppstahl (Hard as Krupp steel). This phrase recalled Hitler's eulogy of National Socialist youth, and her book was intended as a paean to German militarism. She nearly lost her next post in a school at St. Etienne because of opposition from a local league against anti-Semitism as a result of her pro-Nazi statements in class, which included denying the Holocaust. Between 1965 and 1967 she taught in Firminy, just outside St. Etienne, but continued to live in Montbrison. She usually spent her summer holidays visiting old Nazi comrades in Germany and regularly stayed in Bavaria, often at Berchtesgaden in spiritual proximity to her idol Hitler. In September 1968 she was the focus of another friendly gathering of Nazi sympathizers, this time at Munich. Hans-Ulrich Rudel and his wife, Uschi; John Tyndall, now prominent in the National Front, a new far right party in Britain; and Beryl Cheetham, a former Mosleyite and veteran of the Narford and Cotswold camps, spent a happy reunion dinner with Savitri Devi. She later traveled with John Tyndall and Miss Cheetham to the Austrian border for a rendezvous with Fred Borth. Since 1963 he had become involved with pro-German terrorists fighting in South Tyrol (an Austrian province with a German-speaking majority ceded to Italy in 1919) and was now wanted by the German police.

In 1969 a job in Ireland beckoned, but again she was frustrated by the British ban on her entry, and she traveled on to Greece, where she took a small job and gave some private lessons. Since 1968 she had been working on a book of her reflections and memoirs in the French language, and in October 1970 she accepted an invitation from her old friend Françoise Dior to stay and write at her home in Ducey in Normandy. Dior had divorced Colin Jordan in October 1967. Her stormy career in the 1960s included a number of anti-Semitic incidents in London, culminating in her being sentenced in January 1968 at the Old Bailey to eighteen months in Holloway prison for conspiring to commit arson on synagogues. While "inside" she enjoyed the nickname of "Nazi Nell" among fellow inmates.

Savitri Devi had now passed her sixty-fifth birthday and had no further prospect of earning her living in French state schools. However, she had built up a small pension entitlement from the past nine years' service, and the question arose as to where she should now spend her retirement and continue writing on such slender means. The cost of living was very high in France, Britain was closed to her, and despite her well-wishers in America, she had no prospects of an U.S. residence permit. A return to India had much to commend it. She had spent many years in the country and enjoyed its ambience. She still had the friendship of her husband, who now lived in Delhi, even if they had long lived separate lives. A number of supporters provided her airfare, and on 23 June 1971 Savitri Devi flew from Paris to Bombay. She arrived in Delhi in August and stayed for a while in the guest rooms of the Hindu Mahasabha office, completing the manuscript of Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne, an intellectual autobiography combined with her final statement of Aryan racist religion.

Once she and her husband had found a new home in Delhi, she resumed writing, returning as ever to the racial basis of history and her abiding obsession with the Jews. A new book in French, entitled Ironies et paradoxes dans l'histoire et la légende, was begun. This was an anthology of historical curiosities, including the strongly Christian upbringing of Josef Goebbels, against which he had rebelled. But the book was chiefly concerned with the apparent paradoxes of Jewish history. These included the Jews' acquisition of banking skills from the Aryan Kassite dynasty during the period of their Babylonian exile under Nebuchadnezzar. But for the destruction of the second Temple by Titus (A.D. 70) and the dispersal of the Jews by Hadrian (A.D. 135), she was certain that the Jews would have been overwhelmed by Islam in the seventh century. By this time, however, they had been dispersed in comparative safety around the Mediterranean and in the Germanic world, and so Europe inherited the "Jewish Question." Although physically remote, she still busily corresponded with Colin Jordan, Matt Koehl, Ernst Zündel, and others around the world. It was in this fashion that her ideas were passed on to a new generation of mystical neo-Nazis from the late 1970s into the 1990s.

12

LAST YEARS AND LEGACY

Nazis, Greens, and the New Age

Once again Savitri Devi lived in the tropical world of faraway India. This was the country to which she had first traveled in search of the Aryan race in 1932 and where she had remained, throughout all her hopes of the Third Reich, until 1945. Now she had returned as a sixty-six-year-old pensioner. New Delhi was planned by Sir Edwin Lutyens when the British moved their imperial capital from Calcutta to the northern plain in 1911. This spacious and gracious city of modern palaces, extensive parks, and broad avenues still bristled with old forts, towers, mosques, and temples recalling India's legends, gods, and dynasties. She and her husband first lived in New Delhi in a small apartment on South Extension Park One until 1973, when they moved to similar accommodation at C-23 on South Extension Park Two. This crowded suburb lay five miles south of the old walled city but within walking distance of the diplomatic enclave. Such meager income as they enjoyed was derived from her French pension and earnings as a teacher at a French school until the summer of 1977. After a period of illness, her husband died on 21 March 1977. From Delhi, Savitri Devi continued to follow the fortunes of neo-Nazi groups and parties in Europe and America and conducted a busy correspondence with her die hard comrades scattered around the world. Through these links she maintained her continuing influence and reputation in the international Nazi movement. But there is more. Her association with Hinduism and oriental religions, her biocentric view of nature and fanatical concern with animal welfare have offered present-day Nazis the opportunity to disguise their entry into the occult, Green, and New Age movements.

From Toronto Ernst Zündel wrote to her proposing a new edition of her books and outlining his plans to record an extensive interview with her. Since the early 1970s his neo-Nazi publishing house Samisdat had been issuing tracts on Holocaust denial, including Thies Christophersen's Auschwitz: Truth or Lie? (1974), which was a runaway success among anti-Zionists, the far right, and German patriots in the United States. It also had made money for Zündel and established Samisdat as a flourishing underground Nazi publishing concern. By the summer of 1979, more than 100,000 copies of the book in five languages had been sold. At this time Zündel was also pandering to the market for mysteries and occultism with books on Nazi UFOs that were based at secret German postwar bases in Antarctica. Willibald Mattern, a German émigré in Santiago de Chile, had spun a powerful tale of Nazi resurgence. His book, UFOs: Unbekanntes Flugobjekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe des Dritten Reiches (UFOs: Unidentified flying object? Last secret weapon of the Third Reich) (1974), described how thousands of Nazi UFOs will one day fly forth from the South Pole to restore German world power against a scenario of increasing racial chaos and economic catastrophe in a final act of deliverance.¹

Mattern's work was a resounding underground success in West Germany, linking the market for mysteries and extraterrestrial visitations with millenarian myths of German salvation. Zündel lost no time in publishing an abridged English-language version, which introduced yet more occult speculations. Did the Nazis in Antarctica gain access to the "Inner Earth," long ago described in Nordic legends and sagas and assiduously cultivated by the Thule Society? Had the Nazis discovered long-hidden secrets on their expeditions to the Himalayas and Tibet? Perhaps extraterrestrials from other galaxies had assisted the Germans with the saucer projects, having recognized their receptiveness to the new technology. Perhaps this collaboration was based on some shared ancestral kinship. Zündel recalled Reinhold Schmidt's account of a "Saturnian" spacecraft, whose crew spoke German and behaved like German soldiers, and speculated whether the German nation was indeed a colony of Saturn, long since settled on Earth. Why were the Germans so "different"? Could this explain why the Germans always excel as soldiers, engineers, and technologists? Was Hitler planted on this planet to pull back Western civilization from the brink of degenerate self-extinction?²

Besides the Mattern book, Samisdat also published Zündel's own books on the German Antarctic theme, Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions

(1978) and Hitler am Südpol? (1979). In the former, Zündel dilated on the enigma of extensive German wartime activity involving bases, mountain troops, and U-boat patrols within the Arctic Circle. He asked whether there was a shortcut from the Arctic to Antarctica. Had the Nazi expeditions discovered a more direct way to Antarctica via Greenland, Spitzbergen, or the North Pole? "Only time will tell us what is really up there or down there, or should we say, IN there?"³ Further titles in the planning stage on the secrets of the poles included The C.I.A.-U.F.O. Cover-Up, The Antarctica Theory, and The Last Battalion. In 1978 Zündel sent out a large mailing to readers in North America and West Germany, advertising a proposed Samisdat Hollow Earth Expedition to Antarctica on a specially chartered Boeing 747 to search for Nazi UFO bases and the entrances to the Inner World. The idea of Nazi UFOs caught on fast. The British author W. A. Harbinson wrote a best-selling novel Genesis (1980) on the theme, which was reprinted five times in three years. Harbinson has since expanded this novel into a tetralogy, Projekt Saucer (1991–1995), and also published a nonfiction study, Projekt UFO: The Case for Man-Made Flying Saucers (1995). Several heavily documented studies about the Nazi UFOs were published by Hugin, a neo-Nazi research group in the Ruhr.⁴

The mystical ideas of Savitri Devi, the aged Aryan Hindu prophetess, now fitted well into Samisdat's publishing program. Her identification of Hitler as an avatar, her celebration of ancient Vedic texts as Aryan-Nazi scripture, the whole mythological and devotional cast of her thought concerning her beloved Führer and the Third Reich were a perfect complement to Mattern's Hitler-survival myths and Nazi UFO apocalyptic. Ernst Zündel decided to relaunch Savitri Devi with a new illustrated Samisdat edition of The Lightning and the Sun (1979), the result of her lifelong meditations on history and religion. In a short preface, he remembered the privilege and pleasure of meeting the prophetic and talented Aryan writer years before in southern France. She was, he recalled, a true revelation and a source of many mysteries to him, the embodiment of ancient Aryan India, the repository of the Aryan racial memory. Her gifts of psychic vision and insight had enabled her to express better than anyone else the meaning of Adolf Hitler and National Socialism, not only for Germany, or even for the white race, but for all mankind. "The name, Savitri Devi, will be remembered in White History as one of the truly great names of Our Race, when our history is once again written by White historians."⁵

Besides giving details of a further six Savitri Devi titles, an appendix announced an appeal to raise funds to republish Pilgrimage.

Zündel also produced a set of five two-hour audiocassettes recording extended interviews with Savitri Devi to coincide with the publication of the book. Already in November 1978 he had arranged for a German agent to fly from Frankfurt am Main to Delhi to conduct taped interviews with his old mentor from the 1960s. "Discovered alive in India: Hitler's guru!" read one of his sales flyers, and it was indeed a strange experience to hear the harsh, self-confident voice of Savitri Devi speaking clearly amid the raucous, bustling squalor and street sounds of distant India. For ten hours she related the story of her youth in France and her mission to India in the 1930s. The excitement of her propaganda tours in occupied Germany, arrest and imprisonment, and contacts with the neo-Nazis in the 1960s completed the chronicle of her Aryan pagan mission across the decades. It was another Samisdat masterstroke of surprise and publicity, precisely because Savitri Devi was such a strange and exotic veteran of the Nazi movement. Just how many neo-Nazi sympathizers knew what had become of her since her WUNS days in the mid-1960s? Even if Zündel could not find Hitler in Antarctica, he had produced his forgotten priestess in a fabulous and faraway country.

But Savitri Devi had remained in regular contact with the Anglo-American leaders of the neo-Nazi movement. Matt Koehl, who had become leader of the National Socialist White People's Party (NSWPP) and the WUNS in 1967 after Rockwell's assassination, was making his movement into a full-blown Hitler cult and had a particular affinity for Savitri Devi. For him, Nazi ideology was a creed and a new faith that would lead to an upheaval of unprecedented magnitude.⁶ Besides his periodicals White Power, The National Socialist, and NS Bulletin, Koehl promoted a variety of books by Hitler, Alfred Rosenberg, Rudolf Hess, and Colin Jordan, and Savitri Devi's Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne to his international WUNS mailing list. His books, The Future Calls (1972) and Faith of the Future (1995), set forth the "racial idealism" of modern Hitlerism, regularly invoking religious mythology and symbolism. On the occasion of Hitler's birthday in April 1987, he recalled the words of the Bhagavad Gita, that "ancient book of Aryan wisdom and insight" according to Savitri Devi: "Age after age, when justice is crushed, when evil reigns supreme, I come; again am I born on Earth to save the world." Mingling Hindu, pagan, and Christian motifs, Koehl ruminated on nature's eternal message of renewal and resurrection.⁷

William Pierce's publication of her writings in Nationalist Socialist World (1966–1968) had brought her new admirers in the United States like the violent Nazi fanatic James N. Mason. Born in 1952, Mason spent an alienated youth in Ohio before joining Rockwell's Nazis in 1966. By 1968 he had a full-time job in the Arlington headquarters. When the party split into various factions in 1970, Mason initially remained loyal to Koehl's NSWPP but later rejected the mass strategy of electioneering in favor of subversive terrorism. His inspiration was Joseph Tommasi (b. 1951), a young leader of the NSWPP in southern California who had founded the National Socialist Liberation Front (NSLF) in 1974. Aping the militant left, Tommasi called for a guerrilla war with racial killings and direct attacks on "the Jewish power structure" of the United States. The NSLF maintained overseas links with the extremist British Movement in England. The NSLF's advocacy of armed struggle would not be matched for a decade in the United States until the terrorist outrages of The Order in the mid-1980s, based on William Pierce's novel about a global white revolution, The Turner Diaries (1978). In 1980, Mason revived the NSLF (lapsed after Tommasi's assassination in 1975) as a forerunner of new militant American white-supremacist movements committed to armed struggle against the so-called Zionist Occupation Government.⁸

Mason now relaunched the NSLF journal Siege, in which he preached violence, racial strife, and an all-out war against the hated "system." In his quest for extremist mentors, Mason next became obsessed with Charles Manson (b. 1934), the notorious psychopathic killer serving life imprisonment for conspiracy in the murders of the actress Sharon Tate and others in 1969. By the late 1970s Manson had begun to assume an underground cult status as the supreme outlaw who had taken direct action against a corrupt society. He claimed the "system" was killing the world: human survival depended on a simple ecological philosophy based on air, trees, water, and animals. Meanwhile he had carved a swastika on his forehead as a badge of his renegade spirit. By 1982 James Mason had adopted Manson as the spiritual leader of his new Nazi group, the Universal Order (the name came from Manson), and its campaign of destruction against the alleged insanity of liberal American society. The Universal Order's insistence on the balance of nature coupled with a call for apocalyptic violence against a rotten mankind bears an uncanny resemblance to the sentiments of Savitri Devi. In the pages of Siege Mason paid extravagant tribute to Hitler, Tommasi, Manson, and Savitri Devi.⁹

But Savitri Devi also had her admirers in Britain. Her old friend John Tyndall was meanwhile a prominent leader of the National Front (NF) in England. Founded in 1967 as an alliance of racial populist parties, the new party experienced electoral surges as a result of immigration scares involving the Ugandan Asians (1972) and Malawi Asians (1976). Until its decline after the 1979 general election, the NF threatened to become the third party in British politics.¹⁰ Savitri Devi was excited by this prospect, but her favorite contact in England remained the hard-core Nazi Colin Jordan.

In 1968 Jordan had reorganized the National Socialist Movement as the British Movement (BM) and recruited street toughs, skinheads, and soccer hooligans from the ranks of alienated white urban youth as shock troops for racial attacks on immigrants. During the 1970s the BM was at the forefront of terrorist efforts to provoke a color war in Britain, destabilize the state, and prepare the way for a neo-Nazi coup. Scorning the NF's parliamentary ambition, the BM reflected Jordan's long-standing obsession with Hitler and National Socialism, backed by a violent private militia. Through all the splits on the British Nazi scene, Savitri Devi had always followed Jordan's extreme lead. Jordan still recalled her memory years after her death. On the hundredth anniversary of Hitler's birth, Jordan used her terminology and wrote "The Man against Time" in a commemorative article for Matt Koehl's NS Bulletin.¹¹

Jordan retained his admiration for Savitri Devi and often recommended her writings to his more literate BM members. One of his young bodyguards, David Myatt (b. 1952), was so enthused by the eulogy of Nazi values in The Lightning and the Sun that he recalled its impact in an interview more than twenty years later.¹² A violent neo-Nazi activist, Myatt started his own National Democratic Freedom Movement in 1974 and was twice imprisoned for public order offenses in the 1970s. He meanwhile embraced satanism as an extreme expression of Nazi paganism and was involved in Jordan's "Vanguard Project" to create Nazi rural communes in the mid-1980s. Since the early 1990s Myatt has reemerged as the publicist of an "Aryan religion" that owes much to the idealized Hitlerism of Savitri Devi. His Nazi sect Reichsfolk acts as a cadre of the current British neo-Nazi scene, which now imitates American terrorist models and calls for a white racial enclave in East Anglia. Myatt and his Nazi satanic group, the Order of Nine Angles, are close to a similar cult in New Zealand, the Ordo Sinistra Vivendi, whose leader Kerry Bolton has published a condensed edition of The Lightning and the Sun (1994), promoting it alongside an interview with James Mason.¹³

Following Zündel's new publicity, Savitri Devi even received visits in Delhi from young neo-Nazi pilgrims. One of these was Christian Bouchet from France. Born in 1955 into a radical-right family with strong Vichy and OAS links, Bouchet had been involved in monarchist, fascist, and nationalist groups since his early teenage years. During the 1970s he was a member of the Organization Lutte du Peuple and the Groupes Nationalistes Révolutionnaires. Through the mystical fascist writings of Julius Evola (1898–1974), he discovered tantricism and Shivaism and visited India three times, staying for a year. During this time he sought out Savitri Devi to learn more about the Kali Yuga and the Hitler avatar. In 1991, Bouchet founded Nouvelle Résistance, a new revolutionary nationalist movement, and the European Liberation Front, which revives the ideas of Francis Parker Yockey for a fascist continental bloc. He now busily liaises with Libyan nationalists and Mexican national revolutionaries, while his magazine Lutte du Peuple promotes the idea of an alliance between Third Way movements in Britain, Spain, Italy, Germany, and Russia. He has issued editions of Savitri Devi, Yockey, Gabriele D'Annunzio, Jean-François Thiriart, Louis Auguste Blanqui, José Antonio Primo de Rivera, Pierre Drieu La Rochelle, and Robert Brasillach. Bouchet is also involved in magic, fringe masonry, and gnosticism. He publishes an esoteric journal, Thelema, and his imprint carries titles by Aleister Crowley and his followers, Jack Parsons, Frater Achad, and Austin Osman Spare.¹⁴

A regular correspondent from Germany was Lotte Asmus of Sylt in Schleswig-Holstein. Her family had been dedicated Nazi supporters during the Third Reich, and she had been a keen member of the Bund Deutscher Mädel during the 1930s. At some stage in the late 1970s she had discovered the books of Savitri Devi and begun writing to her. Lotte Asmus was married to a retired Italian headmaster and had good links to neofascist circles in Italy because she and her husband spent part of the year at Terracina near Rome. She proposed to translate Savitri Devi into German and sought a publisher. Her first choice for translation, Gold in the Furnace, recalled her own postwar impressions of defeated Germany and its privations. In 1982, Edizioni di Ar published Asmus's German-language edition of Savitri Devi's Gold in the Furnace in its "Sturm" series. Its narrative is suffused by her glowing account of the unbroken Nazi spirit of the various individuals she befriended and their undimmed enthusiasm for Hitler and the Third Reich. The book was distributed in Germany by Thies Christophersen's Kritik-Verlag in Mohrkirch in Schleswig-Holstein. The text made a strong propaganda offering to a new generation of young German neo-Nazis looking for new ideological tools to glorify the Nazi past.

Savitri Devi's publication by Edizioni di Ar marked her arrival as a author in the Italian neofascist scene, renowned for both its terrorism and intellectual following. Franco Freda, the notorious Italian neofascist finally tried in 1978 for his part in the bombings of 1969, originally founded Edizioni di Ar in Padua in 1964. Its list includes memoirs by Léon Degrelle, Goebbels, and the French fascist Drieu La Rochelle; a three-volume work by Hitler entitled Idee sul destino del mondo; and new critical editions of works by such conservative revolutionaries as Julius Evola, Oswald Spengler, Werner Sombart, and Othmar Spann. The imprint consciously cultivates the idea of a pagan Aryan heritage through the Romans and the European peoples with artwork showing prehistoric artifacts of Indo-European origin. Edizioni di Ar also publishes an annual review, Risguardo (1980–), which contains articles on the ancient Aryans, the New Europe, and Third Position. Its fourth volume carried an article by Lotte Asmus and Vittorio De Cecco devoted to Savitri Devi as the "missionary of Aryan paganism," with a review of her life, works, and influence.²⁵

Savitri Devi's work had already appeared in Italian translation with the publication of L'India e il Nazismo by Edizioni all'insegna del Veltro of Parma in 1979. The publisher, Claudio Mutti, is a prominent member of the Italian far right. Formerly a lecturer in East European languages at Padua University, he had edited an edition of Julius Evola's L'autenticità dei Protocolli provata dalla tradizione ebraica (The authenticity of the Protocols as proven by the Hebrew tradition) for Edizioni di Ar in 1976. He also published a new edition of the Protocols with his own introductory essay entitled "Hebrews and Hebrewdom." An admirer of Islamic fundamentalism and Franco Freda's brand of armed right-wing terrorism to provoke revolution, Mutti styles himself a "Nazi Maoist." His own imprint, Veltro, offers a wide range of books on symbolism, tradition, golden-age myths, paganism, and Islam, together with works by Nazis and fascists, including Horia Sima, Corneliu Codreanu, and Robert Brasillach, and Holocaust denial texts. Steeped in the antimodernist sentiment of Julius Evola, Mutti is drawn to the works of the Traditionalists René Guénon and Frithof Schuon as a negation of the secular world.

As a Muslim convert and Third Positionist, Mutti combines anti-Semitism with virulent anti-Westernism, mirrored in his editions of Rûhollâh and Imâm Khomeyni, and the Iranian Mujâhidîn and its declaration of a holy war against the infidels. In his introduction to Savitri Devi's L'India e il Nazismo, a translation of the tenth chapter of her Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (1976), Mutti claims that while "the spiritual dimension of Nazism has been ignored in the West, it is intuitively understood by those traditional peoples of India, North Africa, Japan, and Afghanistan who have a concept of holy war." He suggests that Savitri Devi's "Hitlerian esotericism" throws new light on the Hindu regard for Hitler as an avatar of Vishnu, and sees a similar motive in his honorific title hâjj (pilgrim) among Muslims. Mutti mentions Hitler's own recognition of his providential status among non-European peoples ("Already Arabs and Moroccans are mingling my name with their prayers," Hitler's Table Talk, 12/13 January 1942). Mutti wholeheartedly agrees with Savitri Devi's conception of Hitler as a "Universal Restorer" of a pristine order akin to the Kalki avatar or the Mâhdi.¹⁶ By this means Claudio Mutti assimilates Savitri Devi into his own neofascist war against the profane West. It is perhaps noteworthy that Mutti first encountered Savitri Devi through reading the fervent prose of Pilgrimage as an idealistic teenager.

Further Italian translations of her work have been published in Arya, an émigré neofascist journal published by Vittorio De Cecco in Montreal.¹⁷ De Cecco was a former member of Unità Italica, a Canadian section of the far-right Italian terrorist group Ordine Nuovo (New Order). This organization was founded in the early 1960s by Pino Rauti, formerly of the fascist MSI party, and led by Stefano delle Chiaie, who was responsible for many ultraright bombings intended to create a state of tension propitious for a military coup in the early 1970s. The Canadian section was active as an émigré support group from 1964 to 1971. Graduating to the philosophical sources of Italian terrorism, De Cecco founded a Canadian affiliate of the Centro Studi Evoliani (Genoa) in 1976 to promote Evola studies in Montreal. But De Cecco soon broadened his brief to embrace an outspoken neo-Nazism and began publishing Arya to reflect this political line. The articles on Savitri Devi were duly characteristic of his attempts to popularize a pan-Aryan universal Nazism among Italian émigrés (and terrorist fugitives) in North America.

Savitri Devi has also become known in the Spanish-speaking world. Through the WUNS she came into contact with Franz Pfeiffer, a German Nazi who had fled to Chile after the war. In 1963 he had founded the Partido Nacional Socialista Obrero Chileno (National Socialist Chilean Workers' Party), which joined the WUNS. During the Allende era, Pfeiffer edited a clandestine fascist newsletter, and after the 1973 coup he published a monthly journal. He too corresponded with Savitri Devi and received copies of her books for publicity in his journal. It is most probable that Miguel Serrano, the retired Chilean diplomat and author of several devotional books on Hitler, first encountered her work through his fellow fascist and countryman Franz Pfeiffer. Serrano's own occult brand of neo-Nazism presents a heady brew of ancient Teutonic mysteries, Hinduism and yoga, Jungianism, Gnosticism, and the Western esoteric tradition. He also adopts Savitri Devi's idea of Hitler as the divine avatar of the Aryan race. This unique constellation has led to the introduction of Nazi mysticism among occult and New Age groups.

Born in 1917, Serrano had already joined the Chilean Nazi Party in 1939 and edited a pro-Axis periodical La Nueva Edad (The new age) in Santiago during the early war years. He subsequently entered the diplomatic service as Chilean ambassador in India (1953–1962), Yugoslavia (1962–1964), and Austria (1964–1970). During this time he acquired an international reputation as a poet and mystical writer and formed friendships with Hermann Hesse and Carl Gustav Jung. Following his summary dismissal in 1971 by the new Marxist government in Chile, Serrano reverted to his fascist past and articulated a new cult of "Esoteric Hitlerism." While living as an exile in Switzerland, he wrote El Cordón Dorado: Hitlerismo Esotérico (The golden band: Esoteric Hitlerism) (1978), which presented a convoluted Nazi mythology involving the Knights Templar, the Cathars, the Holy Grail, and the Rosicrucians. The trilogy was completed by Adolf Hitler, el Último Avatāra (Adolf Hitler, the last avatar) (1984) and Manú: "Por el hombre que vendra" (Manu: "For the man who will come") (1991). During the 1970s Serrano befriended many old Nazis in Europe, including Léon Degrelle, Otto Skorzeny, Hans-Ulrich Rudel, and Hanna Reitsch, the famous aviatrix. He visited Julius Evola in Rome and Herman Wirth, the aged former director of Himmler's Ahnenerbe, in West Germany. He also knew the former French Waffen-SS man and author, Saint Loup, whose novels about the "Nazi mysteries" had given him much inspiration.

Serrano's neo-Nazi mythology may be traced to his wartime enthusiasm for Hitler, anti-Semitism, and initiation into a Chilean esoteric order practicing yoga, tantricism, and a Nietzschean will to power. He elaborates a Gnostic doctrine describing the celestial origin of the Aryans, the bearers of divine light, and a global conspiracy against them by the evil demiurge, the regent of our planet and all base matter, personified by the Jews. Serrano claims that Hitler was an avatar, an archetypal eruption of the Aryan racial unconscious against the reign of the demiurge and his minions. He took this idea from Carl Gustav Jung's notion of the collective unconscious as a store of ancestral racial memory. Serrano well understood how Jung's ideas owed much to his interest in Mithraism and other supposed Aryan cults, gleaned from Theosophy and the occult-völkisch milieu of the early 1900s.¹⁸ Serrano's Aryo-Nordicist inspiration is plainly evident in his assimilation of the Aryans' polar home, Sanskrit terminology, and yoga. Meditation, mudras, and mantras are supposed to repurify the blood to its former quality of divine light, transforming the Aryan into a god-man. For instance, Serrano interprets the Hitler salute as a mudra for drawing cosmic energy into the chakras, the subtle energy centers of kundalini yoga.¹⁹

Although he gave the Hitler avatar a Gnostic-Jungian slant, Serrano had evidently immersed himself in Hindu mythology and Savitri Devi's The Lightning and the Sun. Like her, Serrano also identified Hitler as an avatar of the gods Vishnu, Shiva, or Wotan, come to lead the heroic Aryans back to their long-lost divinity.²⁰ Serrano paid frequent tribute to Savitri Devi and has twice published an account of her own visit to the Externsteine and ritual death and reawakening in the Tomb Rock. He described her "as the greatest fighter after Adolf Hitler, Rudolf Hess, and Josef Goebbels . . . the first to discover the secret and spiritual power behind Hitlerism." He noted her belief in the incompatibility of Nazism and Christianity, predicting that posterity would revere her as a pioneer of "Esoteric Hitlerism" and "the priestess of Odin."²¹ Serrano combined his thoughts on the Hitler avatar with Nazi UFO myths. He claimed that Hitler had escaped from the Berlin bunker and remained some years at a secret base in Antarctica before his translation to Venus and thence to the Black Sun, the original home of the extraterrestrial Aryans before their Gnostic descent into time, space, and matter.²²

By early 1980, Savitri Devi was regularly corresponding with Miguel Serrano, who had returned from Switzerland to Chile after Allende's fall. She expressed great interest in his "Esoteric Hitlerism" but worried about Serrano's disagreement with Manfred Roeder, with whom she also corresponded, about the Russian potential for neofascism and made a plea for good relations within the embattled neo-Nazi camp. Most of her long letters revolved around the themes of her books, such as the coming of the last avatar (Hitler now being accounted the last but one) and England's betrayal of Hitler's peace plan. As retribution, she prophesied that England would disappear within three hundred years in a chaos of racial confusion and vice. She also sent Serrano her martial poem "And Time Rolls on," a bitter postwar memoir of her grief at the defeat of the Third Reich, which ends with the refrain "Faithful when all become unfaithful—while we never forget, never forgive." Serrano praised her extravagantly as a warrior and thanked the gods that he knew about her. It was, he considered, a privilege to have lived at the same time as her and their Führer.²³

Serrano's Esoteric Hitlerism trilogy was originally published in Chile, Colombia, and Spain, but there is evidence that his ideas have now begun to percolate through the rest of world. A German translation of El Cordón Dorado; Hitlerismo Esotérico was published in 1987 by Richard Schepmann's Teut-Verlag in Wetter, West Germany, which specializes in reprints from the SS Ahnenerbe's Nordland press and dossiers on Nazi UFOs. Serrano was the subject of long in-depth illustrated interviews in the Spanish neofascist journal Cedade and the Greek far-right magazine TO ANTIΔOTO.²⁴ More recently, he has been featured in the underground literature of the Black Order, a small international neo-Nazi organization with lodges in Britain, the United States, Italy, Sweden, Australia, and New Zealand. The Black Order combines Hitlerite mythology with Nazi satanism in a Nordic pagan denial of the Christian roots of Western civilization.²⁵

Serrano's mystical neo-Nazism and references to Savitri Devi have a distinct appeal to the younger generation. Here Nazism becomes a pop mythology, severed from the historic context of the Third Reich. The Gnostic Cathars, Rosicrucian mysteries, Hindu avatars, and extraterrestrial gods add a sensational and occult appeal to powerful myths of elitism, planetary destiny, and the cosmic conspiracy of the Jews that culminate in a global, racist ideology of white supremacy. In interviews Serrano seeks to engage a younger audience by juxtaposing his magical vision of National Socialism with a corrupt, saturated image of modern liberalism, a contrasting that appeals to Green and New Age audiences. Using heroic and epic metaphors, Serrano opposes the mystique of archetypes, ancient Aryan gods, and lost continents to the Jewish "black magic" of money, computerization, nuclear power, and ecological degradation.²⁶ His numerous references to Savitri Devi have fostered interest in her work as a precursor of his, and a new edition of The Lightning and the Sun was published by Renaissance Press for the Black Order in 1994. Books by Serrano and Savitri Devi are now circulating among neopagans, satanists, skinheads, and Nazi metal music fans in the United States, Scandinavia, and Western Europe.²⁷

By the time of her taped interviews for Zündel's Samisdat in November 1978, Savitri Devi was already suffering from one cataract and her eyesight deteriorated further over the following year. Myriam Hirn, a middle-aged clerk from the French embassy, befriended her and looked after her with regular house visits. By early 1981 Savitri Devi had cataracts in both eyes and underwent an operation that left her nearly blind. Following a stroke, she suffered partial paralysis of her right leg and hand. Myriam Hirn now read her mail aloud to her and also wrote on her behalf to Serrano and other correspondents. However, her powers of recovery were not to be underestimated and she rallied. In the meantime, Zündel's publicity and appeals for charity had led to several offers of financial help and health care. Encouraged by this response, Savitri Devi decided to leave India and travel once again to Germany, her land of hope for an Aryan revival.

With the aid of friends, Savitri Devi was able to return to Germany in October 1981 and first stayed at a Bavarian home for the elderly. She moved on to stay with Frau Elisabeth Ettmayr, an old friend who lived in Traunstein near the Chiemsee in Upper Bavaria. It was at this time that she first met Lotte Asmus, who traveled to Prien on the Chiemsee to visit her. There were also other contacts in Munich. Later, in the spring of 1982, Savitri Devi lived at an old people's home in Alix near Lozanne (Rhône) in France but she soon wanted to be on the move again. In late June she returned to Germany, staying for more than a month with Georg Schrader and his wife in Steinen near Lör-rach. In August she returned with the Schraders to Frau Ettmayr, and together they visited Hans-Ulrich Rudel in Kufstein just over the Austrian border. She had not seen her hero Rudel since the late 1960s when visiting Bavaria during school holidays; it was to see such old Nazi comrades that she had wished to return to Germany.

It was however evident to all concerned that Savitri Devi was stranded in Europe with scant means of support. Rudel generously offered to pay for Savitri Devi's return flight to India but she seemed in no hurry to leave. Frau Schrader's impression is that she intended to return to India in due course but was excited at the prospect of revisiting more old contacts. After another short stay in Traunstein, she visited friends in Munich, and then traveled on to France. While staying with friends in Nantes, word came from Matt Koehl in Arlington, Virginia, that a visa and funds were available for her to travel and stay in the United States. He had arranged for her to address American racist and Nazi groups in seven or eight cities. Savitri Devi was immensely proud of this invitation and quickly accepted Koehl's offer. Although half blind and lame, unable to read and write, she took the view that she could still lecture. Despite her acute infirmity, Savitri Devi saw this trip as a fitting finale of her lifelong Nazi witness and secretly indulged thoughts of martyrdom at the hands of a Jewish or Negro assassin. In the meantime, she made a stopover in England, to visit her oldest friend, Muriel Gantry.

On Sunday, 17 October 1982, Savitri Devi arrived by taxi from London's Victoria station at Moira Cottage, Muriel Gantry's cozy small home in the sleepy Essex village of Sible Hedingham. It was an expensive fare, but Miss Gantry had already been alerted to her impending arrival by the police, who still kept a watchful eye on Savitri Devi's entries to Britain. Although the two elderly women had not met since the 1960s, they had regularly kept in touch by letter. Their friendship extended back to London in 1946 when a common enthusiasm for Akhnaton and ancient Egypt had brought them together. It was perhaps one of Savitri Devi's few nonpolitical friendships, for Miss Gantry had no time for Hitler or National Socialism. Muriel Gantry had visited Savitri Devi and her mother at Lyons in autumn 1950 and twice traveled to stay with her in Athens, in February 1953 and again in the summer of 1961. The two women spent the next couple of days happily sharing reminiscences before an roaring coal fire. Savitri Devi was eagerly anticipating her visit to the United States and even hoped to see Japan on the return leg of her journey to India.

But Savitri was unwell. Wearing only a thin white sari, she looked fragile in the English autumn weather. At noon on Thursday she was complaining of fever. Miss Gantry called a doctor, who thought the problem was mainly due to recent changes in diet and water supply. Later that night, just after midnight, Muriel Gantry heard Savitri Devi breathing heavily and shortly afterward found her dead in her bed in the front room of the cottage. It was 12:25 A.M. on Friday, 22 October. The doctor recorded the causes of death as myocardial infarction and coronary thrombosis. After a long delay, occasioned by fruitless police inquiries after next of kin, official permission was granted for her cremation. As Muriel Gantry began to make the arrangements, she received a visit from Tony Williams, a wealthy young supporter of Nazi causes, who was acting on Colin Jordan's behalf. He provided money and later attended the simple funeral ceremony with two fellow Nazis, all three dramatically dressed in black. On 7 December 1982 at Colchester crematorium, Miss Gantry read her own tribute to her friend while the press cameras popped and flashed. Savitri Devi's simple floral wreath was decorated with a Man-rune, the sign of life; the inverse Yr-rune (death) commonly marked SS graves in the war.²⁸

By an odd irony of fate, Savitri Devi's mortal remains continued their journey around the world. The great finale took place in the United States. By a prior arrangement, Muriel Gantry sent an inscribed urn containing Savitri Devi's ashes to Matt Koehl, who placed them in his Nazi hall of honor at Arlington, purportedly next to those of Lincoln Rockwell. To mark this occasion Koehl held a formal New Order memorial service replete with memorabilia and Nazi bathos. Pious tributes by leading American comrades were interspersed with rousing music from the Third Reich. Behind the funerary urn hung the black, white, and red colors of a gigantic swastika banner, while a picture of Savitri Devi was draped with a funeral sash said to have belonged to Adolf Hitler. A report of the proceedings in Koehl's NS Bulletin stated that "[her] extraordinary loyalty and devotion to our cause has earned her a place for all time in the pantheon of National Socialist heroes and heroines."²⁹ Thus did Savitri Devi, the nomadic Nazi and Hitler worshiper, enter the Valhalla of the former American Nazi Party.

Savitri Devi's influence on international neo-Nazism and other hybrid strains of mystical fascism has been continuous since the mid-1960s and beyond her death into the 1990s. But the very eccentricity of her thought, combining as it does Aryan supremacism and anti-Semitism with Hinduism, animal rights, and a fundamentally biocentric view of life, has led to strange alliances in radical ideology. Indications of her potential appeal to occult, neopagan, ecological, and New Age groups are apparent in the interest shown by Myatt, Bouchet, Serrano, and Mason in her ideas. In their writings paganism, magic, and the natural order act as a foil for a cleansing wave of fascist violence that will sweep away a corrupt humanity, leaving only Aryans in possession of a pristine world. Their thought is undeniably fascist in inspiration, but her ideas also hold an appeal for "alternative" movements whose inspiration is far removed from such sources.

In 1954 the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC), America's leading Rosicrucian occult order, published a second edition of A Son of God. Founded in 1915 by H. Spencer Lewis (1883–1939), AMORC offers a nondenominational approach to ancient wisdom teachings. In his early years the American founder had been involved in Theosophy and several occult lodges in Britain as well with Aleister Crowley and his magical Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO). Lewis received a formal Rosicrucian initiation at Toulouse in 1909, but he also laid emphasis on the arrival of traditional Rosicrucians in North America in the 1690s.³⁰ He was versed in Theosophical lore concerning rounds, root races, and Aryans, and also held the ancient Egyptians in great esteem, especially Akhnaton.³¹ From its Californian headquarters comprising an entire city block built with sphinxes, domes, and porticoes in San Jose, AMORC now runs a very successful nonprofit educational foundation with tens of thousands of members worldwide, seeking health, happiness, and human progress. Its influence in the New Age movement has been enormous.³² As a key volume in the AMORC Rosicrucian Library, Savitri Devi's book is always available, last reprinting in 1992.

From the late 1960s onward growing numbers of individuals began to dissent from the values and institutions of modern Western society. The hippie movement of 1965–1973 celebrated drugs, Eastern religions, and other forms of exotic enlightenment against the “false civilization” of denominational religion, reason, and industrial modernity. By the 1970s, there was more widespread concern about the unchecked exploitation of the earth’s limited resources, urbanization, and the destruction of the environment. The Marxist critique traced these ills to the power of the bourgeoisie and international capital, but these scapegoats were giving way to a broader condemnation of urban-industrial culture by the 1980s. With the advent of the New Age movement, man was felt to have lost his roots in nature, leading an artificial life among machines and automated processes that robbed him of his humanity and a meaningful life. Rudolf Bahro, a leading left-wing Green and an important New Age figure, identifies patriarchy, the Judaeo-Christian religious tradition, and the entire rationalist and scientific praxis of the West as the root causes of man’s alienation.³³

Green thinkers are especially pessimistic about the effects of human population on nature. New advocates of Malthusianism—the doctrine that species proliferate until they exhaust their food resources—oppose liberal and Christian notions of aid to the needy. In the 1970s there were widespread appeals for zero population growth or decline, if necessary backed by repressive measures, especially in Third World countries. The Environmental Fund, a prestigious international grouping, took the view that sending food aid to the hungry only encouraged their population growth. Other organizations like Zero Population Growth, the Campaign to Check the Population Explosion, and Planned Parenthood/World Population also focused attention on the overbreeding in poor nations. Paul Ehrlich’s bestseller, The Population Bomb (1970), suggested tax penalties for childbearing and breaking off relations with a Vatican opposed to birth control. A rhetoric using inflammatory terms of violence (“bomb,” “explosion”) was matched by a contempt for humans (“plague,” “people pollute”). Many ecologists identified the teeming colored races of Africa, Asia, and South America as the root cause of the world population problem.

An extreme school of ecological catastrophism regards all human civilization as deleterious and evil. Such antihumanist sentiment, coupled with an idealization of animals and nature, represents a break with liberal thought. Many radical ecologists believe that human population must be drastically reduced because humans have simply become too numerous, placing an intolerable burden upon their natural environment. Edward Callenbach's novel Ecotopia (1978) described a revolutionary ecological regime in the Pacific Northwest that secedes from the United States. Its ecocentric policy is enforced through a variety of repressive, violent, and exclusionary measures against any opposition. Once human beings are stigmatized as a threat to Mother Nature, Christian and Enlightenment notions of human equality and the sanctity of human life start to retreat. Nazi modes of thought concerning "unfit life" (the old, sick, and indigent), hierarchies of human value, and eugenic programs find ready acceptance among those who despair of mankind.³⁴

The American movement of Deep Ecology betrays an uneasy resemblance to Savitri Devi's biocentric vision. Its precepts of community and cooperation are belied by romantic irrationalism and the assertion that all nature is equal. In his pioneering work The Arrogance of Humanism (1978), the leading U.S. biocentrist David Ehrenfeld rejects the humanist foundation of modern life, denying that any part of nature has more value than another. Due to man's global health schemes, the pox virus is now an endangered species.³⁵ Inspired by the Norwegian philosopher Arne Naess (b. 1912), Bill Devall and George Sessions, both American professors, have publicized Deep Ecology and biocentrism as a fundamentalist movement opposed to the pragmatic approach of reform ecology. In their influential book Deep Ecology (1985), man is regarded as a degenerate and artificial creature in painful opposition to wild, untamed nature. Only a radical reevaluation of human importance can avert the grim future of a teeming, polluted planet. Man must give up his privileged position as the lord of the earth and seek a new accommodation with nature, at once harmonious, modest, and subordinate.

The hero of Deep Ecology is Thomas Malthus (1766–1854), while the philosophies of humanism, rationalism, and Enlightenment are blamed for man's vanity and ecological destruction. Devall and Sessions approvingly quote Theodore Roszak, the doyen of the American counterculture: "Humanism is the finest flower of urban-industrial society; but the odor of alienation yet clings to it and to all culture and public policy that springs from it." And again, with the philosopher Pete Gunter: "Pragmatism, Marxism, scientific humanism . . . the whole swarm of smug antireligious dogmas emerging in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and by now deeply entrenched in scientific, political, economic, and educational institutions . . . make nature an extension of and mere raw material for man."³⁶ The sources of Deep Ecology are variously sought in mysticism, Christianity (especially St. Francis of Assisi), the Eastern religions of Hinduism, Taoism, and Zen Buddhism, and Native American spirituality. Devall and Sessions also trace their ideas in the literary tradition of naturalism and pastoralism in America (Walt Whitman, Henry Thoreau, Robinson Jeffers, and John Muir).³⁷

All nature has intrinsic worth and equality, and whatever science that remains should be nondominating. But if Devall and Sessions couch Deep Ecology in gentle words, their biocentrist epigones use a sterner language. Dave Foreman, the founder of the radical movement "Earth First!" conflates romanticism and brutality in a manner reminiscent of Savitri Devi. Primitivist sentiments such as "dream the bison back, sing the swan hither" and "back to the Pleistocene" punctuate Foreman's views that starving Ethiopians should be left to die and Malthus was right: "There are too many people on the earth."³⁸ He agrees with Arne Naess that the earth's human population should be reduced to about 100 million. Another contributor to his magazine has recommended a drastic 80 percent reduction in the global human population, while praising AIDS as a valuable ecological weapon.³⁹ The German Green leader, Herbert Gruhl, has even echoed Savitri Devi's passion for nuclear destruction: because only Westerners are amenable to birth control programs, the overcrowded peoples of the Third World will one day regard "the atom bomb no longer as a threat but as a liberation."⁴⁰

Left-wing writers have been the fiercest critics of Deep Ecology, which they accuse of smuggling "fascist" discourse into liberal society. "People are shit," a recent quote from the German ecomagazine Instinkte, illustrates the left-wing claim that biocentrism denies the moral basis of any human rights to equality and support. By rejecting man's claim to distinctiveness from animals and plants, either through spiritual transcendence or social consciousness, biocentrism reduces mankind to mere biomass, a burden on nature. And by blaming humanity collectively for ecological disaster, Deep Ecology deflects any critique of capitalism and authority, thereby frustrating genuine social emancipation.⁴¹ Marxist ecologists regard such doctrine as the ideological ally of monopoly capitalism. Only by denying the special status of man and his anthropocentric traditions of Judaism, Christianity, humanism, and socialism can capitalism soften up democracy to accept the mass dying of Third World populations, as well as the euthanasia of the elderly, ill, poor, and redundant in the rich North. Such a countertranscendent strategy will facilitate the exploitation of human beings as raw material in twenty-first-century industries based on genetic engineering, embryo farming, and cloning.

Ideological parallels between Deep Ecology and the prefascist currents of Social Darwinism and mystical Lebensreform (the natural-living movement in pre-1914 Germany) are also highlighted by Marxist critics. At the end of the nineteenth century the ugly, unhealthy, and harmful effects of industrialization—destruction of nature, slums, disease—were attributed by its romantic bourgeois critics not to capitalism but to decadent civilization in general. Rather than demanding the emancipation of the working class, German Lebensreformer embraced health diets, natural remedies, nudism, and vegetarianism, and founded alternative colonies on the land and in the cities. Ideas of civilizational decadence found a ready ally in Darwinist ideas of degeneration, which could be countered only by healthy rural living, Aryan racism, and eugenics, as advocated by the Social Darwinist Wilhelm Schallmayer (1857–1919) and the völkisch biologist Willibald Hentschel (1858–1947). Marxist and anarchist ecologists detect the same romantic reactionary thought in Deep Ecology today. However, whereas German Lebensreform is burdened by its links to Nazism, Deep Ecology can supply a similar prefascist discourse from an blameless Anglo-American source.⁴²

Nature is divinized, man is relegated. The ultraright-wing Noontide Press in California has recognized this receptivity to the Nazi religion of nature by bringing out a new edition of Savitri Devi's Impeachment of Man (1991). Presented by the publisher as an indictment of the values and mores of our modern human-centered "produce and consume" society, the book attempts to popularize Savitri Devi's conviction that divinity manifests itself in all of nature, that man is nothing special, and that his recent ideas of universal equality and entitlement to prosperity at the expense of the rest of nature are fundamentally wrong. The beautiful tiger, the great banyan tree, the lithe felines, according to Savitri Devi, these are noble creatures, but not all "two-legged mammals" qualify. Only the strong, intelligent Aryan is fit to survive in a redeemed biocentric order. The publisher's foreword gives a brief account of her life, mentioning her lifelong devotion to Nazism and her books in which "she portrayed Hitler and National Socialism as expressions of transcendent spiritual truth." Such an edition is a telling example of the new entryism the far right is currently pursuing in its appeal to Green and New Age audiences.

But Savitri Devi's emphasis on nature and animal rights against the claims of mankind could evoke a wider response in mass urban society. Ecological sentiment often owes more to an urbanized lifestyle than any authentic awareness of nature. Here one might note that anti-hunting and animal rights activists have their bases of support in large towns and cities. Their sentimental image of animals and nature is informed by modern media and synthetic enclaves like "wild life parks" but hardly ever anchored in the genuine countryside, where farming, animal husbandry, hunting, and practical conservation schemes are pursued as a way of life. The shrill and often violent demands for the protection of animals from human exploitation typically come from social groups with no living connection to the land. Given the overwhelming preponderance of urban over rural populations in modern Western society, these attitudes are set to become ever more prevalent.

The growing practice of vegetarianism and its active proselytism amongst the young often derive from the sentimental and squeamish sensibilities of urban populations. Advanced technological societies no longer regard food as rural produce: the sanitized image of hygienic food packaging in the suburban supermarket replaces livestock, slaughterhouses, and butchers' shops in the modern imagination. Once city dwellers are reminded of the bloodstained background to meat production, the horrified flight into vegetarianism only reinforces the continuing retreat from nature. Constantly serviced by television and computers, modern man inhabits an electronic "virtual" reality drained of organic natural content. The sensory poverty of a synthetic order devoid of life could well lead to contempt for mankind and a compensating idealization of animals. Here again, one may detect the reviving appeal of Savitri Devi's vehement misanthropy. A computerized and superurbanized humanity might long for contact with nature while entertaining violent visions of hatred and destruction for its own species.

Nor is Savitri Devi's vision of the noble Aryan far removed from primitivist currents of New Age thought. The German völkisch and youth movements in the period 1890–1930 mixed paganism and nature worship with reverence for barbarian virtue. Ancient Germans, racial purity, and national revival were all bound up with the merits of nature.⁴³ Many New Age groups rehearse the nativist aspects of these Nazi precursors in a eulogy of the primitive. The movement began in the 1970s with European support for the cultural struggle of the North American Indians, but politics soon gave way to mythology. Navajo, Hopi, and Sioux Indians were credited with a natural wisdom long lost among the rational, technologically advanced peoples of the West. In the 1980s Indian deputations and medicine men plied their trade of esoteric workshops and conferences across Germany and Switzerland. So long as the idealized groups were marginal, alien, or oppressed, such New Age sentiment was generally left-wing or anarchist. However once the models were sought closer to home in the prerational, mythical past of Western culture, völkisch ideas could make a fashionable return.

By the early 1980s the enthusiasm for North American Indians and their ecological-esoteric wisdom had spread to the ancient European tribes—the “Indians of the West.” In the New Age movement there are now numerous groups devoted to reviving the wisdom of the ancient Celts and Teutons. Druids and old Germanic priest-kings, witches, and priestesses now provide New Age precursors closer to home and Western identity. Books, workshops, and conferences on paganism, shamanism, runes, and magic proliferate. The Anglo-American Ásatrú Free Assembly and Odinists revived neo-Germanic paganism, while in Germany neo-völkisch groups such as the Goden (est. 1957) and Armanenschaft (est. 1969), a revival of the Guido von List Society, swiftly reoriented themselves toward the New Age concern with feminism, ecology, and esoteric lore. The Aryan mysticism of Julius Evola was rediscovered by New Age publications. Nostalgia for a lost golden age and apocalyptic hopes of its revival recall the ideological foreground of earlier demands for fascist renewal.⁴⁴

Deep Ecology, biocentrism, nature worship, and New Age paganism reflect a hostility toward Christianity, rationalism, and liberalism in modern society. Although these radical movements often have their roots in left-wing dissent, their increasing tendency toward myth and despair indicate their susceptibility to millenarian and mystical ideas on the far right. Neo-Nazi and fascist activists now actively seek to infiltrate the ecological and esoteric scene. The cybernetic encirclement of man and his complete divorce from nature could well foster a more fundamental alienation. In a congested and automated world, Savitri Devi's sentimental love of animals and hatred of the masses may find new followers. The pessimism of the Kali Yuga and her vision of a pristine new Aryan order possess a perennial appeal in times of uncertainty and change.

NOTES AND REFERENCES

NOTES TO THE INTRODUCTION

1. Illustrated advertisement for books (Buffalo, N.Y.: Samisdat Publishers, circa 1982), card flyer.
2. Matt Koehl, "Adolf Hitler: German Nationalist or Aryan Racist?" National Socialist World, no. 4 (summer 1967), pp. 13–22.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 1

1. Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), pp. 12, 58.
2. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), pp. 12, 142f.
3. Savitri Devi, interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassette 1A.
4. Irving Putter, The Pessimism of Leconte de Lisle: The Work and the Time (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1961), pp. 277–287; Alison Fairlie, Leconte de Lisle's Poems on the Barbarian Races (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1947), passim.
5. Richard Clogg, A Short History of Greece, 2d ed. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986), pp. 105–110; Edward S. Forster, A Short History of Modern Greece, 1821–1945, 2d ed. (London: Methuen, 1946), pt. 2.
6. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 59; Savitri Devi, interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassette 1A.
7. Quoted in Clogg, Short History of Greece, p. 76.
8. The following account of the Anatolian campaign is drawn from Clogg, Short History of Greece, pp. 112–121, and Forster, Short History of Modern Greece, pp. 135–147.
9. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, p. 105.
10. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 60.
11. Athen-München, ed. George Himmelheber (Munich: Bayerisches Nationalmuseum, 1980).

12. E. M. Butler, The Tyranny of Greece over Germany: A Study of the Influence Exercised by Greek Art and Poetry over the Great German Writers of the Eighteenth, Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1935).
13. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 105f.
14. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 58.
15. Biographical material for the following account of Kaires's life is drawn from Philosophics of Theophilos Kaires (Greece's new Socrates), ed. and trans. Peter Thetis (New York: Pageant Press, 1960), pp. 9–33. An earlier biography written by Demetrios P. Paschales, Θεόφιλος Καίρης (Athens, 1928) was acknowledged by Maximiani Portas in her thesis.
16. Maximiani Portas, Essai critique sur Théophile Kairis (D. Litt. thesis, University of Lyons, [1935]). The thesis was revised in the summer of 1931. Maximiani dated her introduction at Athens in October 1931 with an acknowledgment to her friend Kyria Marika Kaloyerikou for hospitality, affection, and kindness during the previous years in the capital.
17. Heinrich Schliemann, Troy and Its Remains (London: John Murray, 1875), pp. 102, 119–120.
18. Malcolm Quinn, The Swastika: Constructing the Symbol (London and New York: Routledge, 1994), pp. 22–26.
19. Sir Charles Eliot, Hinduism and Buddhism, 3 vols. (London: Edward Arnold, 1926), 1:41.
20. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 69–70.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 2

1. Leconte de Lisle, "L'Arc de Civa," in Poèmes Antiques (1852), quoted in Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), p. 431.
2. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 379.
3. Ibid., p. 69.
4. Léon Poliakov, The Aryan Myth (London: Sussex University Press and Heinemann, 1974), pp. 183–188. A. Leslie Willson, A Mythical Image: The Ideal of India in German Romanticism (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1964) traces the growth of interest in India among the German Romantics.
5. J. P. Mallory, In Search of the Indo-Europeans (London: Thames and Hudson, 1989), pp. 9–11.
6. Poliakov, Aryan Myth, pp. 188–190.
7. Ibid., pp. 190–192.
8. Ibid., pp. 192–199.
9. Malcolm Quinn, The Swastika: Constructing the Symbol (London and New York: Routledge, 1994), pp. 22–38, 45. All the swastika symbols collected for the Paris Exposition display were illustrated in the journal article by Michael von Zmigrodzki, "Zur Geschichte der Suastika," Archiv für Anthropologie 19 (1890): 173-181, tables 4-7. Thomas Wilson, a delegate at one of the conferences, was the curator of the Department of Prehistoric Anthropology at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C. His comprehensive study The Swastika: The Earliest Known Symbol, and Its Migrations was published in the Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, 1894 (Washington, D.C. 1896), pp. 757-1011.

10. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, The Secret Doctrine, 2 vols. (London: Theosophical Publishing Company, 1888), 2:6-12, 300f., 433-436; 98-101, 585f.

11. The contribution of Theosophy to the German völkisch movement is fully documented in Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and Their Influence on Nazi Ideology, 2d ed. (New York: New York University Press; London: I. B. Tauris, 1992).

12. Erich Biehahn, "Blondheit und Blondheitskult in der deutschen Literatur," Archiv für Kulturgeschichte 46 (1964): 309-333.

13. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, trans. Lotte Asmus (Padua: Edizioni di Ar, 1982), p. 21.

14. Details of B. G. Tilak's career may be found in Dictionary of National Biography, ed. S. P. Sen, 4 vols. (Calcutta: Institute of Historical Studies, 1972-1974), 4:352-356.

15. Bâl Gangadhar Tilak, The Arctic Home in the Vedas (Poona: Kesari, 1903), pp. 453-455, 464.

16. A concise account of the Aryan settlement of India appears in Romila Thapar, A History of India, vol. 1 (Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1966), chap. 2, "The Impact of Aryan Culture," pp. 28-49.

17. Savitri Devi, L'Etang aux lotus (Calcutta: author, 1940), pp. 62-68.

18. Ibid., pp. 74-86.

19. Ibid., pp. 167-171.

20. Ibid., pp. 19-25, at p. 25.

21. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 100-102.

22. Savitri Devi, Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (New Delhi: Savitri Dêvi Mukherji, 1976), pp. 282f.

23. Lotte Asmus and Vittorio De Cecco, "La 'missionaria' del paganesimo ariano," Risguardo 4 (1984): 64-70, at p. 65.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 3

1. The origin and development of these movements are discussed in the masterly study by Christophe Jaffrelot, The Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics: 1925 to the 1990s (London: Hurst, 1996), pp. 11-35.

2. Savitri Devi, Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (New Delhi: Savitri Dêvi Mukherji, 1976), pp. 35-40.
3. Details of V. D. Savarkar's career may be found in Dictionary of National Biography, ed. by S. P. Sen, 4 vols. (Calcutta: Institute of Historical Studies, 1972-1974), 4:92-95.
4. V. D. Savarkar, Hindutva, 2d ed. (New Delhi: Central Hindu Yuvak Sabha, 1938), pp. 7f.
5. Vincent A. Smith, The Oxford History of India, 4th ed., ed. Percival Spear (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1981), pp. 405-407.
6. Savarkar, Hindutva, pp. 69f.
7. Smith, Oxford History of India, pp. 407-415.
8. Savarkar, Hindutva, pp. 71, 72f.
9. This act symbolized the victory of Maratha nationalism and Hinduism over the old Muslim order in India. A plate of the event provided the frontispiece for Savarkar's longer history of the Marathas. V. D. Savarkar, Hindu-Pad-Padashahi or a Review of the Hindu Empire of Maharashtra (Poona: Manohar Granth-Mala, 1942).
10. Smith, Oxford History of India, pp. 439-442.
11. Savarkar, Hindutva, pp. 56f.
12. Ibid., pp. 102, 103, 105ff., 111ff.
13. Ibid., pp. 126, 144.
14. Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 32, 53f.
15. V. D. Savarkar, Hindu Sanghatan: Its Ideology and Immediate Program (Bombay: Hindu Mahasabha, 1940), pp. 11, 13f., 23-30.
16. Ibid., pp. 43-47, 60-67.
17. Ibid., p. 83.
18. G. D. Savarkar, Foreword to A Warning to the Hindus by Savitri Devi (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939), p. ix.
19. Savitri Devi, Warning to the Hindus, pp. 7, 17.
20. Ibid., pp. 46-48.
21. Ibid., p. 50.
22. Ibid., p. 51.
23. Ibid., p. 54.
24. Ibid., pp. 34, 35.
25. Ibid., pp. 41f.
26. Ibid., pp. 43f.
27. Ibid., p. 55.
28. Ibid., pp. 57f.
29. Ibid., p. 61.
30. Ibid., pp. 68-73; cf. Savarkar, Hindu Sanghatan, p. 80.
31. Savitri Devi, Warning to the Hindus, pp. 73-75.

32. Biographical details of K. B. Hedgewar may be found in Dictionary of National Biography, ed. S. P. Sen, 4 vols. (Calcutta: Institute of Historical Studies, 1972–1974), 2:161–162; Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 33f.

33. The RSS is fully documented in Walter K. Andersen and Shridhar D. Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron: The Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh and Hindu Revivalism (Boulder, Colo.: Westview Press, 1987), and Tapan Basu et al., Khaki Shorts and Saffron Flags: A Critique of the Hindu Right (New Delhi: Orient Longman, 1993). See also Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 35–79.

34. Andersen and Damle, The Brotherhood in Saffron, p. 38.

35. Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 65–68.

36. Ibid., pp. 51f.

37. M. S. Golwalkar, We, or Our Nationhood Defined (Nagpur: Bharat Prakashan, 1939), pp. 19, 35, 59, quoted in Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 52–53.

38. Golwalkar, We, or Our Nation Defined, p. 37.

39. Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics, pp. 72–74.

40. Savitri Devi, Warning to the Hindus, p. 142.

41. Ibid., p. 146.

42. Ibid., p. 63.

43. Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), p. 60.

44. Savitri Devi, Warning to the Hindus, title page; cf. Defiance, pp. 379–380.

45. Savarkar, Hindu Sanghatan, pp. 114–126. Savarkar discussed the pan-Hindu flag, ibid., pp. 140–42, and also wrote the tract “The Pan-Hindu Dhvaj” about its design and symbolism.

46. Jaffrelot, Hindu Nationalist Movement and Indian Politics is the definitive study of the later history of the RSS and the Hindu national parties. The Babri Masjid incident is described in detail, pp. 453–458.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 4

1. Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf, intro. D. C. Watt, trans. Ralph Manheim (London: Hutchinson, 1969), p. 602.

2. Hitler's Table Talk, 1941–44 [the so-called Heim-Bormann notes], ed. H. R. Trevor-Roper, 2d ed. (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973), 8–10.8.1941, 17–18.9.1941, 10.1.1942, 12–13.1.1942, 3.3.1942, 27.6.1942, 22.8.1942. For a full review of Hitler's thinking on India, see Milan Hauner, India in Axis Strategy: Germany, Japan, and Indian Nationalists in the Second World War (Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1981) (Publications of the German Historical Institute London, vol. 7), pp. 26–34.

3. Alfred Rosenberg, Der Mythos des 20. Jahrhunderts (Munich: Hoheneichen-Verlag [Franz Eher Verlag], 1934), pp. 660–664.
4. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 56–70.
5. Quoted, ibid., p. 66.
6. Jean Parvulesco, La spirale prophétique (Paris: Guy Trédaniel, 1986), p. 99; Savitri Devi, Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (New Delhi: Savitri Dêvi Mukherji, 1976), pp. 41, 274f.
7. Biographical details of Asit Krishna Mukherji are drawn from Savitri Devi, interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassettes 1A, 1B.
8. The ideology, membership, and political influence of the Thule Society are fully discussed in Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and Their Influence on Nazi Ideology, 2d ed. (New York: New York University Press; London: I. B. Tauris, 1992), pp. 135–152.
9. Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), pp. 39f.
10. Ibid., p. 148.
11. Ibid., pp. 39f., 434f.
12. Ibid., p. 161.
13. Ibid., p. 453.
14. Ibid., p. 342.
15. Ibid., pp. 126, 149–151, 226.
16. The ensuing account of Savitri Devi's life in wartime India is based on Savitri Devi, interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassette 2B.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 5

1. The following account of Subhas Chandra Bose's life and political career is drawn mainly from Leonard A. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj: A biography of Indian Nationalists Sarat and Subhas Chandra Bose (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990). Further material has been gleaned from Milan Hauner, India in Axis Strategy: Germany, Japan, and Indian Nationalists in the Second World War (Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1981) (Publications of the German Historical Institute London, vol. 7).
2. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 32–35.
3. Ibid., pp. 37–41.
4. Ibid., pp. 40, 42–49, 52–54.
5. Ibid., pp. 55–63.
6. Ibid., chaps. 3, 4, and 5, passim, pp. 234–235.
7. Ibid., pp. 269–285; Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 61.
8. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 286–288.
9. Ibid., pp. 293–309; Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 62.
10. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 316f., 325–331, 338–349.

11. Ibid., pp. 349–353.
12. Ibid., pp. 370f., 372–392, 399–402, 416f.; Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 64.
13. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 239; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 410, 420.
14. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 240–249; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 421–428, 441–445.
15. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 246f.
16. Ibid., pp. 187–189, 193–213.
17. Ibid., pp. 249, 255–258.
18. Ibid., pp. 259–274, 357–361.
19. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 450–452.
20. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 251.
21. Ibid., pp. 250–253, 363f., 368–371; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 447f., 453–455.
22. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 366–368, 371f., 576–592; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 456–460, 486.
23. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 409–413, 433f., 437–439, 489–493; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 462–472.
24. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, p. 415.
25. Ibid., pp. 417f. The invitation to Bose to come to Asia was repeated in March and again at the Bangkok conference of Indian nationalists in June, pp. 434, 489–493; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 468–470.
26. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 423–436, cf. above, chap. 4, n. 2; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 461f.
27. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 382–390, 391–406.
28. Ibid., pp. 484–487; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 484f.
29. Hauner, India in Axis Strategy, pp. 487–489, 558–562; Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 486–490.
30. Gordon, Brothers against the Raj, pp. 491–504.
31. Ibid., pp. 507–23, 534–43.
32. Ibid., pp. 604–610.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 6

1. Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), p. 451.
2. Ibid., pp. 345f.
3. Cyril Aldred, Akhenaten: King of Egypt (London: Thames and Hudson, 1988), provides a comprehensive account of the rediscovery of Akhnaton and his new capital.
4. Arthur Weigall, The Life and Times of Akhnaton, Pharaoh of Egypt (Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood and Sons, 1910).

5. In her taped interview of 1978 (Cassette 5B), Savitri Devi recalled a trip to Syria and Iraq by ship and train in 1937. This journey probably included a stop-over in Egypt, for there are some passing references to ancient and modern Egypt in A Warning to the Hindus (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939), pp. 58–61. She also mentions rail travel in Egypt in L'Etang aux lotus (Calcutta: author, 1940), p. 46.
6. Savitri Devi, A Son of God (London: Philosophical Publishing House, 1946), p. 16.
7. Ibid., pp. 19–25.
8. Ibid., pp. 25–27.
9. Ibid., p. 35.
10. Ibid., pp. 35, 40–42.
11. Ibid., pp. 126–128.
12. Ibid., pp. 129–130.
13. Ibid., p. 243.
14. Ibid., pp. 245f.
15. Ibid., p. 247.
16. Ibid., p. 248.
17. Ibid., p. 253.
18. Ibid., p. 254.
19. Ibid., pp. 255f.
20. Ibid., p. 253.
21. Ibid., pp. ix–xiii.
22. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 347.
23. Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1959), chaps. 1, 2.
24. Ibid., pp. 16, 52.
25. Ibid., p. 59.
26. Ibid., pp. x–xi, 13–14.
27. Ibid., p. 59.
28. Ibid., pp. 148f.
29. Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man, p. 141.
30. Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man, pp. xi, 189–193.
31. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 184–186, 203–204, 456–457.
32. Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man, p. [iv].

NOTES TO CHAPTER 7

1. Savitri Devi, Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (New Delhi: Savitri Dèvi Mukherji, 1976), pp. 33–35, 39, 285–287. Srimat Swami Satyananda also quoted in Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]), pp. 375–377, and interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassettes 4B, 5B.

2. Agehananda Bharati, The Ochre Robe (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1961), p. 214.
3. Agehananda Bharati, "Hindu-Faschismus," FORVM 33, Heft 387/394 (30 September 1986): 29–35.
4. Horace Hayman Wilson, The Vishnú Purána, a System of Hindu Mythology and Tradition (London: John Murray, 1840), pp. 21–26 (bk. 1, chap. 3). The text is also discussed in John Muir, Original Sanskrit Texts on the Origin and History of the People of India, 2d ed., 5 vols. (London: Trübner, 1868), 1:43–49.
5. Quoted in Muir, Original Sanskrit Texts, 1:142–146.
6. Wilson, Vishnú Purána, pp. 621–626 (bk. 6, chap. 1).
7. Savitri Devi, The Lightning and the Sun (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherjee, 1958), pp. 21, 20.
8. Ibid., pp. 4–15.
9. Ibid., pp. 17f.
10. Ibid., p. 18.
11. Ibid., pp. 36f.
12. Ibid., pp. 37–41. The first part of this book presents the story of Genghis Khan, pp. 57–126.
13. Ibid., p. 126.
14. Ibid., pp. 41–47.
15. Savitri Devi, A Son of God (London: Philosophical Publishing House, 1946), p. 215.
16. The complex mythology and theology of the avatar receives its definitive study in Geoffrey Parrinder, Avatar and Incarnation, 2d ed. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982).
17. Bhagavad Gita, 4, verses 7–8. This couplet is quoted by Savitri Devi repeatedly in Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), pp. [v], 7, 28, 31, 52, 173, 188–189, 261, and in Lightning and the Sun, passim and p. 416.
18. Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 215–216, 222–224.
19. Ibid., pp. 349–351. August Kubizek, Young Hitler: The Story of Our Friendship, trans. E. V. Anderson, 2d ed. (Maidstone: George Mann, 1973), pp. 64–66.
20. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 10f.
21. Ibid., pp. 28, 31.
22. Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 220f.
23. Ibid., p. 235.
24. Ibid., p. 403.
25. Bhagavad Gita, 3, verses 19, 25, quoted in Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, p. 199.
26. Bhagavad Gita, 2, verse 38, quoted in Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 405f. Otto Ohlendorf's example in Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 252f. Interestingly enough, Ohlendorf was also a Theosophist and may well have studied the Bhagavad Gita.
27. Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 204f., 246–249.

28. Ibid., pp. 251, 265, 362f.
29. This cosmic vocabulary owes something to Hitler's fascination with prehistory, diluvial myths, and cosmology. He enthused over Edgar Dacqué, Urwelt, Sage und Menschheit (Munich: R. Oldenbourg, 1924), which related diluvial myths to prehistoric cataclysms and Hanns Hörbiger's glacial cosmogony. Hitler also supported Hörbiger's theories. James Webb, The Occult Establishment (La Salle, Ill.: Open Court, 1976), pp. 326–333.
30. Adolf Hitler, Mein Kampf, trans. James Murphy (London: Hurst and Blackett, 1939), pp. 76, 316.
31. Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 230f., 236.
32. Ibid., p. 256.
33. Ibid., p. 244.
34. Ibid., p. 258.
35. Wilson, Vishnú Purána, pp. 483f. (bk. 4, chap. 24).
36. Savitri Devi, Lightning and the Sun, pp. 431f.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 8

1. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), pp. 193–195.
2. This story is narrated in Savitri Devi, interview, New Delhi, November 1978, Cassette 4B.
3. Leconte de Lisle, "Le Runoïa," in Poèmes Barbares (1862), quoted in Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji [1950]), pp. 495–497.
4. Detlef Brennecke, Sven Hedin: Mit Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1986).
5. Ibid., pp. 116–123.
6. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, trans. Lotte Asmus (Padua: Edizioni di Ar, 1982), pp. 65ff.
7. Ibid., p. 67.
8. Ibid., pp. 195–204, 233–246, 248–263.
9. Savitri Devi, Defiance, p. 50.
10. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, pp. 233–239.
11. Ibid., pp. 131–137.
12. The full story of conditions in Allied POW camps in postwar Germany was not published until the late 1980s. James Bacque, Other Losses: An Investigation into the Mass Deaths of German Prisoners at the Hands of the French and Americans after World War II (London: Macdonald, 1990).
13. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, pp. 239–246, Defiance, pp. 574f., and Pilgrimage, pp. 244f.
14. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, pp. 315–340.
15. Ibid., pp. 248–263.

16. Text of handbill quoted in English in Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 1ff. The German original appears in Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, p. 261.
17. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 158–161. At this hearing Wassmer was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The incident and a description of Savitri Devi's leaflets were reported in the British press, "Nazi Leaflets in Cologne," The Times, 15 March 1949, p. 3.
18. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 69–71.
19. Ibid., pp. 188f.
20. Ibid., pp. 169, 104, 190.
21. Ibid., pp. 211–212.
22. Details of Belsen and its liberation are recounted in Douglas Botting, In the Ruins of the Reich (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1985), pp. 28–36. Robert H. Abzug, Inside the Vicious Heart: Americans and the Liberation of Nazi Concentration Camps (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985), describes the universal shock at the discovery of the concentration camps and their publicization.
23. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, p. 121.
24. Details of the female wardresses appear ibid., pp. 128–130. Ehlert's Auschwitz service is mentioned in Defiance, p. 273.
25. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 117–118.
26. Trial of Josef Kramer and Forty-Four Others (The Belsen Trial), ed. Raymond Philips (London: William Hodge, 1949), pp. 227–241, 709–711. Trial picture of Hertha Ehlert, No. 8, facing p. 352.
27. Savitri Devi, Gold im Schmelztiegel, pp. 122–125.
28. Ibid., p. 126.
29. Savitri Devi, Defiance, pp. 463f.
30. Ibid., pp. 562–575.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 9

1. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), p. 13.
2. Extensive details of Adolf Hitler's life at Linz may be gleaned from August Kubizek, Young Hitler: The Story of Our Friendship, trans. E. V. Anderson, 2d ed. (Maidstone: George Mann, 1973); Franz Jetzinger, Hitler's Youth, trans. Lawrence Wilson, 2d ed. (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1976); John Toland, Adolf Hitler (New York: Doubleday, 1976).
3. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, p. 16.
4. Ibid., p. 17.
5. Ibid., pp. 23–27. Other witnesses of the young Adolf Hitler's behavior in Leonding are quoted in Jetzinger, Hitler's Youth, pp. 59–60, 74–76. One of Hitler's teachers at the Realschule in Linz, which he attended between 1900 and 1904, recalls him as having talent but also as willful, arrogant, and irascible. Another remembers his open expression, bright eyes, and, perhaps evidence of his love of nature, how he would converse with trees. Ibid., pp. 68–70.

6. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, p. 32.

7. Ibid., p. 34.

8. Ibid., p. 42.

9. Ibid., pp. 43–48.

10. Ibid., pp. 48–54.

11. Toland, Adolf Hitler, pp. 142f., 211f., 219, 229.

12. The history and development of the Obersalzberg is documented in Josef Geiß, Obersalzberg, 17th ed. (Berchtesgaden: Anton Plenk, 1985). Copious pictures, aerial photographs, and maps appear in Der Obersalzberg im 3. Reich (Berchtesgaden: Anton Plenk, 1982), Das Kehlsteinhaus (Berchtesgaden: Anton Plenk, 1986), and Obersalzberg: Bilddokumentation (Berchtesgaden: Anton Plenk, 1983).

13. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 64–66.

14. Ibid., p. 67.

15. Ibid., pp. 71–80.

16. Ibid., pp. 101–111.

17. Ibid., pp. 112f.

18. Ibid., pp. 114–121, 126–129, 131–133.

19. The political circumstances of this softening line on Nazi war criminals and an account of the paroles at Landsberg are described fully in Tom Bower, The Pledge Betrayed (New York: Doubleday, 1982), pp. 343–354, and T. H. Tetens, The New Germany and the Old Nazis (New York: Random House, 1961), pp. 197–209. Mention of Savitri Devi's contribution to the appeal is made in Pilgrimage, pp. 161, 256.

20. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 152–162.

21. Ibid., pp. 203–214.

22. Ibid., p. 217.

23. Ibid., pp. 223–230, 239–247, 251–258.

24. Ibid., pp. 270–294.

25. Ibid., p. 302. For the historical background to Ernst von Bandel and the Hermannsdenkmal, see George L. Mosse, The Nationalization of the Masses: Political Symbolism and Mass Movements in Germany from the Napoleonic Wars through the Third Reich (New York: Howard Fertig, 1975), pp. 58–61.

26. The Irminsul and rock-hewn grave are attributed by modern scholars to a Christian hermitage established at the Externsteine, possibly by the bishop of Paderborn, Henry II, around 1115. Wilhelm Teudt identified the Tomb Rock as an ancient Germanic structure in his book Germanische Heiligtümer (Jena: Eugen Diederichs, 1929).

27. Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, pp. 320–323.

28. Ibid., pp. 341–345, 348–352.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 10

1. Quoted in Ib Melchior and Frank Brandenburg, Quest: Searching for Germany's Nazi Past: A Young Man's Story (Novato, Calif.: Presidio Press, 1990), pp. 219–222.
2. Hans-Ulrich Rudel describes his experiences in the postwar period 1945 to 1951 in Trotzdem: Kriegs- und Nachkriegszeit (Preußisch Oldendorf: Karl Schütz Verlag, 1987) and Mein Leben im Krieg und Frieden (Rosenheim: Deutsche Verlagsgesellschaft, 1994).
3. Jörg Friedrich, Die kalte Amnestie: NS-Täter in der Bundesrepublik (Frankfurt am Main: Fischer, 1984), pp. 216f.
4. Kurt P. Tauber, Beyond Eagle and Swastika: German Nationalism since 1945, 2 vols. (Middleton, Conn.: Wesleyan University Press, 1967), 2:1114–1115 (chap. 7, n. 179).
5. Ibid., 1115; T. H. Tetens, The New Germany and the Old Nazis (New York: Random House, 1961), pp. 73–75; Friedrich, Die kalte Amnestie, p. 217; William Stevenson, The Bormann Brotherhood (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1973), pp. 123–128.
6. Tauber, Beyond Eagle and Swastika, 2:1113 (chap. 7, n. 178).
7. For Johannes von Leers's contacts in Munich, see Anna Bramwell, Blood and Soil: Walther Darré and Hitler's "Green Party" (Bourne End: Kensal Press, 1985), pp. 49–50. Von Leers's introduction of Herman Wirth to Heinrich Himmler is documented in the standard history of the Ahnenerbe: Michael H. Kater, Das "Ahnenerbe" der SS 1935–1945 (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1974), pp. 16, 26, 363, 366, 387. On Karl Weisthor, see Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and Their Influence on Nazi Ideology, 2d ed. (New York: New York University Press; London: I. B. Tauris, 1992), pp. 177–191.
8. Otto Skorzeny's wartime career is described in Otto Skorzeny, Skorzeny's Special Missions (London: Robert Hale, 1957), and Charles Foley, Commando Extraordinary (London: Longmans, Green, 1954). Details of his shadowy postwar activities are reported in Stuart Christie, Stefano delle Chiaie: Portrait of a Black Terrorist (London: Anarchy Magazine/Refract Publications, 1984) (Black Papers No. 1), pp. 156–161. See also Angelo del Boca and Mario Giovana, Fascism Today: A World Survey (London: Heinemann, 1970), pp. 79–82.
9. Savitri Devi, Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne (New Delhi: Savitri Dêvi Mukherji, 1976), pp. 219–221.
10. For biographical details and wartime career, see Léon Degrelle, Denn der Hass stirbt . . . Erinnerungen eines Europäers (Munich: Universitas, 1992).

NOTES TO CHAPTER 11

1. Angelo del Boca and Mario Giovana, Fascism Today: A World Survey (London: Heinemann, 1970), pp. 89–90.
2. The ensuing account of far-right political groups associated with Colin Jordan in the period 1958–1962 is based on Martin Walker, The National Front (London: Fontana, 1977), chap. 2, pp. 25–50.
3. Friedrich Borth's career is described in del Boca and Giovana, Fascism Today, pp. 87–89, 208–209.
4. Colin Jordan, Britain Reborn: The Policy of the National Socialist Movement (London: National Socialist Movement, [1962]).
5. The following biographical details are drawn from William L. Pierce, "George Lincoln Rockwell: A National Socialist Life," National Socialist World, no. 5 (winter 1967), pp. 13–36, and his own autobiography This Time the World (Arlington, Va.: author, 1962).
6. Rockwell, This Time the World, pp. 154–155.
7. Ibid., pp. 296–302. Rockwell's communications with the Atlanta suspects are discussed in Melissa Fay Greene, The Temple Bombing (London, Jonathan Cape, 1996), pp. 219–223.
8. Rockwell, This Time the World, pp. 309–310.
9. Newspaper coverage of the camp included "Home Office Ban Entry of Nazi Delegates," The Times, 2 August 1962, p. 10; "Foreign Nazis Banned," The Daily Telegraph, 2 August 1962, p. 1; "Secret 'Nazi' Camp," The Daily Telegraph, 6 August 1962, p. 9; "Inquiry on Visit by U.S. Nazi," The Times, 7 August 1962, p. 8; "Yard Search for U.S. Nazi Leader," The Daily Telegraph, 7 August 1962, p. 1; "Jackboots in an English Glade," The Daily Telegraph, 7 August 1962, pp. 1, 16.
10. "Camp Abandoned by British Nazis," The Daily Telegraph, 8 August 1962, p. 1; "Deportation Order on U.S. Nazi," The Times, 8 August 1962, p. 8.
11. "U.S. Nazi Caught in London," The Daily Telegraph, 9 August 1962, p. 1; "American Nazi Detained in London," The Times, 9 August 1962, p. 8.
12. "2-hour Yard Raid on Nazi HQ," The Daily Telegraph, 11 August 1962, p. 1.
13. George P. Thayer, The British Political Fringe (London: Anthony Blond, 1968), pp. 13–14.
14. Richard C. Thurlow, Fascism in Britain: A History, 1918–1985 (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1987), pp. 268–269.
15. Savitri Devi, "The Lightning and the Sun" (condensed ed.), National Socialist World, no. 1 (spring 1966), pp. 13–90.
16. Savitri Devi, "Gold in the Furnace," National Socialist World, no. 3 (spring 1967), pp. 59–71; Savitri Devi, "Defiance" (excerpts), National Socialist World, no. 6 (winter 1968), pp. 64–87.

17. The early French history of Holocaust denial is recounted in Deborah E. Lipstadt, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (London: Penguin, 1994), pp. 50–64.

18. Robert Lenski, The Holocaust on Trial: The Case of Ernst Zundel (Decatur, Ala.: Reporter Press, 1989). The story of Ernst Zündel's first trial is told in Michael A. Hoffman II, The Great Holocaust Trial (Torrance, Calif.: Institute for Historical Review, 1985).

NOTES TO CHAPTER 12

1. Willibald Mattern, UFOs: Unbekanntes Flugobjekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe des Dritten Reiches? (Toronto: Samisdat Publishers, [1974]), pp. 142–149. An English-language edition was published in 1975.

2. Willibald Mattern and Christof Friedrich [i.e., Ernst Zündel], UFOs: Nazi Secret Weapon? (Toronto: Samisdat Publishers, [1975]), pp. 143–146. Schmidt's otherwise typical alien abduction experience took place at Kearney, Nebraska, in November 1957. Reinhold O. Schmidt, The Kearney Incident and to the Arctic Circle in a Spacecraft (Kearney, Nebr.: author, 1959).

3. Christof Friedrich [i.e., Ernst Zündel], Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions (Toronto: Samisdat Publishers, [1978]), p. 97.

4. Walter Kafton-Minkel relates the extensive background of Nazi polar mythology in the chapter "The Nazis and the Hollow Earth," in his Subterranean Worlds: 100,000 Years of Dragons, Dwarfs, the Dead, Lost Races and UFOs from inside the Earth (Port Townsend, Wash.: Loompanics Unlimited, 1989), pp. 217–242, and Joscelyn Godwin, Arktos: The Polar Myth in Science, Symbolism and Nazi Survival (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Phanes Press; London: Thames and Hudson, 1993), offers the definitive and most comprehensive account of the traditions about the poles and the postwar Nazi myths surrounding them. The Hugin Nazi UFO publications comprise D. H. Haarmann, Geheime Wunderwaffen, 3 vols. (Wetter: Hugin, 1983–1985); O. Bergmann, Deutsche Flugscheiben und U-Boote überwachen die Weltmeere, 2 vols. (Wetter: Hugin, 1988–1989); and a dossier of two hundred press reports over four decades, UFO Dokumenten-Sammlung (Wetter: Hugin, 1986).

5. "A commentary by Christof Friedrich," in Savitri Devi, The Lightning and the Sun (Buffalo, N.Y.: Samisdat Publishers, [1979]), [pp. iii–iv].

6. Matt Koehl, "Some Guidelines for the Development of the National Socialist Movement," National Socialist World, no. 6 (winter 1968), pp. 8–17, at pp. 12, 14f.

7. Matt Koehl, "Resurrection," New Order brochure, reprint of an editorial in NS Bulletin (April 1987).

8. James N. Mason, Siege: The Collected Writings of James Mason (Denver: Storm Books, 1992), pp. xi–xxvii.

9. Ibid., pp. 281–322. For Savitri Devi, see Siege 11, no. 10 (October 1982), reprinted ibid., pp. 304ff.
10. For the electoral rise and fall of the National Front in the 1970s, see Stan Taylor, The National Front in English Politics (London: Macmillan, 1982).
11. Colin Jordan, "Adolf Hitler: The Man against Time," NS Bulletin Special Centennial Issue (1989), reprinted in Colin Jordan, National Socialism: Vanguard of the Future (Aalborg: Nordland Forlag, 1993), pp. 25–29.
12. David Myatt, Cosmic Reich: The Life and Thoughts of David Myatt (Wellington: Renaissance Press, 1995), p. 1.
13. "An Interview with James Mason," The Flaming Sword (Wellington), no. 2 (April 1994), pp. 2–4.
14. "An Interview with Christian Bouchet," The Nexus (Wellington), no. 6 (November 1996), pp. 1–6.
15. Lotte Asmus and Vittorio De Cecco, "La 'missionaria' del paganesimo ariano," Risguardo 4 (1984): 64–70.
16. Savitri Devi, L'India e il Nazismo (Parma: Edizioni all'insegna del Veltro, 1979) (Quaderni del Veltro 11), pp. 5–7.
17. De Cecco has published Omaggio a Savitri Devi as Arya 2 (1978). Her article "Shinto (La via degli dei)" appeared in Arya 4 (July 1980) (written in 1979 and based on an article of Asit Krishna Mukherji in New Mercury [circa 1936]). An Italian translation of her book on Paul of Tarsus, introduced by "Wittekind," was published under the title Cristianesimo e Giudaismo (Paolo di Tarso) in Arya 5 (January 1981).
18. Miguel Serrano, Adolf Hitler, el Último Avatāra (Santiago: Ediciones La Nueva Edad, 1984), pp. 33f., 94–97, 119–124, 129–132. Jung's own occult sources are discussed in Richard Noll, The Jung Cult: Origins of a Charismatic Movement (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1994), pp. 64–69, 109–137.
19. Serrano, Adolf Hitler, pp. 210, 243, 254, 281.
20. Ibid., pp. 95, 124, 131, 139, 232.
21. Ibid., pp. 481, 497f., 620. Savitri Devi's visit to the Externsteine is described ibid., p. 497, and illustrated in Miguel Serrano, La Resurrección del Heroe (Santiago: author, 1986), p. 79. The latter book is also dedicated to Savitri Devi with a portrait and verse. For these quotes, see "Miguel Serrano στο ANTIΔOTO," TO ANTIΔOTO no. 29 (n.d.), pp. 23–31, at p. 27.
22. Serrano, Adolf Hitler, pp. 145f., 149, 487.
23. Personal correspondence between Savitri Devi and Miguel Serrano.
24. Javier Nicolás, "Miguel Serrano: Una visión mágica del NS," Cedade (Barcelona), July–August 1985, pp. 28–33, and "Miguel Serrano στο ANTIΔOTO," TO ANTIΔOTO no. 29 (n.d.), pp. 23–31.
25. The TO ANTIΔOTO interview was reprinted in The Flaming Sword, no. 3 (August 1994), pp. 5–9. A further interview has been published as "Miguel Serrano: 'Esoteric Hitlerist,'" The Flaming Sword, no. 4 (November 1994), pp. 4–8, and no. 5 (February 1995), pp. 4–10. The latter interview was reprinted as a booklet in 1995.

26. Miguel Serrano, Imitación de la Verdad: La ciberpolítica, Internet, realidad virtual, telepresencia (Santiago: author, 1995).

27. A eulogy of Savitri Devi has appeared in one of Britain's leading Nazi "skin-zines." "Heart of Gold, Spirit of Light, Will of Steel," The Order, [no. 14, early 1996?], cover headline: "No Surrender to ZOG!" [pp. 5–7]. Cover title and article "Priestess of Hitlerism: Savitri Devi," The Nexus, no. 9 (August 1997), pp. 1–4.

28. Searchlight, no. 91 (January 1983), p. 3.

29. Searchlight, no. 97 (July 1983), p. 10.

30. Christopher A. McIntosh, The Rosicrucians: The History and Mythology of an Occult Order, 2d ed. (Wellingborough: Thorsons, 1987), pp. 129–141.

31. Harvey Spencer Lewis, Rosicrucian Questions and Answers with Complete History of the Rosicrucian Order, 15th ed. (San Jose, Calif.: AMORC, 1981; 1st ed., 1929), pp. 52–60, 292–294.

32. J. Gordon Melton, Jerome Clark, and Aidan A. Kelly, New Age Encyclopaedia (Detroit: Gale, 1990), pp. 16–17.

33. Rudolf Bahro, Avoiding Social and Ecological Disaster: The Politics of World Transformation, trans. David Clarke (Bath: Gateway Books, 1994). The first German edition was published as Die Logik der Rettung: Wer kann die Apokalypse aufhalten? (Stuttgart: Weitbrecht, 1987).

34. The ideologies of "ecofascism" are discussed in David Pepper, The Roots of Modern Environmentalism (London: Croom Helm, 1984), pp. 204–213.

35. David Ehrenfeld, The Arrogance of Humanism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1978), pp. 207–211.

36. Theodore Roszak, Where the Wasteland Ends: Politics and Transcendence in Postindustrial Society (London: Faber and Faber, 1973), p. xxx, and Pete Gunter, "Man-Infinite and Nature-Infinite: A Mirror-Image Dialectic" (MS, North Texas State University, 1980), quoted in Bill Devall and George Sessions, Deep Ecology (Salt Lake City: Gibbs Smith, 1985), pp. 53–54.

37. Devall and Sessions, Deep Ecology, pp. 79–108.

38. Dave Foreman, "Around the Campfire," Earth First!, 21 June 1987, p. 2; "Whither Earth First!?" Earth First!, 1 November 1987, p. 20.

39. Miss Ann Thropy, "Population and AIDS," Earth First!, 1 May 1987, p. 32.

40. Herbert Gruhl, Himmelfahrt ins Nichts: Der geplünderte Planet vor dem Ende (Munich: Langen Müller, 1992), p. 244. Gruhl is citing René Jules Dubos, Die entfesselte Fortschritt: Programm für eine menschliche Welt (Bergisch Gladbach: Lübbe, 1970), p. 166. This title was originally published in English as So Human an Animal (New York: Scribner's, 1968).

41. Jutta Ditfurth, Entspannt in die Barbarei: Esoterik, (Öko-)Faschismus und Biozentrismus (Hamburg: Konkret Literatur, 1996), pp. 124–134.

42. Dieter Asselhoven and Andrea Capitain, "Wenn Gedanken wie Wildgänse rauschen: Die Reinkarnation der präfaschistischen Lebensreform," ÖkoLinX, no. 25 (spring 1997), pp. 11–15.

43. George L. Mosse, The Crisis of German Ideology: Intellectual Origins of the Third Reich (New York: Grosset and Dunlap, 1964; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1966), provides a concise survey of the völkisch movement.

44. The correspondences between völkisch, fascist, and New Age thinking have been chiefly noted by German writers to date. See, for example, Eduard Gugenberger and Roman Schweidlenka, Mutter Erde, Magie und Politik: Zwischen Faschismus und neuer Gesellschaft (Vienna: Verlag für Gesellschaftskritik, 1987), and Karlheinz Weißmann, Druiden, Goden, Weise Frauen: Zurück zu Europas alten Göttern (Freiburg: Herder, 1991). A Marxist critique is offered by Ditfurth, Entspannt in die Barbarei.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

The primary sources for this study of Savitri Devi and the new Hitler cults have been identified in the notes. This list of Savitri Devi's works is intended to serve as a chronology of her works.

Maximiani PORTAS, afterward SAVITRI DEVI MUKHERJI

Savitri Devi's first published works were her two doctoral theses presented at the University of Lyons, which appeared under her maiden name Maximiani Portas. Essai critique sur Théophile Kairis (Lyons, [1935])
La simplicité mathématique (Lyons, [1935])

All her subsequent publications appeared under her new Hindu name Savitri Devi. The books relating to Hinduism and India were written in the 1930s after her arrival there.

L'Etang aux lotus (Calcutta: author, 1940) [written in 1935–1936]
A Warning to the Hindus (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939) [written in 1937–1939].
Translations into Bengali, Hindi, Marathi, and other Indian languages.

The Non-Hindu Indians and Indian Unity (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1940)
During the war years she wrote at length on Akhnaton and his solar cult; the earlier books were published in Calcutta; the others were published in London after her return to Europe in 1945.

Akhnaton's Eternal Message: A Scientific Religion 3300 Years Old (Calcutta: A. K. Mukherji, [1940])
Joy of the Sun: The Beautiful Life of Akhnaton, King of Egypt. Told to Young People (Calcutta: Thacker, Spink and Co. [1933] Ltd., 1942)
A Son of God: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt (London:

- Philosophical Publishing House, 1946); subsequent editions were published under the title Son of the Sun: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt, 2d ed. (San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1956); 3d ed. (London: Hazell Watson and Viney Ltd., 1957); 4th ed. (San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1981); 2d printing, 1992.
- Akhnaton: A Play* (London: Philosophical Publishing House, 1948)
- Her books on Hitler and National Socialism were first written after the war. The first editions were typically published in India to avoid censorship and other restrictions.
- Defiance* (Calcutta: A. K. Mukerji, [1950]). Excerpts from the work were published in National Socialist World, no. 6 (winter 1968), pp. 64–87.
- Gold in the Furnace* (Calcutta: A. K. Mukherji, 1953) (written in 1948–1949). Excerpts, comprising chapters 3 and 13, were published in National Socialist World, no. 3 (spring 1967), pp. 59–71. A German translation was published under the title Gold im Schmelztiegel: Erlebnisse im Nachkriegsdeutschland, trans. Lotte Asmus (Padua: Edizioni di Ar, 1982). The same edition was simultaneously published by Nordwind Verlag at Mohrkirch under the auspices of Thies Christophersen.
- Paul de Tarse, ou Christianisme et juiverie* (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958) (written in 1957). An Italian translation, introduced by “Wittekind,” was published under the title Cristianesimo e Giudaismo (Paolo di Tarso), Arya 5 (January 1981) (Montreal: Arya, 1981)
- Pilgrimage* (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958) (written in 1953–1954)
- The Lightning and the Sun* (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherjee, 1958) (written in 1948–1956). A condensed edition was published in National Socialist World, no. 1 (spring 1966), pp. 13–90. Second edition (Buffalo, N.Y.: Samisdat Publishers, Ltd. [1979]). Third edition (Paraparaumu Beach, Wellington, New Zealand: Renaissance Press, circa 1994).
- Impeachment of Man* (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1959) (written in 1945). Second edition (Costa Mesa, Calif.: Noontide Press, 1991)
- Hart wie Kruppstahl* (not known) (written in 1961–1963)
- Long Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess, or The True Story of a Most “Objectionable Nazi” and . . . half-a-dozen Cats* (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji [n.d.]) (written in 1957–1961)
- Souvenirs et réflexions d'une aryenne* (Calcutta: Savitri Dêvi Mukherji, 1976) (written in 1968–1971). The tenth chapter of this book was translated into Italian and published as L'India e il nazismo (Parma: Edizioni all'insegna del Veltro, 1979) (Quaderni del Veltro 11).
- Shinto (La via degli dei)*, Arya 4 (July 1980), (Montreal: Arya, 1980) (written in 1979 and based on an article of Asit Krishna Mukherji in New Mercury [circa 1936]).

Further biographical material is contained in the five audiocassettes of an interview with Savitri Devi in November 1978, in New Delhi, published by Samisdat Publications of Toronto in 1979. Arya of Montreal has published Omaggio a Savitri Devi as Arya 2, and the article by Lotte Asmus and Vittorio De Cecco, "La 'missionaria' del paganesimo ariano," Risguardo 4 (1984): 64-70 (published by Edizioni di Ar, Padua) contains interesting details.

INDEX

- Abyssinia, 64, 81
 Achad, Frater (Charles Stansfield Jones), 216
 Adenauer, Konrad, 162, 170–171
 Afghanistan, 48, 61, 74, 83, 87, 218
 Afrika Korps, 174
 Afzal Khan, 47
 Agni, 38
 Ahnenerbe. See SS (Schutzstaffeln)
 Akhetaton (city), 93–95
 Akhnaton, 2, 74–75, 92–104, 117, 122, 127, 129, 157, 179, 190, 223, 225
 Alexander the Great, 21, 74, 180
 Algeria, 175, 183
 Ali, Rashid, 174
 Alpine Redoubt, 157, 181
 Alter, Erich, 175
 Amalia, queen of Greece, 13
 Ambedkar, Bhimrao Ranji, 43
 Amenhotep III, pharaoh of Egypt, 93
 Amenhotep IV, pharaoh of Egypt. See Akhnaton
 American Nazi Party 196, 198–199, 203
 Amin al Hussein, Mohammed (Grand Mufti of Jerusalem), 174–175
 Amon, 93
 Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC), 225
 Animals: cruelty to, 8; idealization of, 226, 232; rights of, 104–108
Ankh, 95
 Antarctica, 3, 211–213, 221
 Anti-Apartheid Movement, 189
 Anti-Comintern Pact, 64, 72
 Antihumanism, 226. See also Misanthropy
 Anti-Nazi League (India), 65
 Anti-Semitism, 5, 66, 69, 122, 176–77, 188, 194–195, 199, 220. See also Protocols of the Elders of Zion
 Anti-Zionism, 175, 211
 Anushilan Samiti (Society of Practice), 58
 Apocalyptic, 124, 137, 140, 212
 Ar, Edizioni di (publisher), 217
 Arcand, Adrien, 206
 Argentina, 172, 192
 Arjuna, 118, 120
 Armanenschaft (German Pagan society), 231
 Arminius. See Hermann the Cherusker
 Arrowsmith, Harold N., 198
 Artama, king of Mittani, 98
Arya, 218–219
 Aryan myth, 4, 45, 66, 93; development through archaeology, 33–34; in Indian revival, 37, 44, 47, 66, 69, 78; in opposition to the Jews, 23, 30, 33, 36, 118; and racial unconscious (C. G. Jung), 220; superiority of Aryans, 32–33, 37, 39, 106; and Theosophical doctrines, 35, 225; wisdom of Aryans, 110, 121–122. See also Vedas Aryans: caste system of, 39, 109; cult of beauty, 54; and Graeco-Roman pantheon, 31, 38; Greek influence revived during the Renaissance, 101; languages of, 30–32; migrations of, 28, 37–39,

- Aryans (Continued)
 41, 74, 90; polar origin of, 4, 35, 37–38, 67, 220; paganism of, 5, 56, 61; polytheism of, 23, 38; in Vedic India, 24, 36–39, 44, 47, 60; warrior code of, 60, 122
- Arya Samaj, 43, 62
- Aryavarta, 27, 41
- Āsatrú Free Assembly, 231
- Asmus, Lotte, 216–217, 222
- Assyrians, 122
- Athens: Academy, 16, 24; Acropolis, 13–14, 56; Agora, 14–15; National Library, 16, 24; Palace of Ilion, 23–24; Parthenon, 55; Propylaea, 14; University, 16, 24; visits to, by S. D., 13–16, 16–24, 147. See also Munich
- Atlanta, temple bombing in, 198
- Aton (the Disk), 93–94, 97–98
- Aurangzeb, 47
- Auschwitz, 141, 143–144, 207. See also Holocaust
- Austria, 64; Anschluss of, 60, 64, 151, 154
- Avatar, 118–125
- Axis, 64, 74, 83, 86, 93, 125, 219; Secret Military Convention (partition of Eurasia), 74, 87, 93. See also New Order, Axis world system
- Ayodhya, 27, 63
- Bader, Douglas, 172
- Bahram Yasht*, 118
- Bahro, Rudolf, 226
- Baikie, James, 96
- Balamicen, King, 68
- Baldur, 129
- Bandel, Ernst von, 165
- Barbie, Klaus, 173
- Bardèche, Maurice, 183, 207
- Bartel, Franz, 176
- Baumann, SS Colonel, 175
- Bean, John Edward, 189–191
- Belgium, 9
- Belsen, 126, 141–142, 144, 243; war crimes trial, 141, 143–144
- Bender, Bernhard, 175
- Beneš, Eduard, 80–81
- Berchtesgaden, 148, 155, 208
- Berner, Willi, 175
- Bhagavad Gita*, 2, 46, 109, 114, 118–120, 125, 164, 213, 241
- Bhakti*, 110, 119
- Bhao, Sadashiv, 49
- Bharata, 27–28
- Bharati, Agehananda, 110
- Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), 58, 63
- Bhen, Amala. See Spiegel, Margaret
- Biocentrism, 227–229, 231
- Birgel, Werner, 176
- Black and White News*, 198
- Black Order (neo-Nazi organization), 221–222
- Black Sun, 221
- Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna, 35; Isis Unveiled (1877), 35; The Secret Doctrine (1888), 35
- Blick, Dennis, 201
- Blobel, Paul, 161
- Bluntschli, Johann Kaspar, 50, 60
- Böckler, Wilhelm, 176
- Bohemia and Moravia, Protectorate of, 64; invasion of Prague, 66
- Bollmann, Walter, 176
- Bolton, Kerry, 216
- Boole, George, 22
- Bopp, Franz, 33
- Bormann, Martin, 156–157, 174, 185
- Borth, Friedrich, 190, 196, 200, 208, 246
- Bose, Rash Beshari, 82, 86, 88
- Bose, Subhas Chandra, 66–67, 73, 77–91, 111; career in the Congress movement, 79–82; concern with Aryan origins, 67, 78; contact with Axis powers, 82–83, 89–90; death of, 89; education and studies, 77–79; favours synthesis of socialism and fascism, 79, 81, 90; An Indian Pilgrim, 82; The Indian Struggle, 1920–1934, 80; meeting with Hitler, 87; as president of Congress, 82; rejects fascism, 82; revered as avatar, 90; in wartime Germany, 83–88; in wartime Southeast Asia, 88–89
- Bothe, Herta, 143, 145–146
- Bouchet, Christian, 216, 225
- Brahmanas* (Vedic texts)
- Brahmans* (priests), 39, 68, 124
- Brahminism: authority of, 4, 25, 26, 43–44, 46–50, 53, 58, 62, 116; challenges to, 43–44, 47
- Brandner, Ferdinand, 176
- Brasillach, Robert, 183, 216, 218

- Braune, Werner, 161
 Breasted, James, 96
 Brindaban, 40
 Bristowe, Ethel, 96
 British Empire, 12, 62, 82, 86, 106; British rule in India, 41, 44, 49, 65, 77, 86, 110
 British Movement (BM), 214–215
 British National Party (BNP) [est. 1960], 189–192, 194–195, 204; Narford camps, 190, 194, 208
 British National Party (BNP) [est. 1982], 6
 British Union of Fascists (BUF), 183, 188
 Brunner, Alois, 176
 Brunschvicq, Léon, 22
 Buchenwald, 161
 Buddha, 117; Buddhism, 68, 75, 101, 104
 Bulgaria, 75
 Bund Deutscher Mädel (BDM), 165, 216
 Bund Heimattreuer Jugend, 190
 Bünsch, Franz, 176
 Bunz, Erich, 176
 Burg, Joseph G., 207
 Burma, 73, 74, 77, 89
 Burnouf, Emile, 24, 34–35
 Byzantium, 10, 19, 22, 69; Moscow (“Third Rome”) as successor of, 68
- Calcutta, 2, 40–42, 45, 60, 66–67, 70–77, 81, 92, 104, 180, 206, 210
 Callenbach, Edward, 227; Ecotopia (1978), 227
 Campaign to Check the Population Explosion, 226 Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), 192
 Capitalism, 68, 122, 228
 Capodistras, John, 17
 Caste System, 39. See also Brahmins (priests); Kshatriyas (warriors and nobles)
 Cathars, 219, 221
 Caumont-la-Force, Count Henri Robert-Henri de, 203
Cedade (Barcelona), 221
 Celts, 231
 Ceylon (Sri Lanka), 27
 Chamberlain, Neville, 64, 156
 Chaphekar brothers, 46
 Charlemagne, 166–167
 Cheetham, Beryl, 208
 Chiaie, Stefano delle, 218
 Chile, 203, 219
 China, 64, 90, 130
 Christian Democratic Union (CDU), 170
 Christianity, 4, 41–44, 57, 61, 92, 99–104, 113, 134, 138, 158, 166, 213, 227–228, 230
 Christophersen, Thies, 207, 217; Die Auschwitz-Lüge (1973), 3; Auschwitz: Truth or Lie? (1974), 3, 207, 211
 Christus Rex, 184. See also Degrelle, Léon
 Codreanu, Corneliu, 218
 Collins, Wilkie, 77; The Moonstone (1868), 77
Combat, 191
 Comité National Français, 183
 Communal Award (1932), 50
 Communism, 178. See also Marxism
 Comte, Auguste, 102; cult of Humanity, 102
 Condor Legion, 184
 Congo, 137, 190
 Conspiracy theory, 220, 222. See also Jews; Protocols of the Elders of Zion
 Constantine I, king of Greece, 9, 11
 Constantine I (the Great), Roman emperor, 20, 56
 Cotswold Agreement (1962). See World Union of National Socialists (WUNS)
 Cotswold Camp. See National Socialist Movement (NSM)
 Crowley, Aleister, 216, 225
 Curzon, Lord, 71, 78
 Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine), 76, 111–125; Bronze Age, 112; Dvapara Yuga (two units), 111–112, 119; Golden Age, 113, 115, 117; Iron Age, 112; Kali Yuga (one unit), 111–117, 119, 121–125, 216, 232; Kalpa or Day of Brahman, 112; Krita or Satya Yuga (four units), 111–115, 117, 119, 124; Mahayuga, 111; Silver Age, 112; Treta Yuga (three units), 111–112, 119
 Czechoslovakia, 64–65, 80, 142. See also Bohemia and Moravia, Protectorate of

- Dachau, 126; alleged fake gas chambers at, 170; war crimes trials of U.S. Army, 160–161
- Dacqué, Edgar, 242
- Däumling, Joachim, 175
- Daladier, douard, 64, 156
- Dalits (Untouchables or Scheduled Castes), 43
- D'Annunzio, Gabriele, 216
- Darré, Richard Walther, 178
- Darwin, Charles, 30
- Das, Chitta Ranjan, 79
- Das Kamerad*, 190
- Dasaratha, 26–27
- Dashanami Order, 111
- Datta, Vinaya, 67
- Daysus, 39
- De Cecco, Vittorio, 217–219
- Deep Ecology, 4, 106, 227–229, 231
- Deep Ecology* (Sessions and Devall), 227
- Degrelle, Léon, 184–186, 217, 219
- Delhi, 1, 2, 74, 180, 209–210, 213
- Deutsche Reichspartei (DRP), 170–171, 173
- Deutsche Soldaten-Zeitung*, 173
- Devall, Bill, 227–228. See also Deep Ecology
- Dietrich, Sepp, 161
- Dior, Françoise, 203–205, 208; marriage to Colin Jordan, 204
- Dirlewanger, Oskar, 175
- Disk, religion of, 98–99, 104; as basis of New Order, 99. See also Aton (the Disk)
- Dittrich, Horst, 161
- Doenitz, Karl, 163
- Dollmann, Eugen, 173, 175
- Dragoumis, Ión, 22
- Dravidians, 28, 39, 68
- Drieu La Rochelle, Pierre, 216–217
- Druids, 231
- Dulles, Allen Welsh, 182
- Dunkirk, evacuation of, 71
- Dvapara Yuga. See Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine)
- Dyaus, 38
- Eastern Economist, The*, 72
- Eckart, Dietrich, 69
- Ecology, radical, 226–228
- Economous, Constantinos, 18
- Edda, 34
- Eden, Garden of, 30
- Egypt, ancient civilization, 31, 93–97; Exploration Society, 95; modern, 56, 96; Nazis in postwar Egypt, 5, 173–174, 178
- Ehlert, Hertha, 143–144, 146, 164
- Ehrenfeld, David, 227; The Arrogance of Humanism (1978), 227
- Ehrlich, Paul, 226; The Population Bomb (1970), 226
- Eichberger, Eugen, 175
- Eichmann, Adolf, 176, 192
- Eisele, Hanns, 176
- Eisenhower, Dwight D., 162, 167
- Eliot, Sir Charles, 24, 26
- Elizabeth II, Queen of England, 202
- England: S. D.'s rejection of, 8, 9; violation of Greek sovereignty, 9; wildlife of, in seventeenth century, 106. See also British Empire; Great Britain
- Enlightenment, 30, 101, 227
- Environmental Fund, 226
- Eritrea, 64
- Ettmayr, Elisabeth, 222–223
- Euclid, 101
- European colonialism, 101; Portuguese, Dutch, French and British overseas possessions in Asia, 116; Third World resentment of, 179
- European Social Movement (ESB), 183
- Evola, Julius, 216–218, 220, 231; Centro Studi Evoliani (Genoa), 218
- Externsteine, 149, 167–169, 220
- Extremist Party (Indian National Congress), 78
- Fahrbacher, Wilhelm, 175
- Farouk, King of Egypt, 174
- Fascist, The*, 188
- Faurisson, Robert, 207
- Felderer, Dittlieb, 207
- Fiest, Gertrud, 145
- Final Solution, 192, 201. See also Holocaust
- Fischer, Leopold. See Bharati, Agehananda
- Foreman, Dave, 228
- Forster, Ida, 145
- Fontaine, Andrew, 189–190, 194
- France, 64–65, 69, 106; Arab rivalry to-

- ward, 178; French Indochina, 136;
French overseas empire, 12; S. D.'s rejection of, 8, 9; violation of Greek sovereignty, 9
- Francis of Assisi, Saint, 228
- Franco, Francisco, 185–186
- Frank, Hans, 163
- Freda, Franco, 217
- Free India Center (Berlin), 73, 85, 87–88
- Free India Provisional Government (Singapore), 89
- Frege, Gottlob, 22
- Freikorps Deutschland, 173
- French Revolution: Goddess Reason enthroned, 101. See also Savitri Devi, antipathy toward “Ideas of 1789”
- Freud, Sigmund, 96; Moses and Mono-theism (1939), 96
- Frick, Wilhelm, 163
- Funk, Walther, 163
- Gandhi, Mohandās Karamchand (Mahatma), 43, 62, 80–83; Non-Cooperation Movement (1922) of, 43
- Gantry, Muriel, 127, 190, 193, 194, 202, 223–224
- Gehlen, Reinhard, 182
- Genghis Khan, 2, 116
- Germany, 64–65, 69, 77, 80, 83; Indophi-lia in, 29, 66; philohellenism of, 15;
Romantic movement in, 29–33, 36,
234; völkisch ideology in, 230–231,
235; Youth Movement in, 230. See also Third Reich
- Ghose, Aurobindo, 78
- Giesler, Hermann, 172
- Giuriati, Camillo, 42, 148
- Gleim, Leopold, 175
- Gnosticism, 126, 135, 149, 216, 220–221
- Goblot, Professor Edmond, 16, 22
- Godafoss (Iceland), 129
- Goden (German Pagan society), 231
- Goebbels, Josef, 108, 156, 170, 173, 181, 209, 217, 220
- Goering, Hermann, 74, 128, 130, 156–
157, 163, 175
- Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 29
- Golwalkar, Madhav Sadashiv, 50, 59–60, 62–63, 69, 111; We, or Our Nationhood Defined (1939), 59
- Gothic Ripples*, 188
- Grail, 219
- Great Britain, 64–65, 69, 84; postwar Arab hostility toward, 178. See also British Empire
- Greater Britain Movement (GBM), 204
- Greece, 56, 57, 60; ancient wildlife of, 106; Christian eclipse of pagan civilization in, 56; defeat by Turkey, 11–12;
forced alliance with the Entente, 9;
Megali Idea, 10–11, 19, 22; occupation of Anatolia, 9, 11; S. D.'s roots in, 7
- Greens (ecology movement), 3–4, 92, 210, 225, 230. See also Ecology, radical
- Grese, Irma (“Bitch of Belsen”), 144
- Grimm, Jacob, 33
- Groupes Nationalistes Révolutionnaires, 216
- Gruhl, Herbert, 228
- Guénon, René, 218; “reign of quantity,” 123
- Gunter, Pete, 227
- Hadrian, Roman Emperor, 209
- Hansen, Christian Frederik and Theophil, 16
- Hanuman, 27
- Harbinson, W.A., 212
- Harwood, Richard, 207
- Haschke, Irene, 143
- Hatch, Military Intelligence Officer, 138
- Hebrews, 122, 217
- Hedgewar, Keshavrao Baliram, 45, 58,
60, 69, 237
- Hedin, Sven, 130–131; *Amerika im
Kampf der Kontinente* (1942), 130
- Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, 33
- Heiden, Louis, 176
- Hekla (Iceland), 107, 129
- Helena, Saint (Roman empress, mother of Constantine the Great), 20
- Hellenism, 10, 13, 93; Hellenes, 21, 62; Hellenic world empire, 19, 62; S. D.'s notion of, 13, 69
- Helwan (Egypt), 176
- Hempel, Anna, 143
- Hentschel, Willibald, 229
- Herder, Johann Gottfried, 29–30
- Hermann the Cherusker (Arminius), 165–
166; Hermannsdenkmal (monument), 149, 165

- Herodotus, 32
Hess, Rudolf, 156, 163, 194, 202, 213, 220
Hesse, Hermann, 219
Himmeler, Heinrich, 3, 175, 178, 220
Hindenburg, Paul von, 130
Hindudom, 53, 56–57, 61
Hinduism, 3, 42, 48, 55–57, 104, 109, 111, 210; caste system of, 38, 57, 75; cult of beauty, 99; cult of Shiva, 4; as custodian of Aryo-Vedic heritage, 41, 43; violent pageant of creation and destruction, 3–4
Hindu Mahasabha, 45, 50–51, 55, 58–60, 62, 66, 83, 90, 209; pan-Hindu swastika flag of, 62, 69, 237
Hindu Mission, 42, 44, 51, 70, 73, 76, 109–110
Hindu nationalism (Indian political movement), 43–63, 93. See also Hindu Mahasabha; Hindutva
Hindu Sabha, 44, 58
Hindutva, 44, 46, 50–51, 54, 57, 63. See also Savarkar, Vinayak Damodar
Hippies, 226
Hirn, Myriam, 222
Hitler, Adolf, 2, 4–5, 7, 15–16, 44, 60, 64–67, 69–70, 85–87, 91–92, 107–109, 118, 121, 123–124, 129–130, 137, 139, 140, 145, 148, 155, 167, 169–170, 172, 174, 186–187, 171, 193, 197–199, 202, 208, 213, 215, 220; admiration of British rule in India, 65, 86; anti-Semitic cosmology of, 123; as avatar, 4, 6, 91, 206, 212, 218, 220; childhood and schooldays of, 150–153; country residence (Berghof) of, 155–159; birth of, 153–155; early political activity in Munich, 159–160; as enemy of the Jews, 118; eulogy of Aryans, 23; Freinberg hill experience of, 119–121; as hâjj, 218; Idee sul destino del mondo, 217; as Man against Time, 118; Manichaeism of, 23; Mein Kampf (1925), 23, 65, 67, 73, 91, 110, 123, 134–135, 155, 174, 197, 199; Munich putsch of, 15; as Saturnian, 211; survival myth of, 125, 131, 133, 135, 137, 167, 169, 212, 220–221; wartime conversations (Hitler's Table Talk), 218
Hitler, Alois (father), 153, 154
Hitler, Klara (mother), 150
Hitler Youth (HJ), 69, 183
Hollow Earth Theory, 211–212, 247; Samisdat Hollow Earth Expedition, 212
Holocaust: denial of, 3, 6, 206–207, 211, 218, 247; extermination of European Jewry, 5, 118, 122, 187, 201
Homecomers' League (Heimkehrerverband), 165
Homer, 24, 34; Iliad, 34; Odyssey, 34
Hörbiger, Hanns, 242; glacial cosmogony (World Ice Theory) of, 242; theory supported by Hitler, 242
Horn, Fritz, 132–134, 164
Horst Wessel Song, 139, 180, 187, 196, 201, 204
Horthy, Miklós, 156
Hugo, Victor, 8
Humanism, 102, 227
Human population explosion, 106–108
Hurrians, 97
Huxley, Aldous, 103
Iceland, 107, 129
Immigration, colored, 188–189, 192, 215
Imperial Fascist League (IFL), 188, 192
Imphal, battle of, 75, 89
India, 61, 65; Aryan origins of, 24, 26–42; independence movement in, 36, 46, 58, 65, 67, 72, 73, 77, 80, 82; "Quit India" movement, 74, 88. See also Hinduism; Indian National Congress; Islam
Indian Independence League (IIL), 85, 88
Indian Legion, 73, 85, 87, 111
Indian National Army (INA), 73, 86, 88–89
Indian National Congress, 50, 61, 66, 72–73, 78, 80–81, 89–90; alliance with Khilafat, 43
International Military Tribunal (IMT), 76, 128, 142, 163
Indra, 98
Iran, 74; Mujâhidîn of, 218
Iraq, 73, 84
Irminsul, 166, 244
Irving, David, 207
Islam, 42–43, 53, 56, 92, 104, 217; Jihad (holy war) in, 218. See also Muslims
Israel: history of, 19; Arab hostility toward, 176, 178. See also Palestine
Italy, 64, 74, 81, 83; East African empire

- of, 64; declaration of war on Allies, 70–71
- Iwaichi, Fujiwara, 85–86
- Jainism, 101, 104
- Japan, 64, 74, 85, 87, 88–90, 218
- Jeffers, Robinson, 228
- Jehovah, 99
- Jerusalem, 20–21; first Temple of, 19; second Temple of, 209
- Jesus Christ, 117, 123, 129, 158
- Jeune Europe, 183, 190
- Jews, 99, 122–123, 125, 145, 178, 199, 209; contrasted to Aryans, 30; Jewish international finance (“money power”), 116, 157; “Jewish question”, 209; myth of Jewish world-conspiracy, 217, 222; Nazi restrictions on, 118; S. D.’s repugnance toward, 19, 23, 135. See also Anti-Semitism; Palestine; Protocols of the Elders of Zion
- Jinnah, Mohammed Ali, 89
- Jodl, Alfred, 163
- Jones, Sir William, 31
- Jordan, John Colin Campbell, 6, 187–206, 208–209, 213, 215, 224; Trafalgar Square rally, 192, 204; Vanguard Project, 215; See also National Socialist Movement (NSM)
- Judaeo-Christian heritage, 43, 93, 101, 123
- Judaism, 4, 92, 104, 228
- Julian the Apostate, Roman emperor, 56, 61–62
- Jung, Carl Gustav, 219–220
- Kaikeyi, epic queen, 27
- Kaires, Theophilos, 16–18; Theosevia theology of, 17
- Kali, 45, 76, 145
- Kalighat (Calcutta), 45
- Kali Yuga. See Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine)
- Kalki, 2, 118, 124–125, 218, 221
- Kaltenbrunner, Ernst, 163, 181
- Kameradenwerk (Nazi rescue organization), 173
- Kant, Immanuel, 29
- Kausalya, Queen, 27
- Keisel, Wilhelm, 163
- Kerr-Ritchie, Roland, 192, 194, 202–203
- Khomeyni, Imâm, 218
- Khomeyni, Rûhollâh, 218
- Klaproth, Julius von, 33
- Klenze, Leopold von, 15, 160
- Knights Templar, 219
- Koehl, Matt, 205, 209, 213–215, 223–224; Faith of the Future (1995), 213; The Future Calls (1972), 213
- Kohima, battle of, 75, 89
- Kolletis, John, 10, 18
- Koravas, 118
- Korean War, 197
- Kosala, Kingdom of, 28
- Kossinna, Gustav, 36
- Kramer, Josef, 141
- Kranti Dal (Party of Revolution), 58
- Krause, Ernst Ludwig, 34–35
- Krishna, 40, 118–120, 123, 125
- Krita Yuga. See Cycle of the Ages (Hindu doctrine)
- Kritik-Verlag, 217
- Kshatriyas* (warriors and nobles), 39, 122
- Kurukshetra, battle of, 118, 125
- Lakshmana, 26–27
- Landsberg am Lech, 149, 160–162
- Langobards, 7
- Lanz von Liebenfels, Jörg, 35
- Lassen, Christian, 33
- League of Empire Loyalists (LEL), 189
- League of Nations, 64
- Lebensraum*, 65
- Lebensreform*, 229
- Leconte de Lisle, Charles, 8, 26–27, 114, 129
- Leers, Gesine von, 178
- Leers, Johannes von, 176–179, 245
- Leese, Arnold, 188, 192
- Legion Europa, 190
- Lehmann, Johannes, 131
- Leonding, 120, 148, 150–152
- Lessing, Theodor, 175
- Leuchter, Fred A., 207
- Lewis, Harvey Spencer, 225
- Linz, 119–20, 148–150; Freinberg hill, 119–120; Kürnberg Castle, 149
- List, Guido von, 35; Guido von List Society, 231
- Lloyd George, David, 156
- Lutte du Peuple*, 216
- Lutyens, Sir Edward, 210

- Lyons, 7, 9, 12, 18, 27, 39, 127, 147, 180, 187; French Resistance in, 127; Klaus Barbie as Gestapo chief of, 173; University of, 16
- Lyons, Robert, 190
- Mahabharata*, 41, 109, 111–112, 118
- Mahakala, 116
- Maharashtra, 43, 59
- Mâhdi (Mohammed Ahmed), 218
- Malmédy, 161
- Malmö. See Neofascist International Conferences
- Malthus, Thomas, 226–228
- Man against Time, Hitler as, 118
- Manichaeism, 23, 36, 122, 158
- Mann, Thomas, 131
- Manson, Charles, 214
- Marathas, 47–49, 51, 69
- Marcus Aurelius, Roman Emperor, 7
- Marxism, 115, 122–123, 125, 199, 227; Marxist ecology, 228–227
- Mason, James N., 214–216, 225
- Mathura, 40, 54
- Mattern, Willibald, 211–212; UFOs: Unbekanntes Flugobjekt? Letzte Geheimwaffe des Dritten Reiches (1974), 211
- Maugham, Somerset, 77; Ashenden (1928), 77
- Mauthausen, 161
- McCarthy, Joseph, 197
- McCloy, John, 161
- Megali Idea*, 10–11, 19, 22. See also Greece
- Meinberg, Wilhelm, 171
- Men in Time, S. D.'s doctrine of, 115–117; Men above Time, 115, 117; Men against Time, 115, 117–118, 215; See also Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine); Man against Time, Hitler as
- Mendelssohn, Moses, 32
- Mengele, Josef, 173
- Millenarianism, 124–125, 140, 211, 231
- Minoan Crete, 127, 166
- Misanthropy, 92, 106–107, 139, 230
- Mithras, 25, 38, 98; Mithraism, 220
- Mitra, 38
- Mittanians, 97–98, 122
- Mongols, 30; Mongol Empire, 116
- Moonje, Balakrishna Shivaram, 45, 58–59
- Moser, Alois, 175
- Moses, 19, 31, 101
- Mosley, Sir Oswald, 183, 187, 192
- Movimento Sociale Italiano (MSI), 187, 218
- Muazzam, Prince, 48
- Mughal Empire, 47–49
- Muir, John, 228
- Mukherji, Asit Krishna, 67–77, 82–83, 89–90, 110, 180, 209–210, 248; doctoral thesis on “Third Rome”, 67; espionage on behalf of the Japanese, 73; services to the Third Reich, 67; studies in London, 68; writes A History of Japan (1945), 76. See also Eastern Economist, The; New Mercury, The
- Mukherji, Asoka, 68
- Mukteshwar Dal (Liberation Organisation), 59
- Müller, Ludvig, 24, 34
- Munich: birthplace of the Nazi movement, 69, 159–160; Brown House, 160, 194; Bürgerbräukeller, 160; Feldherrnhalle, 15, 148, 159, 167; Glyptothek, 15, 160; Hofbräuhaus, 159; Königsplatz, 15, 148, 160; Ludwigstraße, 15, 159; Munich Conference (1938), 64, 65; Nazi putsch, 15; Propylaea, 15, 160; Siegestor, 15
- Munro, Major, 144
- Muslims, 43–44, 48, 50, 52, 59, 218; Muslim League (India), 89
- Mussolini, Benito, 64, 80–81, 156, 181, 186
- Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, 11
- Mutemuya, 98
- Mutti, Claudio, 217–218
- Myatt, David, 215–216, 225
- Myceneans, 15, 23, 122
- Naess, Arne, 227
- Nanesaheb, 48
- Nash, Julia (S. D.'s mother), 7, 27, 127, 180, 223
- Nash, William (S. D.'s maternal grandfather), 7
- Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 175–176, 178
- Nasser, Nassiri, 174

- National Democratic Freedom Movement, 215
- National European Party, 187
- National Front (NF), 208, 215, 248
- Nationalism, 102, 195
- Nationalist, The*, 189
- National Labour Party (NLP), 189
- National Socialism (Nazism), 2, 4–5, 107, 110, 139–140, 169–170, 187, 191, 204–205; “blood and soil” doctrine, 93; S. D.’s support of, 13, 27. See also Third Reich
- National Socialist, The*, in Great Britain, 191
- National Socialist, The*, in U.S., 213
- National Socialist Liberation Front (NSLF), 214
- National Socialist Movement (NSM), 190–192, 194–195, 203–214, 215; Cotswold Camp, 193, 199, 204, 206, 208, 246; Princedale Road headquarters, 188–189, 191, 194–195; raid on, 202. See also Jordan, John Colin Campbell
- National Socialist White Peoples’ Party (NSWPP), 213–214
- National Socialist White Power Movement, 205
- National Socialist World*, 6, 205–206, 214
- National States’ Rights Party, 190, 205
- Native American Indians, 228, 231
- Nature worship, 104, 231
- Naumann, Erich, 161
- Naumann, Werner, 170
- Nebuchadnezzar, 19, 209
- Nefertiti, queen of Egypt, 93–94
- Nehru, Jawaharlal, 59, 82–83
- Neofascist International Conferences: Rome, 187; Malmö, 187; Venice, 187; Zurich, 187
- Neopaganism, 225, 230–231
- Neurath, Konstantin von, 163
- New Age, 3, 92, 210, 225–226, 230–231, 250
- New Mercury, The*, 67, 69, 72
- New Order: Axis world system, 27, 74, 93, 99, 104, 126, 146; U.S. neo-Nazi group, 224
- Nibelungenlied*, 149
- Nietzsche, Friedrich, 57, 101, 103, 220
- Nizam Civil Resistance movement, 62
- Noontide Press, 4, 229
- Nordland press, 221
- Normandy: Allied invasion of, 75; home of Françoise Dior, 208
- Northern European*, 191
- Nouvelle Résistance, 216
- Nouvel Ordre Européen (NOE), 183, 203. See also Neofascist International Conferences, Zurich
- NS Bulletin*, 213, 215, 224
- Nuremberg: Nazi Party rallies, 70, 149, 162–163, 167, 169; Nazi race laws, 121; Palace of Justice, 149, 163; trials (International Military Tribunal), 76, 128, 142, 163
- Obersalzberg, 148, 155–159, 244
- Occultism, 92, 210
- ODESSA (Organisation der ehemaligen SS-Angehörigen), 182, 184–185, 206; Bremen-Bari (B-B) escape line, 182
- Odin, 129; S.D. as priestess of, 220; Odinism, 231
- Ohisa, Mr. (Japanese Foreign Ministry), 82
- Ohlendorf, Otto, 122, 161, 164, 241
- Olympic Games, 14, 69
- On (Heliopolis), 94, 97
- Operation Barbarossa, 84
- Operation Werewolf, 181
- Order, The (U.S. neo-Nazi group), 214
- Order of Nine Angles (ONA), 216
- Ordine Nuova (Italian neofascist group), 218
- Ordo Sinistra Vivendi (OSV), 215
- Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), 225
- Organisation Armée Secrète (OAS), 183, 190, 216
- Organisation Lutte du Peuple, 216
- Oshima, Ambassador, 86
- Oskar, king of Sweden, 130
- Otto, king of Greece, 13, 15, 17
- Ow-Wachendorf, Wernher von, 67
- Palestine, 19–21, 122, 135; Balfour Declaration on, 20
- Pamir, 130
- Pandavas, 118
- Paris Exposition (1889), 34

- Parsons, Jack, 216
 Parsons, James, 30–31
 Parthians, 124
 Partido Nacional Socialista Obrero Chileno, 219
 Paul, Saint, 100, 117
 Paveió, Ante, 184
 Peiper, Jochen, 161
 Pendlebury, John, 95
 Penka, Karl, 35; Die Herkunft der Arier (1883), 35; Origines Ariacae (1886), 35
 Perón, Juan, 172
 Persia, 19, 33, 48, 73, 130
 Petrie, Sir Flinders, 95–96, 98; Tell-el-Amarna (1894), 96; A History of Egypt (1899), 96
 Pfeiffer, Franz, 219
 Philo, 123
 Pierce, William, 6, 205, 206, 214; The Turner Diaries (1978), 214
 Pirie, Denis, 191, 194, 203
 Pinochet, Augusto, 174
 Planned Parenthood/World Population, 226
 Plato, 63, 100
 Podewils-Durnitz, Count von, 67
 Pohl, Oswald, 161
 Poincaré, Henri, 22
 Poland, 142
 Ponworth, Mrs. (boardinghouse in London), 128
 Portas, M. (father of S.D.), 7, 18, 24
 Portas, Maximiani. See Savitri Devi
 Priester, Karl-Heinz, 183
 Primitivism, 231
 Primo de Rivera, José Antonio, 216
Protocols of the Elders of Zion, 217. See also Anti-Semitism; Conspiracy theory Pyramids (Giza), 3, 166, 179
 Pythagoras, 100
- Ra, 94
 Racism, 102, 195; as ecological imperative, 106, 230–231; Nordic racial type, 35, 69
 Raeder, Erich, 163
 Rama, 26–28, 58–59, 118–120, 123; proposed temple in Ayodha, 63
 Ramakrishna, 7
 Rama's Bridge, 27
- Ramayana*, 27, 41, 109, 118
 Rameswaram, 27, 54; festival, 27–28, 39, 76
 Randoopa Dancing Company, 130
 Rao, Balaji, 48–49
 Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS), 43, 45, 58–59, 62–63, 69, 111, 237
 Rassinier, Paul, 207
 Rationalism, 101–102, 230
 Raubal, Angela, 155
 Rauff, Walther, 174
 Rauti, Pino, 218
 Ravana, 27, 58
 Ravensbrück, 144
 Reichsfolk, 215
 Reitsch, Hanna, 219
 Remer, Otto Ernst, 170
 Renan, Ernst, 33
 Revelation, Book of, 124
 Rhineland, 64
 Ribbentrop, Joachim von, 83f, 163
 Rienzi, 119. See also Wagner, Richard Risguardo, 217
 Ritter, Karl, 33
 Rockwell, George Lincoln, 6, 193, 196–203, 205–206, 213–214, 224
 Roeder, Manfred, 221
 Romania, 75; Iron Guard (fascist organization) in, 184
 Romanticism, 26, 31–33, 36. See also Germany, Romantic movement in Rome: ancient world empire, 19, 41, 57, 122. See also Neofascist International Conferences
 Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 130
 Rosenberg, Alfred, 3, 36, 65, 91, 108, 213
 Rosicrucians, 219, 221, 225
 Rössler, Fritz, 183
 Roszak, Theodore, 227
 Rudel, Hans-Ulrich, 4, 171–175, 177–181, 186, 206, 208, 219, 223, 245
 Rudra, 167
 Runes, 129, 231
 Russell, Bertrand, 22
- Saint Loup, A. de (Marc Jean Pierre Augier), 220
 Sali, Mahmud, 177
 Sambhala (birthplace of Kalki), 124

- Samisdat Publishers (Toronto), 2, 3, 211, 222; Hollow Earth Expedition, 212
- Satanism, 6, 215, 221
- Satyananda, Srimat Swami, 44–45, 60, 110
- Satya Yuga. See Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine)
- Sauckel, Fritz, 163
- Savarkar, Ganesh, 46, 51, 54, 59
- Savarkar, Vinayak Damodar, 44–45, 49, 51, 54–55, 57–60, 62, 83, 90, 236; elected president of Hindu Mahasabha, 50; Hindutva (1923), 46, 49, 51; The War of Independence (1908), 46
- Savitri (female Hindu deity), 38
- Savitri Devi: ancestry and childhood, 7–8; ambition to broadcast in Third Reich, 70; antipathy toward “Ideas of 1789,” 8, 113, 115, 203; arrest in Cologne, 137; in Calcutta, 40; contempt for democracy, 138, 159; custody and trial, 137–141; devotee of Hitler, 44; embraces Aryan myth, 26–27, 39, 54; espionage on behalf of Japanese, 73; first propaganda tour in Germany (Nord-Express), 131–132; as Hindu Mission lecturer, 45, 70; identification with Aryan paganism, 44; identification with Greece, 7, 9, 12, 15–16; imprisonment at Werl, 132, 138, 140–147, 169; in Iceland, 129–130; leaves India after Second World War, 76; lives at Tagore ashram, 39; in London, 127–128; meets Sven Hedin, 130–131; misanthropy of, 8, 105–107, 127, 230; overland route through Middle East, 176–177; pilgrimage to Germany, 148–168; prewar visit to Egypt, 96, 240; release from Werl, 140, 146; returns to Europe in 1960, 181; return to Greece, 147; return to India, 180; rejection of man-centered creeds, 4, 28, 92, 99, 101, 113, 138; rejection of transcendence, 93, 96, 99, 101, 123; second propaganda tour, 132; studies and doctoral thesis on Theophilos Käires, 16–18; takes Hindu name, 40; third propaganda tour, 132, 136–37; travels to India, 27; visits Greece, 13–16; visits Palestine, 19–21; visits Sweden, 130. Publications: A Warning to the Hindus (1939), 52–62, 66; L’Etang aux lotus (1940), 40f; The Non-Hindu Indians and Indian Unity (1940), 72; Akhmaton’s Eternal Message (1940), 96; Joy of the Sun (1942), 96; A Son of God (1946), 92, 96, 99, 102–103, 117, 127, 225; Akhmaton. A play (1948), 129; Defiance (1950), 147, 206; Gold in the Furnace (1953), 132, 147, 206, 216; “And Time Rolls On” (1953), 221; Pilgrimage (1958), 119, 125, 149, 165, 176, 180, 213, 218; The Lightning and the Sun (1958), 2, 111, 119, 124, 130, 147, 165, 173, 176, 180, 205–206, 212, 215–216, 220; Impeachment of Man (1959), 3, 92, 104–108, 127; Hart wie Kruppstahl (c. 1963), 207; Souvenirs et réflexions d’une aryenne (1976), 213
- Schacht, Hjalmar, 182
- Schallmeyer, Wilhelm, 229
- Schenkl, Emilie, 90
- Schepmann, Richard, 221. See also Teut-Verlag
- Schilling, Andreas, 161
- Schirach, Baldur von, 163
- Schlegel, August Wilhelm, 31–33
- Schlegel, Friedrich, 31–33
- Schliemann, Heinrich, 23–24, 26, 34–35; excavations at Troy, 23–24; discovery of swastika as prehistoric ornament, 26; Palace of Iliion, 23
- Schmalstich, SS Major, 175
- Schmidt, Reinhold, 211, 247
- Schönbaumsfeld, Hans, 176
- Schrader, Georg, 223
- Schuon, Frithof, 218
- Schuschnigg, Kurt von, 156
- Sebottendorff, Rudolf von, 69
- Seipel, SS Major, 175
- Selimann, Heinrich, 175
- Selzam, Edward von, 67
- Semites, 28, 122
- Sarapis, 25
- Serrano, Miguel, 6, 219–222, 225; Adolf Hitler, el Ultimo Avatara (1984), 219; correspondence with S. D., 221; El Cordón Dorado (1978), 219; “Esoteric Hitlerism” of, 6, 219, 220–221; Manú:

- Serrano, Miguel (Continued)
por el hombre que vendra'' (1991), 219; meetings with Hermann Hesse and C. G. Jung, 219
- Sessions, George, 227–228. See also Deep Ecology
- Sèvres Treaty, 11, 13
- Seyss-Inquart, Arthur, 163
- Shamanism, 166–167, 231
- Shankara, 75, 111
- Shiva, 107, 116, 129, 139–140, 167, 216, 220
- Siege*, 214, 215
- Sima, Horia, 184, 218
- Singapore, 85–86
- Singh, Amar, 85
- Singh, Jai, Rajah of Jaipur, 48
- Singh, Mohan, 85–86, 88
- Singh, Pritam, 85
- Sita, 27
- Sivaji, 47–48, 58–59
- Skinheads, 6, 215
- Skorzeny, Otto, 5, 173, 175, 177, 181–187, 206, 219, 245
- Slim, General William, 89
- Smith, Bradley, 207
- Social Darwinism, 4, 229
- Socrates, 100
- Solomon, 19
- Somalia, 64
- Sombart, Werner, 217
- Souriau, Étienne, 22
- Soviet Union, 65, 68, 74, 84, 87, 110, 122, 125, 165, 170
- Sozialistische Reichspartei (SRP), 170
- Spain, 181–186; Civil War in, 64, 183–184; postwar, Nazi émigrés in, 5, 173, 174, 182
- Spann, Othmar, 217
- Spare, Austin Osman, 216
- Spearhead, 189, 191–192, 200–201
- Spearhead*, 204
- Speer, Albert, 156, 163
- Spengler, Oswald, 217
- Spiegel, Margaret, 42
- SS (Schutzstaffeln), 121, 187, 206; Ahnenerbe (Ancestral Heritage Office), 178, 220–221; Aryan pedigree to 1750, 121; Aryan wisdom of, 122–123; black uniforms and death's head insignia, significance of, 121; fugitive war criminals in Egypt, 175; Reich Security Main Office (RSHA), 163, 175–176, 181
- Stalin, Joseph, 110
- Stalingrad, battle of, 74
- Streicher, Julius, 143
- Stroessner, Alfredo, 173
- Sudetenland, 60, 64
- Suez, 27, 179
- Surya, 38
- Swadeshi movement, 78
- Swastika: as Aryan symbol, 24, 34–35, 67; as decoration on Schliemann's mansion; 24, 26; on Hissarlik terra-cotta whorls, 23; as holy Indian symbol, 4, 44, 62, 66, 69, 85, 107, 110; as National Socialist symbol, 136, 168; as neo-Nazi symbol, 187, 193–195, 201, 206, 214, 224; on pots at Königswalde, 23; S. D.'s gold pendant, 139
- Syria, 84
- Tagore, Rabindrath, 39, 42; ashram at Shantiniketan, 39
- Tamils, 28
- Tantricism, 216, 220
- Taoism, 228
- Tarun Hindu Sabha, 59
- Tell-el-Amarna, 95, 179
- Teutoburger Wald, 149, 165
- Teutons, 24, 122
- Teut-Verlag, 221
- Thadden, Adolf von, 170
- Thailand, 73, 85
- Thebes, 93, 97
- Theosophical Society, 127
- Theosophy, 35, 127, 220, 225, 235, 241
- Thielemann, Albert, 176
- Third Reich, 4–5, 13, 42, 62, 66–67, 69, 75, 83, 92, 110, 121, 126–128, 139, 141, 145, 157, 169–170, 173–174, 178, 186, 210–211, 216
- "Third Rome," Moscow as successor to Byzantium, 68
- Third World, 228–229
- Thiriart, Jean-François, 190, 216
- Thor, 129
- Thoreau, Henry, 228
- Thutmose IV, Pharaoh of Egypt, 98
- Thule Society, 69, 211, 238
- Tibet, 130, 211

- Tilak, Bâl Gangadhar (Lokmanya), 36–38, 58, 78, 235
- Tilly, Jan Tserklaes, Count of, 159
- Tippu, Sultan of Mysore, 72
- Titus, Emperor, 209
- Tiy, queen of Egypt, 93, 97
- TO ANTIAOTO* (Athens), 221
- Tojo, Hideki, 88
- Tommasi, Joseph Charles, 214–215
- Treblinka, 164
- Treta Yuga. See Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine)
- Trichinopoly, Rock of, 39
- Troy (Hissarlik), 23–24, 34
- Truman, Harry S., 161
- Turkey, 10–12, 20
- Tutankhamen, pharaoh of Egypt, 95, 99
- Tyndall, John, 6, 189–196, 200–201, 203–205, 208, 215
- U., Leokardia (“Katja”), 111, 165, 176
- UFOs, 3, 211–212, 220–221, 247
- Union Movment (UM), 183, 187, 192.
See also Mosley, Sir Oswald
- Unità Italica, 218
- United States: Hitler’s declaration of war against, 125; Japanese attack on, 85; neo-Nazi activity in, 198–199, 205, 213–215
- Universal Order, 214. See also Manson, Charles
- Upanishads*, 116
- Uranus, 38
- Urchs, Oswald, 82
- Ustaše (Croatian fascist organization), 184
- Vanguard Project, 215. See also Jordan, John Colin Campbell
- Varuna, 38, 98
- Vedas, 34, 37–38, 109, 212; Vedic deities, 98, 167; Vedic India, 24, 34, 49, 109
- Vegetarianism, 2–3, 8, 92, 107, 230
- Veltro, Edizioni all’onsegna del (publisher), 217
- Venice. See Neofascist International Conferences
- Venizelos, Eleftherios, 9–10
- Versailles Treaty, 10–13, 15, 23, 65, 69, 118
- Vickers, Colonel, 146
- Vikings, 7, 129
- Vishnu, 4, 44, 110, 118–119, 218, 220;
Vishnu Purana, 111–112, 124
- Vivekananda, 77–78
- Volcanoes, 76, 107
- Völkischer Beobachter*, 59
- Voltaire, 29
- Wagner, Richard, 33, 119, 150; Rienzi, 119
- Wagner, Winifried, 120
- Walendy, Udo, 207
- Wassmer, Gerhard, 137–138
- Weber, Mark, 207
- Weigall, Arthur, 96
- Weisthor, Karl (Karl Maria Wiligut), 178
- Wellesley, Lord, 71
- Wellington, Duke of, 71
- White Defence League, 189
- Whitehead, Alfred North, 22
- White Power*, 213
- White supremacism, 5, 30–33, 195, 199, 214, 222
- Whitman, Walt, 228
- Wilhelm II, German Emperor, 130
- Williams, Tony, 224
- Wilser, Ludwig, 35
- Wilson, Thomas, 235
- Winckelmann, Johann Joachim, 15
- Windsor, Duke and Duchess of, 156
- Wirth, Herman, 178, 220
- Witches, 231
- Woltmann, Ludwig, 35
- Woolley, Leonard, 95
- World Union of National Socialists (WUNS), 6, 187, 200–201, 203, 205–206, 213, 219; Cotswold Agreement (1962), 200–201. See also National Socialist Movement (NSM)
- Wotan, 220
- Wrede, Karl Philipp, 159
- Yama, 38
- Yockey, Francis Parker, 216
- Yoga, 73, 220
- Yonezawa, K., 72
- Yoshida, T., 72
- Ypsilantis, Alexander, 17
- Yuga, 111–125; Yuga avatar, 119–120, 124; See also Avatar; Cycle of the ages (Hindu doctrine)

Zen Buddhism, 103, 228
Zero Population Growth, 226
Zeus, 38
Ziller, Ernst, 23
Zionism, 19–20, 175
Zmigrodzki, Michael, 24, 34
Zoroastrianism, 118

Zündel, Ernst, 2–3, 6, 206–207, 209–213, 216, 222, 247; Hitler am Südpol?
(1979), 212; Secret Nazi Polar Expeditions (1978), 211–212
Zurich. See Neofascist International Conferences; Nouvel Ordre Européen
(NOE)

A SON OF GOD

THE LIFE AND PHILOSOPHY OF AKHNATON, KING OF EGYPT

by

Savitri Devi

1946

CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION — p. 1

PART I

THE WORLD'S FIRST INDIVIDUAL

CHAPTER I: Fleur Séculaire — p. 13

CHAPTER II: Prince Amenhotep — p. 19

CHAPTER III: Alone Against Millions — p. 39

PART II

THE RELIGION OF THE DISK

CHAPTER IV: The City of God — p. 69

CHAPTER V: The Way of Reason — p. 106

CHAPTER VI: The Way of Love — p. 140

CHAPTER VII: The Way of Beauty — p. 170

CHAPTER VIII: The Implications of the Religion of the Disk — p. 187

PART III

TRUTH VERSUS SUCCESS

CHAPTER IX: Unrest in Conquered Land — p. 215

CHAPTER X: The Reward of War — p. 251

CHAPTER XI: The Price of Perfection — p. 262

CHAPTER XII: Akhnaton and the World of Today — p. 275

HYMNS OF AKHNATON TO THE SUN — p. 304

DEDICATION TO MY HUSBAND

“Thou art in my heart;
There is no other that knoweth Thee,
Save Thy Son, Akhnaton.
Thou hast made him wise in Thy designs
And in Thy might.”
Akhnaton — Longer Hymn to the Sun
(Translation by Breasted)

“The modern world has yet adequately to value or even to acquaint itself with this man who, in an age so remote and under conditions so adverse, became the world’s first idealist and the world’s first individual.”

Breasted — History of Egypt, page 392

INTRODUCTION

Roughly fourteen hundred years before Christ, at the time Egypt was at the height of her power, King Akhnaton ruled over that great country for a few years.

He was a thinker; he was an artist; he was a saint — the world's first rationalist, and the oldest Prince of Peace. Through the visible disk of the Sun — Aton — he worshipped “the Energy within the Disk” — the ultimate Reality which men of all creeds still seek, knowingly or unknowingly, under a thousand names and through a thousand paths. And he styled himself as the Son of that unseen, everlasting Source of all life. “Thou art in my heart,” he said in one of his hymns, “and no one knoweth Thee save I, Thy Son.” And his words, long forgotten, have come down to us, recorded upon the walls of a nobleman's tomb — these amazing words in what is perhaps the earliest poem which can be ascribed with certainty to any particular author: “I, Thy Son. . . .”

Akhnaton is one of the very few men who ever put forth such a bold claim. The aim of this book is to show that, in doing so, he was no less justified than any other teacher of the truth, however impressive may appear the success of the latter contrasted with his defeat; however widespread may be his fame, contrasted with the total oblivion in which has lain the Egyptian king for the last thirty-three hundred years.

* * *

Who is a “son of God”?

There are men who vehemently deny the honour of that title to any person whosoever, in consistency with the fundamental idea of a transcendent God, above and outside the Universe and distinct from all that is within it. Others recognise no “Son” but the founder of their own creed, to whom they attribute a miraculous birth as the proof of a divine origin.

In harmony with an entirely different conception of God, we believe that any man who realises to the full that true relation of his finite individuality to the immanent, impersonal Essence of all things can call himself the Son of God — at once human and divine — for the relation of which he is then aware is one of substantial identity with that supreme Essence. We also believe that, properly speaking, the word “God” has no meaning except to those who have realised this. Such men are rare, always and everywhere. But they alone stand to justify the existence of the human species.

The aim of this book is to show that Akhnaton was one of those few men, and the earliest known, perhaps, among those whose life can be dated.

* * *

The failure of his teaching to survive him as an established religion can be regarded as one of the tragedies of history. We can explain it; we can even try to redeem it. But the bitter fact remains, for nothing can undo the past.

Other great souls have had disciples to preach their message, martyrs to bear testimony to their greatness in torture and death, missionaries to carry their name and domination to the limits of the earth; they have had commentators, admirers, detractors — philosophers, poets, artists — to keep their memory alive century after century. But Akhnaton’s fate was different. He had no sooner died than the fervour of his followers seems to have been spent out. Within a few years, his name was anathematised, his new city pulled down stone by stone, his remains profaned and his memory systematically destroyed, without, apparently, a single cry of protest on the part of any of those eighty thousand¹ or more who had, in their zeal, left Thebes with him, thirteen years before. Ever since then, until a part of his foreign correspondence and fragments of his hymns were brought to light, some fifty years ago, there was not a man on earth who knew of his existence. And to this very day, notwithstanding the genuine admiration of a learned few for his rational religion, there are hardly any people in the world whose daily life he fills with his presence.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), pp. 149-150.

Why?

Men who are in the habit of judging in haste will at once infer that his teaching cannot have been as perfect as those that have become the nucleus of living faiths.

But success is not the criterion by which one should decide on the value of a religion. In the diffusion of any doctrine far and wide there are too many factors at work for one to be able to ascribe its conquests to the sole amount of truth it contains. Moreover, it is only when that amount of truth appears to be of immediate and tangible use that it appeals to the herd of men sufficiently to help the propagation of the creed. The finer side of every religion is precisely that which escapes the attention and leaves unmoved the sensitiveness of its average followers. Therefore the number of people who profess a certain faith, and the extent of the geographical area in which it is recognised, prove nothing.

The quality of the nations that officially adhere to it does not stand any better as a guarantee of its value. For it is man who makes religion; not religion that makes man. Through some historic accident — migration, conquest, or the whims of some powerful chief — a sublime teaching can become and remain the collective creed of a pack of gross barbarians. They will no doubt misunderstand it; but they will, none the less, hold sacred the whole mythology and symbolism that tradition has attached to it. And reversely one has seen — and one sees still — cultured, progressive, rationally-trained nations adhere to childish dogmas invented or accepted by their uncritical ancestors. True, they do not fail to produce subtle theologians to interpret the nonsense in terms of hidden wisdom. But nonsense it remains.

A religion should be judged in itself, independently of its real or apparent influence upon any society, apart from its success or failure among men. And its founder — when it has a founder — is the only man whose life and personality one should consider when speaking of it. Judged in that manner, from the sole standpoint of its inner beauty, Akhnaton's simple and rational religion, of which hardly anybody knows, can be compared advantageously with recognised faiths professed by millions of men. And its promoter, with perhaps not more than one or two living disciples, can nevertheless be ranked among the divine souls that honoured this earth — among those whom we call “incarnations” or “Sons of God.”

* * *

We can now try to explain why the worship of Aton failed to endure as an organised collective cult. From the little that can be gathered of it through the existing fragments of Akhnaton's hymns and through the history of his life, one can assert, to say the least, that it was far in advance of the time in which it appeared.

The abyss that separates a man of genius from his contemporaries does not necessarily awe them into accepting his leadership. If it be the result of his superiority in technical knowledge or in skill, it will make him powerful — a hero, a worker of wonders, a giant of war or of industry, whatever be the case. His counsels will soon be followed, and his inventions or discoveries soon admired and put to ever-increasing application because of the obvious advantages that they immediately procure. But if it be the abyss that separates a perfect man from the average human cattle, a rational mind and an enlightened soul from the superstitious crowd of believers; an all-loving, all-understanding heart, from the narrowly selfish majority of men, then, it only helps to render the great one lonely and powerless. The greater the difference between himself and his people, the lesser the immediate success of the man of moral, philosophical or religious genius. His words, his actions meet with no understanding; his lofty example has no imitators; the creation he strives to bring forth remains a dream. To be technically in advance of one's time is a source of strength, an assurance of worldly achievements; to be morally or philosophically ahead of it, is not.

The towering superiority of Akhnaton over his fellow-men has no parallel in the mechanical sphere. “Were it invented to satisfy our modern scientific conceptions,” his religion “could not be logically improved upon at the present day,” writes Sir Flinders Petrie.¹ Could we imagine a man of the fourteenth century B.C. in possession of the secret of our modern aeroplanes, we would then realise what would have been the mechanical equivalent of Akhnaton’s religious revolution. The very idea of it shatters us by its enormity. But, while our imaginary inventor could have safely conquered the world with the help of a single aircraft, the earliest rationalist failed to convince a minimum number of disciples capable of carrying on his work. His teaching “suitable for our own times,” met little response in his. Those who could easily have gathered it from his lips and transmitted it to posterity in all its details, were not moved to do so. And we, who would have done so, were not yet born. That is the main reason why nothing was left of it after the thirteen glorious years during which it flourished.

There are other reasons for its extinction.

One of them is that the cult of Aton was too rational to appeal to the average people of any time. Another is that Akhnaton himself was too good — and perhaps too farsighted, also — to establish it by means of violence.

Three elements seem to have contributed to the propagation of every widespread religion: a mythology; miracles; and a more or less definite doctrine concerning the hereafter. (By “mythology,” I mean the true or fictitious story of all natural or supernatural beings connected with the creed: men, angels, beasts, saints, demons, gods, etc.) I do not know of a religion which has stood up to now the test of time without one or two, at least, of these three elements. And most of the great international creeds owe much to all three.

But the cult of Aton seems to have been devoid of all three from the start. That is perhaps why some modern authors have called it a philosophy rather than a religion. But it did possess that stamp of devotion that distinguishes a religion from a philosophy. It was not purely a philosophy, whatever one may say. It even comprised a daily ritual, with hymns and music, incense and flowers. It was a religion, but one which offered its followers, at the same time, rational thought, the warmth of devotion, and a stately display of sensuous beauty.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

But there were no marvellous tales connected with it. The one theme that could have become the centre of a whole literature, had the religion lasted a little longer, was the life of its Founder. And that was too simple, too human, too obviously natural to impress the coarse imagination of the commoners.

Akhnaton, in his love of truth, seems to have deliberately stripped himself of all the mystery that had helped his fathers to appear as gods in the eyes of their prostrate people. He was of unconventional manners and of kindly approach. His divinity was not the showy privilege of a Sun-born king, or of a prophet, asserted by external signs, but rather the innermost perfection of a man whose heart, will and understanding were in complete harmony with the eternal laws of life; of a man who had fulfilled man's divine purpose as naturally as others drift away from it. He felt therefore no need of ascertaining it by a fastidious pomp, any more than by strange renunciations. There was no excess in him; nothing that the vulgar eye could look upon as "striking," nothing that popular enthusiasm could catch hold of and magnify. He wrought no extraordinary deeds, as other teachers are said to have done. The only wonder of which he spoke was the everlasting miracle of order and of fertility — the rhythm of day and night, the growth of a bird or of a baby.

And he brought with him, apparently, no new ideas about death, and put no stress upon the ones that were common in Egypt in his time. From the beautiful prayer inlaid upon his coffin, and probably composed by himself, one infers that he believed in the eternal life of the soul. But that is all. No allusion to the nature of that life beyond death, and especially not a single reference to sin, reward and punishment can be found in at least what has survived of the young king's hymns, or in the inscriptions in the tombs of the nobles who boast of having “hearkened to his teaching.” Not that the religion of Aton was in any way devoid of a moral character, as some of its modern judges¹ have supposed — a gratuitous assumption, contradicted by the very motto of Akhnaton’s life: “Living in Truth.” But its morality concerned what one was rather than what one did. It was the inherent character of a harmonious life rather than the outcome of any catalogue of “dos” and “don’ts.” As all natural things are, it was foreign to the idea of promises and threats. And that was a reason for it not to appeal to a number of followers. Most men do not want true morality any more than true religion. They want mythologies and miracles to wonder at, and police regulations to abide by; illusions in this world, and punishments and rewards in eternity. In one word, they want eternity made small and exciting to suit the measure of average life. They do not want life simply stripped of its shallowness and made divine — “life in truth.” And as Akhnaton had nothing else but that to offer them, his teaching left them indifferent. It did not spread beyond the narrow circle of courtiers.

* * *

The one means by which he could have secured its success as an international creed was violence.

The religion was, indeed, far in advance of its time and of many future ages. And it lacked the elements that generally make a creed popular. Men would, no doubt, have misinterpreted it, misused it, and degraded it within a few years. But it would have spread. Force of money and force of arms can make any people accept any faith, even one that does not suit them. And Akhnaton was both the most powerful and the richest king of his days. We are convinced that, had he chosen to use his strength to impose his new cult upon the world, he would probably have largely succeeded.

But he felt too deeply and he knew too much to sacrifice the spirit of his doctrine to an illusory triumph. Far from using violence to propagate his religion, he did not even persecute those who tried to destroy it. As a result, it is they who enjoyed the thrill of triumph — for the time being. It is they who imposed their will upon the world. They wanted Akhnaton to be cursed, and so he was; they wanted him to be forgotten, and so he was; it was their will that never, never again the world should hear his name, and for over three millenniums the world did not.

¹ J. D. S. Pendlebury: Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1935), pp. 156-157. Also Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, and Egyptian Monotheism, pref. XV; also pp. 114-115.

But his beautiful, rational teaching, however incompletely known, remains unstained by superstition, unmarred by compromise, unconnected with any of the crimes committed, in course of time, in the name of many a successful religion; pure, whole, as its Founder conceived it — a thing of beauty for all ages to come.

* * *

But if there are psychological reasons for which Akhnaton's teaching had little chances of becoming one of the widespread creeds of the world, it could have remained, at least, the religion of an elite. It could have; and it most probably would have, in different surroundings. One of its main features is the diversity of its appeal. It satisfies reason; it fulfils our highest aspirations towards the beautiful; it implies love, not of man alone, but of all creatures. In the midst of general superstition and strife, the better men could have sought in it an ideal to live up to. A pious tradition could have kept the name of Akhnaton sacred to the few who are worthy to know of him.

But such a tradition was never started, or at least never permitted to develop. Egypt, in the fourteenth century B.C., was already too deeply engrossed in formalism to respond to the forgotten message of living life. And the countries around her were either too barbaric or too decadent to understand it. Strangled at home by priestly fanaticism and by popular indifference, the new religion was submerged, abroad, amidst a crowd of conflicting practical faiths that promised men tangible advantages in this world as well as in the next. Persecuted as an organised cult, it soon ceased to exist even as a secret worship. To keep it alive, it would have needed an atmosphere of earnestness and of toleration, a truly religious atmosphere as it was difficult to find anywhere on earth for many centuries, except perhaps among a minority of Hindus.

We may remark here that none of the lofty doctrines of antiquity which originated before Christianity have survived, west of India. And, unexpected as this may seem, India might well be the only land that would have given the youthful worshipper of Radiant Energy a place worthy of him in his time, had she heard of his teaching; the only land, also, who probably would have continued to venerate him to this very day as one of the incarnations of the Supreme Soul.

* * *

The aim of the present book is to tell the world how perfect Akhnaton was.

We believe that no teaching would meet, better than his, the exigencies of the critical modern mind. Yet, it is not our intention to try to revive it on a broad scale, as the basis of a public cult. We do not think it desirable to attempt what its Founder himself does not seem to have aimed at — he who, though fully conscious of its universal value, did not try to explain it to the many. With all their pride in progress, our times are no less foolish and no less barbaric than his. We now use electric fans, while in Thebes they did not; that is about all the difference. The resuscitated religion of Cosmic Energy would soon offer, in the hands of any crowd, as ludicrous a sight as that of the great “living” faiths of to-day. We do not wish to rob the other world-teachers of a few millions of insignificant admirers in order to give a noisy following to the great man who is dear to us. We know too well, through daily experience, what the quality of that following would be.

But we do wish to make the name and teaching of Akhnaton popular among the best of our contemporaries — among those who really represent the higher tendencies of our sceptical and at the same time mystical age; among those to whom dogmas no longer appeal, whom wonders no longer impress, whom religion without a background of positive knowledge, and science without the feeling of the seriousness of life, leave equally unsatisfied. It is among such people that we earnestly wish to revive the spirit of him who, a thousand years before Socrates and nearly nine hundred years before the Buddha, united the boldest rationalistic views to the deep intuitive certitude of the oneness of God, the oneness of Life, and the brotherhood of all creatures.

Modern scholars have already recognised his undeniable greatness. The earliest and most eminent of all those specialists who have laboured to revive his memory among the learned, Sir W. Flinders Petrie, has paid him a magnificent tribute.¹ But what we want also is that Akhnaton's name be held sacred by all those who, without being scholars, can think in terms of truth and feel in terms of beauty and who are capable of modelling their lives on an immortal example of living perfection.

More so, if few be likely to live up to the spirit of his teaching, let all at least know that there has been such a man as he, once, long long ago. Let them remain superstitious, vulgar and violent, if they will; but let them know that there has been a man in whose life religion and reason walked hand in hand; a man whose very being was harmony, balance, supreme elegance, and who lost an empire for the sake of truth. Few meditate upon the beauty of the Sun; yet all behold it. Above man's unchanging mediocrity He shines in glory. In a similar manner, worshipped by a few, but familiar to all after thirty-three hundred years of silence, we want the name of Akhnaton, Son of the Sun, young for ever, to live once more in the consciousness of our old world.

This will no doubt appear as a stupendous dream.

The aim of this book is to make others feel that the dream will become true the moment they sincerely realise its beauty.

¹ In his History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 214 and 218. Also in his Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1894), pp. 41-42 (§102).

11-12

Part I

THE WORLD'S FIRST INDIVIDUAL

CHAPTER I

FLEUR SÉCULAIRE

Akhnaton was born in Thebes, in about 1395 B.C.¹ in a world already as old, as civilised and as sophisticated as our own. And he was the son of the greatest monarch of that world; the last offspring, in direct descent, of a long and glorious line of warriors over-loaded with the spoils of conquest; the heir of an empire that stretched, in modern words, from the Sudan to the borders of Armenia, and of a culture more than four thousand years old.

When he was a child, the famous Pyramids of Gizeh were nearly as ancient as the Roman remains in England are today, and the first empire-builder of whom we know something definite — Sargon of Agade — was already as remote in time as Nebuchadnezzar is now.² And beyond the glories of which the oldest monuments bore witness, and beyond the mighty shadows of half-forgotten heroes and king-gods lost in the midst of legend, a still remoter antiquity, with its immemorial art and wisdom, extended over centuries, down to the dim beginnings of the Neolithic Age, and further still. Crete and the Ægean Isles had flourished for over two thousand years, and Babylonia and Elam for several millenniums more, while, unaware of each other and of the rest of mankind, distant India and China counted long centuries of polished life.

If, indeed, instead of letting ourselves be over-impressed by the few hundreds of years that separate us from him, we stop to consider the endless length of time that separates both Akhnaton and ourselves from the mysterious origins of civilisation, we might well look upon him as a man of yesterday, almost as one of our contemporaries.

¹ According to Sir Flinders Petrie, who places his accession in 1383 B.C. (History of Egypt, Vol. II, p. 205). L. W. King and H. R. Hall (Egypt and Western Asia, p. 365) place his reign half a century earlier, and Arthur Weigall places it from 1375 to 1358 (Life and Times of Akhnaton, new and revised edit., 1922, p. I; Tutankhamen and Other Essays, p. 80).

² According to Nabonidus. See Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. I, p. 155. Sir C. Leonard Woolley, however, believes him to be of a much later period. (See Ur of the Chaldees, A Record of Seven Years of Excavation (Edit. 1929), pp. 160 and 203; or Pelican Books Edit., 1937, pp. 76, 112, 142).

He was the tenth Pharaoh of that glorious Eighteenth Dynasty which opens the period known in history as the “New Kingdom.”

His ancestors, the kings of Thebes, had freed Egypt from foreign domination; his great-great-grandfather had made her the head of an empire; his father had made her the abode of unprecedented splendour.

Sporadic revolts in Nubia and in Syria had been utterly crushed, and peace had at last succeeded the unceasing struggles of the former reigns. From all parts of the immense empire, tribute in gold and silver, in ivory and slaves and cedar wood, poured in regularly. King Amenhotep the Third, whom some modern writers have rightly called Amenhotep the Magnificent, lived a life of pleasure in the midst of every kind of luxury, with a number of beautiful wives and concubines collected from every country of the known world.

The granaries were full and the people content. Thousands of foreign slaves — the prize of war — were toiling for the welfare of Egypt: tilling the fields, digging or repairing canals, extracting gold from the Nubian mines, dragging down the Nile huge barges loaded with granite, building temples and palaces and keeping the highways in good condition. And the faraway kings of Babylon and of Mitanni — the Pharaoh’s brothers-in-law — and the king of the Hittites and the king of barbaric Assyria wrote with equal greedy envy, in their despatches to Amenhotep the Third: “Verily, in thy land, gold is as common as dust.”

Every refinement in pleasure, every treasure of art, every subtlety of thought, every comfort, every delicacy, every brilliancy was to be found in Thebes. Nothing equalled the beauty of its monuments, the pomp of its festivities, the wealth of its priests who enjoyed throughout the world a reputation of mysterious powers and of hidden wisdom. Its temples, of which the gigantic ruins still stir the admiration of travellers, stood then in all their glory. Their half-dark halls inspired something of that sacred awe that one feels in the cave-temples of medieval India; and their rows of mighty pillars with lotus-shaped capitals displayed already that harmony of proportions, that grace blended with majesty, that perfect elegance that was one day to distinguish the art of Periclean Greece.

Thebes was not merely the metropolis of the greatest empire then existing, not merely one of the largest and most sumptuous cities that the world had ever seen; it was the masterpiece in which the genius of the Near and Middle East had finally expressed itself, after having groped for centuries in quest of perfection. It seemed as though nothing could be added to its beauty.

It seemed, also, as though nothing could be added to its glory.

Along with the words of praise to all the gods, that covered the walls and columns, the crowds of worshippers that thronged the halls of the temple of Karnak could read in golden hieroglyphics, on a slab of black granite, the song of war and triumph of King Thotmose the Third, the words of the Theban god to the maker of Egypt's greatness:

“I have come; I have granted thee to trample over the great ones of Syria; I have hurled them beneath thy sandals in their lands...”

It is one of the most beautiful hymns of victory of all times. Its echo had run through the world from the Nile Valley to the Black Sea and to the Persian Gulf, from the Libyan Desert to the boundaries of India. And as he beheld the solemn words, the Egyptian pilgrim was filled with national pride. What song would ever efface the glory of that one?

Thus, in wealth, in splendour and in warrior-like fame stood Thebes, the capital of the first nation of the earth, the seat of divine royalty, the proud City of Amon, the mighty god. Millenniums of culture had created it; the skill of all known lands had adorned it. And the sword of its kings had spread far and wide the glory of its name and the terror of its local deity whom the priests had boldly identified with Ra, the immemorial Sun-god of the Egyptians.

It is then that he came.

* * *

On the western bank of the Nile, upon a site which to this day retains its loveliness, was built the Charuk palace, the residence of the Pharaoh Amenhotep the Third.

It was a light but beautiful structure of brick and precious wood, decorated with exquisite paintings and surrounded by immense gardens full of shade and full of peace.

From the terraces of the palace one beheld to the east, beyond the Nile and its palm-groves, white walls contrasted with dark shadows, flat roofs of different levels, flights of steps, broad avenues and gardens and monumental gates: all that glory that was Thebes. In the foreground, the towering pylons of the great temple of Amon emerged above the outer walls of the sacred enclosure that stretched over miles. And the gilded tops of innumerable obelisks glittered in the dazzling light or glowed like red-hot embers in the purple of sunset. One could distinguish many other temples dedicated to all the gods of Upper and Lower Egypt, temples with doors of bronze and gates of granite, of which the humblest would have been the pride of any other city.

To the west, the eye wandered over the vastness of the desert.

It is in that palace that Akhnaton was born.

His mother, Queen Tiy, was the chief wife of Amenhotep the Third, and one of the ablest women of all times. While her weary lord, after experiencing in his long life of pleasure the vanity of all pursuits, had gradually brushed aside the tiresome duties of kingship, it was she who received the foreign ambassadors, gave orders to provincial governors and drafted the despatches that messengers were to carry to Babylon or to the faraway capital of the Hittites. It was she who, through a well-organised network of informers, kept an eye on the restless vassal princelings of Syria as well as on the movements of the unconquered tribes below the Fourth Cataract of the Nile; she who saw to it that the public officers did their work well, and that the taxes came in without delay.

Consort of the mightiest monarch, and the virtual ruler of his empire no less than the head of his “house of women,” she had enjoyed all through her twenty-six years of married life every pleasure, every luxury and every glory that a woman can imagine in her wildest dreams. For her the gardens around the Charuk palace had been extended and adorned at great cost with an artificial lake. For her the priests of the oldest Sun-god, Ra — which they also called Aton, the Disk, in the sacred city of On, his abode — enjoyed favour at court in spite of the secret jealousy of the powerful priests of Amon, for the god of On was Tiy’s favourite god. In pomp and power the queen’s years had drifted away. She was fairly past thirty-five, and perhaps not far from forty, when at last she bore the little prince, her only son.

The babe’s coming into the world was greeted by the joy of a whole nation. Sacrifices of thanksgiving were offered to the gods of Egypt; distant vassals from North and South welcomed through their messengers the child who was one day to be their lord, and allied monarchs congratulated the king, his father, in friendly despatches.

But the birth of Akhnaton was a greater event than anyone in his days could realise. The world was already old, as we have said — as old as it is now. Men had already invented many arts and many gods, and built up many kingdoms. The infant who, in the Charuk palace, now smiled for the first time to the Sun, was, in a few years, to transcend the very idea of nation, to preach the oneness and universality of the Principle of all existence, and to show men the way of life in truth, which is also life in beauty — life divine upon earth. That he was to proclaim — less by his words than by his deeds, less by his deeds than by his attitude towards things — which the weary world had dimly sought, age after age; which those who know him not are still seeking: the synthesis of total knowledge and perfect love.

His life, which had just begun, was to last very little indeed: less than three decades. Yet, in that short span of time, he was to be what neither the victories of his fathers, nor the wealth and wisdom of his country, nor the arts and glories of all the ancient kingdoms had succeeded in producing: a perfect Individual of equal genius and sanctity — a divine Man.

His mother, who had grown-up daughters but no male child, may well have looked upon his birth as the fulfilment of her long, active and sumptuous life. It was, in no less manner, the culmination of a long evolution towards the rational and the beautiful, the ultimate achievement of the oldest cultures of the world, already so fruitful in outstanding creations. Like unto the cactus-tree which, so they say, blooms after a hundred years into one resplendent flower that lasts less than a day,¹ Egypt had lived and dreamt and toiled four thousand years — and mankind perhaps fifty times longer — in order to produce him whose life was to remain in history only a flash — but a flash of unsurpassed beauty.

¹ “Et le grand aloès à la fleur écarlate,
Pour l’hymen ignoré qu’a rêvé son amour,
Ayant vécu cent ans, n’a fleuri qu’un seul jour.”
José-Maria de Hérédia, in “Fleur Séculaire” (Les Trophées).

CHAPTER II

PRINCE AMENHOTEP

There is no historical record of Akhnaton's life before he succeeded his father as king of Egypt. What we know definitely about him at an earlier date is very little. We know, for instance, that his parents had conceived him in an advanced age, and that he was given at his birth the name of Amenhotep — his father's name — which means "Amon is at rest," or "Amon is pleased" (the name under which he is famous in history he chose himself later on). We know that he was, as a baby, committed to the care of a woman — the "great royal nurse" — who bore, like the queen herself, the name of Tiy, and was the wife of Ay, a court dignitary and a priest. We know also that he was married, some time before his father's death, to a princess called Nefertiti, of whom it is not certain whether she was an Egyptian or a foreigner. That is practically all that can be gathered from the written documents so far brought to light, about the first part of a life so remarkable.

But if nothing precise can be stated about the facts of those early years, yet, from what we know of Amenhotep the Third's "house of women" and its inmates, something can be inferred of the atmosphere in which the royal child was brought up. And something, too, we can expect to guess of his first reactions to the world around him, in the light of all that we know of his subsequent life.

* * *

To say that he was the son of parents of mature age is already to suggest some prominent traits of his personality, such as eagerness, seriousness of mind, depth. To add that he was not, like most babies, the casual product of a moment's fancy, but the fruit of yearning and of prayer no less than of pleasure, not only accepted but intensely desired; to recall that his mother — herself an exceptional woman — with all her power and glory, with the love of her lord and the graceful presence of several daughters was not happy until he, a son, was born to her; that she longed for him, year after year, as for the one blessing she could dream of, is to explain, to some extent, how he was no average child, and could never grow into an average man. Few children indeed ever were so desperately wanted — and so much loved — as the only son of Amenhotep the Third and Queen Tiy.

The queen, as we have said, was surely over thirty-five, and perhaps not far from forty at the time of his birth — an age which is not young for a woman in any climate, and which, in the tropics, in the days of Egypt's greatness just as now, was considered old. We may try to imagine her feelings when she came to know that she was once more to become a mother, long after her daughters had grown up; her joy for an event that had so long seemed unlikely, if not impossible, and then the hopes, the dreams she had concerning him who was not yet born; the prayers she addressed to the most powerful gods and goddesses, especially to her favourite deities, for the welfare and future greatness of her child. Those ardent hopes, those dreams, that fervour of prayer, that constant anxious thought concentrated on him in an expectation of glorious days to come, were the very earliest influences upon the formation of Akhnaton's personality — the earliest, and the most impossible to retrace, but certainly not the less powerful, nor the less important.

* * *

The god whom Tiy worshipped was Aton — the Disk — the oldest Sun-god of Egypt. The seat of his venerable cult was not Thebes, but the sacred city of Anu or On — “the city of the obelisk” — which the Greeks were one day to call Heliopolis, “the city of the Sun.” The priests of On were less wealthy but more thoroughly versed in ancient wisdom than those of Thebes. For a generation or two they had been trying to make their deity popular in the great metropolis, and especially at court. They hoped that, if they succeeded, the god would recover all over Egypt the prominent place which he held of old. And they had succeeded to some extent. People were beginning to add to the name of the mighty Amon, in votive inscriptions, that of the elder god.¹

And when he had inaugurated the newly-built artificial lake in the gardens around his palace, the Pharaoh had named the pleasure-boat in which he had glided over its waters with Tiy, his chief wife, Tehen-Aton, i.e. "Aton gleams."²

But the name of Aton was still that of a secondary god among many. Tiy herself was far from looking upon him as the only god worth praying to; she had grown up, like everybody else, in a world full of various deities, and her father, Yuua, was a priest of Min, the fertility-god. Yet she was impressed by the great antiquity of the cult of the Disk. Perhaps also did she realise, with her sharp intelligence, that there was much more in the less popular religious traditions of the priests of On than in the pious devices that the ministers of Amon in Thebes were in the habit of using to impress the people, and sometimes to force their will upon the kings. She probably disliked their increasing grip upon public affairs and, without wishing to displease them openly (for she was a worldly-wise woman), she dreamt within her heart of a new order of things more in accordance with the rights of royalty. Perhaps she had already the dim presentment of a possible conflict between Aton and Amon, as of a struggle of royalty against priestcraft.

Whatever might have been her aspirations at the moment, there can be little doubt that they coloured her conception of her child's greatness. The child would be a son — that was certain; the queen had too long waited and prayed and hoped for her to be disappointed once more. But that is not all; he would be a providential child, a man the like of which are born once in many hundreds of years; he would put an end to the arrogance of the priests of Amon, restore the cult of the old Sun-god of On on a wide scale, reassert the meaning of divine kingship, and surpass in power and glory all his forefathers.

¹ A stele of the two brothers, Hor and Suti, overseers of the works of Amon in Thebes. (British Museum, Stele 475.) See Sir Wallis Budge's Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (edit. 1923), p. 46.

² James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 90.

Were these the thoughts of Queen Tiy while day after day she felt the unborn prince come into being within her body? It is difficult to say. All one can state is that it was natural for a woman with her ambitions to entertain such thoughts and that, if she did so, her hopes were to be rewarded a hundredfold — though not in the way she might have expected.

* * *

The young prince spent his early years in his father's "house of women." To judge by what we know of his health all through his life, and also by some of the portraits of his boyhood, he was probably a delicate if not a sickly baby, perhaps also a premature one. Though, as we repeat, there is no information to be gathered concerning the very first part of his life, we may, with some chances of not making a mistake, imagine him, when four or five years old, as a quiet, slender boy with a long neck, delicate features, large dreamy eyes, pretty hands like those of a girl, and nothing of the boisterousness of ordinary children of his age.

The uncompromising spirit that he showed, hardly ten years later, as a king, leads us to believe that he already had a strong personality, and that he was conscious of it; also that he loved truth and was incapable of dissimulation. This must have urged him, more than once, to rebel against whatever shocked him or simply bored him; to speak when he was not expected to, and often to take a hasty initiative in matters which the grown-ups preferred to reserve for themselves. It is likely that he used to put a quantity of puzzling questions, as most intelligent children do — many of which, no doubt, were unanswerable, but others that he was himself to answer, one day, in the most eloquent manner. It is likely, too, that he never obeyed but those whom he really loved, and then only after asking many "whys" and "what fors." In one word, if conventional behavior be the measure of what is “good,” then many a well-intentioned pedagogue might have called him a “naughty child.” That much-used adjective is equally applied to children who are worse and to others who are better than their environment. Prince Amenhotep was of the latter.

* * *

The greatest and most lasting influence to exert itself upon the royal child was surely that of his mother. His father, who had prematurely grown old, loved him, no doubt, who was his only son and heir. But he had put in him less hopes, less dreams than the queen had, for he was himself weary, and took less interest than she did in the future, even in the present. It was several years since he had practically let the burden of government lie upon his able chief-wife, whom he knew he could trust. It is probable that he also relied entirely on her for the education of his son.

As already stated, the queen was a worshipper of the solar god of On, Aton — the Disk. She must have taught the child to render homage to him at sunrise and sunset. The boy, who was born an artist, opened his heart to the beauty of the Sun.

It is likely that many times his mother’s sweet words rang in tune with his rapture in front of a glowing sky, in which the Disk appeared or disappeared. He saw the fiery reflection of the Sun upon her face, which it beautified, while she repeated to him, in a tender voice, something of what the wise men of On and her own common sense had taught her about the beneficent Lord of the Two Horizons. He watched the birds fly round and round, with joyous thrills, as the Sun flooded the gardens, the Nile and the western hills with pink morning light, and the queen told him that they were glad because He, the Father of all creatures, had come back. She showed him in the ponds the water-flowers that had just opened to receive His warm kiss. And he looked at them, and understood that they were alive, like himself; and he loved them, and loved the birds and the beasts and the many-coloured insects, and all things that live and feel the Sun's caress.

It is true that the history of his early years is not recorded; and even if it were, would history have remembered to note the small facts of daily life, psychologically so important? Yet, one can well imagine Prince Amenhotep, a delicate and sensitive child, stooping to pick up a fledgling fallen from its nest, because he felt for the fragile drop of life, or smoothing down with his little hands the burning-hot fur of a cat lying in the sun — a sight so common in ancient Egypt, where those graceful felines were universally cared for — and enjoying to see how, while it purred, it kept gazing at the faraway Disk with its half-shut emerald eyes. He loved the Sun as a living and loving God, and, being by nature kind to living creatures, he loved them all the more, in Him. His mother encouraged him in that true, spontaneous piety, so different from the vain display of bigotry she had so often witnessed among grown-up people. And the Disk, of which he was one day to evolve a personal conception more lofty than anything Tiy could dream of, was always to retain, in his subconscious mind, the indefinable charm of things we have loved from childhood and which remain intertwined with our dearest associations.

The queen, however, was no monotheist, and surely no philosopher, and we think it would be a great mistake to attribute to her early influence the essential of Akhnaton's religious ideas. They were decidedly his own. The only thing that one can say is that his mother was one of the factors (and the most effective one, probably) which helped him, from the very beginning, to find his way. That she did, and no more. But that was enough. And besides the positive influence she exerted by directing him to ponder over the beauty of the Sun, she played also a negative part, equally important. She helped to create around him the psychological conditions in which the whole religion of Egypt, with the exception of the ancient Heliopolitan solar cult, would appear to him the least lovable. She did not create the facts that would have impressed him anyhow as he grew to know them: the dead ceremonial of the temples of Amon, "as intellectually low and primitive,” in the words of Arthur Weigall,¹ “as its state of organisation was high and pompous”; the hypocrisy of the priests, whose piety was dwindling as their wealth and power increased; the superstition of the people, and that narrow national pride which, kindled by constant victories, had become more and more aggressive since the liberation of the country from the yoke of the Hyksos. But, willingly or unwillingly, she probably drew his attention to some of those facts — and to many others — as soon as he could think. And even earlier still, stray remarks of hers about the priests of Amon, whom she did not like, and about their impressive tricks, which she probably detested, must have made it impossible for him to feel, towards those sacred persons, the respect — not to speak of the awe — that generations of princes had felt; impossible even for him, perhaps, to take their faith seriously.

It is quite plausible to suppose that on more than one occasion the child, who was extremely intelligent, overheard such bitter remarks. Moreover, he was soon given preceptors who, apart from reading and writing and the elements of the sciences of his age, taught him what he should know of the history of his fathers. In a country in which everything was calculated to impress upon the future king the consciousness of his divine origin, every mark of supernatural favour shown by the gods to his family must have been stressed to the utmost. And Prince Amenhotep was surely told of such miracles as that, for instance, which occurred under Queen Hatshepsut, when during a solemn procession the statue of Amon suddenly stopped in front of him who was to succeed the queen as Thutmose the Third, and nodded to him before everybody, so as to make the choice of heaven manifest. The story seemed suitable enough to inspire the child with reverence for the Theban god as well as for his illustrious great-great-grandfather, the builder of the Egyptian empire. What impression it made upon him, nobody knows. But we do know that the prince was to show a very critical mind in early adolescence. And that is enough for one to hold it possible that, already as a child, he only half-believed the marvellous tale. His next step was probably to ask his mother about it, in answer of which she told him that the whole scene had been staged by the priests of Amon, who favoured Thotmose the Third as Queen Hatshepsut's successor. She added, perhaps, that when he grew up, he would acquire still more glory than his great ancestor if only he succeeded in keeping those same priests in their place, for they were now becoming a nuisance — if not a menace — to royal power. And she spoke emphatically, for she felt what she said.

¹ Arthur Weigall, in Tutankhamen and Other Essays (1st Edit. 1923), p. 81.

Prayers, ceremonies, sacrifices in honour of the “king of gods” were, of course, a part and parcel of the young prince's official life, so as to say. As heir-apparent, he had to be present wherever his presence was considered necessary. He was never taught that Aton was the only god; and for some years at least it appears that he did not question the existence of other deities. Yet, his early devotion to the Disk must have had the natural exclusiveness of every ardent love. Those dutiful attendances to shrines of other gods must have seemed boring to him, to say the least, in spite of the surrounding pomp. And his inborn disposition to tell the truth and to act according to his feelings — a trait of his character so dominant that it cannot but have distinguished him, even as a child — must have made him feel morally uncomfortable every time he was forced to be the silent witness of some priestly magic on grand occasions, or to pay a public homage to Amon, the god whom he seems never to have loved.

It has been said that every great life is the realisation of a child's dream. In the case of Akhnaton, who was little more than a child when he began to put his ideas into action, this is obvious. But it is likely that he conceived his main ideas before he gave them a public expression, and that the great tendencies which were to direct his astonishing career were discernible in him long before he even had ideas. That is to say that his contempt for Amon and for most of the national gods, and his passionate adoration of the Sun alone, are probably to be traced to an incredibly early age. His whole life being a marvel of precocity, there is nothing unnatural in supposing him to have been a “heretic” from the start.

The rôle of his mother was not to make him such, but to encourage him to remain such, without perhaps a clear understanding of what she was doing.

* * *

One may assume that, besides his mother, the prince's step-mothers had a place in his early life. We know next to nothing about them, but we know at least that they were numerous and that they came from various countries far and near. One of the wives of Amenhotep the Third was the sister of the ruling king of Babylon; another, named Gilukhipa, was the sister of Dushratta, the ruling king of Mitanni. Apart from her, the Pharaoh had married at least one other Mitannian princess — if not more than one — and a number of women from all the countries of the Near East, especially from Syria and Mesopotamia. Alliances with foreign ladies of rank were no longer uncommon in the royal family of Egypt since Thotmose the Fourth had taken Mutemuya, the daughter of Artatama, king of Mitanni — Dushratta's grandfather — as his chief wife.

It is now established that, apart from the great war-god Teshub, the Mitannians, whose ruling class at least seems to have been of Indo-Aryan race, worshipped also Mithra, Indra, Varuna, and other well-known Vedic gods. The remarkable similitude that exists between Akhnaton's conception of the Sun and that found in certain hymns of the Rig-Veda has prompted some authors to suggest that the Egyptian king might have received the essential of his religious innovations from India through Mitanni. And the influence of his father's Mitannian wives upon him in his childhood, as well as that of other Mitannians, possibly, during the rest of his life, has been stressed in support of this view.

There are, however, as yet, no available Mitannian documents describing the Vedic gods which we have mentioned. Those gods are merely enumerated, under names slightly different from their Sanscrit ones, as witnesses of a treaty between Shubbiluliuma, king of the Hittites, and Mattiuaza, son of Dushratta, king of Mitanni. From some Mitannian proper names, such as for instance “Shuwardata,”¹ one may also infer the existence of a god whose name was not much different from that of the Vedic sun-god, Surya. But that is all. So much so that Sir E. Wallis Budge,² one of the authors who stresses the most the similarity of Aton and Surya, backs his argument with quotations from the Rig-Veda, not from any Mitannian text. The argument, as a result, loses much of its weight. For the idea two different nations have of the same deity is not necessarily the same. And whether the Mitannians borrowed their Surya and their Mithra from India, or whether both they and the Aryans of India, borrowed them from a common source, still it remains to be proved that Surya or Mithra represented, to the Mitannian mind, the same religious conception as that expressed in the Rig-Veda. And as long as that point is not well established, it is not possible to assert that a conception of the Sun more or less similar to that in the Rig-Veda is derived from Mitannian influences.

The part played in the prince’s religious education by the Mitannian inmates of his father’s harem must therefore be, we think, considerably reduced.³ Of course, it is plausible to imagine the royal child coming to know from the mouth of his step-mothers the names and legends of different gods. And it is possible that some of those glimpses of foreign religion, especially under its solar aspects, made a greater impression on him than others. It is also not impossible that he might have heard on some occasions of a sun-god little different, at least in his superficial features, from the Surya of the Aryans and from the god he was himself to praise one day under the name of Aton. But the point remains doubtful, for lack of information. And the impression the prince received must have been rather vague, anyhow. For even if there did exist any noteworthy solar philosophy behind the sun-gods of the Mitannians (or of any other nation represented in Amenhotep the Third's "house of women"), it is doubtful whether any of the Pharaoh's wives or concubines would have been able to convey adequately the essence of it, especially to a child. It is much more natural to imagine that the young prince, popular among his step-mothers (as among women in general), because of his mild disposition and girlish beauty, gladly used to go to their rooms; that he spent his time there playing, chatting about trifling things, as children do — partaking of the sweets they gave him; and that occasionally he listened to some outlandish tale of gods and demons, of heroes and hidden treasures and fairy-like queens, tales such as have always been told to little boys and girls all over the world.

¹ James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 209.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 113-115.

³ The proper explanation of the doubtless striking similitude between his conception of Divinity and that of the Aryans of India, as expressed in the Rig-Veda, lies, not in the assumption of any influence exerted upon Akhnaton, but in the fact that he was himself partly Aryan (being the grandson of a Mitannian princess).

Knowing of the child's precocious understanding, we are inclined to believe that he loved stories and also that he readily put questions to his step-mothers, and to any foreigners he would meet, about strange lands and customs. We do not know if anybody ever threw into his subconscious mind the idea of a foreign sun-god with some of the attributes he was one day to transfer to Aton, or if the god of the priests of On, of which he knew well, was sufficient to set him dreaming lofty religious dreams. But we may say, without much risk of being misled, that through his daily contact with his step-mothers Prince Amenhotep acquired one thing at least which was to leave upon him an indelible impression, and that was the knowledge that every land had a sun-god. That is, no doubt, the one important thing he learnt, at a very tender age, from Gilukhipa and the other ladies of the royal harem: Mitannians, Babylonians, Syrians and Canaanites, Libyans and Nubians, women from the Upper Euphrates and from the Arabian desert and from the sacred land of Punt; Cretans also, possibly, and women from the Ægean Isles, perhaps even from farther northern shores, who had all brought their gods with them.

There were not only sun-gods, it is true. Every land had also its moon-god, and its war-god, and many other gods and goddesses in great numbers, some of which could more or less be paralleled with those of Egypt. Another intelligent child would have remarked that all the gods were universal, and universally made in the image of their worshippers; and he would have stopped there and troubled himself no longer about the nature of Godhead. The child who was one day to be Akhnaton probably made the same remarks; but he did not stop there. For along with that keen, analytical, destructive intelligence with which he was soon to crush all man-made gods, there was in him an immense power of devotion which he had already directed to the one God whose beauty overwhelmed him — the Sun. Among the hosts of deities of which he gradually came to know, the Sun alone he chose to see. And he saw Him everywhere, for everywhere He was present. He was the true God of all nations.

And as from the terraces of his palace the child gazed day after day at the real Sun and watched Him rise and set in incandescent splendour, strange thoughts came to him — thoughts that no boy of his age, and perhaps no grown-up man had ever had before. That Sun — the Disk, the god of his mother — was surely not a god like the others, not even like those who were supposed to represent Him. How could indeed those clumsy sun-gods — Shamesh of the Babylonians, Moloch of the Tyrians, Amon of the Thebans, worshipped throughout Egypt — gods with bodies like men's and with men's passions, who were pleased, when fed and flattered, and who got angry for trifling offences; how could such gods be really the same as He? Since all nations saw the Sun in heaven, why then did they not look up to Him directly instead of making themselves graven images so unworthy of Him?

No one knows what age he was when he first put such questions to himself. It may have been a few years before his accession to the throne — that is to say, when he was a mere child. Children do, sometimes, open new horizons of thought for themselves. But their best intuitions are, half the time, crushed by so-called "education." Prince Amenhotep's intuition of the oneness of God, which he grasped through the visible Sun, was too strong to be crushed. As he grew in years, he more often and more thoughtfully gazed at the sky — the very image of glowing Oneness — and became more and more devoted to the life-giving Disk, the one God whom he loved. And a time must have come when what had been at first, in him, a dim desire, burst forth into a determination that nothing could bend; a time when, conscious of the power he was destined one day to exert, he resolved to use it for the glorification of his God.

* * *

The prince's education was confided to learned men, mostly if not entirely chosen among the priests. We know nothing of the curriculum followed in his studies, but it is plausible to imagine that the sciences the most in honour in Egypt — mathematics and astronomy on one hand, and the history of the past on the other — had a prominent place in his programme. Apart from his mother-tongue, he was probably taught Babylonian, which was the international medium of trade and diplomacy for centuries and the language in which kings wrote to one another. It is likely that he was able to speak, possibly also to read, several other languages. Brought up as he was in the crowded harem of his father, where so many nations and tribes were represented, it seems hardly believable that he was not. Much less gifted children get acquainted with foreign speeches with amazing facility.

The method of teaching in Egypt, fourteen hundred years before Christ, was not much different from that which prevails to this very day in the Mohammedan schools of the same country, and in the East in general; nay, from that used in Europe throughout the Middle Ages. It consisted mainly of making the child repeat over and over again, until he knew it by heart, all what it was not absolutely necessary to explain to him thoroughly, that is to say, all his curriculum save mathematics. And young Prince Amenhotep was probably made to learn in that manner whole scrolls of hieroglyphics: sayings of the wise men of old, treatises on good behaviour and good government, hymns to different deities, in cadenced verses, summaries on the movements and influence of the heavenly bodies, and lists of battles in which the kings of Egypt had routed their enemies with the help of the gods.

It is reasonable to suppose that the history of what we call to-day the Eighteenth Dynasty — the line of kings of which he was himself the scion — was given an important place in his course of studies, and that special stress was put, in it, upon the struggle against the Hyksos (the Egyptian “War of Independence”), and the following victorious campaigns in Syria and in Nubia which had resulted in the making of the Egyptian empire. Those happenings, which read like very ancient history to most of us, were modern, almost contemporary events to the people of the time. The ruthless punitive expedition of Amenhotep the Second against Syria was then hardly more remote than the Russo-Japanese War is to-day; and the staggering victories of Thutmose the Third, though less recent by some thirty years or so, were as vivid as ever in everybody’s imagination. Men who had been children under the Conqueror were still alive. It is therefore but natural that the whole glorious period extending from the reign of Seqenen-Ra and Aahmose onwards should have been presented to the young prince as a subject of which he was to be particularly proud. The kings of the Twelfth Dynasty were certainly great ones; and so were, long before them, the famous Pyramid builders of the Fourth and Fifth Dynasties. But they already belonged to what was then antiquity.

There can be also no doubt that the prince’s preceptors thoroughly insisted upon the protection which Amon, the patron god of Thebes and of the Dynasty, had bestowed so lavishly upon all his forefathers. For however popular the ancient god Aton had re-become at court on account of the queen’s devotion, Amon remained the great god of the land, and Prince Amenhotep was expected to be, like all his ancestors, his loyal servant — in fact, his first priest.

In the light of what we already know of the royal child’s tendencies, we may now try to picture ourselves how he probably reacted to the education thus given him.

First, the very method of teaching is likely to have made much of the imparted knowledge appear to him as uninteresting. The wise but commonplace maxims and proverbs and the sacred hymns he was probably made to repeat in paying great attention to subtle rules of cadence and pronunciation, must have stirred less joy in his heart and conveyed to him less meaning than did the song of a bird, the music of a shepherd's flute in the distance, or a single glimpse of blue sky. Like most children who are all round intelligent — and not gifted with memory alone — Prince Amenhotep had little taste for bookish knowledge devoid of the touch of life. He may have grasped it easily; and we have indeed no reasons to suppose he did not. But one may doubt if it interested him. The main distinctive traits of his mind, relentless logic and poetic enthusiasm, so remarkable in the man, were certainly prominent already in the child. He must have liked all that could set in motion his reasoning power or captivate his imagination. And, as far as we can infer, the manner in which he was taught could do neither.

On the other hand, it is likely that he used to put to his preceptors many embarrassing questions and that he made, now and then, remarks which already revealed his triple genius as a forerunner of modern science, as an artist and as a saint.

There are no means of knowing what those remarks were. Possibly, as we have suggested, the prince compared more than once the ungainly figure of several of the deities he knew — of which some, such as Taurt,¹ the Egyptian hippopotamus-goddess, were little inspiring indeed — with the radiant beauty of the real Sun-disk, which he adored. Possibly, when told that the crocodile-headed god, Sebek, was another manifestation of Ra, the Sun,² he refused to believe it on aesthetic grounds. Possibly, too, when urged to pay more attention to the moon-god, Khonsu — the son of the great Amon — he may have retorted that the moon only shines by the reflected light of the Sun, without knowing how rigorously true his statement was. It would be too much to attribute such an intuition as this to any other child without sound historic evidence; it is not distorting the spirit of history to hold it possible, even likely, in a child who was, but a few years later, to grasp intuitively the fundamental equivalence of light and heat.

¹ Or Ta-urt, "the Great One." Sir Flinders Petrie: Religious Life in Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1924), pp. 13, 82, 185.

² "Sebek, the Crocodile-god, an ancient solar deity." Sir Wallis Budge: Osiris and the Egyptian Resurrection (Edit. 1911), Vol. I, p. 63.

Finally, if there be anything true in the belief that the basic aversions of an individual appear very early in life, we may suppose that Prince Amenhotep always showed a particular repulsion for acts of cruelty of any sort, including those justified by war and sanctioned by religion, that some of his great ancestors might occasionally have committed. It seems, for instance, impossible for his gentle nature not to have shrunk as he heard of the well-known torture of the seven Syrian chiefs captured by Amenhotep the Second during his campaign and hung, head downwards, in front of that Pharaoh's galley, as it sailed triumphantly up the Nile. The idea of those same men solemnly sacrificed to Amon, and of their bloody remains left to rot for days upon the walls of Thebes and of Napata, must have filled him with hardly less disgust. And whatever be the spirit in which they were related to him, such accounts have perhaps contributed no little to infuse into him, for life, the horror of war; to thwart in him every desire of imperial expansion at such a cost; and to turn his indifference towards the national god Amon into positive hatred.

* * *

Some time before his accession, Prince Amenhotep, then hardly more than ten years old, was married with all the customary pomp to a little princess of about eight or nine, Nefertiti.

Scholars do not agree about the bride's parentage. Sir Flinders Petrie identifies her with Tadukhipa, daughter of Dushratta, king of Mitanni.¹ Arthur Weigall rejects this view on account of the princess's "typically Egyptian" features, and supposes her to be the daughter of Ay, a court dignitary,¹ while the striking resemblance between her portraits and those of her young husband has prompted others to suggest that she was his half,² or even his full sister.³ Brother and sister marriages were common in Egypt, as everyone knows.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 207.

We have no opinion to express on the subject. Yet, we find it difficult to dismiss Sir Flinders Petrie's version on the sole ground of Nefertiti's looks. For, if the princess were indeed the daughter of Dushratta, then her mother would be the sister and her paternal grandmother, the paternal aunt of Amenhotep the Third, while the prince's paternal grandmother — the chief wife of Thotmose the Fourth — was, as we know, Dushratta's paternal aunt. In other words, the wedded children would be even more closely related than ordinary first cousins are, and there would be nothing strange in their resembling each other as brother and sister. However, it makes little difference whose daughter Nefertiti actually was. To history, she remains Akhnaton's beloved consort. It is curious to observe that her beauty, revealed in her famous limestone portrait-busts — the loveliest masterpieces of Egyptian sculpture — has made her far more widely known than her great husband to the modern European public at large.

It is probable that the idyllic love that was to bind the prince and his consort together all through their years began long before their actual connubial life. If the features and more particularly the expression of the face do reveal something of what we call the soul, then we must suppose that the two children, heir-apparent and future queen of Egypt, had much in common. Their earliest portraits represent them both with the same regular, oval face, slender neck and large, dark eyes full of yearning; with already, in their gaze, a touch of thoughtful sadness which is not of their age. A delicate, almost feminine charm seems to have distinguished

¹ Arthur Weigall: The Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 49.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 76.

³ James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 243. H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), pp. 258, 299.

Akhnaton's person all his life. But it was balanced in latter days, as his portraits testify, by a stamp of manly determination. In early youth, and especially in childhood, before his struggle with the surrounding world had actually begun, his virile qualities had not yet found their expression; the delicate charm alone was prominent; and the newly-married prince resembled his wife even more than he did in subsequent years.

The two played together, sat and read or looked at pictures together, listened together to the stories that grown-up people told them. They admired together a lotus-bud that had just opened; they watched a velvety butterfly on a rose, or a flight of swallows going north with the coming of hot weather. A painted bas-relief, dating perhaps a few years later, pictures the prince leaning gracefully on a staff while Nefertiti gives him a bunch of flowers to smell. An indefinable sweetness pervades the whole scene, which we may plausibly take to be a faithful likeness of the young couple's everyday life.

It is probable, too, that Prince Amenhotep soon initiated his child-wife into what could already be called his higher life. Whatever be her parentage, the worship of the Sun was nothing new to the little princess. But through her daily contact with the inspired child with whom she was now wedded, what had meant to her, until then, little more than a mere succession of grown-up people's gestures, became an act of personal love. Although his own ideas were yet far from definite, Prince Amenhotep probably taught her to see the Sun as he did, that is to say, as the most beautiful and the kindest of gods; we do not know if we should add, at this early stage of his religious history: as the only God worth praising.

If Nefertiti be, as Sir Flinders Petrie suggests, the daughter of the king of Mitanni, then one may suppose that she told her young husband about Mithra and perhaps Surya, the sun-gods of her country, and that she described to him in a clumsy manner, putting too much stress upon details, as children do, some of the rites with which they were worshipped there. It is doubtful whether there could be in those details, as she presented them, anything impressive enough to be of psychological importance in the prince's evolution. But he may have seized the opportunity to tell the little girl, pointing to the fiery Disk in heaven, that this was the only real Sun, under whatever name and in whatever way one may praise Him in different lands. And she possibly felt that there was truth in his childish remarks, and began to look up to him as to somebody very wise — wiser even, perhaps, than the grown-up people.

* * *

We have tried to emphasise that, before becoming the Founder of the Religion of the Disk, Akhnaton was once a child with many of the weaknesses natural to his age, but, at the same time, a child in whom the first sparks of genius must often have burst forth; a child whose coming greatness must have appeared, at times, undoubtable.

As there is hardly any information about his early years to be gathered from historical records, one has to be content with imagining what expression the main emotional tendencies must have taken in the prince, as a little boy, the qualities of mind, and traits of character which made his life and teaching, as a king, what we know them to be. But one can assert with a high degree of probability that those psychological elements were already observable in him at an extremely early age, and that he was therefore not a child like others.

It is likely that he was a serious, meditative child, full of the vague call of an Unknown that he could not yet think about, but that he could feel at times with strange intensity. He had vivid, delicate sensations, and was already deeply moved by visible beauty — even more so, as far as we can infer, by that of land, water and sky, and of living creatures, than by that of the highly artistic luxuries in the midst of which he was growing up. He was a sensitive and loving child, who would burst out in indignant rage at the report, not to speak of the sight, of any act of brutality committed, with whatever purpose it be, on man or beast. He was an exceedingly logical child, who would question the very foundation of whatever did not seem evident to him, and who would never be content with such evasive answers as grown-up-people often give to children who discuss, in order to make them keep silent. Above all, if there be any children who, from the day they were born, have never told a lie or acted deceitfully, he was certainly one of them. And we may safely believe that he renounced many times in his childhood, for the sake of truth, little advantages which seemed great ones in his eyes, as readily as he was one day to sacrifice an empire to the consistency of his life.

CHAPTER III

ALONE AGAINST MILLIONS

In about 1383 B.C.¹ the prince ascended the throne of his fathers as Amenhotep the Fourth, king of Egypt, emperor of all the lands extending from the borders of the Upper Euphrates down to the Fourth Cataract of the Nile — in modern words, from the neighbourhood of Armenia to the heart of the Sudan.

He was crowned not at Thebes but at Hermonthis — the “Southern Heliopolis” — where a brother of Queen Tiy was high-priest of the Sun.² The list of his titles, as found in the earliest extensive inscription yet known of his reign,³ presents an interesting combination of the old traditional style with expressions foretelling an entirely new order of thought. It runs as follows:

“Mighty Bull, Lofty of Plumes, Favourite of the Two Goddesses, Great in kingship at Karnak, Golden Horus, Wearer of diadems in the Southern Heliopolis, King of Upper and Lower Egypt, High-priest of Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons rejoicing in his horizon in his name ‘Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk’; Nefer-kheperu-ra, Ua-en-ra; Son of Ra; Amenhotep, Divine Ruler of Thebes, Great in duration, Living forever, Beloved of Amon-Ra, Lord of Heaven, Ruler of Eternity.”⁴

In this long succession of titles, the one of “High-priest of Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons rejoicing in his horizon in his name ‘Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk’” is remarkable. Whatever may be the higher conception of the Sun which the new king was soon to preach, we must remember that originally his God was the Sun-god revered in the old sacred city of On

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 205. According to Arthur Weigall (Life and Times of Akhnaton, New and Revised Edit. 1922, p. 1), he ascended the throne in 1375 B.C.

² Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 111.

³ The Inscriptions of Silsileh. See Breasted’s Ancient Records of Egypt (Edit. 1906), Vol. II, p. 384.

⁴ Breasted: Ancient Records of Egypt (Edit. 1906). See also Arthur Weigall’s Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 50.

(Heliopolis) and identified with the well-known Ra. As noticed by some authors, the Pharaoh never attempted to conceal the identity of his God with the antique solar deity¹; rather he gave the immemorial deity a new interpretation. The compound name which we have just recalled was therefore but another designation of the god Aton.

Why was that designation specially chosen to figure in the titulary of the newly-crowned Pharaoh? Why not simply the words “High-priest of Aton”? It may be that the compound name, being of more current use, was considered more suitable in an official document. It may be, also, that the king was already conscious that the real God whom he loved was something more subtle than the visible Sun; the expression “Shu” (heat, or heat and light)² “which-is-in-the-Disk” rendered the idea of that unknown Reality as adequately as language permitted.

One might think that such a consciousness was well-nigh impossible in a boy not yet in his 'teens. Most writers do, in fact, insist on the king's extreme youth, and seem to believe that the religious views of which we find the evidence in documents dating from this early period of his reign, were mostly, if not entirely, those of the dowager queen and of her entourage.³

That Amenhotep the Fourth was a mere child in years, and consequently in worldly experience, is beyond doubt. The letters in which Dushratta (or Tushratta), king of Mitanni, asks him to refer to his mother concerning all matters previously discussed with Amenhotep the Third, prove that, at least for some time after his accession, he still acted practically as a minor, under the tutelage of Queen Tiy.⁴

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 111.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 80.

³ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 211. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 50-51.

⁴ “As to the words of Nimmuria (Neb-maat-ra, i.e., Amenhotep the Third), thy father, which he wrote to me, Tiy, the great wife of Nimmuria, the beloved, thy mother, she knows all about them. Enquire of Tiy, thy mother, about all the words of thy father, which he spake to me . . .”
“All the words together which I discussed with thy father, Tiy, thy mother, knows them all; and no one else knows them. . . .”

(Letters of Dushratta, Amarna Letters, K.28)

It is likely that the messages addressed to him by foreign kings and by vassals were first read by her, and not handed over to him without ample comments about the intentions of their writers, whom she had learnt to know through and through and to tackle with all the shrewdness of a diplomat. It is possible that certain changes in the dealings of the Egyptian court with foreigners, the reluctance of the young king, for instance, to lavish his gold on his neighbours, in extravagant presents, as his father had done — a change of which the monarchs all complain in their letters — were partly due to the influence of Queen Tiy.

But religious and philosophical matters were quite a different thing. On that plane, as we remarked before, Amenhotep the Fourth, though still a child in years, probably showed signs of an extraordinary power of intuition and of both analytical and creative intelligence far beyond his age. We cannot, it is true, assert on the sole ground of a few words in his titulary that he had already conceived the idea of a God of a more subtle nature than the material Sun. But we can no more reasonably deny him the capacity of conceiving such an idea on the sole ground that he was not more than twelve years old. It is quite possible that it was he himself who insisted on being called, in the list of titles that was soon to remain officially attached to his name, “High-priest of Ra-Horakhti” (i.e., of Aton), as other Pharaohs had been called “High-priest of Amon.”

Other titles of his, such as “Wearer of diadems in the Southern Heliopolis,” “Son of Ra,” etc., emphasise his close connection with the old Sun-cult of On, in which his religion has its roots; while his names “Nefer-kheperu-ra” (Beautiful Essence of the Sun) and “Ua-en-ra” (Only One of the Sun), are to be found throughout his reign in all inscriptions concerning him. Other expressions in the titulary, however (such as “Favourite of the Two Goddesses,” “Beloved of Amon-Ra”), seem to indicate that even if, to some extent, he was already conscious of the subtle nature of his God and of His superiority over other gods, the king had not yet reached the stage at which he was soon to look upon all special, partial or local — limited — ideas of Godhead as absurd no less than sacrilegious.

It is likely that Queen Tiy, though herself no fervent devotee of Amon, inserted into the titulary of her son one or two typically orthodox expressions in order to please the powerful local priesthood. Even if it be so, the king does not appear to have too strongly objected, since the sentences were, in fact, inserted. Moreover, we see that at the present stage of his history, he still bore the name of Amenhotep, and that the most distinctive of all the titles which accompanied his name in later days — that of “Living in Truth” — was not yet mentioned in the inscriptions.

* * *

Amenhotep the Fourth was greeted on his accession by the kings of the North and of the East — the rulers of the civilised world outside Egypt. Their letters, fortunately preserved to posterity, are interesting in their diversity. That of Burnaburiash of Babylon is friendly; that of Shubbiluliuma, king of the Hittites, is formal, somewhat stiff; that of Dushratta of Mitanni is touching in its unaffected sincerity. Dushratta had been the friend as well as the cousin and brother-in-law of Amenhotep the Third; it was he who had sent the Pharaoh the miraculous statue of Ishtar of Nineveh, in the hope that the goddess would re-give him his health, and if she had failed to do so, it was not his fault.

Each monarch, however, considered the accession of the new king of Egypt as an important event because Egypt was a very powerful country; also, perhaps, because they imagined that the son of Amenhotep the Third — so mighty, so amiable in his dealings with them, and so fabulously rich — was no ordinary prince. They expected handsome presents from him — “more gold,” and still “more gold,” for gold in his land was “as common as dust.” They sought his alliance, for they knew he had soldiers garrisoned along their frontiers and strongholds overlooking the roads that led to their kingdoms. But none of them had the slightest idea of the actual greatness of the child to whom they were writing. None knew that the main event of the world in which they lived was the rapid dawning of eternal truths in the consciousness of that lad of twelve, and that the splendour of his kingship was nothing compared with that of his priceless individuality. Nobody knew it. It takes time to become aware of what is really important.

Meanwhile, in the palace of his fathers in Thebes, the young Pharaoh thought of his God.

He was now less free than before, being a king — and a god, in the eyes of his people. His daily round of duties was fixed by rigid custom. From his stately visits to the temples and his reception of high officials and foreign envoys down to the minute details of his private life, all his actions were regulated, with implacable exactitude, by a time-honoured etiquette little short of a religious ritual. He could neither do what he pleased at the time he pleased, nor be alone whenever he wished. He probably appreciated all the more the moments allowed to him for rest or recreation, and used them to feel the presence of the divine in the beauty of the visible world and in the silence of his own soul.

As we once remarked with reference to the Pharaoh's childhood, that which is psychologically the most important in a man's life is generally left out from recorded history, however detailed. Of the period extending from the coronation of Amenhotep the Fourth to the erection of the earliest temple to Aton of which we know — completed before the sixth year, and therefore begun not later than the fourth year of his reign — there is no written information. And were there any, still we would probably know nothing of the actual process by which the dominant idea of the oneness of an immaterial God came to fill the king's consciousness; still the history of the king's religious life in those years immediately preceding his great struggle against tradition — by far the most interesting thing — would necessarily have to be conjectured.

Though already from his childhood he had been, to no little extent, of a contemplative nature, susceptible of unusual inspiration, we may suppose that it was between the age of eleven and that of fifteen or sixteen that the eminently intelligent and intuitive young monarch went through some particular religious experience, after which the basis of his doctrine was fixed. The sudden determination with which he pursued his aims, from the erection of Aton's temple onwards, seems to indicate that there was a change in his inner outlook; that what had been, up to then, at most a strong feeling, had become to him a truth — nay, the truth — overwhelming his mind and heart, and most probably his finer senses, with all the power of logical, moral and physical evidence.

What his experience actually was, nobody will ever know. Some historians, on the authority of certain remarks of Professor Elliot Smith, who examined his skeleton, suggest that the young Pharaoh was possibly subject to fits and hallucinations. Several truly great individuals are said to have shared the direct knowledge of those singular nervous states, and there may be some relevance in the expression of “divine” illness that served in former days to designate them. It seems difficult, however, even for a medical expert such as Elliot Smith, to assert after so many centuries the exact nature of those temporary lapses out of normal consciousness, if any. The pathological names given to their supposed cause — epilepsy,¹ “water on the brain,”² etc. — help us very little to guess what they meant, in fact, not to the outward observer, but to the particular adolescent who is said to have undergone them. Nor can their abnormal character throw the slightest discredit either upon Amenhotep the Fourth or upon the teaching which he was led to conceive, perhaps partly through their agency, as some all-too-normal creatures might be inclined to believe.

Whatever it be, we must remember that Sun-worship had never meant to Amenhotep the Fourth what it meant to everybody else. Enraptured, from the very start, by the beauty of light, which seems to have made upon him an extraordinary impression all through his life, he saw in our Parent Star neither a god among many other gods, nor a physical body among many other physical bodies, but the supreme source and embodiment of all that appeared to him worth adoring: beauty, power, heavenly majesty; and that sweetest complement of all these things — kindness.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 51.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 75.

It is likely that he had once associated all the divine attributes of the Sun with the material Disk, but that very soon he had conceived a more subtle idea of Godhead by considering the “Heat” or “Heat-and-Light”-(Shu)-which-is-in-the-Disk. The god Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons of which, in his titulary, he proclaims himself the high-priest, is referred to under that particular name. We should, it seems, suppose that the king’s third step was to identify the “Heat within the Disk” with the Disk itself — the invisible form of Godhead with the visible; the immaterial, or apparently such, with the material, or apparently such.

Sir Wallis Budge¹ tells us that the old god Tem, or Atem, the lord of the sacred city of On (Heliopolis), whose supremacy is asserted in the Pyramid Texts, formed a trinity with the deities Shu (heat, or heat and light) and Tefnut (the watery element). In the identification of Aton (the Disk) — the same as Atem or Tem, according to Budge — with “Shu-which-is-in-the-Aton,” we may see the outcome of a process towards unity, perhaps already latent in the trinitarian teachings), but brought to its full effect in a direct consciousness of the One in the complementary three no less than in the infinite diversity of the many. This explanation, whatever be its value, seems far more in accordance with all that is known of religious experience than Sir Wallis Budge’s own version that Amenhotep the Fourth worshipped all along but the material Sun, and that there was “nothing spiritual” either in his hymns or in his religion.²

All religious geniuses seem to have become aware, in their meditations, of some indefinable Oneness, the nature of which it is impossible to convey to those who have not lived through the mystic state. In the case of Amenhotep the Fourth, the truth he was to set as the foundation of his teaching (if not the experience that led him to the knowledge of it) can be expressed to-day in scientific terms. Originally, the object of his meditations was neither a metaphysical entity, nor an idea, nor a symbol, nor anything abstract, but solely the visible Sun — the Father from whom our material earth and its sister planets sprang. Therefore, any discovery concerning Him, through whatever channel it be made, was, in the long run, susceptible of being tested by the ordinary scientific means by which we test all knowledge of the material world. And, as Sir Flinders Petrie has admirably pointed out,¹ the young Pharaoh's discovery of the equivalence of light and heat, and of the Sun as source of all power has been tested in recent times, and proved accurate. It is nothing else but an anticipation of the principle of equivalence of all forms of energy, which is the basis of modern science. We may add that, if such be the correct interpretation of the king's conception of the Sun, we may regard his identification of Aton (originally, the material Disk) with Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons, rejoicing in His name, "Shu (heat, or heat and light)-which-is-in-the-Aton," as an equally bold anticipation of the fundamental identity of "energy" with what appears to the senses as "matter" — the latest great scientific generalisation.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 57-58.

² Ibid., p. 79, also p. 112 and following.

In other words, Amenhotep the Fourth reached, through some direct realisation of the Essence of all things — through an experience of which we can say nothing — the ultimate result that scientific thought was one day to attain, after thirty-three centuries of patient labour. Whether such occurrences as fits or trances helped him to leap into supernormal stages of consciousness, or whether he reached those stages simply through an unusual aptitude for concentrated meditation, it makes little difference. The fact that, by sole means of direct insight, he grasped the fundamental truth concerning the material no less than the spiritual world, and opened to himself the only outlook on nature and on divinity which can be called scientific in all times, is perhaps the most illustrative historic proof of the unity of all truth; the most illustrative instance, also, of the ultimate equivalence of all methods which lead to its knowledge.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

* * *

The Pharaoh's first important act of which there is any record was the erection in Thebes of a temple to Aton. Like all the buildings consecrated to the Disk, that temple was utterly destroyed in subsequent years by the enemies of the king's faith, and nothing is left of it save a few blocks of sandstone, detached from one another, which were mostly re-used in the construction of later monuments. It appears to have been a large building, if we judge by the size of the fragments of bas-reliefs that can still be seen on some of the blocks. (In one such fragment, for instance, the width of the king's leg, at the lower edge of his kilt, is of twenty inches.) An inscription — invaluable for the study of this period of the reign of Amenhotep the Fourth — states that new quarries were opened at Silsileh, in the South, to provide sandstone for the construction of this temple. High officials of the court were appointed to supervise the transport of the stone to Thebes. We also know from an inscription that a scribe named Hatay was made "overseer of the granaries in the House of Aton."

From the little that remains of it, it is hardly possible to tell whether the temple was built in the traditional style or whether it resembled the temples of Tell-el-Amarna, of which we shall speak later on. In the writing upon the stones that belonged to the new building, as well as in the well-known inscription of Silsileh, the king is referred to as Amenhotep, which shows that he had not yet changed his name. The name of Aton is not surrounded by a "cartouche," as it is in all later inscriptions; and the expression "Living in Truth" — which recurs continually in all documents dated after the sixth year of the reign — has not yet been found, and possibly had not yet been incorporated by the king into the list of his most usual titles. Moreover, references to several of the gods recognised by orthodox Egyptians — such as Horus, Set, Wepwat — are to be read upon the fragments of stone that once formed the temple walls. Apart from that, above the commemorative inscription of Silsileh, there was originally a figure of the king praying to Amon while the Sun-disk with rays ending in hands — the distinctive symbol of the new religion — shed its life-giving beams upon him. The image of the national deity has been afterwards effaced; but traces of it are still visible. In the tomb of Ramose, in Thebes, which dates from about the same time apparently, there is an image of the goddess Maat; and Horus of Edfu is invoked in an inscription. And, in a letter addressed to the king in the fifth year of his reign, by a royal steward named Apiy, who lived in Memphis, Ptah and “the gods and goddesses of Memphis” are mentioned without Apiy seeming to suspect in the least that his sovereign no longer adhered to the traditional religion — an instance all the more impressing that here, in that letter, Amenhotep the Fourth is for the first time referred to as “Living in Truth,” the motto which he kept to the very end of his reign. Finally, on the scarabs of this period, the Pharaoh is spoken of as “beloved of Thot,” the god of wisdom.¹

From these various data, most authors have inferred that, when he built this first temple to Aton of which history tells us, the king had not yet conceived his religion in its definitive form. This interpretation presupposes that the changing of the king’s name, the abolition of all cults save that of the imageless Aton, the erasure of the name and figure of Amon and the plural word “gods” from every stone, were all unavoidable consequences of the new faith — a translation into action of its essential tenets. And it is generally in that light that those facts are viewed. It has been written that Aton was “a jealous god,”² as if the Pharaoh, in waging war upon the gods of his fathers, was but implicitly obeying some rigorous religious dictate similar to the first of the Ten

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 74.

² Sir Flinders Petrie: Religious Life in Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1924), p. 95. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 168-170. Tutankhamen and Other Essays (Edit. 1923), p. 82. James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 251.

Commandments that Moses was one day to give his wandering Israelites in the name of their tribal deity. Perhaps a certain resemblance between one of the king's hymns to the Sun and a psalm of David, written centuries later¹; perhaps, also, some unconscious desire of seeing in Amenhotep the Fourth the forerunner of a religion out of which Christianity was one day to spring, has prompted many modern authors to attribute to him a monotheism of the same nature as that of the Jews.² The data concerning the construction of the earliest temple to Aton, and the whole of the monarch's reign up to his sixth year, do not point to such a religious conception. Therefore the writers conclude that the king did not know his own mind before the sixth year of his reign, or at least that his faith evolved after that period in the sense of a more and more rigorous monotheism.

But, to a man with no preconceived idea whatsoever as to what sort of a god Aton should be, it does not appear at all necessary to suppose anything of the kind. For if, indeed, as Sir Flinders Petrie has pointed out,³ Aton be none other but Radiant Energy deified — that is to say, an all-pervading reality of an immanent character — there is no reason to attribute to Him the all-too-human desire of being worshipped alone. On the contrary, it would seem natural that one who sees divinity in the “Heat-which-is-in-the-Disk” (and which is of the same essence as the Disk itself), far from proscribing the time-honoured gods of his land, should look upon them as man's halting attempts to reach the Unreachable; as imperfect symbols of the One true God. It is thus that sages of all times have looked upon the traditional deities in lands where popular polytheism prevails side by side with the most exalted religious realisations. And it seems to us most probable that Amenhotep the Fourth considered the gods of his country — and of all countries — in that very light. It may be that the figure of Amon was carved out on the slab bearing the Silsileh inscription by a sculptor who “simply followed the time-honoured custom.”¹ But, had the king found the slightest objection to its presence, he would certainly have had it effaced — as he did, in fact, later on. The thing is that he had no quarrel with any of the gods, not even with Amon. His God was above them all and contained them all as He contained all existence; He was not against them. At most, the king may have felt a little contempt for the man-made deities, on account of their local character and of their alleged petty interferences in human affairs. He did not love them. But, at first, he tolerated them — as a pure Vedantist tolerates to-day the popular gods and goddesses of India — knowing that most men can never rise to a higher and more comprehensive idea of Godhead.

¹ Psalm 104. See Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1923), pp. 134-136; Tutankhamen and Other Essays (Edit. 1923), p. 82; The Glory of the Pharaohs (Edit. 1923), p. 147; Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), p. 154.

² It has been asserted — and that by an Israelite — that Jewish Monotheism was entirely derived from the worship of Aton. See Sigmund Freud's Moses and Monotheism. See also Arthur Weigall's Tutankhamen and Other Essays (Edit. 1923), p. 93.

³ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

It seems that he would easily have tolerated them to the end, had it not been for the serious opposition of the Egyptian priests — especially of those of Amon — to the execution of his legitimate designs. The series of steps he was soon to take, and the new aspect of his religion in the eyes of whoever considers it from outside, can be explained as a masterful reaction to unwelcome priestly interference rather than as signs of a religious evolution towards a new and narrower idea of God. This view receives confirmation from the fact that, even after the abolition of the public cult of Amon and of the other gods, still, as we shall see, the Pharaoh made no attempt to spread his own faith beyond a small circle of disciples.

* * *

It is also supported by the inscription in the tomb of Ramose at Thebes — an early document, no doubt, for the tomb is decorated in the “old” style, and wherever the king’s name appears, it is still Amenhotep. The general tone of the inscription plainly indicates that, at the time the tomb was built, not only was the king already in possession of a definite truth which he had received directly from God — that is to say, which he had grasped intuitively; which had forced itself upon his mind with all the strength of evidence — but that he was, also, fully conscious of being, himself, substantially identical with the Essence of all life, the Sun. He addresses himself to Ramose in the inscription, and says: “The words of Ra are before thee, of my august Father who taught me their essence. All that is His . . . since He equipped the land . . . in order to exalt me since the time of the god. . . . It was known in my heart, opened to my face — I understood.” And Ramose answers: “Thy monuments shall endure like the heavens, for thy duration is that of Aton therein. The existence of thy monuments is like the existence of His designs. Thou hast laid the mountains; their secret chambers. The terror of thee is in the midst of them as the terror of thee is in the hearts of the people; they hearken to thee as the people hearken.”¹

¹ Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 254.

The old Sun-god Ra, the divine Ancestor of the most ancient Pharaohs, is clearly regarded here as the same as Aton. But if we bear in mind all that we already know of the religion of Amenhotep the Fourth — his idea of the “Heat-which-is-in-the-Disk” identical with the Disk itself, his conception of a thoroughly immanent Godhead — then we cannot but see much more than customary dynastic boasting in the king’s assertion that Ra is his “august Father,” and much more, also, than the polite exaggerations of a courtier in Ramose’s reply: “Thou art the Only One of Aton, etc. . . .” This document, the earliest one perhaps in which the king and his God are as boldly identified as in so many later texts, is a further proof that, even in this first part of his reign, the Pharaoh’s religious views already appeared to other men as something decidedly new, and that they probably were very little, if at all, different from what we know them to have been at the time he lived in his new capital and wrote his famous hymns.

¹ Breasted: Ancient Records of Egypt (Edit. 1906), Vol. II, p. 389.

The king's next step was to decree that the quarter of Thebes in which the newly-built temple stood would henceforth be called "Brightness of Aton, the Great One," and that Thebes itself — the proud City of Amon, whose patron-deity had become the god of a whole empire — would henceforth be known as the "City-of-the-Brightness-of-Aton."

One need not see in this a deliberate insult to the local god on the part of Amenhotep the Fourth. There is, at least, no evidence suggesting that such might have been the monarch's intention; and if our interpretation of his religious views be right, there is every reason to believe that it was not so. The Pharaoh did not endeavour to crush the Theban deity out of existence, or even to defy it, as the worshipper of a "jealous god" would have done. He only wished to keep it in its place — to relegate it among the partial symbols of Godhead which a man who thinks and feels must sooner or later learn to transcend. He did not suppress the cult of Amon or of any other gods; nor, probably, did he intend to do so at this stage of his career. But he surely wished that the One invisible, intangible God, Essence of all things, Whom he had come to realise through his contemplation of the visible Sun, should be honoured above all the minor deities, protectors of families, cities, or even nations, whose power was limited and whose nature was apparently finite, like that of their human devotees. And, in giving its new name to the capital of his fathers, he paid a public homage to the true God of the whole universe, as opposed to all the man-made tribal gods.

It is likely that the priests of Amon failed to understand this attitude — or perhaps did the most intelligent among them understand it but too well? As a result, they were unable to accept the change with equanimity. They and their god had been receiving such extraordinary honours in Thebes and throughout Egypt, for so many centuries, that it was hard for them to realise that a new order was dawning, in which their unchallenged domination would no longer have a meaning, and therefore a place. Amon, whom they had identified with the old Heliopolitan god Ra — the Sun — so as to legitimise his sway over all Egypt, was in their eyes the actual sovereign of the land. It was he who had rendered his sons, the Theban Pharaohs, invincible in war, magnificent in peace. And it was the custom that they should visit every day his shrine, and, through the performance of certain traditional rites, receive from him the breath of life — justify, so as to say, through a daily renewed supply of divine power, their age-old claim to divinity.¹ We know not at what time Amenhotep the Fourth ceased to conform himself to this practice. But we may conjecture that he did so very early in his reign if, as suggested in the inscription in Ramose's tomb, he already realised that his oneness with the Sun (and, through Him, with ultimate Cosmic Energy) was a fact, and that therefore he needed no rites to maintain it or even to assert it. Doubtless the priests resented bitterly this break with immemorial tradition. What they resented no less — if not more — was the steady decrease in the revenues of their temples, now that the king had started encouraging the sole cult of the Disk, and had withdrawn from them the habitual royal gifts, which were enormous.

They had not, however, been able to show their displeasure openly, as long as Amenhotep the Fourth had contented himself with honouring his God without stressing His priority over their and over the other national deities. But when, by the change of the capital's name, he made public his intention to place his own intuitive conception of Godhead above the established gods of the land, their fury burst out.

We do not know how, nor exactly when, they began to show stern opposition to the Pharaoh's designs. The only record of that opposition is a later inscription in which the king tells of the priest's wickedness. The inscription is mutilated, and the reference therefore vague, though vehement.² In all probability, however, the step we just spoke of — the renaming of the City of Amon (Nut-Amon, or

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 34-35.

² "For as my Father liveth . . . more evil are they (the priests) than those things which I have heard in the fourth year; more evil are they than those things which King . . . heard; more evil are they than those things which Men-kheperu-ra (Thutmose the Fourth) heard . . . in the mouth of Negroes, in the mouth of any people." — (From a mutilated inscription on one of the boundary-stones of Tell-el-Amarna.)

Thebes) as the “City-of-the-Brightness-of-Aton” — was the signal of a bitter conflict between the king and the ministers of the Theban god.

It is difficult to say what the priests actually did to assert what they considered to be their god’s rights. Did they try to frighten the people by foretelling calamities which they ascribed beforehand to the wrath of the deity? Did they start spreading rumours against the king, in order to create disaffection? Or did they use men in their pay to do more effective mischief — to try, for instance, to destroy the newly-erected temple of Aton, or even to make an attempt on the monarch’s life? We shall never know; but they appear to have been capable of anything, once their fanaticism was stirred. And, if we judge by the extreme measures which the king took immediately in reply to their intrigues, and also by the bitterness he still seems to feel in recalling his experience with them, even after having broken their power, we may believe that the servants of Amon and of the other gods acted with unusual harshness towards him who, until then, had tolerated their faith and who, even afterwards, was never to seek to harm their persons.

The outcome of the struggle was a change not in the king’s actual religious outlook, but in his practical attitude towards the national forms of worship, and a series of new decrees of an uncompromising spirit, by which all hopes of future reconciliation were annihilated at one stroke. The priests of Amon were dispossessed of their fabulous wealth; the name of Amon and the plural word “gods” were erased from every stone where they were found, whether in public monuments or in private tombs. Even the compound proper names which contained that of the Theban god were not allowed to remain; and, carrying out his decision to its ultimate logical consequences, the Pharaoh did not hesitate to have the name of his own father erased, even from the inscriptions in his tomb, and replaced by one of the other names by which he had been well known: Neb-maat-ra. And by the sixth, perhaps even the end of the fifth year of his reign, the young king changed his own name from Amenhotep — meaning, as we have seen: “Amon is pleased,” or “Amon is at rest” — to Akhnaton — “Joy of the Disk,” that is to say, “Joy of the Sun” — the name under which he has become immortal. The cult of Amon, and finally that of the innumerable other national gods and goddesses, was abolished, and images were destroyed.

It is these measures which seem to have stirred the indignation of Akhnaton’s modern detractors, and prompted them to call him a “fanatic,” an “iconoclast,” and so forth. But we believe it would be more in keeping with historical truth to see in them, as we have said, a vigorous reaction against sacerdotal interference, a determined assertion of the Pharaoh’s rights, as a ruler, against a class of ambitious men who, under the cover of religion, had been grabbing more and more power for centuries. The man who conceived God as the all-pervading impersonal Life-force — the Energy within the Sun — cannot have shared the aggressive piety of such later believers as Charlemagne or Mahmud of Ghazni, the Idol-breaker. It is unreasonable — nay, absurd — to attribute to him a zeal of the same nature as theirs.

Nor can we suppose that he suddenly changed his idea of God by the fifth or sixth year of his reign, just after completing the first temple which he built to Him. All subsequent evidence — in particular that of the king’s admirable hymns to the Sun — goes to prove that he worshipped till the end of his life that all-pervading Energy which he had discovered intuitively and which he adored already in his early adolescence.

Apart from being stern efforts to free himself and his country from the ever-tightening grip of the priests, these measures against the national cults of Egypt seem, however, to indicate a phase in Akhnaton’s psychology. We have just said that his religious views remained the same. But his estimation of man’s capacity to realise, within the frame of traditional symbolism, the Truth that he had grasped apart from it, had changed a lot. Until then, he had tolerated the time-honoured deities of the land either because he had seen in them possible steps towards a higher Reality, or simply because he looked upon human superstition with the kindly smile of many a philosopher: that is to say, because he considered those gods helpful to most men's religions progress, or at least harmless. The time had now come when he found out that they were neither. The trouble stirred up by the servants of Amon after the renaming of Thebes was to him both a revelation and a warning. It suddenly thrust upon him the fact that the generous toleration which he had shown until then would find no imitators among the professed religious leaders of the people. It taught him that the national gods were indeed "jealous gods," in the sense that, as long as their priests remained in power, no truer and broader conception of the divine could find its way to the hearts of the worshippers; that, far from leading gradually to the knowledge of the One God, they would continually be used to keep the people away from Him — to bind them to a state of satisfied religious routine; to kill both criticism and inspiration under the weight of a vain formalism; to prevent the dawning of a sense of universal values, by constant stress upon local, or at the most national, concerns.

It warned him that, if he allowed the priests to hold their sway, his God would never receive the whole-hearted public worship due really to Him alone; that His truth would never be made manifest. One of the two had to be pushed into the background: either national tradition, or universal truth. It is this dilemma which seems to have forced itself upon the king's consciousness from the time of his first open conflict with the priests of Amon. Had these men let him organise, unopposed, as he pleased, the religious life of the whole country, around the central truth which he had discovered; had they admitted that their gods were but partial aspects of the One ultimate Reality — the Heat or Energy within the Disk — or steps in quest of it, and had they acted up to that belief, it is probable that he would never have gone to the extremities which history has recorded. But now, the only reasonable course before him was that which he took and followed, in fact, to its utmost implications. It was not "religious fanaticism," but a clear understanding of the situation that prompted him to act. The "fanatics" were not he, but the priests; they who, by their violent hostility to a teaching of exceedingly broad significance (which, religiously speaking, should not have upset them at all), set forth the dilemma which we have just recalled.

The thoroughness with which Akhnaton followed his course is one of the early recorded instances of that unbending determination that he showed all his life, once he felt sure which way he was to act in accordance with truth.

* * *

In fact, it is not exactly for what one could call religious reasons that the priests of Amon and of the other gods showed such stubborn opposition to the king's projects.

It has been said¹ that "the religious thought of the period just preceding the reign of Akhnaton was distinctly monotheistic in its tendencies," and that, with all its startling originality, the new movement was the natural outcome of the long unconscious evolution of the Egyptian mind. The universal power of the Sun is already asserted in the famous "Hymn to Amon as he riseth as Horus of the Two Horizons," inscribed upon the stele of the two brothers Hor and Suti, architects of Amenhotep the Third. He is called there: "Sole Lord, taking captive all lands, every day" — an expression hardly different from that which we find later on in Akhnaton's hymns, and which may well be much older than the inscription quoted. In the same inscription, the name of Aton appears as practically identical with that of Amon, for the "Hymn of Amon" runs: "Hail to thee, O Aton of the day, Thou creator of mortals and maker of their life."² It has even been proved that, under Amenhotep the Third, a temple to a god bearing the full title of "Horus of the Two Horizons, rejoicing in his horizon in his name 'Shu-(heat)-which-is-in-the-Aton-(Disk)'" — the title we find in Akhnaton's inscriptions — existed, with the sole difference that this god was there represented in the traditional style, with a falcon's head. Both the figure and the title are to be found on one of the blocks re-used by King Horemheb in his pylon at

¹ By Blackman; quoted by James Baikie in The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 314.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 49.

Karnak; and in the royal cartouche can be seen the name of Nefer-kheperu-ra (one of Akhnaton's names) altered from that of Amenhotep the Third.¹

The elements of the new faith were therefore, to some extent, latent within the old. What Akhnaton did was to assert that such a conception of divinity as that of the "Heat (or Energy)-within-the-Disk" at once transcended and comprehended all others. And he possibly preferred to worship his God under the older name of Aton — the Disk — so as to point out, as we have said, the identity of the visible Sun and of the Heat within it — ultimately, the oneness of the Visible and the Invisible; of Matter and Energy. Religiously speaking, there was no radical antagonism between his pantheistic monism (for such it seems to be) and the popular polytheism of the priests with the underlying monotheistic tendency that burst out, now and then, in its most intellectual aspects.

The truth appears to be that the priests did not really mind Akhnaton going further than any of the former Egyptian thinkers in his conception of the divine. But they cared a good deal when, as a logical result of his new lofty idea of Godhead, he decreed that the City of Amon should henceforth be called: City of the Brightness of Aton; when, in other words, he made public his desire to do all he could to urge Egypt and the empire to look upon the cosmic God as God, the other city-gods, national gods, etc., being nothing, if not secondary aspects of Him, to be merged into His infinity. They objected to his purely religious — and therefore individual — idea of God being given priority over their mainly customary, ritualistic, and therefore national one. The struggle between the king and them was not a struggle between two different religious conceptions, but perhaps the oldest recorded phase of the still enduring age-long conflict between individual inspiration and collective tradition; between real religion and state religion; between the insight of the religious genius and the vested interests of the spiritual shepherds of the crowd — and of the crowd itself, one might add.

¹ T. Eric Peet: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 205.

Sir Wallis Budge has criticised Akhnaton in the most violent language for not having upheld the cult of Amon, already popular throughout the Egyptian empire. “None but one half insane,” says he, “would have been so blind to facts to attempt to overthrow Amon and his worship, round which the whole of the social life of the country centred.”¹ Professor H. R. Hall, apparently for a similar reason, brings also against the enlightened Pharaoh the same accusation of being “half insane.”² It is the expression used, in last resort, by most average men, about the spiritual giants whom they hate without knowing why, but in fact because they are incapable of understanding their greatness. It only shows how irredeemably average even learned scholars can be where religious insight is concerned. The authors of the foolish statements just quoted seem to have entirely missed the meaning of Akhnaton’s efforts. If Aton and Amon were but two Egyptian deities like any other, then indeed the exaltation of the former at the expense of the latter could perhaps be interpreted as the whim of a “fanatic.” But if, as evidence forces one to believe, Aton be the name given to deified Cosmic Energy, while Amon, as everyone knows, is the patron-god of Thebes, promoted to the position of a god of all the empire only through the victories of the Theban Dynasty, then the whole perspective changes, and one understands how Akhnaton could not look upon the local deity as identical with the ultimate Essence of all existence.

He could not do so, because of the close association of Amon with all the limited interests of nation and church — because of his political miracles, his partiality in war, his satisfaction in man-ordained rituals and sacrifices. He could not merge his own religion of the Universe into the existing religion of the State; his own intuitive truth of all times into the narrow framework of custom, which had no meaning to him. What he wanted to do, on the contrary, was to have the true religion recognised as State religion — pushing the existing one into the background. And that seems to have been the reason for his giving a new name to the very stronghold of the national cult, the City of Amon. He wanted to start a new tradition — more rational, more scientific, more beautiful, more truly religious — on the basis of his extraordinary individual insight; to raise the State religion of the future to his own level; to make himself — the consciously divine Man — the spiritual head of the nation, to which he would teach how to transcend nationhood. The priests of the nation stood in his way; he brushed them aside — without, however, persecuting them.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 78.

² H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 298.

* * *

The struggle between Akhnaton and the priests was to be a deadly one precisely because it was less a conflict of ideas than a conflict of values. Had the quarrel merely been about the attributes of divinity or some other such question, a compromise might have taken place, if not during the king's life, at least after him. His message, even if rejected, would have left some trace in history. With time, Amon, while still continuing to protect Egypt in war and peace, might have taken over some of the more subtle qualities of Aton. But there was no possible compromise between the values that the inspired Individual, Akhnaton, stood for, and those represented by the priests of the deified State. As we shall see later on, it is the practical implications of his teaching that were finally to estrange the Pharaoh from his people, from his age, from the average men of all ages. In the meantime, his conception of religion was, from the start, a greater barrier between him and his contemporaries than the lofty philosophical tenets of his religion; his attitude towards his God, something more unusual to them even than his incredibly advanced idea of the nature of God.

The priests would have remained content had he paid a lip homage to tradition — had he, for instance, continued to accept his divinity as a Pharaoh from a daily ceremonial contact with the divine patron of the Pharaonic State, in his temple. It would have mattered little if, while doing so, he worshipped the “Heat-within-the-Disk” as the One supreme Reality. But he could not do so. His devotion to the Sun, deeply coloured by an artist’s emotion if we judge it by the fragments of hymns that have survived, must have had the character of mystic rapture. There was a sort of mysterious understanding, a strange intimacy between the young king and the fiery Disk — something quite different from the official filiation of any prince priding in his solar descent, with any man-made Sun-god. Whether stretching out his hands in praise to the rising or setting Sun, or gazing during the middle of the day into the cloudless abyss which He filled with burning light, Akhnaton was in tune — and consciously so — with Something intangible, shapeless, unnameable, and yet undeniably real; Something that was, at the same time, within the vibrating waves of existence all round him, within the deep rhythmic life of his body, within the silence of his soul. He experienced his oneness with the Sun, and through Him, with all that is. This experience made him, in fact, what other Pharaohs were merely by name and by tradition: the true Son of the Sun. What need had he of receiving his divinity from the patron-god of the State, when he was conscious of sharing by nature the life of the real Sun — of being in tune with the Essence of all things: one with It? “The heat of Aton gave him life and maintained it in him,” writes Sir Wallis Budge; “and whilst that was in him, Aton was in him. The life of Aton was his life, and his life was Aton’s life, and therefore he was Aton.” . . . “His spiritual arrogance made him believe that he was an incarnation of Aton — that he was God; not merely a god, or one of the gods of Egypt — and that his acts were divine.”¹

Budge is right, with the difference that there was no “spiritual arrogance” on the part of Akhnaton. The series of beliefs — or rather the successive stages of consciousness — which his detractor ascribes to him, are nothing more than those reached by all men who have the privilege to go through the ultimate religious experience — through that which the Hindus call “realisation” of the divine — and who are bold enough to draw to the end the conclusions that it implies. Unknowingly (for he does not seem to have had, himself, a similar experience), and also unwillingly (for he does not seem to like the young Pharaoh of the Disk), Budge only proves that Akhnaton was a genuine spiritual genius at the same time as an intellectual one, the greatest tribute which a man — and especially a detractor — can pay to another man.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 82.

The king's contemporary enemies, apparently, did not understand him any better than his twentieth-century critics. Deeply attached as they were to their ideology of dynastic Sun-worship — of royalty created, protected, and deified by the gods of the State, through the intermediary of their traditional priesthoods — they could hardly imagine what was going on in the monarch's consciousness. They opposed him for the new values he set forth. They did not even share with him that which enemies often hold in common: an ultimate similarity of purpose if not of views.

The people, who doubtless considered their Pharaoh in the same light as their fathers had done — as the son and embodiment on earth of the national god Amon — must have been at a loss to make sense of what appeared to them as meaningless, sacrilegious novelties.

Queen Tiy herself, who had probably played the greatest part in the early formation of the king's soul, could perhaps hardly recognise the distant result of her influence (combined with his personal genius) in the present expression of his faith. It is noteworthy that all the drastic steps taken by Akhnaton against the cult of Amon are posterior to the fifth year of his reign. Even in supposing, as some authors have done, that, still as a king, he remained for some time virtually under the tutelage of his mother, it is probable that this state of dependence had already come to an end before he promulgated his first religious decrees. Those decrees are not the dowager queen's, but decidedly and fully his. The king's opposition to Amon's public cult seems indeed to have become more stern as his personal part in the government became more unquestionable. We may even believe that, as long as she had any say in the matter, the dowager queen tried to check rather than to prompt her son on the path of open conflict with the priests. She was first a queen — and a shrewd one, with long experience of the world, and great ambitions — and then only the devotee of a particular deity; perhaps also, to some extent, an initiate into a particular esoteric philosophy, originated among the priests of On. But he was, first and last, a man who had realised the truth, both in the mystic and in the intellectual sense. He happened to be the ruler of the greatest empire of his time. But the truth he had discovered always passed, and was always to pass, with him, before the interests and “obligations” he had inherited. And it is possible that this attitude of his alienated him from his mother, in a certain measure. We know positively that she did not follow him when he left Thebes for good.

We doubt if even Akhnaton’s followers — and they appear to have been numerous in the beginning¹ — were able to grasp the full significance of his message. The inscriptions which some of the most prominent of them have left in their tombs, at Tell-el-Amarna, tend to point out that many did not. Most of them seem to have joined the Religion of the Disk for motives either of material interest or of personal attachment to the king — perhaps sometimes for both. It is possible that Akhnaton saw through their minds but accepted their allegiance all the same, hoping, with the natural confidence of youth, to make them sooner or later his true disciples. Yet he had probably already found out how difficult it is to create higher aspirations in men who do not have them, and one may believe that he was not totally ignorant of the enormity of the task before him. He must have realised the strength of tradition, the inborn apathy of the human herd (which includes men of all classes), the frequent incomprehension even of the best intentioned of friends; and, at times, he must have felt desperately alone.

Each time he threw a glance across Thebes from the flat roof of his palace; each time he passed through the streets in his chariot — and we infer, from pictorial evidence, that he did so more usually than any other Pharaoh, even in this early part of his reign — it certainly struck him how little the capital was worthy of its new lofty name: “City-of-the-Brightness-of-Aton.”

¹ Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), p. 149.

The great temple of Amon towered above all the buildings of the immense city. It was now closed by the king’s orders; its splendid halls were silent; and the name of the god had been erased from every pillar, from every wall, from every statue, whether inscribed upon granite or alabaster, or bronze, or lapis lazuli. Still, there it stood, in all its defiant grandeur. It had taken a hundred years to build; a thousand years to adorn, to enrich, to complete. Forty generations of kings had lavished upon it the wealth of the Nile, the treasures of conquered lands, the workmanship of the best artists from all the known world, and had made it a thing unsurpassed in magnificence.

The people bowed down before the closed gates to the hidden deity whom they still revered and feared. The temple remained the heart of Thebes. And there were shrines to other gods within its sacred enclosure — to Mut, Amon’s consort; to Khonsu, the Moon-god, Amon’s son; to Ptah; to Min — and other temples, all over the city. Every house, in fact, was a temple in which the traditional gods and goddesses were honoured daily, and propitiated occasionally, with magic incantations and ritual offerings.

Akhnaton gazed at it all in a bird’s-eye view, and understood that Thebes would never be his. What could he do? Destroy all those temples of the man-made gods? He could have done it if he liked. His word was law. And it was not more difficult for him — and hardly more sacrilegious, perhaps, in the eyes of many orthodox Egyptians — to pull down Karnak stone by stone than to have the name of Amon erased from his own father’s tomb. But the idea seems never to have occurred to him. In spite of the hasty judgments passed on him by so many modern critics, he was not an iconoclast. He was too much of an artist ever to dream of becoming one.

He gazed at the sober, majestic architecture of Amon’s dwelling-place, and was impressed by its beauty. Then he gazed at the sky — the simple blue depth, without a line, without a spot, without a shade; the void, luminous, fathomless abyss; the dwelling-place of the real Sun in front of which all the splendours and uglinesses of the earth seem equally to vanish into nothingness. And the well-known feeling of absorption into the vibrating infinity, of oneness with that intangible existence that contains all existence, would take him over once more. If only he could have made people understand what he knew, he would not have needed to take steps against the traditional cults. The man-made gods would have automatically sunk into their place as mere symbols, far below the One Reality. But at the sight of the magnificent City of Amon stretched before him, with its temples, its pylons, its avenues bordered with great rams of granite, he knew that he could not. These dazzling earthly glories, with their all-powerful collective associations, would always mean more to the people and the priests — to the herd and its shepherds — than the transparent truth, unconnected with national pride, hopes, or fears, which he had come to realise and to reveal. And no matter how brilliantly and how long he would preach to its thousands the message of the One God made manifest in the real Sun, Thebes would never follow him.

The men of the capital — in fact, of all the great centres of traditional worship — represented that intellectually lazy, superficially artistic, prejudiced, irresponsible, apathetic, uninteresting crowd upon whose stupidity and for whose guidance governments and priesthoods — states and churches — are established. Perhaps, indeed, the city-gods that they made so much of were good enough for them; perhaps any new god they would start worshipping would finally become to them a city-god hardly any better than the old ones; perhaps gorgeous architectural structures of polished granite and gold — the signs of wealth and power — would always represent the supreme acquisitions that nations take pride in, and live for, and die for.

But he could not be content with improving on those, as his fathers had. He had raised his senses from the fascination of sculptured curbs and painted colours and resounding formulas, to the inner vision of intangible waves of heat and light; from the spell of the temple service to the clear and joyous understanding of the silence of the sky. James Breasted has most appropriately called him “the first individual in human history.” He was indeed the oldest historic embodiment of the outstanding Individual as opposed to the dull majority of mediocre men; of the Individual whose aspirations, whose experience, whose raison d’être are different from anything the crowd can understand and accept; of the Individual who, in his own singular logic and beauty, stands alone against the background of all times and all countries, in tune with absolute realities and absolute standards forever inaccessible to the many.

Thebes would never side with him — nor would any city, any state, any crowd with age-long collective associations. And yet, in his youthful desire for success, in his inherited consciousness of unchecked power, he wished to be a leader; to proclaim far and wide the truth that was to him as clear as daylight, and make the cult of intangible Energy the official State religion of Egypt and of the empire; to spread it still further, if possible. He needed the collaboration of men for that great purpose.

And if Thebes was not the place where the first seeds of truth could be sown; if it clung to Amon, its patron-god, even in his downfall, there would perhaps be, somewhere down the Nile, an out-of-the-way spot where a new City could be founded — a City, the capital of a new State, which one day, possibly, could become the model of a new world. He would build that ideal State with the help of the few who, if they did not always understand him to perfection, at least seemed to love him. The cult of the One impersonal God would prevail there, and the standards of the enlightened few would be the official standards. The name of Amon and all it stood for would be unknown there from the start.

Thus Akhnaton decided to leave Thebes for good, and to build himself a new capital.

67-68

Part II

THE RELIGION OF THE DISK

CHAPTER IV

THE CITY OF GOD

In the sixth year of his reign — that is to say, when he was about seventeen or eighteen — Akhnaton sailed down the Nile to a place some 190 miles from the site of modern Cairo, and he laid there the foundations of his new capital, Akhetaton — the City of the Horizon of Aton — of which the ruins are known today by the name of Tell-el-Amarna.

He selected, on the eastern bank of the river, a spot where the limestone hills of the desert suddenly recede, enclosing a beautiful crescent-shaped bay, some three miles wide and five miles long. There is a little island in the middle of the Nile, just opposite. The place was lovely. Moreover, it was entirely free from religious or historic associations. In the very words of the king, it belonged “neither to a god nor to a goddess; neither to a prince nor to a princess.”¹ And he decided to build upon that virgin soil the City of his dreams.

The City was to occupy part of a sacred territory extending on both sides of the Nile “from the eastern hills to the western hills,” an area measuring roughly eight miles on seventeen. According to an inscription, the king appeared in stately pomp upon a great chariot of electrum drawn by a span of horses. “He was like Aton when He rises from the eastern horizon and fills the Two Lands with His love. And he started a goodly course to the City of the Horizon of Aton on this, the first occasion . . . to dedicate it as a monument to Aton, even as his Father, Ra-Horakhti-Aton, had given command. And he caused a great sacrifice to be offered.”²

After the customary offerings of food and drink, gold, incense and sweet-smelling flowers, Akhnaton proceeded

¹ “First foundation inscription,” quoted by Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 84.

² From the “Second foundation inscription,” quoted by Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 88.

successively to the south and to the north, and halted at the limits of the territory he wished to consecrate. And he swore a great oath that he would not extend the territory of the City beyond those limits.

“And His Majesty went southwards and halted on his chariot before his Father Ra-Horakhti Aton, at the (foot of the) southern hills, and Aton shone upon him in life and length of days, invigorating his body every day. Now this is the oath pronounced by the king:

“As my Father Aton liveth and as my heart is happy in the Queen and her children . . . this is my oath of truth which it is my desire to pronounce and of which I will not say: “It is false,” eternally, forever:

“The southern boundary-stone, which is on the eastern hills, is the boundary-stone of Akhetaton, namely the one by which I have made halt. I will not pass beyond it southwards forever and ever. Make the south-west boundary-stone opposite it on the western hills of Akhetaton exactly. The middle boundary-stone which is on the eastern hills is the boundary-stone of Akhetaton, namely that by which I have made halt on the eastern hills. I will not pass beyond it eastwards forever and ever. Make the middle boundary-stone which is to be on the western hills opposite it exactly. The northern boundary-stone which is on the eastern hills is the boundary-stone of Akhetaton, namely that by which I have made halt. I will not pass beyond it downstream (northwards) forever and ever. Make the northern boundary-stone which is to be on the western hills opposite it exactly.

“And Akhetaton extends from the southern boundary-stone as far as the northern boundary-stone measured between boundary-stone and boundary-stone on the eastern hills, (which measurement) amounts to 6 aters, $\frac{3}{4}$ khe, and 4 cubits. Likewise, from the southern boundary-stone to the northern boundary-stone on the western hills the measurement amounts to 6 aters, $\frac{3}{4}$ khe, and 4 cubits, exactly. And the area between those boundary-stones from the eastern hills to the western hills is the City of the Aton; mountains, deserts, meadows, islands, high-grounds, low-grounds, land, water, villages, embankments, men, beasts, groves, and all things which Aton my Father will bring into existence, forever and ever. . .”¹

Akhetaton was not only to be the new capital of Egypt, but the main centre from which the cult of Aton would radiate far and wide — to the four ever-receding horizons north, south, east and west — and the model, on a small scale, of what the world at large would be if only the spirit of the new rational solar religion would prevail; an ideal abode of peace, beauty, of truth — the City of God. Akhnaton would make it as splendid as he could in the short time it would take him to build it, and continue to adorn it afterwards as long as he lived. And he founded at least two other cities, of lesser proportions and less sumptuous than Akhetaton, but destined in his mind to be, like it, radiating “seats of truth”: one in Syria, of which the name and exact location are unknown¹; and one in Nubia, on the eastern bank of the Nile, somewhere near the Third Cataract,² which he named Gem-Aton, like the temple he had first built in Thebes.

¹ “Second foundation inscription,” quoted by Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edition, 1922), pp. 89-90.

This fact is sufficient to show that, at least as early as the foundation of the City of the Horizon of Aton, in the sixth year of his reign, Akhnaton consciously endeavoured to spread the lofty cult of Cosmic Energy to all his empire, if he did not already dream of preaching it beyond the limits of Egyptian civilisation. The domain of a universal God could logically admit of no boundaries. And the solemn consecration of the territory of Akhetaton with all it contained and would ever contain from cliff to cliff, and of at least two similar holy cities, one at each end of his dominions, may be taken as a ritual act symbolising the Pharaoh’s ultimate intention of consecrating the whole earth to the life-giving Sun, its Father and Sustainer.

* * *

According to the inscriptions upon the boundary-stones, the demarcation of the territory of Akhetaton took place “on the 13th day of the 4th month of the 2nd season,” in the sixth year of Akhnaton’s reign.

The king then returned to Thebes, where he lived until

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 166.

² James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 263. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 166.

his new capital was inhabitable. It is however probable that he came more than once to inspect the works that were now being carried on with feverish speed on the site of the sacred City. A tablet states that the oath and words of consecration pronounced by him in the sixth year of his reign were repeated in the eighth year “on the 8th day of the 1st month of the second season” . . . “And the breadth of Akhetaton,” said the king, “is from cliff to cliff; from the eastern horizon of heaven to the western horizon of heaven. It shall be for Aton, my Father; its hills, its deserts, all its fowl, all its people, all its cattle, all things which Aton produces, on which His rays shine, all things which are in Akhetaton, they will be for my Father, the living Aton, unto the temple of Aton in the City, forever and ever. They are all offered to His spirit. And may His rays be beautiful when they receive them.”¹

The time between the sixth and the eighth year was spent in preparations. At the Pharaoh’s command, hundreds of diggers and bricklayers, masons, carpenters, painters, sculptors, craftsman and artists of all sorts flocked to the site of the new capital. Stone quarries were opened in the neighbourhood, while Bek, “Chief of the sculptors on the great monuments of the king,” was sent to the south for red granite. Marble and alabaster, granite of different colours, ivory, gold and lapis lazuli, and cedar and various kinds of precious woods were brought from Upper Egypt and from Nubia, from Sinai and Syria, and even further still. The whole empire — nay, the whole of the known world — contributed to the great work undertaken for the glory of the universal God.

And the miracle took place. Within two years or so, temples, palaces, villas, cottages, gardens, lakes full of lotus-flowers, avenues bordered with lofty palm-trees sprang forth from the barren sands. Limited on the east by the desert and on the west by a strip of cultivated land, a mile wide, along the Nile, the town was generally about three-quarters of a mile (and, in some places, not more than eleven hundred yards) in breadth, though it stretched over a distance of five miles from north to south. It was, therefore, definitely smaller than Thebes. But it was lovely. It had broad streets, “parks in which were kiosks, colonnaded pavillions and artificial lakes,”¹ and plenty of open spaces, shady groves and flowers. Its great temple of Aton was a magnificent building; its lesser temples, its shrines erected to the memory of the Pharaoh’s ancestors, could stand in parallel with any of the most beautiful religious monuments of Egypt; and the king’s new palace exceeded in splendour that of his parents in Thebes. And not only were the most costly materials thrown lavishly into the construction of the sacred capital, but “the whole place was planned with delicate taste and supreme elegance.”²

¹ Quoted by Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 93.

The main temple of Aton and the king’s palace lay in the northern part of the City. Beautiful pleasure-gardens with several artificial lakes — the “Precincts of Aton” — lay to the south. In the white cliffs of the desert that closed the landscape towards the east, were soon to be hewn tombs of the king, royal family and courtiers.

We have already alluded to the existence in architecture, sculpture, painting, and every form of art, of a new style of which the canons, as far as we can infer, may have influenced the decoration even of the earliest temple of Aton, in Thebes. That art, inspired and encouraged by Akhnaton himself,³ found its everlasting expression in the monuments, the wall-paintings, the statues of Akhetaton; especially in the great temple of Aton, in the decoration of the king’s palace and of the tombs in the eastern hills, and in the beautiful portrait-busts of the Pharaoh and of his queen which rank among the masterpieces of Egyptian sculpture.

In architecture, the break from tradition was perhaps less apparent at first sight than in the other arts. The temples, in Akhetaton, seen from outside, looked much like the classical Egyptian shrines of the time. When, for instance, after crossing its walled enclosure, one beheld the imposing facade of the great temple of Aton — a pillared portico behind which towered two huge pylons — one had probably the impression of entering a sacred building not much different from those erected in honour of the old gods in the City of Amon. The same five tall flag-staves, from the tops of which fluttered long crimson pennons, shot up against the deep blue sky above each pylon. The same monumental gateway formed the entrance of the temple proper. It was only after its shining doors had been flung open that the difference became evident. One found oneself in a broad paved courtyard flooded with sunshine, in the midst of which stood a high altar on a flight of steps. On either side there was a series of small chapels, brightly decorated. Then, a second gateway led into a second open court, from which one passed into a third, and then into a fourth one, half-filled with a magnificent pillared gallery. The columns were tall and thick enough to give that impression of greatness enduring for ever that one had in Karnak, but from their midst the open part of the court and the blazing sky above could always be seen. The rays of the Disk fell directly upon the golden hieroglyphics in praise of divine light and heat; the cool airy shade made the outer wall appear, by contrast, more luminous and the coloured paintings more bright under the dazzling midday Sun. From there, one passed into a fifth, a sixth, and finally a seventh court — all opened to the sky. The two last ones, surrounded by small chapels, had, like the first, an altar in their centre.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), p. 151.

² Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), p. 151.

³ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 180-181.

There was there nothing of the mystery and sacred awe that generally filled the temples of the traditional gods. There were no dimly-lit lamps hanging from gloomy ceilings; no precious images buried in the depth of pitch-dark sanctuaries like stolen treasures in a cave. There was no gradual passage from sunshine to shade, from shade to gloom, from gloom to complete darkness — the abode of an awe-inspiring hidden god. But a visit to the temple, even to the innermost altar, was but a natural transition from the all-pervading radiance of the fiery Disk, from the blazing heat of the world vivified by His beams, to the worship of the unknown invisible Essence behind that light, behind that heat — of the Power, of the Soul of the Sun.

At different times of the day, bread and wine and frankincense and beautiful flowers were offered upon the altars to that invisible God whose only image and symbol — the Sun — shone far above, the same in the temple and outside. And clouds of perfume, and waves of music went up to Him and disappeared, dissolved in the golden light of heaven. One was in presence of an entirely new cult; of an entirely new spirit.

Behind the great temple and within the same enclosure there was a smaller one, also faced by a pillared portico. On either side of its entrance, in front of each row of columns, stood a statue of the king and queen. There were shrines all over the City, among which four at least were dedicated to the Pharaoh's ancestors — one to his father, one to his grandfather, Thutmose the Fourth, one to his great-grandfather, Amenhotep the Second,¹ and one to the father of the latter, Thutmose the Third. We may suppose that there were more. For it is difficult to believe that Akhnaton would have honoured those particular ancestors of his without giving a place in his veneration to his remote predecessors of the IVth and Vth Dynasties, the Pyramid builders, in whose days the antique god Ra, and the usurper Amon, was the supreme god of Egypt and the sole patron of its divine kings, and whose contemporary art, as we shall soon see, seems to have influenced many of the traits of his own "new style," otherwise hard to account for.

As time passed new temples were built. Two, we know — one for the use of the king's mother and one for that of his young sister, Princess Baketaton — were erected some time before the visit of Queen Tiy to Akhetaton. There were minor shrines in diverse beauty-spots and also in the gardens that lay to the south of the capital, shrines with names evocative of joy and peace. One stood in the small island of "Aton-illustrious-in-festivals," in the midst of the Nile, and was called the "House-of-Rejoicing." Another, specially designed for the worship of God in the glory of sunset, and in which Queen Nefertiti presided over the sacred rites, was called the “House-of-putting-the-Disk-to-rest.” Big or small, they were all built in the same manner, with bright open courtyards and altars covered only by the sky. They were beautifully adorned with paintings and reliefs and statues, generally representing the royal couple (often the royal family) in the act of worship. They had nothing of the ostentatious austerity of a presbyterian church. But there was in them no idol of any sort to be considered as the receptacle of God. The one Symbol of the Religion of the Disk — the Sun, with downward rays ending in hands — appeared repeatedly in the pictures and on the reliefs. But it was there only to remind the worshipper that none but the unseen Power within the Sun, the Force symbolised by those “hands,” was worthy of adoration, and to tell him that no form, however perfect, could ever represent It.

¹ "An official named Any held the office of Steward of the House of Amenophis II and there is a representation of Akhnaton offering to Aton in 'the House of Thutmose IV in the City of the Horizon.'" Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 171. See also Wilkinson's Modern Egypt, Vol. II, p. 69; and Davies' El Amarna.

* * *

The new movement in art inaugurated by Akhnaton found another masterful expression in the decoration of the royal palace and of the villas of the nobles, one of which — that of Nakht, the Pharaoh’s “vizier” — has been described at length by A. Weigall.¹ Most of the palaces and villas laid bare by the excavation “were built on the two main avenues of the City, known as the Street of the High-priest and the King’s Highway.”² If we judge by the description of the villa of Nakht, with its colonnaded entrance, its cool interior courts, its galleries, its richly adorned rooms, those two main avenues and their by-streets also, nay, the whole locality if not the whole town, with series of such buildings, must have been indeed “a place of surpassing beauty.”³

But the Pharaoh’s palace, as was natural, effaced in

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 183, and following.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 183.

³ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 175.

splendour all the rest. Like generally all the mansions of the living in ancient Egypt, it was not intended to last more than a generation or two. The tomb, not the house, was the “eternal dwelling” to endure through ages. And that piece of archaic wisdom had so penetrated the sub-conscious mind of every Egyptian, including perhaps Akhnaton himself, that they acted according to it, spontaneously. But the living loved the comforts of life, and the ephemeral abode was, in all cases, as lovely as it could be; in Akhnaton’s case, perfectly beautiful and sometimes gorgeous.

His palace was a large, airy, brick structure, covering a length of half a mile. What remains of it is not sufficient to reconstruct in detail the plan of its series of halls, pillared courts, chambers, store-rooms, etc., destined evidently to accommodate, apart from the royal family, a considerable number of office-bearers of all sorts and a host of servants. But unearthed fragments of pavements and wall-paintings attest that it was magnificently decorated with scenes of natural life. The pictures expressed in form and colour that joy of breathing the daylight and that constant praise rendered to the “Lord of Life” by all living souls, which are the main themes of the young king’s famous hymns to Aton. There was a pavement representing a field full of high grasses and tall scarlet poppies, through which gambolled a calf; another pictured wild ducks waddling their way through swamps, their glossy bluish-green throats bulging out, their yellow feet stumbling in the mud with perfect naturalness; while grey and white pigeons were seen to flit across the blue of sky-like ceilings, light and airy like faraway clouds. There were birds and butterflies flying in the sunshine over watery expanses covered with pink and white lotuses. And fishes played hide-and-seek between the long winding stems. With shades of pale blue, gold and purple, their scales glittered as the rays of Him on high struck them through the water; the birds’ wings fluttered with joy, and the frisking young bull crushed the grass and poppies in an outburst of overwhelming life. The tender lilies opened themselves to the pleasure of the divine touch and let the warmth and light enter right into their golden hearts.

Never had Egyptian art been so true to life before, and never was it again to be so after Akhnaton's reign. It was more than a new technique — movement rendered, along with colour; expression stressed even above perfection of form — it was a profession of faith; it was the Religion of the Disk made vivid to the senses.

But of all the halls of the palace, the most sumptuous seems to have been that immense one — 428 feet on 234 — in which stood 542 pillars shaped like palm-trees, with capitals of massive gold. Fragments of lapis lazuli and many-coloured glazes, deep-set in the thick curbs of precious metal, marked the intervals between the leaves. The trunks of the columns were thickly gilded, and costly stones adorned their pedestals as well as their capitals. We must imagine the pavement, walls and ceiling completely covered with the most exquisite representations of animal and vegetable life, like those we have just mentioned.

This was probably the great reception hall in which foreign envoys and vassal princes were admitted on State occasions, in presence of the king and court. It is not sufficient to think of the dazzling effect of this forest of shining pillars, either in full daylight or at the time of sunset, when the curbs of gold must have glowed like red-hot embers, and the gorgeous capitals glistened with iridescent splendour. That vast hall, with all its incredible magnificence, formed but the setting in which was to appear, worthy of four thousand years of solar tradition (obscured, at times, but never broken) and of his own lofty religion — the culmination of it all — that Man, invested with limitless power and clothed in majesty; that god on earth: the King.

We must picture him wearing his most beautiful State ornaments: broad necklaces of gold and lapis lazuli, heavy gold earrings and bracelets, and snake-shaped armlets, all studded with precious stones, and rings where gems sparkled and where diamonds flashed light. We must picture him with the tall traditional tiara resting upon his head, with the golden cobra, symbol of kingship, rolled around it; elegantly dressed in the finest of fine white linen — woven air — so transparent that in many places his smooth bronze skin showed through the regular pleats. Above him, at the back of the throne, a large golden hawk — another symbol of royalty — stretched out its shining wings, while on either side the fan-bearers lifted and lowered, with studied cadence, enormous fans of ostrich feathers fixed on long gilded poles.

On their entering the resplendent hall, the ambassadors from distant lands must have repeated to themselves the words that one finds over and over again in all the despatches of foreign kings to Akhnaton: “Verily, in the land of Egypt, gold is as common as dust.” And they could hardly believe their eyes. But when, followed by the fan-bearers, the Pharaoh slowly walked in, ascended the steps and seated himself upon the throne, all attention was at once focused on him. He was in the full bloom of youth — with hopes, illusions, dreams — and at the height of his power. He was lovely to look upon; a touch of feminine grace increased his indefinable charm. He was wise and, above all, he was in tune with the Essence of all things — not merely the king of Egypt, the head of the empire, whom they all expected to see (and whom many had seen already in the person of Amenhotep the Third), but Akhnaton, the Prophet and true Son of the Sun, whom the world was to behold only once. He passed along, before the prostrate courtiers, with supreme poise, and seated himself upon his throne of glory with godlike simplicity. The glittering of gold and gems that surrounded him was lost in the radiance of his own body, in the serene effulgence of Aton within him. His large, dark eyes were full of infinite kindness, full of intelligence, and full of peace. Heavenly light poured out of them. His whole body was surrounded by a halo of invisible rays, like the body of the Sun. One could feel them as he passed. One could feel them as he dominated the whole gathering from the height of his throne. They filled the immense hall and seemed to stretch endlessly. And all those who came within his light — provided they were not of the coarsest type of men — could never forget him.

* * *

There were beautiful gardens to the south of the City. Cart-loads of good black earth had been brought up from the banks of the Nile and spread out in thick layers over the barren desert. Canals and artificial lakes kept it for ever moist, and beds of flowers destined to exhale their fragrance as a permanent offering to the Sun, and trees both indigenous and foreign, destined to praise Him by their very loveliness, were planted there. The dry, yellow sands gave way to a paradise of fresh perfumes, of beauty and peace. Stumps and roots of trees and shrubs, and withered remains of water-lilies which once rested their large flat leaves and open flowers upon the surface of the lakes, have been discovered by modern excavators.¹

A detailed description of the “Precincts of Aton” (as the gardens were called), with their two great enclosures leading to each other, has been given by Arthur Weigall² and other authors.³ It is useless to repeat it here. Let us only recall that there was a little temple built on an island within one of the lakes; that there were summer-houses reflecting their delicately carved colonnades in tanks full of white and coloured lotuses; that there were arbours in which one could sit in the shade and admire the play of light upon the sunny surface of the waters, or watch a flight of birds in the deep blue sky. The gardens, where Akhnaton often used to come either to pray, either to sit and explain his Teaching to his favourite courtiers, or simply to be alone, were planned to convey an impression of quiet beauty. Their sight was to lead the soul to praise God in the loveliest manifestations of His power and to fill the heart with love for Him.

The whole City was built in the same spirit. It was a place where the enjoyment of the greatest material magnificence was to be allied with a full sense of seriousness — nay, of the sacredness — of life; with the consciousness of the highest spiritual values.

On one hand, the world’s experience, from the earliest days onwards, is that those two things seldom go together; and time and again the one has been stressed at the expense of the other in the course of history. On the other hand, it is true that man does and always did crave for both, and that any scheme of life (especially of collective life), in which one of the two is neglected, is felt to be imperfect; is, in fact, a recognition of weakness, an acquiescence in the practical impossibility of realising man's everlasting dream of plenitude.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 182.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 181, and following.

³ Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 279.

Akhnaton was probably not ignorant of the difficulty of maintaining pace with one's times in the spiritual sphere. As we have seen, he was himself the child of an age of splendour, the scion of centuries of grand material achievements — the flower of Egypt and, one may add, of the whole Near East at the pinnacle of civilisation. He knew too well what depths of superstition, what ignorance of the very meaning of spiritual life went along with that worldly wealth and greatness. Whatever was precious in the traditional wisdom of the Egyptians belonged to an earlier and simpler age; and there are signs that seem to indicate that the young Pharaoh, to some extent, wished to revive an age-old cult — namely, the solar cult which had once thrived in the city of On — of which the sense had been long forgotten. But, however much the corruption of his brilliant times impressed him, he was too logical not to dissociate in his mind material comfort, beauty, luxury, etc., from the moral coarseness that so often accompanies them. It was difficult to see the two sides of life flourish simultaneously; but there was no reason why they should not do so; indeed, something told him that they should do so; that, as long as man has a visible body and lives on the material plane, there is no perfection unless they do thrive harmoniously. Himself a living example of opposite qualities admirably balanced, a man in whom, by nature, there was no excess, he wanted the whole of life — material, social, emotional, intellectual — to be a thing of beauty, religious life being the bloom and culmination of it all. He did not believe that wisdom lay in suppressing the natural cravings for worldly comfort and enjoyment, but rather in satisfying them, if possible, and at the same time in purifying them; in living intensely, but with innocence and serenity; in feeling the lovely sensuous objects of this transient world — forms and colours, songs and caresses, the taste of good wine in a finely chiselled cup — the higher realities that these things merely foreshadow and symbolise.

He seems to have gone a step further. He seems to have held that the understanding of religious truth is impossible, if not to all individuals, at least to any group of individuals taken as a whole, without a minimum of material well-being. One aspect of his City which has hardly ever been stressed is that, besides being “a glimpse of heaven,” it was, partly at least, what we would call to-day an industrial town. Thousands of workers had gathered to build it; many of them remained after its completion. With the arrival of the court, more luxuries were needed, and therefore a greater supply of skilled labour. Apart from the usual paintings and carvings, different coloured glazes had come into fashion as an important element of house decoration. They were also widely used in the making of small artistic objects. We have seen how Akhnaton encouraged the new industry by ordering large quantities of coloured glazes for the ornamentation of his palace. Under the impulse given by him, glass factories sprang up here and there in Akhetaton and flourished — perhaps the most ancient centres of production of their kind on a broad scale. Glass vessels of great beauty were exported to distant places in exchange for other goods. Besides that, labourers of different crafts were employed to hew out of the limestone hills to the east of the City the tombs of the nobility, and to adorn them fittingly; so that, apart from the court and the officials, a large population of humble folk lived within the area specially consecrated to the Sun.

We do not know about their life as much as we do about that of the upper-class people, whose dwellings were more solid and whose career, moreover, is retraced upon the walls of their tomb-chambers. But we do know that the king had built for the diggers and other workers in the hills of the desert and in the nearby quarries, a “model settlement” which has been excavated in our times. And it is to be presumed that he did not do less for the labourers working in the City proper.

In the settlement near the eastern hills, says Sir Leonard Woolley, each labourer shared with his family a small house, comprising a front room, used both as a kitchen and as a parlour, bedrooms, and a cupboard at the back. There was accommodation for the beasts of burden that helped the men to transport the stone they had dug out. "Inside the houses, rough paintings on the mud walls hint at the efforts of the individual workman to decorate his surroundings or to express his piety; the charms and amulets picked up on the floor show which of all the many gods of Egypt were most in favour with working men; scattered tools and implements tell of the work of each or of his pursuits in leisure hours."¹

These few remarks are sufficient to suggest that, with all their monotonous simplicity, those workmen's houses of the early fourteenth century B.C., "the very pattern of mechanically devised industrial dwellings,"² were far more agreeable to live in than those in most of the "coolie lines" around the mines and factories of present-day India, where a whole family is often packed into one room, with walls and roof not of cool mud, but of corrugated iron, unbearable during the hot weather; far more agreeable to live in, also, than the slums of industrial England in the nineteenth century A.D. They represented no luxury, but a fairly good amount of comfort. They were the dwellings of people whose elementary needs for air, space, privacy and leisure were recognised.³

The amulets found in the labourers' rooms, and many a figure on the walls, show distinctly that the worship of the immemorial popular gods and goddesses was predominant among the humble folk, even within the sacred territory specially dedicated to the One Lord of all beings, Aton.⁴ The king, so eager to prohibit the public cults of Amon and of the

¹ Sir C. Leonard Woolley: Digging up the Past (Edit. 1937), p. 62.

² Sir C. Leonard Woolley: Digging up the Past (Edit. 1937), p. 61.

³ It has sometimes been suggested that this "Workmen's Village" was in reality a penal settlement. "It was surrounded with walls, in no way defensive, but high enough to keep people in, and there are marks of patrol roads all round it" (Pendlebury: Tell-el-Amarna [Edit. 1935], p. 58). If so, the "recognition of the elementary needs" of the people who lived there, is all the more remarkable.

⁴ Sir C. Leonard Woolley: Digging up the Past (Edit. 1937), p. 62; J. D. S. Pendlebury: Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1935), p. 58.

many deities, to have their temples closed and the plural word “gods” effaced from every inscription, seems never to have tried to bring the commoners to abandon their traditional beliefs.

One reason for that apparent indifference may well be that, as we have suggested in the preceding chapter, the Founder of the Religion of the Disk was much less of a staunch monotheist, in the narrow sense of the word, than both his modern admirers and detractors seem to think. He certainly himself believed in one God alone — one impersonal God, the Essence of all existence, personified in the Father of all life on our earth, the Sun — but he probably did not object to other people paying homage to deities of a more finite nature, as long as they did so sincerely and in a truly religious spirit. He had dispossessed and dismissed the priests who encouraged superstition in view of their own worldly ends and who strongly opposed his cherished plans of making the cult of the One God the State religion of Egypt. He had no quarrel either with the ignorant people or with their childish beliefs. Those beliefs, they would perhaps themselves outgrow with time, provided they could keep their hearts open to the beauty of the sunlit world and their minds receptive to the evidence of truth — provided they could feel and think. In the meantime, it mattered little what names and shapes they held sacred, by custom, as long as their beliefs led them to do no harm. We shall discuss later on the implications of Akhnaton’s famous motto, “Living in Truth,” but we can already safely say here that he seems always to have valued right living above anything else in a man. For one to live rightly, one’s sub-conscious mind, at least — one’s deeper self — has to grasp the truth, even if one’s conscious mind, blinded by external influences, denies it. And in the eyes of a lover of truth, and of a man of extraordinary intuition as Akhnaton was, it was surely the deeper self that mattered.

Another reason why the Pharaoh appears never to have tried to spread his religion among the commoners was perhaps that he felt it useless to force upon them a simple yet high philosophy which they would not understand, which they were not prepared to live up to, and which they would soon distort. It was far more reasonable to increase their material well-being, so that they might begin to acquire that preliminary sense of the beauty of life, without which the Religion of the Disk loses all meaning; to give them a minimum of comfort and a minimum of leisure, that they might learn the pleasure of letting their eyes wander over an open landscape, while relaxed.

Akhnaton took several of his disciples outside the narrow circle of the highest nobility. Every time he found an individual whom he judged worthy to receive his message, not only did he teach him the great truths he had discovered, but he generally gave him his confidence in worldly affairs also, and promoted him to a high rank in the hierarchy of the State, as is shown in inscriptions in the tombs of some of his followers, for instance: "I was a man of low origin both on my father's and on my mother's side. But the king established me . . . he caused me to grow . . . by his bounty, when I was a man of no property. He gave me food and provisions every day, I who had been one that begged bread."¹ He was surely the last man not to appreciate the natural aristocracy of mind and character which exists, but is rare, in every stratum of society. But in his dealings with the people in general, he seems to have been guided by the conviction that a certain amount of material comfort and of leisure should precede any sort of attempt at their religious uplift. The model settlements he caused to be built, with houses containing at least three or four airy rooms each, for each family, seem to have been his main gift to the labourers of his age. And far from setting the formal adherence to his creed as a condition without which none could enjoy the advantages he offered — as so many modern theoreticians would have done, if they had his power — he let the "masses" believe what they were accustomed to, and worship whomever they pleased. Congenial conditions of life were in his eyes, along with good government, their primary need and their foremost right.

¹ Inscription in the tomb of May (Rock-tomb No. 14, at Tell-el-Amarna), quoted by Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 189.

And in this — apart from being, as in many other ways, surprisingly “modern” — he was consistent with that ideal of all-round perfection, spiritual and material, which he tried to realise in his sacred City.

* * *

At the time of the foundation of his new capital, Akhnaton had already recorded upon the boundary-stones his desire that his own tomb, that of the queen and of their children, that of Mnevis (the sacred bull of On), that of the high-priest of Aton and those of the priests and principal dignitaries, should be dug out in the hills to the east of the City.¹ Up till now, some twenty-five tombs have been discovered and excavated by modern archaeologists.² Their decoration is characteristic of the “new style” that flourished in Akhetaton; the inscriptions which accompany the paintings tell us a good deal about the Pharaoh’s followers; and it is upon the walls of those sepulchres that have been found written the two invaluable Hymns to Aton, composed by Akhnaton himself, which have come down to us — the main sources from which something definite is known about the Religion of the Disk.

The tombs were each one composed of several successive chambers, hewn out of the live rock, as it was the custom in Egypt, the innermost chamber being that in which the mummy was to lie. Massive pillars carved out of a single ¹ “There shall be made for me a sepulchre in the eastern hills; my burial shall be made therein, in the multitude of jubilees which Aton, my Father, hath ordained for me, and the burial of the queen shall be made there, in that multitude of years. And the burial of the king’s daughter shall be made there. If I die in any town of the north, south, east or west, I will be brought here, and my burial shall be made in Akhetaton. If the great queen Nefertiti, who liveth, die in any town of the north, south, east or west, she shall be brought here and buried in Akhetaton. If the king’s daughter Meritaton die in any town of the north, south, east or west, she shall be brought here and buried in Akhetaton. And the sepulchre of Mnevis shall be made in the eastern hills and he shall be buried there. The tombs of the high priest and of the Divine Father and of the priests of Aton shall be made in the eastern hills and they shall be buried therein. The tombs of the dignitaries and others shall be made in the eastern hills and they shall be buried therein. . . .” Inscription on the first boundary-stone, 13th day, 4th month, 2nd season, 6th year.

² Norman de Garis Davies: The Rock of El Amarna. Sir Flinders Petrie: Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1894). J. D. S. Pendlebury: Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1935), pp. 47-56.

block and shaped like lotus-buds sustained the heavy roofs. The walls were adorned with exquisite paintings representing the main episodes of the life of the deceased, with special emphasis upon their dealings with the king, and the favour they had received from him. There was no allusion of any sort to Osiris or to any of the gods who, according to the traditional beliefs of the land, were supposed to preside over the netherworld; none of the age-old magical formulas which the dead man was expected to repeat in order to protect himself against the dangers that awaited him at different stages of his journey to the great beyond; none of the ready-made declarations of innocence which he was supposed to recite, with a view to avoiding the consequences of his misdeeds on earth. The main prayer which those who had “hearkened to the king’s Teaching” addressed to the One God was that they might continue to see the beauty of the Sun — and to serve the king — in life beyond death. Some also asked to be remembered on earth by their family and friends.

Apart from these prayers and from occasional extracts from the king’s hymns, the inscriptions in the new sepulchres contained no reference at all to any religious beliefs. They simply stated the titles and gave an account of the career of courtiers who were to be buried there, thus completing the information suggested by the adjoining pictures.

We have just quoted an extract of what May, one of the City officials, says of himself on the walls of his tomb. There are other instances of dignitaries who stress that they owe all their elevation to the Pharaoh’s favour. Pnahesi (or Panehesi), the Ethiopian, apparently one of Akhnaton’s most beloved disciples, whose tomb seems to have been more magnificent than that of any other courtier, tells us plainly: “When I knew not the companionship of princes, I was made an intimate of the king.” He also says of his royal master that he “maketh princes and formeth the humble,” a statement confirmed by another inscription in the tomb of Huya, steward of Queen Tiy, which refers to the monarch “selecting his officials from the ranks of the yeomen.”¹ All this goes to stress what we have said above — namely that, though he surely did not scorn nobility of birth when allied with merit, Akhnaton always took merit first in consideration, in his choice of the men to whom he would entrust responsible posts, and grant wealth and honours as well as that sort of immortality conferred by the gift of a tomb built to last for ever.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 190.

How generously he lavished riches and distinctions upon those whom he judged worthy of his favour is suggested by the paintings and inscriptions in the tombs of Pentu, of Mahu, of Ay, of Merira, the high-priest of Aton, and other dignitaries who are represented receiving from him large rewards in gold. “His Majesty has doubled me his gifts in gold and silver.” . . . “How prosperous is he, my Lord, who hears thy Teaching of life,” states Ay, the “Master of the King’s horse,” who one day, after the ephemeral reign of Akhnaton’s two immediate successors, was himself to wear the Double Crown. “He has multiplied me his favours like the number of the sand,” says Mahu; “I am the head of the officials at the head of the people; my Lord has promoted me because I have carried out his Teaching and I hear his word without ceasing. . . .” Indeed, knowing as one does how readily the greater number of those men — including the most prominent among them — hastened to abandon the worship of the One God and to denounce all connection with their inspired Teacher as soon as his enemies came back to power, one is tempted to suppose that many professed to follow him mainly for the tangible marks of attachment that he would give them. However, there are inscriptions in which the courtiers pay to Akhnaton and his Teaching a homage that seems to come from the depth of their heart; the language, at least, in which it is expressed, is that of ardent devotion, such as, for instance, these words, addressed to the Sun:

“Thy rays are on Thy bright image, the Ruler of Truth, who proceeded from eternity. Thou givest to him Thy duration and Thy years; Thou hearkenest to all that is in his heart, because Thou lovest him. Thou makest him like the Aton, him Thy child, the King; Thou lookest on him, for he proceeded from Thee. Thou hast placed him beside Thee for ever and ever, for he loves to gaze upon Thee. . . . Thou hast set him there till the swan shall turn black and the crow turn white, till the hills rise up to travel and the deeps rush into the rivers. . . . While Heaven is, he shall be.”¹

One really wonders how even such men as the author of those words of glowing faith in him seem to have done nothing to defend the young Pharaoh’s memory, during the terrible reaction that was one day to burst out against all he had stood for.

* * *

Apart from the information they give about the life of the king and courtiers, the paintings and reliefs in the tombs in the “eastern hills” are, along with the famous portrait-heads found in the studio of several artists in the City, the most illustrative productions of the “new art” of Akhetaton.

The conventions which had shackled the artist in his rendering of the human figure — and especially of royal personages — and which had limited the sources of his inspiration, have entirely disappeared in the new school. Here we find the Pharaoh and his queen portrayed in all the familiar attitudes of private life — eating, drinking, chatting, smelling flowers, playing with their children, etc. — with a naturalness never attained in Egyptian art before the “Tell-el-Amarna period,” and never surpassed in any art. And that is not all: more than one of those pictures and sculptures even present a definite exaggeration of certain features, both of the head and body, which sets them apart from nearly all the productions of the ancient world, and renders them somewhat akin to our modern “futurist” art in its strange aspects. One has only to look at some of the reliefs representing the king himself with an unusually developed skull, a protruding chin, and hips and thighs out of proportion with his slender body; one has only to think of the otherwise beautiful limestone head of one of the princesses in the Cairo museum, whose skull is elongated to an incredible extent, to be convinced of the existence of such a tendency among the artists of Akhnaton's school.

¹ Quoted by Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 115.

Some modern authors¹ have endeavoured to present those strange features as the faithful reproduction of an ungainly countenance, by sculptors and painters trained by the king "living in truth" never to flatter their models, least of all himself and his family. But this view is contradicted by the existence of other portraits of the king and of the princesses — paintings, busts, and statues — in which none of these deformities are to be seen. There is the quartz head of one of the Pharaoh's little daughters at the museum of the Louvre, the head of a normal child of exquisite delicacy. There is the delightful painted relief picturing Akhnaton in his early youth as he smells a bunch of flowers that Nefertiti holds out to him — one of the best productions of the Amarna school; a work which, according to Professor H. R. Hall himself, possesses already a hellenic grace, and in which the king's figure "reminds one of a Hermes" and "could hardly have been bettered by a Greek"² (the greatest compliment a European critic can pay to the masterpiece of a non-European artist). There is the whole series of portrait-busts that represent Akhnaton not as a boy, but as a man, and that attest beyond doubt that he was lovely to look upon.

Akhnaton's physical appearance has been discussed nearly as often as his religious ideas, and sometimes commented upon with as much bitterness.³ Inasmuch as a body is the reflection of the soul that animates it — or the soul the projection of the body — it is not superfluous to try to visualise him as he once could be seen, when he trod the painted pavements of his palace. From his remains we know that he was a man of medium height; from pictorial evidence, we know that he had a regular oval face, a straight nose, thick, well-designed lips; and that his jet-black eyes were, in the words of Arthur Weigall, “eloquent of dreams.”¹ He had a long graceful neck, well-shaped arms and legs, and beautiful hands. His body, of which the top part is generally represented bare in the paintings and bas-reliefs, was neither stout nor thin. The pleated cloth he wore wrapped around the hips and tightly tied below the navel, seems to be responsible for the “protruding paunch” to which so many authors allude in their description of him. He has been depicted as having little of a virile appearance and, at first sight at least, this remark is not entirely without grounds. There was surely an indefinable charm all about his person; a gracefulness of deportment, an irresistible gentleness — something subtly feminine. But, at the same time, in those large, dark, loving eyes, whose mere glance was like a caress, one could read courage, determination, a manly depth of thought and will; those lips, with their delicate curve, always ready to move into a mysterious smile, expressed the serenity of unshakable strength. There was, in the Pharaoh’s countenance, a well-balanced blending of grace, of force, and of poise; of voluptuousness and of character — a living picture of the harmonious plenitude of his being. In other words, Akhnaton seems to have forestalled in real life, to a very great extent, that well-nigh impossible complete human type — young demi-god with the opposite perfections of both man and woman — which Leonardo da Vinci was to conceive and to strive throughout his career to fix in lines and colours, three thousand years later. And his body, no less than his personality, bore the stamp of that strange dual beauty.

¹ H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 304. Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 103. James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 294.

² H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 305.

³ H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 304-305. L. W. King and H. R. Hall: Egypt and Western Asia, pp. 100, 385. Stanley Cook, in the Preface to Baikie's Amarna Age (Edit. 1926). Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 103.

The paintings and sculptures that represent him, or the members of his family, with the exaggerated features we have referred to above, are therefore to be taken not as faithful portraits, but as characteristic instances of a “style.” And that “style,” apart from any other considerations, contained a religious — perhaps also a political — symbolism. Its productions have no parallel in the immediate past, but they strangely resemble some archaic figures of the Fourth and

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 52.

Fifth Dynasties. Arthur Weigall has given, side by side with the copy of one or two of them, the reproduction of royal heads and of a statuette found by Sir Flinders Petrie, the former at Abydos, the latter at Diospolis,¹ and dating as far back as the days of the great Pyramid builders. The same receding forehead, protruding chin, elongated skull; the same overstressed hips and thighs are to be remarked in both cases, at a distance of eighteen hundred years or more. So that, indeed, from those quaint samples of the work of the new school of Tell-el-Amarna there is every probability that the distinguished archaeologist is right when he states that “Akhnaton’s art might thus be said to be a kind of renaissance — a return to the classical period of archaic days; the underlying motive of that return being the desire to lay emphasis upon the king’s character as a representative of that most ancient of all gods, Ra-Horakhti.”²

How closely that aspect of the new art was interwoven with the Religion of the Disk we can only understand after trying to define what place the king occupied in the creed which he preached. It will suffice here to say that the frequency with which those archaic renderings of him and of his family appear in the paintings and sculptures of his time, suggests what stress he himself put upon the great antiquity of his so-called “new” ideas. Akhnaton seems to have shared with many inspired religious leaders the conviction that, far from being an innovator, he was just the expounder of Truth, which is one and of all times, and of which the oldest civilisations had perhaps a more accurate glimpse than the latter ones.

Whatever, in the Amarna school, was not a deliberate attempt at imitating the archaic models, was of utmost grace and naturalness — true to life as never Egyptian art was again to be. We must remember that the young king was the soul of the whole movement. “It was he who released the artists from convention and bade their hands repeat what their eyes saw; and it was he who directed those eyes to the beauties of nature around them. He and no other taught them to look at the world in the spirit of life; to infuse into the cold stone something of the ‘effulgence which comes from Aton.’”¹

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 64.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 63.

* * *

In the beautiful City we have tried to describe — the dream and the work of one man — life was pleasant. We have already seen what amount of comfort and of freedom the humblest dwellers in the consecrated area enjoyed, in the model settlements built for them near the field of their labours. They probably saw very little of the pomp of the court and, with the exception of those who lived in the City itself, they hardly ever had the opportunity of witnessing the passage of a royal procession. Whether they had or not some sort of vague knowledge of the new creed proclaimed by the king, we cannot tell. They had perhaps heard that he worshipped the Sun alone and despised the other gods; that he was in conflict with the priests of Amon; that he had raised several men of poor extraction to high positions because of their readiness to share his faith; that, in the eyes of his God, Egyptians and foreigners were the same. But, whatever rumours may have reached them in their fields, their factories, or their quarries, that brought no change either in their beliefs or in their lives. As we have seen, they continued to worship in peace the age-old popular deities that they were accustomed to. And the Pharaoh was, to them, what every one of his predecessors had been to the past generations: a divine being, the father and defender of his subjects, the “good god.” And to catch a glimpse of him as he drove through the streets in his chariot, with his beautiful young queen by his side, was a joy that most of them must have keenly valued. Like the bulk of people of all times, they cared little what their sovereign personally believed or did as long as they enjoyed plenty. And Akhnaton’s unconventional habit of appearing in public in all simplicity added, no doubt, a great deal to his popularity — at least, until the disasters of the latter part of his reign created serious discontent, and gave unexpected ground to renewed priestly intrigues all over the land.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 181.

The nobles, and all those upon whom the Pharaoh had bestowed his special favour, dwelt in those elegant villas surrounded by gardens which modern excavation has made it possible to give the most attractive description in full details.¹ They were the bearers of all high offices, the companions and the followers of the king. They had the untold privilege of hearing his Teaching from his own lips. And those who formed the closer circle of his best beloved disciples could see him and talk to him freely.

They shared with him not only the pleasures and luxuries of court life, but also hours of thoughtful conversation and moments of silence and prayer in the brilliant halls of the palace or in the cool shade of pillared pavillions in the gardens, by the side of lakes covered with water-flowers. They were his intimates — his friends. If we judge by the way they speak of him in the inscriptions upon the walls of their tomb-chambers, some of them — such as Mahu, Pnahesi, Ramose — seem to have been fervently devoted to him. But as there are no records to tell us how far any of them stood for him against the current events that followed the close of his short reign, it is very difficult to say who was sincere and who was but a clever flatterer. Whatever it be, Akhnaton was pleased to put his confidence in them, and an atmosphere of peace, goodwill, and happiness appears to have existed in his immediate entourage.

However, the Religion of the Disk is so dominated by the personality of its Founder, so profoundly coloured by his reactions to nature and man, that nothing would help us more to grasp its spirit than the knowledge of Akhnaton's day-to-day life amidst the beautiful surroundings that he himself had created.

It is not always easy to reconstruct the life of practically contemporary figures about whom there is abundance of undoubtable evidence. Now and then a few unpublished letters, the sudden discovery, in somebody else's memoirs, of a precise reference to some action, which had formerly remained secret, alters entirely the picture one had of them. The knowledge of what a man — be he even a great king — did and said, felt and thought, thirty-three hundred years ago, during those apparently uneventful hours that history does not care to retrace, is therefore necessarily incomplete and liable to revision. Yet, to the extent it is possible to acquire it, it is too precious to be overlooked.

¹ See, for instance, the description of the villa of Nakht, in Arthur Weigall's Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 183-184.

The main sources of information from which one can hope to know something of Akhnaton's daily occupations are the paintings and reliefs where he is represented over and over again, in the tombs of his courtiers. There, a great part of his official life is pictured inasmuch as it is connected with the career of the nobles to whom the sepulchres were destined. In Mahu's tomb, for instance, he is portrayed inspecting the defences of Akhetaton in company of Mahu himself, and — a noteworthy detail — followed by an unarmed bodyguard. Elsewhere we see him promoting Merira to the exalted position of high-priest of Aton, in the midst of great solemnity, and rewarding him for his faithfulness with necklaces of gold. Similar, though less stately scenes of distribution of rewards to officials are to be found, as we have already said, in many tombs, with the repeated assertion that the courtiers have won the king's favour by their constant "hearkening to his Teaching of life" and by their understanding of it. This presupposes that Akhnaton spent a fairly great amount of time instructing all those whom he deemed worthy to become his disciples.

On the other hand, from the evidence of the famous "Amarna Letters," we know that he was in correspondence with the neighbouring monarchs — Burnaburiash of Babylon, to whose son he betrothed one of his daughters; Dushratta of Mitanni, his cousin and perhaps also his brother-in-law; Shubbiluliuma, of the Hittites; and even the distant king of Assyria, Assur-Uballit, then only beginning to lead his semi-barbaric nation out of obscurity. We know that he received regular despatches from his vassals and governors of provinces, to whom he no less regularly sent his orders.

There is a picture that represents him coming forth in a gorgeous palanquin, carried upon the shoulders of eighteen men, to receive the tribute of the empire, during the twelfth year of his reign. Gold and ivory, rare fruits, ostrich feathers, and precious vases, products of the deserts and forests of the Far South and articles of Syrian workmanship, are presented to him by men of various races — the gifts of disparate subject countries to their common Lord.

From all this evidence one may presume that the king's days were equally filled by the discharge of his official duties, which were numerous, and by the explanation of his Teaching to a small circle of followers — apart, of course, from the regular performance of worship at sunrise, noon, and sunset, in the palace or in the temple.

Little is known, in its details, of the ritual that accompanied that worship. We can, however, suppose that it was much simpler than that which prevailed in the cult of the Egyptian gods, for here there was no image, no representation of the divine under any form save the Sun-disk with rays ending in hands which was a mere symbol, not an idol. Consequently, there were none of all the elaborate ceremonies, connected with the bathing and dressing and feeding of the god, that formed such an essential part of the ritual in the temples of Egypt and of all the ancient world, as they do still to-day in the Hindu temples of India. Here, the services consisted of a minimum of pre-ordained words, chants and gestures — those alone that were indispensable to translate the king's lofty intuitions of truth into a cult. The altars, that stood, as we have seen, in the open, were decked with beautiful flowers; and various offerings of food and drink, particularly bread, wine, and fruits, were placed upon them, symbolising the idea, at once scientific and religious, that the nourishment of the whole creation is produced through the Sun, and belongs to Him Who is the Soul of the Sun and of all the Universe. The king, reassuming the active priestly functions of the Pharaohs of old, would himself stretch out the kheper baton over the offerings and consecrate them. Then he would throw handfuls of incense into the fire, and as the coils of scented smoke slowly went up into the sky in praise of Him in Whose light the flame of the sacrifice seemed pale, he would intone one of the hymns he had composed to the glory of the Sun — a different one according to the season, the day, and the hour. Musicians, male and female, among whom we know from a picture¹ that there was a choir of eight blind men, played upon their instruments and sang during the daily services. There were dancers, also, who through a harmony of symbolical postures and movements suggested the daily journey of the Sun, the death of the earth at His departure, the resurrection of all flesh at His dawning again. They danced especially on festive days, corresponding to notable positions of the Sun in His apparent course from constellation to constellation. The queen and princesses took part in every solemnity, the little girls occasionally rattling the sistrum, as we see them do in the funeral paintings of the time.

* * *

Besides his administrative duties; besides the State functions, and occasionally the State banquets over which he presided — like that one given in honour of Queen Tiy's visit to the new City, and represented upon the walls of the tomb of Huya — besides even the daily worship he offered publicly at the altar of the Sun, pictorial evidence reveals to us different episodes of Akhnaton's private life which lead us to infer, about him and his creed, more than one could expect at first sight.

In nearly every painting he is portrayed with his consort and often (as in the feasting scene just mentioned) with one or more of his six (or seven) children. And the attitudes in which he has allowed the artists to represent him, doubtless in a spirit of absolute fidelity to living life, are most eloquent in their naturalness.

We have already recalled the lovely painted relief of the Berlin museum in which the young Pharaoh is seen smelling a bunch of flowers that Nefertiti gracefully holds out to him with a smile. On the walls of the tomb of Huya he is pictured seated, admiring the performances of several pretty naked dancing-girls, while the queen, standing by his side, refills with wine his golden cup. In the tombs of Mahu and Aahmose he is painted in his chariot, with Nefertiti next to him, and actually kissing her while he drives. Princess Meritaton, his eldest daughter, stands in one of those pictures in front of her parents, and plays with the horses' tails while the king and queen look lovingly at each other, their lips ready to unite. Even in scenes depicting State solemnities, such as the reception of the tribute of the empire — scenes in which, one might think, there was little place for intimacy — Akhnaton and Nefertiti are represented side by side, hand in hand, and with their arms around each other's waist. And, contrarily to the age-old custom of Egyptian artists, the queen is nearly always pictured on the same scale as her husband.

¹ In the tomb of Merira, the high-priest of Aton. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 143.

One finds hardly less evidence of their great love in the written documents than in the paintings. Whatever be the inscription in which she is referred to, the queen is seldom named without some endearing epithet. She is "the mistress of the king's happiness"; the "Lady of grace"; "fair of countenance"; "endowed with favours"; "she at the hearing of whose voice the Pharaoh rejoices." And one of the most current forms of oath used by the king on solemn occasions — the oath engraved upon the boundary-stones of the new City, and quoted in the beginning of this chapter — is: "As my heart is happy in the queen and her children . . ."

Many will say that expressions of love found in official documents are not always to be taken literally. But we believe that they should be taken so here, for they were written at the command of one who, all through his career, lived up to his ideal of integral truth with unfailing consistency. He, one of whose first actions as a king was to have the tomb of his father reopened and the name of Amon erased from therein, because he saw in it the symbol of a false religion; he, who ended by losing an empire rather than depart from his uncompromising sincerity of purpose, cannot be expected, in any case, to make a show of feelings which he did not have.

One has, therefore, to accept without reservation the conclusion that forces itself upon one's mind through both pictorial and written evidence — namely, that Akhnaton loved his consort ardently.

As we have said before, he had not chosen her, but had been wedded to her when about ten years old or less. The marriage was, no doubt, the work of Queen Tiy; and if Nefertiti was, as Sir Flinders Petrie maintains, the daughter of Dushratta, king of Mitanni, it was perhaps chiefly prompted by political motives. But as it often happens in the case of child-marriages, the little prince and little princess soon grew tenderly attached to each other and, as years passed, they unconsciously stepped from affection to love. In the inscriptions on the boundary-stones of Akhetaton, which were erected between the official foundation of the City and the time the king and court came to settle in it — between the sixth year and the eighth year of the reign — one, and sometimes two of Akhnaton's daughters — Meritaton and Makitaton — are mentioned. The third one, Ankhsenpaton, was born, according to Weigall, just before the departure of her parents from Thebes. Three others at least — Neferuaton, Neferura, and Setepenra — (and perhaps four, if Weigall and other authors are right) were born in the new capital. All six (or all seven) were Nefertiti's children. And there is no allusion of any sort to other children, or to "secondary wives," in the existing documents concerning the royal family; so that, as far as history knows, Akhnaton, in contrast with most kings of antiquity, and of his own line, seems to have been contented all his life with the love of one woman, given to him to be his chief wife while still a child.

Not that he had, apparently, any prejudice against the customs of his times regarding marriage, still less against polygamy as a human fact. And it would be absurd to attribute to him the mentality of a modern European bourgeois on this much-debated subject of private morality. In this matter, as in many others, he seems to have been well in advance of our times — not to speak of more prudish ages.

And if he possessed but one wife, as repeated evidence suggests, this was not because he had any moral objection to polygamy, but simply because he loved that one woman with deep, complete, vital love.

If we judge him through the pictures his artists have left of him, Akhnaton was far from being one of those austere thinkers who shun pleasure as an obstacle to the development of the spirit or even as a meaningless waste of time and energy. He seems, on the contrary, to have believed in the value of life in its plenitude, and the paintings that represent him feasting, drinking, listening to sweet music, caressing his wife, or playing with his children, apart from their merit as faithful renderings of everyday realities, had possibly a definite didactic significance. In practically every one of them the lofty symbol of the Religion of the Disk — the Sun with downward rays ending in hands — radiates over the scene depicted, so as to recall the presence of the One invisible Reality in the very midst of it, and to emphasise the beauty, the seriousness, nay, the sacredness of all manifestations of life when experienced as they should be, in earnestness and in innocence, and considered with their proper meaning. Whether they stand together in adoration before His altar, or lie in each other's arms, the Sun embraces the young king and queen in His fiery emanation; His rays are upon them, holding the symbol ankh — life — to their lips. For life is prayer. One who puts all his being in what he feels or does — as he who “lived in truth” surely did — already grasps, through the joyful awareness of his body to beautiful, deep sensations, a super-sensuous, all-pervading secret order, source of beauty, which he may not be in a position to define, but which gives its meaning to the play of the nerves. And he is able above all to acquire, through the glorious exaltation of his senses in love, a positive, though inexpressible knowledge of the eternal rhythm of Life — to touch the core of Reality.

In allowing a few scenes of his private life to be thus exhibited to the eyes of his followers — and of posterity — was it Akhnaton's deliberate intention to teach us that pleasure, when enjoyed in religious earnestness, transcends itself in a revelation of eternal truth? We shall never know. But one thing can be said for certain, and this is that the instance of that perfect man, on one hand so aware of his oneness with the Essence of all things, on the other so beautifully human in his refined joie de vivre, is itself a teaching, a whole philosophy. And in him one can see an expounder of precisely that wisdom which our world of to-day, tired of obsolete lies, is striving to realise, but cannot; a man who lived to the full the life of the body and of the spirit, seriously, innocently, in harmony with the universal Principle of light, joy, and fecundity which he worshipped in the Sun. Whether we imagine him burning incense to the majesty of the rising Orb, or listening to the love-songs of the day in midst of merriment and enjoying them with the detachment of an artist; whether we think of him entertaining his followers of the marvellous unity of light and heat, thirty-three hundred years before modern science, or abandoning himself to the thrill of human tenderness in a kiss of his loving young queen, the same beauty radiates from his person.

And it is that beauty which, before all, attracts us to him, and, through him, to the Religion of the Disk, that glorious projection of himself in union with the Cosmos.

* * *

As we have just seen, something of Akhnaton's intimate life, perhaps also something of his general philosophy, can be inferred from the pictures that have survived the ruin of his lovely City. Of his inner life, of his thoughts and feelings during those moments of blessed solitude that doubtless followed, with him as with all spiritual geniuses, hours of intense activity, there are no records whatsoever. There cannot be. And yet one feels that nothing would bring one, so as to say, in closer contact with him, than a glance at that particular aspect of his unwritten history.

It is natural to believe that the two hymns that have come down to us — and probably many more, which are lost — were composed by Akhnaton during the hours he was alone. It is therefore, it seems, in the general tone of those poems, as well as in the evocation of the atmosphere in which they were conceived, that one can the best hope to form an idea of the king's mind when away from the crowd of his courtiers and even from the presence of his wife and children — when free from the duties of monarchy, from the obligations of his mission, from the pleasures of love and family life.

The hymns in their details will be discussed later on as the main basis of our knowledge of the Religion of the Disk. But we can already say here, in anticipation of a more complete study of them, that the dominant idea expressed in those songs is that of the beauty of the whole scheme of things as ordained by the Sun — by Him who causes the radiant days to follow the nights full of stars and the seasons to succeed each other. They also contain the belief in an all-pervading, unfailing Love, mysteriously inseparable from the Energy within the Sun-rays; of a Love that gives each speck of life — be it the germ in the bird's egg or the embryo asleep in the depth of a woman's womb — a start on the golden road to full development in health and happiness. They contain the bold certitude of the impartiality of that immanent love, poured out with light and heat, through the life-giving Disk, to all tribes, all nations, all races, all living species, indiscriminately; the assertion of the unity of life and of the brotherhood of all creatures as a consequence of the universal fatherhood of the Sun.

But remarkably enough for one who would consider those hymns as expressing true facts of nature and nothing more, there is, in them, not the slightest allusion to the dark side of the picture of the world; not a hint at the millions of cases in which the all-pervading love of the Father seems to fail; in which the innocent speck of life — young insect, bird, beast, or baby — is mercilessly crushed before it even had time to know the beauty of light, or grows up only to drag a miserable existence; not a single word about those cries of distress which, to any sensitive and thoughtful person, so often seem to interrupt — for what purpose, no man knows — the harmony of the universal chorus.

Nobody, with even a superficial knowledge of his life, can suppose in Akhnaton less sensitiveness to suffering, less love for creatures or less intelligence than in the average man. And the only way to explain, therefore, this total omission of all idea of evil from the picture of the Universe given in the hymns (at least in the two which we know) is to admit that they were composed during special moments of the king's experience; during moments when the very sight of the world with its incoherent mixture of joy and pain, life and death — of the world at our scale — was lost to him in a state of bliss in which he grasped nothing but the essence of things, retaining of their contradictory appearances those alone that convey the idea of joy and order.

In other words, those poems do express true facts of nature, but at the same time they reveal a plane of consciousness which is not the ordinary plane. They suggest a picture of the world as perceived by one who has transcended the ordinary scale of vision; by one who has reached the stage where he actually feels the inherent goodness and beauty of the whole play of existence behind its transient failures, suffering and death — and ugliness; by one who, above the apparent disorder of phenomenal experience, greets the majesty of everlasting laws, expressions of harmony, glimpses of a Reality which is perfect.

Left to himself in the calm of his sumptuous apartments or in the fresh solitude of his gardens, it seems, if our inference be right, that Akhnaton easily raised his soul to that stage of consciousness characterised as bliss in the absence of a more enlightening description of it. Did he reach it systematically, as a result of any physical and mental discipline, or simply as a natural development of his extraordinary sensitiveness, or as the outcome both of a powerful inborn tendency and of wilful application? It is very difficult to say; and it matters little. What is important is that, in all probability, he was familiar with the genuine experience of super-consciousness. It was to that experience that he doubtless owed his astounding insight into scientific truths which could only be proved by the combined intellectual labour of thousands of men, spread over centuries. It seems also certain that, whatever might have been the Pharaoh's deliberate efforts and the inner discipline he underwent, if any, he must have been from the start gifted with powers of intuition out of proportion to those of the ordinary man of science, not to speak of the ordinary layman, of any age.

He would have developed those powers anyhow. And, with his uncompromising logic as a complement to insight and inspiration; with the absolute sincerity of his nature and the charm of his person, he would still have been, even in a totally different social status, one of the few great men to whom divine honours can be rendered without sacrilege. As things stand, far from having to rise to perfection in spite of his material surroundings, he used a part of the inexhaustible wealth at his command to create for himself, in Akhetaton, the ideal abode in which he could pass without effort from life in truth and beauty to the contemplation of supreme Beauty and supreme Truth. Of his City in general, and more especially of his palace with its elegantly decorated chambers, comfortable, quiet and spotlessly clean, in which every detail of architecture, every item of furniture, every minute object was a work of art; with its terraces overlooking rich palm-groves and flower-beds and avenues bordered with villas, and the great temple of the Sun nearby, and the bluish line of the distant hills beyond the sandy desert; of his palace, we say, and of the shady pavilions near the lakes in the “Precincts of Aton,” and of the “Precincts of Aton” themselves — of all the places in which Akhnaton would choose in turn to spend his moments of solitude, one could repeat the words used by the French poet to depict an imaginary land of dream and escape:

“Là, tout est ordre et beauté,
Luxe, calme et volupté. . . .”¹

Clad in fine immaculate linen in the midst of those mythical splendours that we can to-day but faintly recall, the inspired young Pharaoh, half-reclining upon his ivory couch, let his mind drift its natural way. Through a restful perspective of well-shaped pillars, his eyes gazed at a patch of blue sky. Subtle perfumes were floating in the air; the breeze brought him the fragrant breath of flowers; perhaps the subdued harmony of a distant harp reached him now and then. There was peace all around him — peace in keeping with the silence of his heart and congenial to meditation. The tranquil beauty which his eyes met wherever they looked helped him to forget every possible disturbing thought of imperfection; to detach himself from those appearances which stand in the way of the soul in quest of ultimate truth.

¹ Beaudelaire: L'Invitation au Voyage (Fleurs du Mal).

Thus was, as far as we can hope to picture it, the life of the king in Akhetaton, the City of God, built by him to be an island of peace in this world of strife; to be the model, on a small scale, of what he would have desired the world to become under the beneficent influence of his Teaching of truth. We have seen also something of the life of the people there. It was surely not perfect, and Akhnaton knew himself that his new capital, in spite of all his efforts, did not come up to the full expectation of his dream. But it was his dream realised to the extent it could be during the short span of his career, among average men, without the pressure of violent proselytism, without, by the way, any form of creedal proselytism at all among the commoners. It was a beautiful creation, in spite of all unavoidable shortcomings. May, one of those men whom the Pharaoh had promoted to a high position on account of his faithfulness, describes it as follows in an inscription upon the walls of the tomb prepared for him in the cliffs of the desert:

“Akhetaton, great in loveliness, mistress of pleasant ceremonies, rich in possessions, with the offerings of Ra in her midst. . . . At the sight of her beauty one rejoices. She is lovely. To see her is like a glimpse of heaven. . . . When Aton rises in her midst, He fills her with His rays, embracing in His light His beloved Son, son of Eternity, who came forth from His substance and who offers the earth to Him Who placed him upon his throne, causing the earth to belong to Him Who made it. . . .”¹

¹ Inscription in the tomb of May (Rock Tomb 14 at Tell-el-Amarna). See Breasted’s Ancient Records of Egypt (Edit. 1906), Vol. II, p. 412; also Arthur Weigall’s Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 176.

CHAPTER V

THE WAY OF REASON

As remarks Sir Wallis Budge,¹ it is true that all we know for certain about Akhnaton's Teaching is found only in two hymns, one short and one long, the former copied several times, partly or in whole, in different courtier's tombs at Tell-el-Amarna, the latter found written only once on the walls of the tomb of Ay, "fan-bearer on the right side of the King, and Master of the King's House." These two songs in praise of the Sun are all that is left of a probably much more considerable religious literature, the rest having entirely perished in the systematic ruin of Akhetaton and the persecution of the Religion of the Disk under Tutankhamen and especially under Horemheb.

But we believe that, if one considers the hymns closely, and in the light of all that the reliefs, paintings and inscriptions tell us, directly or indirectly, about the king's personality and about his life, then one will find that they imply far more than what Budge appears to admit. One will find that the few enthusiastic admirers of the Religion of the Disk, whom the learned but somewhat prejudiced writer criticises so bitterly, have at least as sound reasons to revere Akhnaton's memory as he himself can have to minimise the young Pharaoh's importance in the history of thought.

Of the two known hymns, the shorter one is universally recognised as having been composed by the king himself. The long one is regarded as the king's work by all authors² except Sir Wallis Budge, who attributes it to Ay (or Ai), the courtier in whose tomb it was discovered. But the authorship of the song seems unmistakable from the text which precedes and explains it. This text, in Budge's own translation, runs as follows:

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), Preface, p. xv.

² Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 136. H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), pp. 306-307.

“A Hymn in praise of Her-aakhuti, the living one, exalted in the Eastern horizon in his name Shu who is in the Aten, who liveth for ever and ever, the living and great Aton, he who is in the Set-Festival, the Lord of the Circle, the Lord of the Disk, the Lord of heaven, the Lord of earth, the Lord of the House of Aten in Akhut-Aten, (of) the King of the South and the North, who liveth in Truth, Lord of the Two Lands (i.e., Egypt), Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra, the son of Ra, who liveth in Truth, Lord of Crowns, Aakhun-Aten, great in the period of his life, (and of) the great royal woman (or wife) whom he loveth, Lady of the Two Lands, Nefer-neferu-Aten, Nefertiti, who liveth in health and youth for ever and ever.”¹

In all this prelude there is no mention of Ay and no suggestion of any possible author save “the King of the South and the North, who liveth in Truth, etc. . . .” The next words are: “he saith,” and then comes the hymn proper: “Beautiful is Thy rising in the horizon of heaven, O Aten, etc. . . .” If the hymn be “(of) the king,” as stated in the forward of the text, and if there be no mention of any other author, there is, we believe, no reason to suppose, as Budge does, that “He,” in the expression “He saith,” designates the courtier Ay and not Akhnaton himself.

The first thing that strikes a modern mind in those very ancient songs is the idea, expressed in them, that the Sun is the ultimate origin to which can be traced all the particular features of our earth, be they meteorological, biological, geographical, or ethnical. To look upon our parent star as the Father of all life was not a new thing. Men had done so from the beginning of the world, and this was no doubt the conception at the root of that most ancient and, in former days, most widespread of all religions: Sun-worship. But here, especially in the long hymn, there is something more. Not only is the Sun hailed as the Source of all life — the indispensable agent of fertility and growth through His heat and light — but it is He who determines the succession of the seasons; He who causes both the rain to fall in the countries where it rains, and the Nile to overflow Egypt with its life-giving waters; He who is at the back of all differences of climate upon the globe, and subsequently, who is responsible for all differences of colour and features, of speech and of diet, among men of various countries. We read in the longer hymn¹:

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 122-123.

“Thou settest every person in his place. Thou providest their daily food, every man having the portion allotted to him, (thou) dost compute the duration of his life. Their tongues are different in speech, their characteristics (or forms) and likewise their skins (in colour), giving distinguishing marks to the dwellers in foreign lands. Thou makest Hapi (the Nile) in the Tuat (Underworld), Thou bringest it when Thou wishest to make mortals to live, inasmuch as Thou hast made them for Thyself, their Lord who dost support them to the uttermost, O Thou Lord of every land, Thou shinest upon them, O Aten of the day, Thou great one of majesty. Thou makest the life of all remote lands. Thou settest a Nile in heaven which cometh down to them. It maketh a flood on the mountains, like the great green sea, it maketh to be watered their fields in their villages. How beneficent are Thy plans, O Lord of Eternity! A Nile in heaven art Thou for the dwellers in the foreign lands (or deserts) and for all the beasts of the desert that go upon their feet (or legs). Hapi (the Nile) cometh from the Tuat for the land of Egypt. Thy beams nourish every field; Thou risest (and) they live, they germinate for Thee. Thou makest the seasons to develop everything that Thou hast made. . . .”

We must realise how novel were, in the fourteenth century B.C., certain conceptions which seem commonplace to us; for instance, that of the identical origin of rain and rivers, both finally the product of the condensation of water that has been first evaporated through the action of the Sun; or the idea that the Nile, however precious it be to the Egyptians whom it feeds, is no more “divine” than other great rivers, and that far from having its origin in heaven, as the ancient dwellers in its Valley believed, it comes “from underground,” like the humblest streamlet, its series of mighty cataracts being not the last degrees of a gigantic celestial staircase, but simply breaks in level of the river’s course from its distant mountainous birthplace.

¹ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 130-132.

We must not forget that many of the beliefs which we now regard as “mythology” and treat with the sympathetic smile of grown-up folk for a child’s belief in Father Christmas, were once held, by the people who shared them, as seriously as other articles of faith — no less and sometimes more absurd, but not yet obsolete — are held, even to-day, by our contemporaries. To proclaim, in Eighteenth Dynasty Egypt, that the Nile was a river like all rivers, was to issue a statement about as revolutionary (and shocking) as that of a man who, in medieval Europe, would have openly denied the Christian dogma of the Incarnation. But Akhnaton, like all sincere rationalists, cared little what reactions his beliefs or disbeliefs could start in other people, once he was himself sure that he was in possession of a tangible truth.

We cannot also fail to be impressed by that other idea, so clearly put forward in the passage we quoted, that the Sun, apart from being the condition and cause of life in general, is the ultimate regulator of each individual life — “setting every one in his place” — and also the differentiator of races and of their characteristics, features, complexion, language, etc., which are finally at the basis of all national feelings among men; in other words, that He is the maker of our globe’s history no less than of its geography.

The concept of nation, being closely entangled with a quantity of immediate human interests, is one of those which has been taking the longest time to be viewed objectively. In the days of the apogee of Egypt with which we are here concerned, a nation was that group of people who worshipped the same national gods, and especially who went to battle in the name of the same war-gods. The conception of a “God of all lands” in whose light all those local deities were but magnified men and women, if they were anything at all, was novel enough. The scientific idea that all differences among groups of men were the product of man’s physical environment — strictly geographical, and also economical — and that the physical environment was finally conditioned by the climate, that is to say, by the Sun, was amazingly in advance of Akhnaton’s times, and of many more recent times with which the general reader is more familiar. Far from merely amounting to the exaltation of any particular sun-god, even of any sun-god “of all lands” above the traditional gods to whom each nation used to bow down, it was the plain, rational assertion that our parent star, origin and regulator of all life on this earth, is ultimately responsible for man’s collective creations — the national gods — as well as for man’s division into racial and linguistic groups; that, in one word, as a brilliant twentieth-century author¹ has put it, man is, before all, “a solar product” just as the other inhabitants of the same planet.

* * *

We have just referred to the visible Sun, the flaming Disk in the sky — Aton in the literal sense. And had Akhnaton worshipped nothing more than it, still his religion, with its most scientific view of the earth and of man purely as “solar products” would be something far in advance of most ancient and modern religions based upon dogmatic assumptions that bear little or no relation to elementary physical facts. But there is more in it.

As we have already seen in the preceding chapters, one of the names of the Sun the most widely used by Akhnaton in the inscriptions is “Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons, rejoicing in His Horizon, in His name ‘Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk,’” or “the living Horus of the Two Horizons, rejoicing in His Horizon in His name ‘Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk’” — the name under which both the hymns that have come down to us are addressed to Him.

“Shu,” as an ordinary noun, we must translate by “heat” or “heat and light,” for the word has these meanings.² In the Pyramid Texts, Shu is the name of a god symbolising the heat radiating from the body of Tem, or Tem-Ra, the creator of the solar Disk, in the indivisible trinity Tem-Shu-Tefnut — father, son and daughter; the Creator of the Sun-disk, the Heat and the Moisture; the Principle of fertility, and its indispensable agents. Whatever be therefore the interpretation

¹ Norman Douglas: How about Europe? (Edit. 1930), p. 173.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 80.

we give to the word, whether we take it as an ordinary noun or as a proper noun, we have to admit that “the king deified the heat of the Sun” — or the “heat and light,” as Sir Wallis Budge himself says — “and worshipped it as the one eternal, creative, fructifying and life-sustaining force.”¹

This permits us to assert with Sir Flinders Petrie that in the Religion of the Disk the object of worship was “the Radiant Energy of the Sun,”² of which heat and light are aspects.

A scarab of Akhnaton dating from the time when he had not yet changed his name, and found at Sadenga, in the Sudan, after stating his royal titles, reads: “Long live the Beautiful God, the great One of roarings (thunders?) . . . in the great and holy name of . . . Dweller in the Set-Festival like Ta-Thunen, the Lord of . . . the Aten (Disk) in heaven, stablished of face, gracious (or pleasant) in Anu (On).”³ The mention of Ta-Thunen, one of the deities that were to be proscribed by him at a later period is not more surprising than that of Horus, Wepwat, and other gods on the blocks of stone that belonged to the first temple of Aton in Thebes. And the other titles in the prayer are much the same as those found in the longer hymn to Aton: “Dweller in the (Disk), the Lord of Heaven . . .” The title “gracious in Anu” (or On, the sacred solar City of old times) confirms our conviction that the God to whom this prayer is addressed is none but the self-same Aton whom the king already worshipped before he rejected the name of Amenhotep. If this be so, the words “great One of roarings” are most interesting. Given the little we know of the scientific conception of Aton, they would point out, it seems, not to the assimilation of Akhnaton’s God to any “indigenous Sudani Thundergod,”⁴ as Budge believes, but to the equivalence of the

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 80.

² Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

³ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 105.

⁴ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 106.

“heat and light” — Shu — within the Disk, to sound in general and thunder in particular, and perhaps also to that unknown form of energy released every time there is thunder, to that force that the king could not name but of which he certainly felt the existence — electricity. They would imply, that is to say, in his mind, the equivalence of all forms of energy.

On the other hand, it is true to say that “the old Heliopolitan traditions made Tem-Ra, or Khepera, the creator of Aten (the Disk), but this view Amenhotep the Fourth rejected, and he asserted that the Disk was self-created and self-subsistent.”¹ This statement is all the more significant because it comes from a scholar who, far from being one of Akhnaton’s admirers, has never lost an opportunity to minimise the importance of his Teaching. Here, the enormous gap between the Religion of the Disk and the old Heliopolitan cult, its historic ancestor, is emphasised without the learned author seeming to suspect what a homage he is paying, indirectly, to the young Pharaoh’s genius. For if the object of the latter’s adoration were purely “the heat and light,” or energy within the Disk, then one fails to understand why he rejected the view of the priests of On about a god separate from the Disk and creator of it — a god of whom Shu (the heat and light) is an emanation, in the same manner as Shu’s female counterpart, Tefnut, the goddess of Moisture. And if, on the contrary, the object of his worship were the material Disk itself and nothing more, then why should he have called it “Shu-which-is-in-the-Disk”? Moreover, why should he say in the short hymn: “At Thy rising, all hands are lifted in adoration of Thy Ka”? And, again, in the long hymn, speaking this time of the worship of the Sun, not by men, but by birds: “The feathered fowl fly about over the marshes, praising Thy Ka with their wings”? In the case of a living being its “Ka” designates its double, or soul; that invisible element of it which survives death; its subtle essence as opposed to its coarser visible body. The “Ka” of the Sun would therefore be the Sun’s soul, so as to say; the subtle principle which is the essence of the Sun, and which would survive the material Disk, were it one day to decay and pass away — the eternal Sun, as opposed to the visible Sun.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 80.

We believe that the best way to account for this apparent ambiguity is to admit that Akhnaton worshipped the Radiant Energy of the Sun as the Principle of all existence on earth, but deliberately brushed aside the Heliopolitan distinction between the god, maker of the solar Disk, and the solar Disk itself, the distinction between creative energy and created matter. To him — and in this we cannot but admire one of the traits of his far-seeing genius — there was no such distinction. To him the Disk was self-created and self-sustaining, because it was, like all matter that falls under our senses, but a visible manifestation of Something more subtle, invisible, intangible, everlasting — its “Ka” or essence. And Shu, the heat and light, the energy of the Sun, was not the emanation from the body of a god different from it, but the manifestation of that One Thing which the visible flaming Disk was another manifestation. It was the Disk itself, and the Disk was it. Visible Matter was not the product of Energy, distinct from it, nor Energy the product of Matter, distinct from it; nor were any particular forms of Energy, such as heat and light, the products of any creative power distinct from them by nature. But, as was to be suggested thirty-three hundred years later by the inquiries of the modern scientists into the structure of the atom, Matter and Energy were inseparable, and both everlasting; they were one. To maintain the distinctions put forward in olden days by the priests of the Sun in On — the distinction between the creator of the Disk and the Disk itself, and also between both these and the Heat and Light within the Disk — was to deny, or at least to hide, the secret identity of the visible and invisible Sun, of the visible and invisible world, of Energy and Matter.

That identity, Akhnaton had become aware of through some mysterious inner experience of which history has not preserved any description, and by which he transcended the human to reach the cosmic scale of vision. It is probable that he could not explain it, as the scientists of our age do, in terms of definite patterns of energy. But he knew it, none the less, to be the objective truth. And, anticipating in a tremendous intuition the rational conclusions of modern research, he based his religion upon the three ideas that summarise them, namely:

(1) The essential equivalence of all forms of energy, including that yet to-day unanalysed (and perhaps unanalysable) form which is life;

(2) The essential identity of matter and energy, each of the two being but the subtler or the coarser aspect of the other;

(3) The indestructible existence, without beginning, without end, of that One unknown Thing, which is Matter to the coarser and Energy to the finer senses.

* * *

The “Ka” of the Sun, mentioned in the hymns, must indeed be taken to mean the soul or essence of our parent star. And it seems certain that the immediate object to which the king’s followers were invited to offer their praise was not the material Disk alone, as some critics have supposed, nor the “Ka” of the Disk regarded as distinct from it, but the Disk with its “Ka,” regarded as one; the Sun, body and soul, visible and invisible, matter and energy; the dazzling Orb itself being, as we have just remarked, but what our senses can perceive, at our ordinary scale of vision, of the enormous store of Radiant Energy that gave birth to our planet and all it contains, and continues to keep it alive.

In the hymns, it is repeatedly stated that Aton is “one” and “alone.” It is said, for instance, in the short hymn, “Thou Thyself art alone, but there are millions of powers of life in Thee to make them (Thy creatures) live,”¹ and again in the other hymn, “O Thou One God, like unto Whom there is no other, Thou didst create the earth according to Thy heart (or will), Thou alone existing.”²

¹ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 121.

² Translation of Sir Wallis Budge: Ibid, p. 129.

It is true that the worshippers of every great god in Egypt had from time immemorial declared that their god was “one”¹ even while they themselves admitted the existence of different gods. We find the expression “one” and “alone” in older anonymous hymns to Amon, to Ra, to Tem, and other deities, long before Akhnaton. And it is also true that “it was obvious that Aten, the solar Disk, was one alone and without counterpart or equal.”¹ But if we see, as it seems we should, in Akhnaton’s identification of the solar Disk with its “Ka” or essence the sign of his belief in the oneness of invisible Energy and visible Matter, then the words “one” and “alone,” when used by him, become more than casual utterances. They express the only knowable attribute of that supreme entity, Substance and Power at the same time, which is at the back of all existence; they qualify the essence of all suns — the universal “Ka” — not only the essence of our Sun. For these are the same. And whether Akhnaton personally knew or not of the existence of other suns besides the one that rules the life of our earth, it makes little difference. His religion bears from the start the character of the broadest and most permanent scientific truth, embracing, along with the reality of our solar system, that of all existing systems; nay, of all possible systems.

For we know to-day that the self-same earthly varieties of what we call matter go to compose the visible bodies of all distant worlds in space. We know that the heat and light that our Sun sends us through His beams, the “Shu-within-the-Disk” that Akhnaton adored, is the self-same Radiant Energy that burns and shines in the remotest nebulae. For us, born after the invention of the telescope and of the spectroscope, the ritual worship of our Sun, coupled with the modern belief in the essential identity of Matter and Energy, is a symbolical homage. Through Him, the visible Disk, Father and Mother of the Earth and our sister planets, our adoration goes to that ultimate Unknown, Father and Mother of all the worlds that spin round and round their respective suns, in fathomless infinity; Father and Mother of all the suns themselves that go their way, bound by inflexible inner laws, at countless light-years from one another; to that ultimate Unknown that contains movement, and heat and light, and finally life and consciousness within it: Cosmic Energy.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 79.

To Sir Wallis Budge and to many others it may seem “inconceivable” to attribute to a man born centuries before the invention of the telescope, anything approaching our grandiose vision of millions of suns and planets evolving through the unlimited abyss of interstellar void, in a divine dance without beginning or end. But who can tell how far man’s insight can take him, even without the precise intellectual knowledge of its objects? Who can tell if Akhnaton, gazing at the glory of his clear night sky full of stars, did not conceive the idea that each of those distant lights might well be a Sun, like ours, maker of worlds over which he daily rises and sets? And who can tell how far in Egypt astronomy had actually reached, even without the help of the telescope? Much of it — like much of all sciences in antiquity — was secret and has been lost. We therefore cannot assert that, in deifying the Radiant Energy of the Sun and the Disk itself, the inspired youth did not deliberately put forward the worship of that indefinable, unknown and perhaps unknowable Reality that modern science meets both in the atom and in the systems of starry space.

But as we have already said, whatever may have been the limitations imposed upon his knowledge of the physical universe by the technical conditions of scientific investigation in his time, it remains true that the cult which he evolved is that of the only Thing which modern science can hail as the ultimate Reality — as God, if science is ever able to speak of a God. It matters little whether he could or could not appreciate his own creation from the point of view of a modern scientist, even from that of a layman of to-day with a summary knowledge of the conclusions of science. And if, with Budge and others, one suggests that this was impossible, then all one can say is that the relation of his religion to the great facts of physical existence, discovered millenniums after him, is all the more admirable, and his genius all the more staggering.

* * *

The only materials on which we can base our knowledge of the Religion of the Disk are too scanty for us to be able to say how far its Founder was aware of the structure of the physical universe as we have learnt to conceive it. It is interesting, however, to consider how exactly certain of Akhnaton's main utterances tally with those conclusions of modern thought now looked upon as definite scientific acquisitions.

One of the points on which he insists the most, in both of the hymns which have survived, is the all-importance of the beams of the Sun. Not only does he say: "Thou sendest forth Thy beams and every land is in festival,"¹ but also: "Breath of life is to see Thy beams,"² and also: "Thy beams envelop (i.e., penetrate) everywhere, all the lands which Thou hast made" . . . "Thou art afar off, but Thy beams are upon the earth"³; and again: "The fishes in the river swim up to greet Thee; Thy beams are within the depth of the great sea. . . ."⁴ The rays of the Sun play an equally prominent part in the symbol of Akhnaton's religion: the Disk with downward beams ending in hands which hold the looped-cross ankh, sign of life. As we have seen, no other image but that one was allowed in the temples, and that was not intended to portray the object of worship (which was beyond any representation whatsoever), but to remind the worshippers of the main truth concerning it — namely, that the Essence of the Sun — the "heat and light" within the Disk — is not confined to the Disk itself, but is present and active, and beneficent (life-giving) wherever the rays of the Sun reach. The

¹ Short Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 119.

² Short Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 121.

³ Long Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 124.

⁴ Long Hymn, Translation of Griffith, quoted by Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 216.

symbol is found “in every sculpture,” a fact that marks the stress that the king put upon it. And it is “an utterly new type in Egypt, distinct from all previous sculptures.”¹

Here, and more so perhaps in the hymns, we find indeed, simply and forcibly expressed, the assertion that the Sun-rays are the Sun’s energy, everywhere present, everywhere active, and that it is through them that He manifests Himself — a truth that modern science has recognised and of which modern therapy is trying more and more to make a practical use. And it is, no doubt, in considering the Sun-rays, agents both of heat and light, that Akhnaton grasped intuitively the great scientific truth which gives the whole structure of his Teaching a solid foundation of intellectual certitude so rarely found in more popular religions — namely, that he realised the equivalence of heat and light and of all forms of energy. Rightly has Sir Flinders Petrie written in 1899: “No one — Sun-worshipper or philosopher — seems to have realised until within this century, the truth which was the basis of Akhnaton’s worship, that the rays of the Sun are the means of the Sun’s action, the source of all life, power and force in the universe. The abstraction of regarding the radiant energy as all-important was quite disregarded until recent views of the conservation of force, of heat as a mode of motion, and the identity of heat, light and electricity have made us familiar with the scientific conception which was the characteristic feature of Akhnaton’s new worship.”²

Another assertion within the hymns which tallies amazingly with the modern conception of the ultimate reality, is the one previously noted: “Thou Thyself art alone, but there are millions of powers of life in Thee, to make Thy creatures live.” It is the assertion:

1st, that there is finally no other reality but the One. (Thou art alone.)

2nd, that the One contains within It infinite possibilities of life and the tendency to bring them forth into actual existence. That is the only meaning we can ascribe to the words “millions of powers of life” or “millions of vitalities in Thee.” 3rd, that, consequently, “creation” is not the miraculous act through which an agent, distinct by nature from the created things, causes them to spring out of nothingness, but the gradual manifestation into actual existence of the different possibilities, latent within the One; in other words, that the One supreme reality is immanent in all things, and that it has been and is for ever producing all the endless variety of the universe out of Itself.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

² Ibid.

If we regard that One object of worship — that essence of the Sun, which is the essence of the solar system — as the same mysterious entity that modern science calls Energy and places at the root of all existence, material or immaterial, then what we have said of it and of the meaning of creation becomes clear. That idea of the infinity of beings as transient products of one fundamental agent, Power and Substance, Essence of life as well as of so-called inanimate existence; that conception of a world in which, strictly speaking, there is no place for pure passivity, but where the inanimate is just life, so as to say, at the lowest stage, is indeed the one suggested by the boldest generalisation of our times. We may call it metaphysical, in a way. But it is no airy metaphysics; no outcome of pure fancy; no dialectical invention. It fits in with the accumulated experience of men who have learnt to measure the infinitely small and the infinitely great, and to see the universe at different scales of vision. It should perhaps as yet be called an hypothesis rather than a fact. But it is the hypothesis that explains the facts which we know: it is the philosophical projection of the science of our times. And one can only marvel at the intuition of the adolescent king who grasped it thirty-three hundred years ago.

* * *

There is still more to be said. In the longer hymn, Akhnaton addresses the following words to his God: “Thou art in my heart; There is none who knoweth Thee excepting Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra. Thou hast made him wise to understand Thy plans and Thy power.”¹ Which means that, to him, the impersonal Essence of the Sun, Radiant Energy, which he adores as the One uncreated, everlasting, ever-active Principle of existence in general, is the self-same reality that he discovers at the root of his consciousness — the Essence of his own soul. And he adds to this utterance a still bolder and stranger one. Nobody, says he, knows that One Reality save he himself, “the Son of the Sun who came forth from His substance,” “like unto Him without ceasing,” as he no less boldly styles himself in other passages of the same hymn and of the shorter one.

The two statements are connected. The first, in spite of appearances, implies the second. The second, detached from the first, loses its real meaning.

The words “Thou art in my heart” can mean simply “I love Thee.” And were they addressed to a personal god they could hardly mean anything more. They can also be interpreted as “Thy Essence and my essence are one; Thou art in me.” And as they are, in this hymn, addressed to an impersonal, immanent Entity — Radiant Energy — that seems to be the main sense to give them. Their other meaning, i.e., “I love Thee,” can and should be added, but only as the natural supplement of the more important idea. The main thing, for Akhnaton, appears indeed to have been to recognise, to realise, divinity in the Sun and in himself; and it was impossible, evidently, for him not to love it, once he knew it — once he had felt it.

Of the process that led him to that realisation we shall never know. He has not described it in any existing document, and it is doubtful whether he could have described it. The series of deductions by which Sir Wallis Budge endeavours to show us how the young Pharaoh came to believe in his own divinity² would surely not have sufficed to convince Akhnaton himself, were they not backed by some genuine experience of universal oneness, lived from within. It was to that experience that he implicitly referred, both when he said: “Thou art in my heart” and “No one knoweth Thee save I, Thy Son.”

¹ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 134.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 82. (Quoted in Chap. III, pp. 54-55.)

It is a well-known fact that all kings of Egypt were looked upon first as “sons of Ra” and later on — as the patron-god of Thebes, Amon, gradually rose to prominence and became the main god of the whole country — as “sons of Amon.” And this was no metaphor in the minds of the Egyptians, nor perhaps in the minds of the kings themselves. It was really believed that the god used to visit each queen destined to be a Pharaoh’s mother in the form of her human husband, and become, by her, the actual physical father of the future king. On many Pharaohs’ monuments is pictured the story of this divine conception. For instance, on the bas-reliefs of Queen Hatshepsut’s temple at Deir-el-Bahari one can see the god Amon, in the form of Thotmose the First — even Amenhotep the Third, Akhnaton’s father — the tolerant, easy-going Pharaoh, under whom the cult of Aton was first encouraged — allowed his mother, Queen Mutemuya, to be represented accompanying with Amon in the form of Thotmose the Fourth. Tradition was tradition. And who knows? He perhaps himself believed in the story of his divine origin as all Egypt did.

But Akhnaton never put forth any similar claim. He did, it is true, repeatedly declare himself “Son of the living Aton”; but not in the miraculous sense his fathers had claimed to be “sons of Amon.” No bas-relief, no painting, no evidence of any sort is to be found which could allow us to suppose that he regarded himself to be, physically, the son of aught but his earthly father, Amenhotep the Third. The idea of a miraculous conception is, in fact, incompatible with that of an impersonal God. And Akhnaton was too much of a rationalist not to avoid that contradiction. “Son of the living Aton,” i.e., “Son of God,” he certainly did proclaim himself to be. But that was in an entirely different sense. His own divinity was, to him, a consequence of his unity with the One divine Power-Substance at the back of all existence — an implication of his experience of a state of super-normal consciousness in which he felt his subtle self identical, in nature, with the universal Energy which he adored. In other words, we should see in this claim to divinity the expression of the innermost certitude of a self-realised soul who can say of the One ultimate Reality: “I am That,” of God: “I am He”; not merely the customary boast of a king of Egypt about his solar descent.

But the modern critical mind will ask: Why, then, that exclusive claim to the knowledge of Godhead? Why the strange sentence: “There is none who knoweth Thee excepting Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra” (Beautiful Essence of the Sun, Only One of the Sun)? If the God Whom Akhnaton worshipped was Radiant Energy, the Principle of all life, present even in apparently inanimate matter, then how could he claim for himself the monopoly of wisdom? A personal God, still endowed with mysterious human feelings could, for some reason beyond mortal understanding, prefer one man to all others and reveal “His plans and His powers” to him alone. But surely an immanent God of the type of “the heat and light within the Disk” could not be accused of such partiality.

To understand the king’s statement we must not forget that he had in mind the knowledge concerning the ultimate One, not the presence of it. From the reality of Cosmic Energy at the root of all things, it would be rash to infer that the knowledge, i.e., the clear consciousness of it, is universal. That clear consciousness of the Essence of existence within the individual seems, in fact, excluded not only from apparently inanimate matter (from which individuality itself does not yet emerge), but also from the plants and from the lower and even higher animals, including nearly all men. Every atom of matter contains the divine spark. Every living creature is possessed with some dim awareness of it. Many men, it may be, repeating without experience the words of experienced religious authorities, think themselves more fully conscious of its presence than they really are. Extremely few are able to realise that their essential identity with the ultimate Principle of all things is not a myth, and that, in truth, “they are That.” To those alone belong the knowledge of God and the wisdom “to understand His plans and His power.” Akhnaton was undoubtedly one of them, and he was conscious of his knowledge.

But a glance at the inscriptions in the tombs of his followers — and at their careers — will convince anyone that they did not share his enlightenment. Of the “Teaching of life,” which they praise so emphatically, they say simply nothing which shows that they actually grasped it. And many of them put such stress upon the rewards they received from their inspired Master in gold and silver and official promotion, that one gets the impression that the lust of material advantages played a definite part in their conversion to the Religion of the Disk. Others, it is true, appear to look upon the king as a god; but even if they were sincere in doing so, that would be no proof that they were able to follow him in the path of knowledge. After all, the only test of a true disciple lies in his actions; and when, a few years after Akhnaton’s premature death, the priests of Amon started persecuting his memory, then none seem to have dared — or cared — to stand openly against the tide of events; none seem to have considered their king worth suffering for, once he was no longer there to distribute honours and gifts to them. They preferred a quiet old age, with perhaps new honours, under the restored rule of the national gods and of their priests, to the glory of sharing with their Master the double curse of a self-seeking gang and of a misled nation. At least, that is what seems to have been their state of mind. For had any serious resistance been opposed to the re-installation of the traditional religion, we believe that Tutankhamen’s scribes would not have failed to report how thoroughly it was crushed. And, in absence of any such report, we may doubt the fervour of the disciples who survived the young Teacher. Moreover, we know that few of those for whom Akhnaton had caused tombs to be dug out in the vicinity of his own even cared to make use of them — a tangible mark of indifference to him and to all that he stood for.

From these various signs we can infer, with a fair amount of safety, that among the crowd of courtiers who professed to have welcomed his rational religion, and even in the midst of the inner circle of those on whom he had thought he could rely to “carry out his Teaching,” Akhnaton realised more and more, as years passed by, that he was all alone. He could not help remarking the gap which existed already during his lifetime between the life of his followers and the pure doctrine of reason, love and truth, which he preached to them. And that, no doubt, convinced him that they entirely lacked the foundation of genuine religion which he possessed: the experience of an overwhelming truth which lay in them, but transcended them. No one indeed could understand “the plans and power” of his God — the nature of life and its meaning — unless one had that experience; unless one was, like himself, aware of the oneness of his individual essence with that of the Sun and of the whole universe.

In the passage quoted above, the king does not use the name under which he is now immortal, Akhnaton, but that under which he was generally known in his days, at least to his foreign correspondents whose letters we possess; his nesu bat name,¹ Nefer-kheperu-ra, which means “Beautiful Essence of the Sun.” This may be a mere coincidence. It may also be a deliberate symbolical choice. “There is none who knoweth Thee excepting Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-ra,” may well mean that one could not penetrate the nature of the object of the king’s worship, the solar and at the same time cosmic Energy — and know, therefore, what one was worshipping — unless one was conscious of being, one’s self, “the beautiful essence of the Sun,” one with Him, as Akhnaton was. Experience had taught him that it was not possible to transmit that consciousness; that, however much he would preach the existence of the One Power-Substance — of the Sun-disk, identical with the Energy within the Disk — it would remain a meaningless mystery to all men save those who had realised their own innermost identity with that One Thing, their natural filiation to It; who had become aware of their being “sons of the Sun, like unto Him without ceasing.”

¹ A Pharaoh had several names: his “Horus name,” his “Nebti name,” his “Golden Horus name,” his “Nesu bat name,” his “Son of Ra name.” Sir Wallis Budge (Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism, Edit. 1923, p. 3) gives a list of those “strong names” in the case of Tutankhamen. The name by which a Pharaoh is generally known to history is his “Son of Ra” name.

He knew no man who, by his life, gave signs of possessing such enlightenment. He only knew for sure that he possessed it. And his strange words, which we have just recalled, can therefore be taken to mean, equally: “No one knows Thee save I, the only one who can call myself Thy Son,” and: “No one knows Thee save that man who, as I am, is aware of his identity with Thee within his individual limitations, and who thus can be called Thy Son.” The two interpretations are correct. The second is a consequence of Akhnaton’s conception of immanent divinity, felt by him in the Sun and in himself; and also the recognition of the impossibility to transmit the knowledge of that ultimate Reality: Cosmic Energy. The first is the recognition of his own unique position in the history of the world which he knew. In his days, within his surroundings, and even among the older religious teachers, if any, whose fame had come down to him, he could see no one conscious of the great truth which he had realised. He was, therefore, “the Only One of the Sun”; and he admitted it without false modesty.

But his very conception of Godhead logically excluded any miraculous personal revelation. And it is reasonable to admit that, had he met any man having the same awareness as he of his ultimate oneness with the Principle of all things, he would not have hesitated to salute in him a true “son of the Sun” or “son of God” — one of his rare equals.

* * *

We have seen, up till now, how Akhnaton’s Teaching, as known through the hymns, is based upon an inner experience of universal unity — which real spiritual seers seem to have shared in all times and all countries — and upon an intuition of genius of which the correctness, at least as far as the material universe is concerned, has been proved nowadays, by our men of science. The first gives the Religion of the Disk that sort of certitude that lies in the concordance of reliable testimonies. The second gives it the intellectual certitude that forces us to accept a scientific hypothesis, when it explains facts. This can be said to sum up the positive value of the Teaching from a rational point of view.

But the Teaching is perhaps as remarkable for what is absent from it as for what it contains. As we have already tried to point out in the introductory chapter of this book, Akhnaton seems to have deliberately avoided the three things of which we find one or two at least linked up, throughout history, with every successful religion: a background of supernatural stories — i.e., a mythology; miracles, and a theory concerning the destiny of the dead.

It suffices to compare his hymns to the Sun with those written previously or at about the same time, or even later, in Egypt and elsewhere, to feel all the difference. Hymns like those quoted by Sir Wallis Budge from the papyrus of Ani as “good typical examples of the songs of praise and thanksgiving addressed to the Sun-god by orthodox Egyptians under the XVIIIth Dynasty”¹ need, in order to be properly understood, the study of a whole elaborate symbolism. The association of the name of the god Tem with that of Horakhti, repeated allusions to the boats Seqtet and Matet, in which Ra sails through the sky; to Nut, the sky-goddess, mother of the Sun-god; to the Lake of Testes that rejoices at the god’s passage; to Sebau, the god’s enemy, “whose arms and hands are cut off,” and many other such mythological recollections, poetic as they may be, only render the hymns obscure to all save people well-versed in Egyptian religion. Those poems, like most of the religious literature of far more widespread creeds in our own times, bear the indelible stamp of a definite civilisation at a definite epoch. By the associations they evoke, by the pictures they recall through the magic of proper names and forgotten stories, it is the whole atmosphere of ancient Egypt that they bring back to us. If, as the historian does, one seeks in them nothing else but a faithful glimpse into the past, then all the better. But if one were to read them for one’s own religious edification, the result would be disappointing. The Egyptian religion is now dead; the proper names, however well-sounding, would stir no longer devotional associations in anybody's heart; the hymns, like all the rest of the old cult of which they were a part, are simply out of date. And in the very time they were daily sung in Egypt, they were out of tune with the religious habits and the familiar conceptions even of the Sun-worshippers of other countries. A Syrian, a Babylonian, a Mykaenian, would have had to take the trouble to learn who was Nut and who was Sebau, and what were the boats Seqtet and Matet before he could follow the trend of inspiration in a hymn to Ra — just as to-day a Buddhist has to acquaint himself with much history, much legend, and much philosophy alien to his own before he can enjoy to the full the beauty of an Easter sermon in a Christian cathedral. Any mythology is of a limited appeal, whether in time or space.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 136, and following.

But if we now turn to the hymns which Akhnaton has left us, we can see in them practically nothing which could not be grasped in the fourteenth century B.C. by a Syrian, by an Indian — nay, by a Chinese or by a man from the forests of Central Europe — as well as, or no worse than, by an Egyptian; nothing which is not to-day able to appeal to any man, without his needing any preparation other than a heart open to beauty. The only thing that would require explanation is, in the shorter hymn, a reference to “the House of the Benben Obelisk . . . in the City of Akhetaton, the Seat of Truth.”¹ We know that the Benben Obelisk was the immemorial symbol of the Sun, worshipped in On or Anu, the Heliopolis of the Greeks, the “City of the pillar.” According to the ancient tradition reflected in the Pyramid Texts, “the Spirit of the Sun visited the temple of the Sun from time to time, in the form of a Bennu bird, and alighted on the Ben-stone in the House of the Bennu in Anu.”² In recalling the Benben stone, Akhnaton, it would seem, wished to stress how deep were the roots of his exclusive cult of the Sun in the most revered tradition of Egypt. The worship of Aton, as we have seen, was evolved out of that of the god of On, the age-old sacred City of the Sun. And the “House of the Benben Obelisk” meant simply the main temple of the Sun in the king’s new capital, also a sacred City. But apart from that allusion there is, in the two hymns and in the prayer composed by Akhnaton and inscribed upon his coffin, and in the references to his Teaching in the courtier’s tombs, not a word which needs, on the part of the readers, any special knowledge of Egypt and of her beliefs, in order to be understood.

¹ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 119.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 63.

The very name of the Sun which comes back over and over again in every text of the time, whether composed by the king or by his followers, is neither Ra, nor Khepera, nor Tem, nor even Horus of the Two Horizons — a name mentioned once, in the introduction to the shorter hymn — but Aton, i.e., the Disk, a noun designating the geometrical shape of the visible Sun — and which can be literally translated into any language.

The symbol of Godhead was neither a human figure nor an animal with a particular history at the back of it, nor a disk encircled by a serpent (a common representation of solar-gods in Egypt¹), but simply the solar-disk with downward rays ending in hands, bestowing life to the earth (“ankh,” the looped cross, which the hands hold out, is, as we have said, the hieroglyphic sign for “life”). This symbol “never became popular in the country”²; it was perhaps, like the rest of the Religion of the Disk, “too philosophical” for the Egyptians as for many other nations. But it was a truly rational symbol, free from any mythological connections and clear to any intelligent person.

The text of the hymns refers to no legends, to no stories, to no particular theology; only to the beauty and beneficence of our parent star, to its light “of several colours,” to its universal worship by men, beasts and the vegetable world; to the marvel of birth; to the joy of life; to the rhythm of day and night and of the seasons, determined by the Sun; and to the great idea that the heat and light within the solar-disk, the “Ka” or Soul of the Disk, and the Disk itself, are one, and that all creatures are one as the children of the one Sun — the one God. We find here nothing but conceptions that need, in order to be accepted, only common sense and sensitiveness to beauty; and in order to be understood in their full, not a theological but a rational — and also spiritual — preparation; not the knowledge of any mythology or even of any human history, but a scientific knowledge of the universe, coupled with a spirit of synthesis.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 80 and 81.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 81.

We can only here, once more, quote Sir Flinders Petrie, to whom the world owes so much in the whole field of Egyptology. “In this hymn,” says he, after having reproduced the text of the longer hymn, “all trace of polytheism and of anthropomorphism or theriomorphism has entirely disappeared. The power of the Sun to cause and regulate all existence is the great subject of praise; and careful reflection is shown in enumerating the mysteries of the power of the Aten exemplified in the animation of nature, reproduction, the variety of races, and the source of the Nile and watering by rain. It would tax anyone in our days to recount better than this the power and action of the rays of the Sun. And no conception that can be compared with this for scientific accuracy was reached for at least three thousand years after it.”¹

* * *

Another remarkable trait of the Religion of the Disk is that it seems to have been completely devoid of that belief in miracles which holds such a place in most of the more popular religions, both ancient and modern; a belief, nay, without which the fundamental dogmas of most great world-wide religions of to-day could not be accepted by their followers.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 218.

When we speak of “miracles” we mean any events, impossible according to the laws of nature, but of which one yet admits the occurrence, taking it to be the result of a special intervention of God, or of any other power, in the natural scheme of things. It must be noted that any conception of immanent Godhead — i.e., any conception in which Godhead and Nature are not distinct from each other; in which the ultimate Power is not “outside” the universe, but bears to it the relation of the soul to the body it animates — excludes the idea of supernatural intervention on the part of God. And any rational view of the world, whether pantheistic, theistic or atheistic, excludes miracles altogether. It is therefore natural that Akhnaton never ascribed to the impersonal Energy behind the Disk (and behind all things) which he worshipped, the occasional tendency or even the capacity to break, in favour of human issues or at the request of human devotees, the immovable laws of action and reaction of which it is Itself the hidden Principle.

In reading the hymns, one has the impression that, to him, the order of nature and the mystery of life were quite marvellous enough in themselves, without man’s needing to seek, beyond them, in happenings that stagger him as unnatural (whether they really be so or not) an occasion to praise the power and wisdom of the Creator. We have already seen that he never attributed to himself a miraculous birth as other Pharaohs, formally at least, were accustomed to do. He could not see in what way even such an event as that could be more divine than the everyday mystery of a germ, nursed by the universal Life-force within the egg or within the womb, and becoming in course of time a young bird or a child.

Whether the king possessed or not the power of performing unusual deeds, in the manner of many religious teachers of all times, we do not know. In the praise of him by some of the most enthusiastic of his followers — praise of which a sample has been quoted in a preceding chapter — there is not the slightest hint that he did. It is, of course, not impossible that he did. If one is to believe a tradition persisting for centuries after the downfall of Egypt, the technique of developing one's psychic powers beyond the ordinary credible limits was not uncommon among the priests of the Nile Valley. In it even lay, one may imagine, their unshakable hold over the minds of the people. And there would be nothing unnatural in supposing that a man who, up till the appointment of Merira, exercised in the new cult the functions of High-priest of the Sun, was able to take interest in such an art. Moreover, we know definitely that Akhnaton had assumed the age-old title borne by the High-priest of the Sun in On: Urma — the seer, or “the great one of visions”¹ — which, if taken in the literal sense, does imply some powers beyond the ordinary. But in the light of the evidence now available we should, it seems, admit that, even if he did, to any extent, possess the capacity of working feats of wonder, he made no use of it, preferring positive knowledge and the logical and beautiful expression of knowledge in his life and Teaching, to the easy task of impressing ignorant crowds. It is also quite plausible that he never endeavoured to cultivate the art of acquiring supra-normal command over the physical world, considering it as not essentially connected with spiritual development, and therefore as superfluous.

And not only does the Founder of the Religion of the Disk claim no miraculous powers for himself, but there is, in the fragments concerning his creed which have come down to us, not an allusion whatsoever to occurrences defying the laws of nature. The very idea of such seems to have been alien to the spirit of the king's Teaching.

* * *

Finally, Akhnaton appears to have given his followers no definite doctrine about death and the fate of the dead.² The custom of mummifying dead bodies, prevalent in Egypt from time immemorial, was observed under him and in his own case. He therefore surely did not discourage it. But it is doubtful whether he subscribed to the essential ideas about the hereafter that the Egyptians associated with it. It is doubtful also whether the personal views he may have had about the mystery of death were ever preached by him as a part of his Teaching. For though the evidence on which all discussion of this subject is necessarily based is very scanty, there seem to be reasons for one to distinguish between his idea of the survival of the soul and that of his followers.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 51. Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 111.

² “The Aten religion contained,” says Sir Wallis Budge, “none of the beautiful ideas on the future life, with which we are familiar from the hymns and other compositions in the Book of the Dead” (History of Egypt, Edit. 1902, Vol. IV, pp. 121-122). See also J. D. S. Pendlebury's Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1935), p. 157.

The only document which may be taken to express his own views is the prayer inscribed at the foot of his coffin, and probably composed by himself: "I breathe the sweet breath which comes forth from Thy mouth; I behold Thy beauty every day. It is my desire that I may hear Thy sweet voice, even in the North wind, that my limbs may be rejuvenated with life through love of Thee. Give me Thy hands holding Thy spirit, that I may receive it and live by it. Call Thou upon my name unto eternity, and it shall never fail."¹

It seems, from this prayer addressed to the One God, that Akhnaton believed in the survival of the individual soul after death. The "I" who speaks here is, or at least has all the appearances of being, a personal consciousness. But it is difficult to imagine personal consciousness beyond death without some sort of survival of the body. We all feel that we owe much of what we are to the characteristic constitution of our various organs. If nothing is to remain of our material self under any form, then the only sort of immortality we can expect, if any at all, is the impersonal immortality of that which is, in us, common to all beings; substantial everlastingness, rather than individual immortality. Akhnaton seems to have been aware of this, and not to have separated the survival of the individual from some sort of hazy corporeality. At least, that is what we would imagine to be implied in words such as: ". . . that my limbs may be rejuvenated with life through love of Thee."

No one can say whether those very same words also imply that the Founder of the Religion of the Disk shared the age-old Egyptian belief in the resurrection of the dead. It may be he did. It may be he did not. It may be that, in his eyes, the “limbs” that constitute, in eternity, the agent of individualisation, were those not of the resurrected mummy but of some surviving “body” more subtle than the visible one. In Akhnaton’s conception, as it can be inferred from the hymns, there is, as we have seen, no clear-cut line of demarcation between the material and the immaterial — between the everlasting “Ka” of the Sun-disk and the Disk itself, and doubtless also between the immortal “ka” of a man — his subtler self — and that man’s body.

¹ Quoted by Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 259.

There is no mention of the rising of the dead anywhere in the solitary prayer, just quoted, which reveals to us practically all we know of Akhnaton’s own beliefs, or hopeful conjectures, on the subject of death. But one or two courtiers do express, in the inscriptions in their tombs, the wish that their “flesh might live upon the bones,” which seems to imply the hope of resurrection. As we have once already remarked, one of the most constant desires of nearly all the king’s followers was to continue to see the Sun after death — “to go out to see the Sun’s rays”; “to obtain a sight of the beauty of every recurring sunrise,” etc. . . . Many also prayed for more tangible happiness; for the unchanged favour of their royal Master in the world beyond the grave; for name and fame in this world of the living; even for a share of the consecrated food offered at the altar of the Sun, “a reception of that which has been offered in the temple”; “a drink offering in the temple of Aton”; “a libation,” spilt by the children of the deceased “at the entrance of his tomb.”¹

Arthur Weigall, in his admiration for the inspired young king, has endeavoured to present him as the most outstanding precursor of Christianity in the Pagan world. And he attributes to him, precisely for that reason, ideas of the hereafter little different from those of an honest church-going Englishman — except, of course, for the important fact that “we hear nothing of hell”¹ in his Teaching. Those ideas, whatever be their value, are much too precise, even in their necessary vagueness, to tally with the very vague references in the prayer we have mentioned, and somewhat too Christian-like to be ascribed to the world’s first rationalist. Moreover, it is noteworthy that Weigall quotes, in support of them, only extracts from the inscriptions in the courtiers’ tombs, and never the prayer which he himself holds to be “composed by Akhnaton.”² And there is a difference in tone and in spirit between that prayer and those inscriptions.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 122-125.

From the prayer, nothing precise about Akhnaton’s view of death can be pointed out, save perhaps, as we have said, that he believed in the survival of the individual under some much subtler state of corporeality (there is no mention of food or drink in his words) and that he considered the universal Energy within the Sun — the object of his worship — to be the principle of the new life, no less than of life under the form we know it. This seems to be the sense of “Give me Thy hands, holding Thy spirit, that I may receive it and live by it.” The words: “. . . that my limbs may be rejuvenated with life through love of Thee,” may also imply, along with the idea that consciousness is inseparable from corporeality under some form or another, that other idea that love of the supreme Reality — ultimately identical with the knowledge of It — is the condition of consciousness, in that life beyond death which Akhnaton expected for himself. Apart from these conjectures, which the text of the prayer suggests, we know nothing of his personal conception of the hereafter.

On the other hand, the hopes and wishes of the courtiers — to rise from the dead; to live and see the Sun; to enjoy food and drink offerings made to Him, and libations spilt by their descendants at their intention; to be remembered on earth and to see and serve the king in eternity — could be, more or less, the hopes and wishes expressed by any orthodox Egyptians of the time. There is nothing new in the beliefs that they presuppose. The only new thing is that all the paraphernalia of threatening monsters and protecting gods that was generally associated with those same beliefs, all the awe that the dead would have to face in the land of shadows, and the magical formulas, declarations, incantations, etc., to propitiate the hostile powers of the netherworld, are completely absent from the inscriptions in the rock tombs of Tell-el-Amarna. “We look in vain for the figures of the old gods of Egypt, Ra, Horus, Ptah, Osiris, Isis, Anubis, and the cycles of the gods of the dead and of the Tuat (Underworld), and not a single ancient text, whether hymn, prayer, spell, incantation, litany from the ‘Book of the Dead’ in any of its recensions, is to be found there. To the Atenites, the tomb was a mere hiding-place for the dead body, not a model of the Tuat, as their ancestors thought. Their royal leader rejected all the old funerary Liturgies like the ‘Book of Opening the Mouth,’ and the ‘Liturgy of funerary offerings,’ and he treated with silent contempt such works as the ‘Book of the Two Ways,’ the ‘Book of the Dweller in the Tuat,’ and the ‘Book of Gates.’ Thus it would appear that he rejected en bloc all funerary rites and ceremonies and disapproved of all services of commemoration of the dead, which were so dear to the hearts of all Egyptians. The absence of figures of Osiris in the tombs of his officials, and of all mention of this god in the inscriptions found in them, suggests that he disbelieved in the Last Judgment and in the dogma of reward for the righteous and punishments for evildoers. If this were so, the Field of Reeds, the Field of Grasshoppers, the Field of Offerings in the Elysian Fields, and the Block of Slaughter with the headsman Shesmu, the five pits of the Tuat and the burning of the wicked were all ridiculous fictions to him.”¹

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 121.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 248.

From this negative evidence it can be gathered that Akhnaton definitely rejected all that appeared to him as irrational in the Egyptian traditions regarding death. He surely did away with all the magic intertwined with them, and he may have had, about man’s liberty and responsibility in general, sufficient doubts to “disbelieve” in the Last Judgment and in the dogma of reward and punishment once and for ever. If his courtiers omitted so much of the conventional funerary symbolism in their tombs, it is because he saw in it something meaningless, perhaps even harmful, and forbade it. But the positive instance of his followers’ beliefs in immortality does not necessarily indicate, in a parallel manner, what were his personal views. Nothing proves that he subscribed to all the hopes which they express in their inscriptions. On the contrary, stripped as it was of all the traditional mythology of the netherworld, their idea of life beyond death may well have been much nearer to the conventional Egyptian views than his. We are inclined to believe it was, when we think of the courtiers asking to enjoy a part of “the food deposited on the altar every day,” and libations and such. Here it seems that the old faith in the necessity of funeral offerings lingers in the believers in the new rational religion. It is noticeable that, in Akhnaton’s own prayer, there is no mention of offerings whatsoever. The love he had for Aton, the One God, was sufficient to “rejuvenate his limbs with life.”

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 94, 95.

From all this one may infer that, whatever were his personal conjectures concerning the hereafter, Akhnaton did not make them an article of his Teaching, but allowed his disciples to solve the problem of death as they liked, provided the solutions they would choose were not, in his eyes, too flagrantly childish. The mythology of the netherworld, as the Egyptians had believed in it for centuries was, no doubt, to him, a network of “ridiculous fictions.” And as Sir Wallis Budge adds, he actually gave his followers “nothing to put in the place of these fictions,”¹ because there was, indeed, nothing to give them. And as a rationalist that he was, he seems to have been much less definite about all he said, or hinted, regarding the possibilities of the next world, than he had been in his assertions about the realities of this; much less categorical, also, in his attitude towards other people’s views, when these concerned that great beyond of which he had no more experience than they or any man ever had.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 95.

The fact, for instance, that some of his followers ask, in their tomb inscriptions, for food and drink, does not prove that he taught them anything positive about funeral offerings, nor that, forerunning Christ who, “after his resurrection asked for food,” he believed that “material food or its spiritual equivalent would be necessary to the soul’s welfare in the next world.”¹ But it does prove that he did not brand the old belief in the same uncompromising way as he had condemned that in a multitude of local gods or in the cult of images.

He appears simply never to have pronounced himself on the problem of the hereafter, perhaps because he deemed that problems of this world and this life should be solved first, perhaps also because he felt less sure of the solidity of his own conjectures about death and after death — of which he had no direct knowledge — than of that of his positive intuition of the ultimate Essence: heat-and-light within the Sun, and world-consciousness within himself. He cancelled, in the funeral traditions of the Egyptians as in the rest of their religion, all that which struck him as definitely meaningless or absurd. He tolerated only such remnants of the past as were but harmless customs — for instance, the habit of embalming the dead — or age-old beliefs which were as difficult to disprove as to justify and which, therefore, might have contained some spark of truth. In his Teaching, he seems neither to have asserted nor denied the current Egyptian dogma of the resurrection of the flesh. It may be that he associated it, in his mind, with the idea of individual survival which would imply, it seems, corporeality. But what corporeality after death meant to him, is not clear to us. The one thing, however, which can be said, is that his uncertain attitude towards the problem of death, and the open mind which he appears to have kept with regard to several ancient beliefs and customs about which, even to-day, one cannot easily pass a decisive opinion, are perfectly consistent with that rigorous rationalism that we remarked all through his doctrine, along with the inspiration that fills it. They are the signs of a truly scientific spirit.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 124.

* * *

It seems right to believe, with Budge, that the fact that he put “nothing in the place” of the old fictions about the next world had the result of turning the Egyptians away from Akhnaton and his Teaching; not, as the learned author says, because “being of African origin, they never understood or cared for philosophical abstractions,”¹ but because they were men and, like most men, foolish, and craved for illusions — better than nothing — in the absence of available knowledge.

We may add that the omission of any “mythology” and of miracle-stories from the Teaching had the same immediate effect. People always wished to be entertained, moved and astonished by marvellous tales, and made to believe them. And all the great successful religions, when based originally on purely philosophical principles — as Buddhism — have seen more and more miraculous narratives creep into their sacred literature as years passed on, and as they spread to further countries. Had the Religion of the Disk not been nipped in the bud, it is probable that the same thing would have happened with it, in course of time.

But, if the absence of what makes a religion popular condemned it, from the start, never to spread of its own impetus; if its Founder himself, doubtless feeling how far too rational his Teaching was for the needs of the mob, never tried to preach it, save to a few men chosen among the first of the land, this was not without an advantage. Popular religions of Akhnaton’s time, that long held sway over nations, have died out. And they could not possibly be revived, now or in the future, precisely because of the mythology and supernatural stories and particular views about death and funerary rites which overload them and hide the amount of truth that they did contain (as all religions do) and make them the products of definite geographical and historical environments, the property of particular civilisations. And nearer to us, in our own world, the greatest obstacle, perhaps, to the proselytism of the well-known international religions still alive, is that they too are irremediably linked up with a particular background of history and legend, stamped with a definite couleur locale; also that they appear inseparable from such supernatural events as the modern mind is no longer ready to accept. Islam cannot be preached to England or Germany detached from the marvellous stories that once stirred the admiration of the medieval Arab tent-dweller. Christianity cannot be preached to India and China detached from its Jewish and Greco-Roman associations; and in Europe itself — one of its oldest fields of expansion — Renan was already conscious that, if anything would one day make people sceptical and indifferent towards it, it would be those very miracles that once made its fortune.¹

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 96.

But Akhnaton's Teaching, devoid of the three things that have assured the success of other doctrines, is also free from the germs of decay contained in them. Logically, it can be revived, now and in any age to come, in any place where rational thinking is more than an empty profession. The absence of miracles, as well as of any positive answer to the insoluble question of death, makes it a religion that the critical mind can prefer to many others. Its rationality, one of the most potent causes of its failure in Egypt, in the days of its Founder, could therefore one day become the main source of its appeal to the disinterested, truth-seeking intelligentsia of all the world. This hope, however premature it might still seem, in our times, is not unjustified, considering the nature of the Teaching and the history of man's religious evolution.

¹ Renan: Life of Jesus (Translation by William G. Hutchinson), pp. 162-163.

CHAPTER VI

THE WAY OF LOVE

We have seen how Akhnaton's two hymns to the Sun which have come down to us suggest an idea of Godhead which, as Sir Flinders Petrie has so effectively pointed out, tallies with "our modern scientific conceptions." But that is not all. The impersonal God whom the young king worshipped — the Energy of the Universe, made tangible in the power and glory of our parent star — is no less inspiring to the heart of the mystic in search of absolute love, than to the clear intellect of the rationalist in search of logical and experimental accuracy. He is the "Lord of Love" no less than the Lord of Truth.

In the shorter hymns we find such sentences as: "Thy love is mighty and great. . . . Thy light of several colours bewitcheth all faces"; "Thou fillest the Two Lands with Thy love,"¹ etc. . . . and again, in the longer hymn, among others, the passage we referred to in the preceding chapter: "Thy rays encompass all lands. . . . Thou bindest them with Thy love," and the well-known paragraph: "Thou makest offspring to take form in women, creating seed in men. Thou makest the son to live in the womb of his mother, causing him to be quiet, that he crieth not; Thou art a nurse in the womb, giving breath to vivify that which Thou hast made. When he droppeth from the womb on the day of his birth, he openeth his mouth in the (ordinary) manner and Thou providest his sustenance. The young bird in the egg speaketh in the shell; Thou giveth breath to him inside it to make him live. Thou makest for him his mature form so that he can crack the shell (being) inside the egg. He cometh forth from the egg; he chirpeth with all his might; when he hath come forth from it (the egg), he walketh on his two feet. . . ."

¹ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 117.

O how many are the things which Thou hast made. . . .”¹ And a little further on, after the passage about the Nile and the rain and the variety of climates and races, follows another expression of devout admiration for the solicitude of the Creator: “How beneficent are Thy plans, O Lord of Eternity!”

As Arthur Weigall says, quoting the Christian Scriptures, never in history “had a man conceived a god who ‘so loved the world.’”² But there is, between the love of Aton for the world and the love of the personal God of the Gospel, all the difference that separates a link of impersonal necessity from one of human attachment.

We must not forget the nature of Aton — the Disk, identical to “Shu,” Heat-and-Light, i.e., Energy-within-the-Disk — who is neither a god in the image of man, nor even an individual power of any description, but the ultimate impersonal Reality behind all existence. The love of such a God for the millions and millions of lives which He brought forth from Himself is something different from the love of an individual parent for his offspring. True, Akhnaton calls his God the “Father-and-Mother of all which He hath made.” But if our interpretation of Aton be the right one, then that double appellation, far from containing any anthropomorphic idea, most probably symbolises the two complementary aspects of the One ultimate Essence: the active, for ever urging new forms and new lives out of dim latent possibilities, and the passive, the sensitive receptacle of all those possibilities, matrix of actual existence; the One everlasting Power of differentiation, and the everlasting and ever-differentiated Oneness. The individual parent and the offspring, however closely linked, are separate bodies with a separate consciousness. The “Father-and-Mother” of the Universe and the Universe itself are not. The latter is the visible and diversified expression of the former invisible and indivisible One — the Energy within the Disk and within the universe, of which matter is but an aspect. The love of Aton for the world is the stable unifying power that underlies all that is diverse and transient — all that is created. “Thou bindest them with Thy love” means: “Through their common relation to Thee, the One Essence of all things, they are one in their diversity — ‘bound to Thee,’ and bound together within their apparent separateness.” In another version of the longer hymn¹ we read: “Thou art Ra; Thou hast carried them all away captive; Thou bindest them by Thy love. . . .” The word “captive” would seem to indicate a link of complete dependence of the creatures upon the Creator. They are bound to Him as to the final condition of their existence.

¹ Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 128-129.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 105.

In that link rests the secret of their link to one another. They are one in Him, because first of all they are one with Him, as children are one with a loving parent, and much more so.

* * *

But apart from this relation of fact between the ultimate Energy and all that exists, the hymns clearly point out to a relation of intention. In Aton’s love “for all He hath made,” there is something more than the bond of physical and logical unity which we have tried to analyse. There is not, of course, that personal love, which only a god in the image of man can feel for each of his creatures; but there is some immanent finality which operates, in each individual case, as if it were the sign of God’s special individual care; a tendency to well-being which nature encourages and helps; an untiring goodness, which strikes one at every step as underlying the whole scheme of things.

That seems to be the truth expressed in Akhnaton’s beautiful passages about the kindness of Aton to the child and to the young bird, mere instances of His solicitude for all creatures. The marvel of pre-natal existence — the patient evolution of a cell into a full-grown individual — is recalled, with all the finality inherent to it, in a few words: “Thou art a nurse in the womb, giving breath to vivify that which Thou hast made. . . .” “Thou giveth breath to him (the young bird) inside the egg, to make him live. Thou makest for him his mature form so that he can crack the shell (being) inside the egg. . . .” God — i.e., Nature, for Aton does not stand for any supernatural entity — does His best. He “gives breath” to every young living thing; He equips it with organs marvellously adjusted; He helps it to grow, before its birth, and feeds it afterwards, for some time at least, that it may have a chance to fulfil its purpose which is to live, to enjoy the sunshine and to be beautiful, in the full-bloom of health and happiness. And though it is not said in the hymns — that are songs of praise to the glory of the Creator, not codes of human behavior — one feels, from the very tone of the king’s words, the moral truth that they imply. One feels that, in his eyes, it is man’s duty to collaborate with the universal Parent, the life-giving Sun; to love all creatures and to help them to live; not merely to do no harm to them, but to see to their welfare, to the utmost of his capacity. Life — the life of any creature — which is, in itself, such a masterpiece of divine love, is not to be considered lightly. And the welfare of anything that lives, especially of any creature that is helpless, is to be the object of our personal care. God Himself has pointed out the way to us by the example of His untiring solicitude.

¹ Translation of Breasted, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1912), p. 324.

It is remarkable that Akhnaton seems to give no less importance to the young bird — standing for the whole animal world — than to the human baby. The admiration he expresses for the loving care of Him Who brings the embryo to maturity and “provideth its needs” is equal in both cases. And one has the impression that the “Heat-and-Light-within-the-Disk” — his God — knows nothing of the childish partiality of the man-made gods in favour of the human species. Those gods, conceived, as some of them may be, centuries after the inspired Pharaoh, appear indeed, in the light of his, as glorified deities — which, no doubt, some of them originally were — raised by the pride of their worshippers to the leadership of a mere extended tribe, mankind, a species among many others in the endless variety of creation.

In the hymn from which we have quoted the above passage, there is another reference in which different countries are enumerated: “Thou didst create the world according to Thy desire, Syria, and Nubia and the land of Egypt. . . .” Commenting on the fact that the two tributary nations are named before Egypt, Arthur Weigall, following the pious trend of thought that characterises his whole book, says: “Akhnaton believed that his God was the Father of all mankind and that the Syrian and the Nubian were as much under His protection as the Egyptian. The religion of the Aton was to be a world religion. This is a greater advance in ethics than may be at first apparent; for the Aton thus becomes the first deity who was not tribal or not national ever conceived by mortal mind. This is the Christian’s understanding of God, though not the Hebrew conception of Jehovah. This is the spirit which sends the missionary to the uttermost parts of the earth; and it was such an attitude of mind which now led Akhnaton to build a temple to the Aton in Palestine, possibly at Jerusalem itself, and another far up in the Sudan.”¹

Before ascribing a definite date to the religious books of the East, especially the Vedas (which is not possible), it is difficult to say whether Aton was or not the first universal God “ever conceived by mortal mind.” But if, by his international spirit, by his belief in a God who was the Father of the foreigners as well as of the Egyptians, Akhnaton was in advance of the old Hebrew idea of Jehovah, then surely his conception of Aton, as free from every kind of human narrowness (loving the little birth and the little child, and all life alike), puts him no less in advance of Christianity itself — nay, in advance of any creed which makes man, and not life, the centre of its theory of creation and the basis of its scale of values. We personally believe that it is precisely this entire absence, not merely of nationalism and of imperialism, but also of any form of anthropomorphism (both moral and metaphysical) which raises the young Pharaoh far above so many later religious teachers and sets him, decidedly, ahead of our present times.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 166.

* * *

The impersonal Energy which radiates as heat and light in the life-giving Disk of the Sun — Aton — loves the world and all that lives upon it. In other words, Nature is indiscriminately, impartially kind. The tragedies that we witness every day — suffering and slaughter inflicted upon creatures, and every form of exploitation of man and beast — are man's doing, not Hers. God has given, to every young individual, health and the desire to enjoy the daylight. He intended it to live its span of years, not to die miserably. Even out of destruction and death He makes life spring out again, causing tender green shoots to appear on the branches of the mutilated trees, and new trees to grow out of the roots of those that were felled. To Him, life is an end in itself. And at every new attempt He makes to bring forth a living thing, again at its birth He lavishes upon it His gifts of health and beauty, possibilities of development into the perfection of its species, promises of happiness.

Such was the essential of Akhnaton's Teaching concerning the love of God. He seems, at least from the little we now possess of his religious poems, to have ignored evil entirely; and perhaps he actually did so, for not only in the hymns, but also in the numerous inscriptions which cover the walls of his followers' tombs, "the destructive qualities of the Sun were never referred to,"¹ not to speak of all the crimes against life that are allowed to be committed under His face all over the earth. That omission, as we have already said in a former chapter,² cannot be explained by supposing the king to have been blind to the existence of suffering as a fact. That would be absurd. True, the surroundings he had created for himself were exceedingly beautiful. But he knew that the wide world extended far beyond them, and beyond his own beneficent influence. Moreover, there never was a town on earth where people were totally free from anger and greed, cruelty and cowardice, the sources of the evil actions that produce suffering. And Akhetaton, though the “seat of Truth,” was surely no exception, for men dwelt there. And the young Prophet of sunshine and joy must have known how limited was his control over other people’s bad instincts, even at a few yards from his peaceful palace. Yet, he sang the love of God, in spite of it all. He deeply felt that there was, at the birth of every new life, equipped for happiness, the triumph of an inexhaustible Power of love, which governs the universe. The newly-born creature might not be left to enjoy the full-bloom of life for which its body and soul were made. The possibility of enjoying it was, nevertheless, the result of the whole finality of its pre-natal development, the outcome of a divine solicitude. Health and happiness were its birthright, according to the decrees of the immense immanent Love that sustains all creation, the Soul of the universe — God.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 104.

² In Chapter IV, p. 102.

Seen in the light of the young king’s super-conscious insight into the mystery of existence, the effects of human wickedness, with all their horror, appeared perhaps as but surface ripples, hardly perturbing the calm abyss of eternal Life and infinite Love. That is possible. However it be, he did not ask the reason why such ripples exist, because he knew there was no answer to the question. It would seem that he brushed aside the problem of evil deliberately (along with the problem of death), as something which the human mind, however exalted, cannot solve. And instead of seeking in vain an explanation where there was none, he absorbed himself in the contemplation of the One unpolluted — and unpollutable — Source of health, life and love: the Energy within the Sun.

* * *

No less than the love of God for the world, manifested in the untiring beneficence of our parent star, Akhnaton has stressed, in the hymns, the love of all living creatures for their common Father, whose heat and light has brought them forth and sustains them, generation after generation.

All men love Him and bow down to Him, whatever be their other professed gods. “They live when Thou shinest upon them . . .” says the inspired author of the hymns; “their eyes, when Thou risest, turn their gaze upon Thee. . . .” “Every heart beateth high at the sight of Thee, for Thou risest as their Lord.”¹ And also: “All men’s hands are stretched out in praise of Thy rising” . . . “O Lord of every land, Thou shinest upon them; O Aten of the day, great in majesty,”² or, in the translation of Mr. Griffith, reproduced by Sir Flinders Petrie: “Thou art throughout their Lord, even in their weakness, O Lord of the land that risest for them, Aten of the day, revered in every distant country.”³

In fact, every nation in the neighbourhood of Egypt paid homage to the Sun under a different name. And however narrow might have been their conception of the God of Light, often brought down to the rank of a local god,⁴ and however debased might have been their forms of worship, still it was to Him that went their praise. They loved Him and revered Him without knowing Him.

And distant peoples and tribes of which the king of Egypt could not possibly have heard, also rendered divine honours to the same fiery Disk at His dawning and setting. It was a fact that, while Akhnaton’s poems were sung to His glory “in the hall of the House of the Benben Obelisk and in every temple in Akhetaton, the seat of truth,”⁵ the Aryan clans, slowly pouring into India, were exalting Him in the hymns of the Rig-Veda; wild tribes from the north of Europe and Asia sang the beauty of His hazy smile over endless snow-

¹ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 118.

² Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 131.

³ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 216.

⁴ Breasted: Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1912), pp. 13 and following; p. 312.

⁵ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 117.

bound plains and dark forests; and at the eastern end of the earth, the primitive people of Japan — more than seven hundred years before their first recorded emperor — doubtless already hailed His rising out of the Pacific Ocean. And still farther to the east and to the south — beyond those virgin waves that it would have taken months and months to cross — men of undiscovered isles and continents praised Him, in speeches now long forgotten, with strange rites of which we shall never know.

And thus it was true that the whole world was full of His name. From the Nile to the Andes, and from the frozen beaches over which He sheds His midnight rays to the luxuriant isles that smile in His golden light, in the midst of phosphorescent seas, it was true that “all men’s hands” were “stretched out in praise of His rising.” Akhnaton probably did not know how big our planet is; nor had he any idea of the farthest lands of dawn and sunset bordering the two great oceans. Yet, with a sure insight of truth, he proclaimed his God: “Thou Aton of the day, revered in every distant land.” He was aware of the universality of Sun-worship, that oldest and most natural religion in the world, of which still to-day one could find concrete traces in the rites and customs and festivals of more intricate, more anthropomorphic — and less rational — cults. He was aware also that, if any religion could one day claim to conquer the earth and unite all enlightened mankind, it could be none but this one. The worldwide concert of man’s praise to the Sun, of which the dim echo resounded in his heart, clumsy, childish, discordant as it was, filled him with joy and glorious hopes. It was the first expression of the whole human race groping in quest of the real God. Its final expression — the religion of integral life, in which reason and inspiration, knowledge and devotion would go hand-in-hand — could be but the worship of the One Essence of all existence, Cosmic Energy, manifested in the heat and light of our parent star; the rational cult of the Sun, which he had forestalled in Akhetaton, his sacred City.

* * *

There is more. Aton is not the God of man alone. We have seen that He loves all creatures impartially and treats them with equal solicitude. It is shown in the hymns no less clearly that all creatures love and worship Him, each in the manner of its species. "Every creature that Thou hast made skippeth towards Thee . . ."; "All the beasts frisk about on their feet; all the feathered fowl rise up from their nests and flap their wings with joy, and circle around in praise of the Living Aten. . . ." ¹ "Beasts and cattle of all kinds settle down upon the pastures" . . . "the feathered fowl fly about over their marshes, their feathers (i.e., their wings) praising Thy 'Ka'. . . ." ² "All the cattle rise up on their legs; creatures that fly and insects of all kinds spring into life when Thou risest up on them. . . ." ³ "The fishes in the river swim up to greet Thee." ⁴ And it is not only quadrupeds and birds, insects and fishes that take part in the general chorus of joy and praise that rises from the earth to the Sun; "shrubs and vegetables flourish" ⁵ when Thou risest upon them; "buds burst into flower, and the plants which grow on the waste lands send up shoots at Thy rising; they drink themselves drunk before Thy face." ⁶

There are two ideas, quite different from each other, expressed in these few quotations from the hymns: on one hand that all creatures rejoice at the sight of the Sun; on the other that they all worship the Sun. The first is a matter of everyday observation that many a sensitive soul would probably have stressed in a poem to the glory of the life-giving Disk; a commonplace truth which indeed has been emphasised in various antique songs of unknown date and authorship, no less than in many passages of modern literature, and which implies no special insight on the part of

¹ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 121.

² In Griffith's version: "Their wings adoring Thy 'Ka.'"

³ Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 126-127.

⁴ Longer Hymn, Translation of Griffith. Quoted by Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 215, and following.

⁵ Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 126.

⁶ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 121.

whoever grasps it; an obvious fact. The second idea implies the belief in the unity of all life and the brotherhood of creatures, and provides the basis of a whole religious and moral outlook.

Apart from Sir Flinders Petrie, who sees in the scientific foundation of the Religion of the Disk its greatest claim to our admiration, most authors among those who appreciate Akhnaton's Teaching seem to do so on account of his God being the God of all nations as opposed to the hosts of national and tribal deities worshipped all over the ancient world. The young Pharaoh's conception of the brotherhood of man as a consequence of the fatherhood of the one Sun; his internationalism; his kindness to all human beings, including rebels and traitors; his "conscientious objection to warfare"¹ — logical outcome of a lofty respect for human life — are the traits which appear to strike historians such as Breasted and Arthur Weigall, commentators such as the Rev. J. Baikie, and, in general, all people who can imagine no broader standards of love than those put forward in the Gospels.

But a closer reading of the hymns in a totally unprejudiced spirit would have revealed, it seems, a feeling of truly universal brotherhood much more comprehensive than that expressed, as far as we know, by any later religious teacher, west of India, with the noble exception of a few Greeks — such as Apollonius of Tyana — obviously influenced by Indian masters. The fatherhood of the Sun implied, in Akhnaton's eyes, the brotherhood of all sentient beings, human and non-human. The point deserves to be stressed.

As we have remarked, there are two distinct ideas in the hymns, with regard to living creatures. The joy of life, and the excitement that the appearing of daylight produces in all beings, from man to fish — even from man to plant — is one thing. The feeling it reveals, no doubt, in the author of the hymns, a heart open to universal understanding and to sympathy for all that lives. But that alone does not necessarily imply any religious doctrine about the unity of man and beast. In fact, saints full of the same tender love for dumb creatures have honoured, in course of time, religions according to the teachings of which man remains the special object of God's solicitude and the measure of all values; Saint Francis of Assisi, for instance, called all creatures his "brothers," and long before him a follower of the Prophet of Islam, Abu Hurairah, so tradition says, preferred to cut off a piece of his mantle rather than disturb a cat that had gone to sleep upon it. Had Akhnaton only spoken of the thrill that the rising Sun sends through all flesh; had even touching stories come down to us concerning his kindness to animals, yet we would not be able to say, on those grounds alone, what was the exact place of animals in the Religion of the Disk. Such evidence would have borne witness to the king's value as a man; but it would have added little to our knowledge of his Teaching.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 200.

Fortunately, he said more. Not only did he look upon the joyous demonstrations of the animal world at daybreak as marks of love for the Sun, but he also considered them as unmistakable expressions of adoration. Birds, said he, "flap their wings with joy, and circle round in praise of the living Aten." And that also is not all. One holding the general views inherited from the Bible by modern mankind — believing, that is to say, that there is a difference of nature, an unbreachable gap, between man and beast — would perhaps be inclined to concede that animals do pay some sort of homage to the material Sun-disk that shines above them, without looking up to any more subtle God, Creator and Animator of the Disk itself. But Akhnaton, following to the end the logical implications of an entirely different view of the universe, boldly asserts, in the longer hymn, that the God Whom beasts and birds worship is the self-same invisible, intangible Essence of all being, manifested in the Sun, Whom man reveres "in every distant country" — the "Ka," or Soul of the Sun; the Soul of the world. "The feathered fowl fly about over their marshes, their wings adoring Thy 'Ka.'"

Not that the young Pharaoh probably believed animals to be aware of the nature of that all-pervading supreme Reality to which we have referred in the preceding chapter. He did not hold all men, also, or even the majority of men, to be conscious of what they really worshipped in the visible Sun. The sentence we have already quoted: “Thou art in my heart, and there is none who knoweth Thee save Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra . . .” (Beautiful-essence-of-the-Sun, Only-one-of-the-Sun) is sufficient to show what an aristocratic conception he had of what is, properly speaking, “religion” — an experience of the Divine within one’s self, which very few men can ever hope to obtain to the full. But just as he believed that men, of whatever country and creed, all tend to the consciousness of the One Essence and worship It in the Sun, in spite of their ignorance, so he held that beasts and birds, even insects and fishes — all living beings — dimly tend to the same ultimate knowledge, and already worship the same Principle of universal life, Cosmic Energy, without being able to conceive its nature, or even to think of it. They are, like the majority of men (and probably to a lesser degree than the average man, though of course nobody knows) vaguely aware of Something fundamental and supreme, which they feel in the heat and light of the Sun; in the magic touch of His life-giving beams. And they worship It, without knowing what It is, with movements and noises, or movements alone, each one to the uttermost capacity of his individual nature and of his particular species. That seems to have been Akhnaton’s view of the relation of animals to God. They were, in his eyes, religious beings of the same nature as man; capable of prayer and adoration, in a vaguer manner (for want of speech) but perhaps with no less elementary emotional intensity. Otherwise — had he not meant that — the word “Ka” would have no sense in the above references.

* * *

Of plants, it is not said in the hymns whether or not, in their thrill at the touch of Aton’s golden beams, there enters any element of adoration. Yet, if the leap of the fish towards the surface of the water is considered as an act of “greeting” the rising Sun, it seems hardly possible not to see in the water-lillies that “drink themselves drunk” (of His radiance) “before His face,” living creatures enjoying, at a lower level of consciousness, the maximum of ecstatic joy that their nature permits. The king’s words, “they drink themselves drunk,” seem to imply, in their case also, a sort of religious intoxication, a holy rapture, as the warm sun-rays enter the open flowers and reach down into their hearts.

In other words, far from setting up a definite line of demarcation between man and the living world outside man, and considering our species endowed with special rights by a god who made the rest of creatures for its use; far from forestalling, that is to say, the common view of later monotheistic creeds, from that of the Jews onwards, Akhnaton looked upon all sentient beings as children of the same Father — the Sun — and co-worshippers of the same ultimate God, Cosmic Energy, made visible and tangible in the Sun; as brothers, identical in nature, different only inasmuch as the consciousness of the supreme One is more or less developed in each individual. And just as all nations were united, in his eyes, by the fact that they all revere the “Father-and-Mother” of life in various tongues and with various inadequate rites, so were all living species united to one another and to man — and man to them — by the worship of the One Cosmic God.

For such was Aton, the God of all animals (and plants) as well as of all men; the God of all men, in fact, only because He was, primarily and essentially, the God of life in general — man being only a small part of the endless scheme of life. A learned historian wrote, as a criticism of Akhnaton’s Teaching, that the hymns contained hardly any more than an assertion of the pleasure to be alive, a “cat-like” enjoyment of the Sun.¹ A true follower of the inspired Pharaoh would answer: “So much the better”; for the value of the Religion of the Disk lies precisely in the fact that it is perhaps the only religion fit for cats and all beasts no less than for men, and supermen. Its bold views concerning the oneness of matter and energy may well be understood only by a few human beings, even to-day. But its visible object of worship — the Sun — is, and indeed ever will be, the only manifestation of God which beasts, and birds, and fishes, and plants, and all possible forms of life can be expected to appreciate in their own way, no less than we do in ours, and to worship, if they are to worship anything. However simple be a creed, it can be at the most extended to all mankind — not beyond. Nor can any seer, any prophet, any deified hero receive the allegiance of creatures other than men. Nor can even any idol be worshipped by dumb beasts. But the Sun appeals to all, inspires all, is loved and worshipped by all, from the philosophising devotee of intangible Energy down to the cat, the cock, the fish, the sun-flower. And the young Founder of the Religion of the Disk himself — the perfect Man in whom shone both intellectual and religious genius — would have, no doubt, seen in the movement of the beautiful sensitive feline stretching out its velvet paws with pleasure as it winks at the Sun, and in the raising of his own hands in praise of Him, two parallel gestures of worship — two expressions of the universal love of finite, individual life for the unknown, infinite and impersonal Energy, Source of all life.

¹ H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 599.

* * *

The love of God for the whole world and the love of the whole world for God are thus clearly expressed in the shorter and in the longer hymns. The love of creatures for one another, especially of man for creatures (his fellow-men and others), is not referred to. The hymns are poems in praise of the splendour, power and goodness of God, nothing more; they contain but statements of fact; and the love of man for his brothers of different races and different species is not a fact, even to-day. But it is the natural feeling of whoever realises, as Akhnaton did, that all creatures, from the superman down to the meanest particle of life in the depth of the ocean, have sprung into existence out of the same divine Source — the Sun; that they are sustained by the action of the same vivifying rays and that, each one in its own way, they all adore the only God, Whose face is the resplendent Disk of our parent star. And in that respect, one can surely say that it is implied in the hymns — nay, that it is the very spirit of Akhnaton's Teaching.

The example of the young Pharaoh's life, whenever available, reveals better than any song the practical implications of his religion. And there is sound evidence that, in various important circumstances, his action, or his restraint from action, was prompted by nothing else but that universal love, natural to a true worshipper of the Sun, which also pervaded his everyday life.

We have spoken of his love for his consort and children, nearly always represented at his side, in paintings and bas-reliefs, in the most unconventional attitudes. We have also mentioned his generosity towards his followers, on whom the contemporary artists portray him lavishing every possible mark of favour. But pleasant and instructive as they are, those scenes of idyllic married happiness and of friendly patronage should not be mistaken for instances of universal love. They no doubt show us, in Akhnaton, a delicate soul, sensitive to the innocent joys of family life and of friendship; they may add to the particular charm he possesses even apart from his Teaching; they appeal to us especially because they make of him, in our eyes, a man like ourselves; they bestow upon him the attractiveness of living life; the eternal actuality of the feelings which they betray bridges the gaping gulf of time, and makes the Founder of the long-forgotten Religion of the Disk young and lovely for ever. But there is, after all, nothing in them which deserves our moral admiration, save perhaps the perfect frankness with which the king allowed them to be rendered. Many men have loved but one woman and have lived with her a peaceful domestic life, without sharing anything of Akhnaton's greatness. And all teachers are inclined to be kind to those who seem to show a keen interest in their message. As for the young Pharaoh's affection for his little daughters, it is but natural. And if one infers, from the fondness he displays towards them, that he probably liked children in general, that is also a trait which many fathers would have in common with him — fathers who, on the other hand, seem to have little experience of that all-embracing love of which we have spoken in the above pages.

More enlightening is the interest that the king appears to have taken in the welfare of the labourers who dug out the tombs of the gentry from the live rock, and for whom he had built the “model settlement” excavated in modern times in the vicinity of the desert hills, east of Akhetaton. We have said already a few words about that settlement,¹ adding that similar ones were possibly built nearer the City or even within its boundaries, for the men working in its famous glass factories. The main point we observed about it was the relative material comfort and the leisure given to each worker (who felt prompted to decorate his rooms according to his taste, and found time to do so), and above all the fact that the place was entirely free from religious propaganda. That suggests that Akhnaton was sufficiently broadminded to see to his people’s happiness without expecting them, in exchange, to show in his Teaching an interest of which he knew they were incapable. He was no forerunner of the dreamers who prepared the French Revolution, and he probably did not believe in the dogma of equality among men any more than the world at large did in his days, or than sensible folk do at any epoch. He knew that the individuals who dwelt in the little four-roomed houses he had built for them, on each side of the long straight streets of the labour-colonies, had hardly anything in common with him save that they were, like all creatures, happy to see the daylight and that, even in the midst of their intricate superstitions, they unconsciously gave praise to the One God, Source of life, health and joy. Yet he loved them — not with the busy possessive zeal of a missionary in a hurry to bring numbers of people to accept his doctrine, but with the disinterested benevolence of a true lover of creatures, who has no aim but the well-being of those to whom he does good, and who knows that most men cannot rise above an ideal of very concrete happiness. He loved them sincerely and wisely, fully conscious both of the weaknesses that separated them from him (and that called for his toleration) and of their oneness with him, in spite of all, through the common Father of Life (that called for his active interest in their welfare).

¹ In Chapter IV, p. 82.

Another instance of Akhnaton's impartial love for human beings is to be found in his attitude towards foreigners — nay, towards rebels, enemies of his country and of his power — and finally in his behaviour towards his personal enemies.

What one could call the young king's "internationalism" and his "pacifism" are perhaps, of all the remarkable aspects of his mental outlook, the ones that appeal the most to many modern historians. And it does indeed stir anybody's interest to find such traits as these (which only since yesterday are beginning to gain among us some popularity) developed, and that, to the extent we shall see, in a youth of the early fourteenth century B.C.

It has been observed¹ that Syria and Kush (Nubia) are named before Egypt in the reference quoted above from the longer hymn. The detail is significant. But quite apart from it, the tone of the whole passage is in striking contrast with that of earlier Egyptian hymns addressed to the Sun-god considered as a local god,² and especially with that of such poems as the famous Hymn of Victory composed by a priest of Amon under Thotmose the Third, both in honour of the great god of Thebes and of the conqueror of Syria, and characteristic of the spirit of imperial Egypt. And the history of the king's dealings with foreigners, both friends and foes, fully confirms the impression left by his words.

The presence among his dearest disciples of a man like Pnahesi (or Panehsi), an Ethiopian — others say a Negro³ — shows that he was free from any racial prejudice in his estimation of individuals, although he was the very last man to ignore the natural, God-ordained separation of races, nay, although he considered it as an essential aspect of that diversity within order, which characterises Aton's creation.¹ But more eloquent than all is the impartial view he seems to have taken of the rights of foreign countries.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 164.

² Breasted: Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt, pp. 13-14; also p. 312.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 92.

The loss of the Egyptian empire is the object of a further chapter. We cannot here expatiate on it in detail. But we can recall the substance of the astounding tale which the well-known Tell-el-Amarna Letters — Akhnaton's correspondence with foreign kings, and especially with his vassals and governors in Syria and Palestine — tell the modern reader. When his Asiatic dominions were seething with ferments of revolt; when his loyal supporters and his officials, guardians of the "rights" of Egypt in conquered territory, were sending him desperate messages and begging for speedy help, the Founder of the Religion of the Disk deliberately withdrew from doing anything to keep Syria under his sway. When an Amorite princeling, Aziru, son of Abdashirta — what we would call to-day a Syrian "nationalist" — had managed to gather the majority of Syrian chiefs around him, and was attacking the few who had remained on the side of the imperial power, and forcing the Egyptian garrisons to surrender one after the other, then, far from trying to quell the rebellion, the king of Egypt did not stir. And when that same princeling, whom he had summoned to Egypt, appeared at last before him, Akhnaton, instead of having him summarily dealt with (as any imperial ruler would have done), received him kindly and sent him back as the practically independent master of Syria. Aziru was guilty of having had one of the most faithful supporters of Egyptian rule treacherously put to death. The Pharaoh loved the man, by name Ribaddi, who had in vain served him and died for him — so much so that he had even sent, once, a small detachment of mercenaries to his rescue, the only soldiers ever allowed, during his reign, to cross the Egyptian border. And he had written the murderer a long, stern letter, expressing plainly how highly indignant he was at the news

¹ Thou settest every man in his place . . .

Their tongues are diverse in speech,

Their shape likewise, and the colour of their skins; for, as a Divider, Thou dividest the strange peoples.

(Longer Hymn.)

of his deed. Still, he seems to have borne no grudge and entertained no desires of vengeance against him. He seems indeed to have been able to enter his spirit and to understand the ultimate motive of his action — the dream of all Syria united under the rule of Aziru's own people, the Amorites — and to have forgiven him without much effort, as one forgives a crime of which one can penetrate the psychology entirely. Such an attitude is so unusual that it bewilders the mind of the student of history.

In fact, the whole story of Akhnaton's dealings with his vassal States is amazing from beginning to end. It clashes with all one knows of the established relations between subject people of any race and at any epoch, and their natural overlord (i.e., the embodiment of the power that holds them by the right of war). It cannot be explained as the result either of incapacity or of negligence on the part of a king whose administration at home appears to have been firm, and whose sense of responsibility is out of question. It can only be regarded, as we shall stress later on, as one of those material tragedies — and moral triumphs — that follow the application of the noblest principles to the conduct of the affairs of a barbaric world. It shows that Akhnaton was not the man able to keep what Thutmose the First and Thutmose the Third had conquered. But it shows, also, that the reason why he could not keep it is that he was hundreds of years in advance of his times — and of our times. For the principle which guided him, in his systematic refusal to help his loyal vassals in their struggle against the “nationalist” elements of Syria, seems to have been that of the right of the Syrians, as a people distinct from the Egyptians, to dispose of themselves and solve their own problems. He saw clearly that some of them were in favour of Egyptian domination; the majority, however, seemed to be against it. The best course for him — whose unprejudiced sympathy extended equally to all mankind — was to let them fight out the question of their future status without interfering. The interest of Egypt, of his supporters, of himself (who had all to gain from the conservation of his empire and of his prestige, and all to lose by their loss) mattered little, if opposed to that idea of the right of all nations to live free under the same life-giving Sun, the Father of all. And it is because he loved all men impartially in his universal God of life and love that Akhnaton believed in that right, as in something fundamental.

There is still more. While so many people, even to-day, try to defend the maintenance of a status quo resulting from old wars of aggression, it is, no doubt, staggering to think of a young man proclaiming — and that, not in words, but by his deeds — the brotherhood of all nations and their right to freedom, thirty-three hundred years ago. But one might argue that Akhnaton was, as his detractors call him, a “religious fanatic,” and that such people have no feelings but for what touches their cherished doctrines.¹ The final test of his love for all men lies in his attitude towards the bitterest enemies of his Teaching, the priests of Amon.

We know that he closed the temples of their god; that he abolished his cult, and that the enormous revenues which his predecessors formerly lavished upon it he henceforth used for the glorification of the One God, for the embellishment of Akhetaton, and for different works of public utility. We also know that he confiscated the scandalous wealth of the priests and did away with their influence. But, apart from that, he caused no harm to be done to them.

Sir Wallis Budge, who seems bent on finding fault with all that Akhnaton did, compares him with the Fatimide Khalif Al-Hakim, who reigned in Cairo two thousand five hundred years later, and tells us that “it would be rash to assume that persons who incurred the king’s displeasure in a serious degree were not removed by the methods that have been well known at Oriental courts from time immemorial.”² But he himself admits, after recalling Al-Hakim’s wholesale massacres of his enemies, that “we have no knowledge that such atrocities were committed in Akhetaton,”³ so that the fact of Akhnaton being an “Oriental” king seems to be the only basis on which the twentieth-century historian puts forth his damaging assumption — a very flimsy basis indeed. James Baikie has singled out Budge’s comment as a characteristic example of what prejudice can bring a serious writer to say, once it has got the best of his good sense.¹ We add that, had any act of violence taken place, at Akhnaton’s command or with his consent, against the opponents of his rational creed, the scribes in the pay of the priests of Amon would surely not have failed to give us a graphic account of it, once the national gods had been restored under Tutankhamen. The absence of any such account suffices to lead one to believe that, beyond dispossessing them of their excessive riches, Akhnaton never harmed the men who hated him the most, though he had every power to do so. His behaviour — in contrast with that of those very same men, who pursued him with their bitter curses even after he lay in his grave — suggests that, in his eyes, the awareness of the universal fatherhood of the Sun implied a broad humanity; a sincere love extended, in practical life, to all men, including one’s foes; including those who, in their ignorance, scorn the real God in favour of dead formulas and spurious symbols.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 106.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 107, 108.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 107.

* * *

It implied more. As we have said, it implied love towards all creatures, our brothers, which the Sun has brought into life not for our use, but for each one of them to flourish in health and beauty, and to praise Him to the utmost capacity of its species. Even the plants are created for a higher purpose inherent in their nature — ultimately, for the glorification of the One universal Energy — not for us. It is said in the longer hymn: “Thy beams nourish every field; Thou risest and they live; they germinate for Thee.”²

One would like to possess more positive evidence of Akhnaton’s personal attitude towards animals and plants in everyday life. There can be no doubt that he loved them; a man who would have looked upon them just as an interesting, perhaps admirable, but yet inferior creation, deprived of a soul of the same nature as our own, would have been incapable of writing the two hymns of which the authorship is ascribed, with practical certainty, to the young Founder of the Religion of the Disk. A painting in which he is portrayed, as usually, in the midst of his family,¹ shows one of the little princesses fondly stroking the head of a tame gazelle which her sister is holding in her arms — a scene which would suggest, to say the least, that pets were welcome in the palace and that the king's children were actually brought up to love dumb creatures. Budge, moreover, tells us that “not only was the king no warrior, he was not even a lover of the chase,”² a statement which is confirmed by the fact that not a single hunting scene, not a single inscription set up in commemoration of a successful chase — as there are so many, exalting the courage and skill of other Pharaohs — has yet been discovered in the amount of pictorial and written evidence dating from his reign. And, while waiting for some more decisive proof before giving the question a final answer, one may wonder if, along with so many other things, traditionally looked upon as normal or even commendable, the action of pursuing and killing beautiful wild beasts and birds for the sake of sport was not forbidden by him who sang the joy of life in all nature, or at least if he had not expressed for that sort of amusement a sufficient repulsion for his courtiers to refrain from indulging in it, throughout his reign. Such a disgust on his part would be fully in keeping with the spirit of the Religion of the Disk as revealed to us in the hymns.

¹ James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 260.

² The Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 132.

The absence of records, or the state in which the existing documents have reached us, makes it difficult for one to say anything more about the application to the king's daily life of that principle of truly universal love and brotherhood, surely implied in what we know of his religion. The paintings that portray him eating and drinking have not come down to us sufficiently well preserved for one to assert, without his imagination playing a great part in the guess, which were the items of the royal menu. And imagination always involves the habits and tastes of the author who hazards the guess. The “broiled bone,”¹ for instance, and the “joints of meat”² in honour of Queen Tiy, represented on the walls of the tomb of Huya, can as well be anything else but a “bone” and “joints of meat.” In fact, it is not easy at all to decide what the artist actually intended them to suggest.

¹ In the tomb of Merira II.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 92.

The same thing can be said of the piles of offerings heaped upon the altar of the Sun in many a picture where the king and queen are portrayed worshipping. It is hard to make out what they represent, without a great amount of imagination. No scenes actually picturing animal sacrifices have so far been discovered, and the mere presence of bulls garlanded with flowers among the crowd that comes forth to receive the Pharaoh at the entrance of the temple of Aton, on the walls of the tomb of Merira, the High-priest, does not suffice to indicate — let alone to prove — that those creatures were destined to be slain in some solemn oblation. Nor can the fact that living victims, “both animal and human,”³ were offered to Ra in the temples built by the kings of the Fifth Dynasty throw any light on the ritual of the Religion of the Disk as regards sacrifices. Akhnaton did, in many ways, aim at a revival of very old ideas concerning the Sun, and the well-known connection of his cult with that in the most ancient centre of solar worship — the sacred city of Anu, or On — goes to support that view, no less than the strange archaisms in art that we have pointed out, quoting Arthur Weigall. But that does not mean that he accepted the old ritual as it had once been in use. We know that, merely by forbidding to make any image of his God, he suppressed a number of rites that had been essential in the cult of all the old gods of Egypt. What, exactly, he did away with, and what he kept of the past is not known. The only indication of living creatures being offered to Aton is to be found in the first inscription commemorating the foundation of Akhetaton. There, along with bread, beer, wine, herbs, fruits, flowers, incense and gold, geese, etc., are mentioned among the items offered at the ceremony which solemnised the consecration of the City's territory. Curiously enough, in the second foundation inscription the enumeration is omitted.

¹ James Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 283.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 154-155.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 62.

It is stated also — on the same boundary-tablets of Akhetaton — that the “hills, deserts, fowl, people, cattle, all things which Aton produced and on which His rays shine” are consecrated to Him by the king, the Founder of the City; that “they are all offered to His spirit.”¹ Were the geese and other living creatures enumerated in the first inscription selected simply so that the animal as well as the vegetable and mineral world might be represented in the ceremony, and “offered to the spirit of the Sun” in the same manner as the whole territory of the future City with all its inhabitants? Or were they actually destroyed according to the age-old custom? And if the traditional rites of sacrifice were observed on that solemn occasion, were they also a part of the daily worship of Aton in the new capital? One can answer neither of these questions with absolute certainty. Arthur Weigall believes that “the ceremonial side of the religion does not seem to have been complex. The priests, of whom there were very few, offered sacrifices consisting mostly of vegetables, fruits and flowers, to the Aton, and at those ceremonies the king and his family often officiated. They sang psalms and offered prayers, and with much sweet music gave praise to the great Father of joy, and love.”² While Sir Wallis Budge tells us plainly that “we know nothing of the forms and ceremonies of the Aton worship,”³ but that “hymns and songs and choruses must have filled the temple daily”¹ — the only thing that can be asserted about the external side of the Religion of the Disk, without much risk of being mistaken.²

¹ Quoted by A. Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 93.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 108.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 91.

* * *

But even if one supposes that, at least up to the period of the foundation of Akhetaton — that is to say, while the religion of Aton had perhaps retained more points of resemblance with the old solar cult of Heliopolis than it did later on — and, maybe also afterwards, on certain occasions, some oblations of living creatures were made, in the traditional manner, to the Father of Life, that would throw very little light on Akhnaton’s personal attitude towards beasts and birds. It would, anyhow, in no way disprove the belief in the brotherhood of all creatures which we have attributed to him on the basis of the hymns he composed.

Blood sacrifices, so common in the ancient world (and still in present-day India, among the Shakta section of the Hindus), shock the modern man not because they imply a murderous violence — worse cruelties take place to-day, everywhere, in the name of food, dress, amusement and scientific research — but because the modern man fails to put himself in the place of those who once offered them. He cannot realise what they represented to the minds of those people; he does not understand their meaning. We know that many interpretations of sacrifice can be given, some of which are purely practical, but some of which also, on the contrary, involve an idea of disinterested gift to God; a useless gift of what belongs to Him already, one might say, but still a gift which the worshipper offers in a spirit of sole devotion. Viewed in that particular light, a blood sacrifice, notwithstanding the gruesome action it supposes, is infinitely less repulsive than the equally or more cruel things that the modern man tolerates or encourages: butchery, hunting, harpooning of whales, and scientific experiments at the expense of sentient creatures. It does not stress the difference between man and beast, nor does it imply the childish and barbaric dogma that beasts have been created for man to exploit at his convenience. It does not sever the tie of brotherhood between the offerer and the victim. In fact, in the early days of history — and among certain Shakta sects of Hindus, still not long ago — men were chosen as victims, and rightly so, no less than beasts. The oblation of life to the interest of mankind — not to God — the standing feature of an order in which religion is free from blood sacrifices without society being innocent of the blood of beasts, is definitely the denial of the sacred unity of life and of the duty of universal love, a permanent insult to the divine Source of all life.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 92.

² Sir Wallis Budge writes, however, in his History of Egypt (Edit. 1902), Vol. IV, p. 122: “. . . in its courts” (i.e., in the courts of the temple of Aton) “were altars on which incense was burnt and offerings were laid, and it is possible that the idea of the altars was suggested to the architect Bek, the son of Men, by the altar which the great Queen Hatshepset had erected in her temple at Dêr-al-Bahari. It is an interesting fact that no sacrifices of any kind were offered up, either on the queen’s altar or on the altars of her successors, and it must be noted that the queen says in her inscription on her altar that she built it for her father, Ra-Harmachis, and that Ra-Harmachis was the one ancient god of the Egyptians whom Amen-hotep IV delighted to honour.”

Whatever may have been the ritual in the temples of Akhetaton, there is one fact which invites us to believe that Akhnaton strongly stressed, in his Teaching and by his behaviour, that all living creatures are our brothers through the Sun, our common Father. This is the definite mention, in the inscription on the first boundary-stone of the sacred City, of the solemn burial of the bull Mnevis (or Mreuris) in a tomb in the eastern hills, near the king's own sepulchre and those of his nobles. "And the sepulchre of Mnevis shall be made in the eastern hills, and he shall be buried therein."

Mnevis was the sacred bull symbolising the Sun incarnate in the eyes of the priests of On. By giving him a worthy place of rest in the cemetery of his new capital, the Pharaoh, no doubt, wished to point out the filiation of his cult to that which was perhaps the oldest form of Sun-worship in Egypt, and thereby to impress in its favour a nation naturally inclined to cling to tradition. But there surely was more than that in his gesture. Akhnaton, who cared so little for success, would not, it seems, have done anything simply for the sake of policy. There must have been some deeper religious significance attached to the honours rendered to the old bull, apart from his being the holy animal of On. The Religion of the Disk was, after all, something quite distinct from the archaic cult of the Sun in On, though it had its roots in it.

What was this religious significance is nowhere stated. But if we bear in mind the spirit of the hymns, in which man, beast, bird, fish and plant are shown in turn to be the objects of the One God's impartial solicitude, and, each one to the capacity of its nature, His worshippers, then it seems quite possible that Akhnaton desired to honour the bull Mnevis less as the sacred bull of On, traditional symbol of vigour and fertility, than as an individual beast standing for Animality in general, the mother of Humanity; standing for the sacred realm of Life, of which human reason is only a late aspect and the clear knowledge of truth the ultimate flower. By the special treatment he gave him, he might well have wished to remind his followers both of the kindness that man should show to all living beings — his brothers — and of the respect he should feel for the great forces of life at play within their dumb consciousness, more frankly and more innocently than in his own.

The inscriptions dating from the time of the great reaction against Akhnaton's work emphasise the decay in which the shrines of the gods and their estates had fallen, during his reign, through neglect. "The sanctuaries were overthrown and the sacred sites had become thoroughfares for the people," states the well-known stele of Tutankhamen in Cairo.¹ It is remarkable that not a word is said about what happened to the sacred beasts — crocodiles, ibis, ichneumons, cats, etc. — that formed such a striking feature in the cult of the local gods. A real "religious fanatic," enemy of the gods and of all that was connected with them, would probably have had those animals destroyed as living idols. But Akhnaton did nothing of the kind, or his enemies would not have omitted to mention it with pious indignation. Not only had he had no quarrel with the living beings which human veneration had set apart as sacred, but perhaps even did he believe that, in the superstition to which they owed such unusual attention, there lay a solid kernel of truth. Whatever might have been the primitive state of religion with which their worship was linked, in the eyes of the mob, they perhaps appeared, in his eyes, as reminders of that great truth, centre of the real religion expounded in his own hymns, namely of the oneness of all life and of the brotherhood of man and beast, united in the common worship of their common Maker, Father and Mother — “the Heat which-is-in-the-Disk.” The silence of Amon’s scribes on their fate during the young Pharaoh’s reign inclines us to believe that they did appear as such to him, and that, thanks to his orders, they lacked neither the food nor the care that they were accustomed to enjoy.

¹ Quoted by Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 5.

This instance, along with the general tone of the hymns, strengthens our conviction that there was a religious meaning in the royal honours given to the Bull of On — the Beast of the Sun, that stood for all the sacred animals, perhaps as the most ancient, surely as the most exalted of them all; a religious meaning which was none other than that which we have tried to make clear.

If that be so — if our interpretation, that is to say, be the right one — then one should consider Akhnaton not merely as the oldest exponent of the rationalism of our age, the first man (at least west of India) to stress the scientific basis of true universal religion, but also as the forerunner of a world far more beautiful and better than our own; as the first prophet of a new order in which not only would there be no distinction between one’s countrymen and foreigners (and no germs of war), but in which the same loving kindness would extend alike to man and to all living creatures.

In fact, we firmly hold that, unless and until man learns to love his dumb brothers as himself, and to respect them, as children and worshippers of the same Father of all life, he will not be able to live at peace with his own species. He must deserve peace before he can enjoy it. And no society which tolerates the shameful exploitation of sentient creatures that cannot retaliate, deserves to remain, itself, unmolested by its stronger, shrewder, and better-equipped human neighbours.

If, as we believe, and as the logical implications of his religion suggest, Akhnaton's "internationalism" and "pacifism" were but a consequence of the broader and more fundamental principle of the brotherhood of living creatures; if his love towards all men proceeded from a deeper love towards all life, then one must hail in him perhaps the most ancient exponent of integral truth — at least the oldest one west of India — and, at the same time, one whose spirit the modern world seems still unable to understand; one from whom the yet unborn generations would do well to learn the way of life.

CHAPTER VII

THE WAY OF BEAUTY

We have tried up till now to show, in the Religion of the Disk, the rare combination of rationalism and love which one seeks in vain in most revealed faiths of later times. And we have seen, in its youthful Founder, that alliance of intellectual genius and of saintliness, perhaps still more rarely witnessed at any epoch in the same individual. A closer study of the hymns and of whatever other evidence is available will further stress that, in him, both the lofty rational thinker and the lover of all life were expressions of the all-round artist, and that the keynote of that particular form of Sun-worship which he evolved — on the basis of half-forgotten memories of an antique cult, as old as the world, and of intuitive anticipations of modern thought — lay in an intense sense of beauty.

The hymns are, before all, songs of praise exalting the beauty of the visible Sun, the splendour of light. “Thou art sparkling; Thou art beautiful and mighty. . . . Thy light of diverse colours bewitcheth all faces”; “Thou vivifiest hearts with Thy beauties which are life,”¹ it is said in the shorter hymn. And in the longer hymn, common are the sentences in the same trend that magnify the Disk in heaven as lovely to look upon: “Thy rising is beautiful in the horizon of heaven, O Aten, ordainer of life.”² . . . “Thou fillest every land with Thy beauty,”³ . . . “Thou art beautiful and great and sparkling and exalted above every land.” . . . “Thou art afar off; but Thy beams are upon the earth; Thou art in their faces; they admire Thy goings”¹ . . . “creatures live through Thee, while their eyes are upon Thy beauty.”

¹ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 117-119.

² Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 123.

³ Longer Hymn, Translation of Griffith, quoted by Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 215.

And not only are such expressions applied to the Sun Himself, but the whole picture of the world pulsating with life and joy under His daily touch — men, bathed and clothed in clean garments, raising their hands in adoration to Him; birds circling round with thrills of joy in the clear morning sky; beasts running and skipping about in fields flooded with light; fishes, whose golden scales shine through the sunlit water as they leap up from the depth, before the rising God; and the tender lilies that open themselves to His fiery kiss and “drink themselves drunk” of warmth, of light, of impalpable effulgences, in the marshes where they bloom — that entire picture, we say, is the inspired vision of an artist which, more than anything else, Akhnaton was.

No less than the perfection of the One God, the hymns exalt the joy of life and the loveliness of the visible world. Life is sweet, in fact, because there is so much beauty all round us. It is a pleasure to have eyes and to behold graceful forms and delicate colours — the green trees and water-reeds, the rich brown earth, the reddish-yellow desert, the blue hills in the distance and, above all, the deep, transparent, boundless, radiant sky, with the flaming Orb — God’s face — “rising, shining, departing afar off and returning”²; to witness the glory of dawn and sunset. It is a pleasure to see happy four-legged creatures stretch out their bodies in the light. It is a pleasure to see a flight of birds sail through the calm, vibrating infinity. It is a pleasure to listen to the noises of life: the song of the crickets, children’s laughter, and the music of the wind in the high trees. It is a pleasure to be alive, for there is beauty in the child, in the beast, in the bird, in the trees — in all that lives; beauty in land, water and sky — in all that is. The emphasis that the young Pharaoh puts on the ravishment of the senses at the sight of daylight — and of all that daylight beautifies — is perhaps equalled only in the masterpieces of Greek literature, centuries later; it forestalls the words so often repeated by the chorus in classical tragedies: “It is sweet to behold the Sun.”

¹ Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 124.

² Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 133.

* * *

One can say of Akhnaton’s whole life that it was an attempt to establish on this earth, here and now, the reign of perfection. His City, as we have seen previously, was to be the City of God, the model of that ideal world which he visualised in his heart and which seems to us, still to-day, so far, far away, so unreal, so impossible. And it was “a place of surpassing beauty,”¹ planned “with delicate taste and supreme elegance.”²

We have already spoken³ of its temples with their successive pillared courts open to the sky; of its fair villas surrounded with palm-groves and flower-beds; of the king’s palace, that exceeded in splendour that in which Amenhotep the Third had spent in Thebes his luxurious days; and of the peaceful gardens — “Precincts of Aton” — that lay to the south, with their colonnaded pavilions, their verdant arbours, their artificial lakes full of lotuses. The very choice of its site, in the eastern half of a broad plain cut in two by the Nile and encircled in a double horizon of mountain-ridges, had been an act of good taste. From the flat roofs of Akhetaton one could see the river shining, to the west, beyond groves and gardens and stretches of green fields. And from the opposite bank onwards, the plain — a narrow ribbon of fertile earth and a wide expanse of desert — unrolled its changing succession of pale or dark colours, finally lost in pink or blue mist, up to the distant hills behind which the Sun would set. To the east, the same broad panorama of rich vegetation, sand and sky extended up to the chalky white cliffs, honeycombed with tombs, that limited the horizon — the hills of rest. At dawn, the western mountains were the first to shine at the touch of the Lord of Rays. And at dusk, the cliffs in the east were the last to reflect the crimson afterglow. Thus the glory of Ra-Horakhti of the Two Horizons was manifested to all the dwellers in His City, as day after day dawned and faded away over the beautiful bay where the place was built. The landscape itself was a hymn and a teaching.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922) p. 175.

² Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), p. 151.

³ In Chapter IV.

The elegant architecture of the houses and villas, of the palace and temples — the sober outlines of light-coloured brick against a clear sky; the harmonious perspectives of pillared porticos and inner halls, with deep contrasts of light and shadow; the imposing profile of the pylons with their flag-staves bearing fluttering pennons of purple; and the airy splendour of the sacred courts with their single altar smoking under the bright sunshine, on a flight of steps — that architecture, we say, was in tune with its natural setting. And the fresh, shady gardens in the neighbourhood of the desert seemed all the more fresh and delightful; and the reddish-yellow sands in the background all the more austere, all the more endless and barren — full of sunshine alone; full of infinite peace. The City was not, as are so many others, a monument of man's domination over nature, and of his pride. It was but a beautiful detail added to the immense landscape, as a permanent offering to the Soul of all beings, the Sun; a monument of worship lying between the silent sands, the majestic River and the radiant sky.

* * *

But it is not only in the emphasis he put in his hymns on the beauty of the Sun-disk; not only in the choice of an inspiring site and in the building of “as fair a city as the world had ever seen”¹ that Akhnaton proves himself an artist in the full sense of the word. The arts held a large place both in his cult and in his life. As far as one can tell from the paintings and reliefs that depict him in familiar attitudes, his days were works of beauty.

As already said, we know hardly anything about the ceremonial of the Religion of the Disk; but we do know that music and singing — and dancing — were an essential part of it. It is written in the shorter hymn that “singing men and singing women and chorus men produce joyful sounds in the Hall of the House of the Benben Obelisk, and in every temple of Akhetaton, the seat of Truth.” In a painting in the tomb of the high-priest Merira, that represents a visit of the king and queen to the main temple of Aton, probably on a festive occasion, one can see a group of blind musicians singing to the accompaniment of a seven-stringed harp. And this is not the only pictorial evidence of musical instruments used in the temples to glorify the One God. Moreover, from the famous stele¹ in which Tutankhamen describes the state of Egypt under the “heretic” Pharaoh, it appears that Akhnaton also maintained a large number of dancers in connection with the service of Aton.²

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 176.

We know, too, that the places of worship which he dedicated, be it in Thebes during the first years of his reign, be it in his sacred City, were richly adorned with frescoes and bas-reliefs and statues, some fragments of which have been found. The temple built as Queen Tiy’s private house of worship, on the occasion of her coming to Akhetaton, and named “Shade of the Sun,” contained statues of the king himself, of Amenhotep the Third, and of the dowager-queen, between the columns that stood on either side of its main court.³ There were statues of the royal couple — or perhaps of Akhnaton with one of his daughters⁴ — in front of each column at the entrance of the pillared portico which led into the smaller temple of Aton, behind the main one. And it is highly probable that, in the shrines dedicated to the memory of the king’s father and to that of his ancestors, Thotmose the Fourth, Amenhotep the Second, etc., statues of those monarchs were to be seen as well as diverse representations of them in colour and relief.

This shows that, rigorously monotheistic as it surely was,

¹ In the Cairo Museum.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 92.

³ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 158.

⁴ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 174.

the Religion of the Disk remained a religion strongly appealing to the senses; one that readily put to contribution all manner of artistic skill, and gave occasion to the greatest display of beauty. Men and women attached to the temples praised the "Lord and Origin of life" in solos and choruses, and on the harp. Sistrums were rattled and drums beaten at certain solemn moments during the ceremonies. And, no doubt also to the accompaniment of music, sacred dancers expressed, in symbolical attitudes and harmoniously suggestive movements, the succession of the seasons or the daily course of the Sun. Akhnaton, so vehemently opposed to any graven or painted representation of God, did not object in the least to the presence in temples of statues of human beings whom he wished to honour, or of fanciful figures, semi-animal, semi-human, such as that remarkable sphinx en relief in his own likeness, familiar to all students of the Tell-el-Amarna art. Any image of God, already sacrilegious in itself by its necessary inadequacy, could tempt the worshipper to forget the Unnameable and Limitless, and to carry his homage to the concrete shape. It was a lie and a danger. While in the portraits in colour or in stone of people destined to be exalted, but not adored, there lay no such falsehood and no such snare. The Pharaoh not only tolerated them, but seems to have encouraged his sculptors to produce them, for the embellishment of the "Houses of Aton." Perhaps, also, did he expect to strengthen the faith of his followers by maintaining them in contact with the long tradition of Egyptian Sun-worship, of which the upstart cult of Amon was, in his eyes, a distortion, and his own Teaching the culmination. That worship had been linked, in the minds of the people, with a religious reverence for the monarch and his line; the fact was not one to be disdained.

Be it so or otherwise, Akhnaton evidently looked upon melodious sounds and rhythmic movements, and colours and forms pleasing to the eye, as powerful means of edification; and he closely associated his rational cult with all the arts. Nothing was more alien to his spirit than that austere puritanism, enemy of dance and music, which so many zealous reformers of various creeds put forward centuries after him, apparently with the purpose of turning the hearts of the faithful away from the world back to God. To him, the visible beauty of the world was god-like; the refined joys of the senses were uplifting to the soul. And the latter-day idea of the opposition of “the world” to God would have seemed to him impious and absurd.

What perhaps characterises Akhnaton the best, besides his uncompromising truthfulness, is the atmosphere of serene beauty in which he seems to have moved in daily life. We have sufficiently stressed the quiet splendour of his material surroundings, the place of the arts in his leisure, and his constant contact with nature, not to have to insist on those points here too elaborately. Yet we cannot help recalling the sets of reliefs in the tomb of Huya which represent the royal family and the dowager-queen feasting, while two string bands play alternately. One of the musical groups consists of “four female performers, the one playing on a harp, the second and third on a lute, and the fourth on a lyre,” while in the other can be distinguished “a large standing lyre, about six feet in height, having eight strings and being played with both hands.”¹ Nor can we refrain from quoting Arthur Weigall’s charming description of another representation of Akhnaton in the privacy of his palace — a picture indeed more eloquent than those of the banquet in honour of Queen Tiy and similar such, for it portrays the king not on any special occasion (on which an unusually lavish display of artistic decorum and extra entertainments might be expected), but simply sitting with his consort and children — and no courtiers — on an ordinary day like any other. “The royal family is shown inside a beautiful pavilion, the roof of which is supported by wooden pillars painted with many colours and having capitals carved in high relief to represent wild geese suspended by their legs and above them branches of flowers. The pillars are hung with garlands of flowers, and from the ceiling there droop festoons of flowers and trailing branches of vines. The roof of the pavilion on the outside is edged by an endless line of gleaming cobras, probably wrought in bronze. Inside this fair arbour stand a group of naked girls playing upon the harp, the lute and the lyre, and no doubt singing to that accompaniment the artless love-songs of the period. Servants are shown attending to the jars of wine which stand at the side of the enclosure. The king is seen leaning back upon the cushions of an armchair. . . . In the fingers of his left hand he idly dandles a few flowers, while with his right hand he languidly holds out a delicate bowl in order that the wine in it may be replenished. This is done by the queen who is standing before him, all solicitous for his comfort. She pours the wine from a vessel, causing it to pass through a strainer before flowing into the bowl. Three little princesses stand nearby: one of them laden with bouquets of flowers, another holding out some sweetmeat upon a dish, and a third talking to her father.”¹

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 156-157.

Here we have one more instance of Akhnaton’s love of every form of sensuous beauty. Both the loveliness of nature and the fine arts were to him a part and parcel of ordinary life no less than of the temple services. They produced something like a rhythmic accompaniment to the simple gestures that we repeat every day; a background on which the most monotonous actions took on a decorous beauty. The sweet-smelling freshness of those pillars festooned with flowers and green leaves, the sight of fair figures and harmonious movements, the soft music, the elegant shape of the cup as well as the taste of the good rich wine, all combined to raise that most ordinary act of quenching his thirst to the level of a higher enjoyment involving the whole being — a moment of beauty. Life was to be a succession of such moments to anyone who, like him, lived it in a spirit of sincerity, of innocence and of understanding; to anyone, that is to say, who knew the value of simple things — of a fiery reflection upon the wall, of a sweet voice, of a child’s smile — as well as of the so-called great ones, and who could constantly feel, as he did, the presence of the divine Disk, with His rays stretched over the world, “encompassing all lands which He hath made,” beautifying, dignifying, sanctifying the humblest manifestations of everyday existence.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 145-146.

The things which, in our age of specialized activities might appear as trifles when connected with the life of a philosopher and of a prophet, did not seem so to him. From the pictures we have of him, it is visible that he brought in the care of his person, and particularly of his dress, an eagerness that numbers of later saintly teachers would have disdained. Not only was he scrupulously clean — as was all the aristocracy of Egypt — but he knew what to wear, and how to wear it. The exquisite painted relief in the Berlin Museum, in which one sees him smelling a bunch of flowers, and the picture in the tomb of Merira which shows him burning perfumes at the altar of the Sun,¹ speak eloquently of the supreme elegance of his attire. Save on very special occasions, he seems to have discarded the abundant display of jewels customary to other Pharaohs, and in those two pictures, as in many others, he is portrayed wearing none at all. His only ornaments are the soft pleats of his garment itself — a simple white skirt of fine linen, that hangs gracefully from the waist, with a long purple sash. And the garment seems to have no other function but to underline the natural grace of the body.

Commenting upon the portrait in the Berlin Museum just referred to, Professor H. R. Hall rightly remarks that there is in it a delicacy only to be found in the best productions of Greek sculpture.² We may add, turning our attention from that one among many masterpieces of the Tell-el-Amarna school to the model who inspired it, that Akhnaton’s passionate love of tangible beauty, of sunshine and of healthy joy, such as it is expressed both in his poems, in his cult and in his person, makes him, perhaps, the first illustrious individual embodiment of that very ideal of art and life which the Hellenes were to put forward, as a nation, a thousand years after him. We can say more: his ideal of integral, harmonised perfection, in which the physical side of things was not to be under-estimated — in which even such details as the pleats of a drapery had their importance — contrasts with the contempt of the body shown, not only by the early Christians, but by some of the most prominent Neo-platonists,¹ and also, strange as it may seem, by the bitterest and most determined champion of Hellenic culture against growing Christianity, Emperor Julian.² It may be declared, without fear of anachronism, that however great they were, those men were far less “Greek” — in the classical sense of the word — than the young king of the Nile Valley who died two hundred years before the Achaeans besieged Troy.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 143.

² H. R. Hall: Ancient History of the Near East (Ninth Edit. 1936), p. 305.

* * *

A lover of sensuous beauty Akhnaton was indeed, and to the utmost. But he did not stop there. From the happy awareness of colour, line and movement, of touch, of sound, of fragrance, he lifted himself, as we know, to the subtler plane of abstract relations and finally to the realisation of the all-pervading oneness of the supreme entity: the Power within the Sun.

We need not here expatiate on the great principles on which his creed was based, principles of which modern science has confirmed the amazing accuracy: the ultimate equivalence of all forms of energy, and the ultimate identity of Energy and Matter. As most if not all ideas of genius, these appear to have resulted from some direct insight into truth, which it is not possible to account for either by the data of external experience available at the time, or by the ordinary means of discursive reasoning. And what the hymns tell us plainly, and what the pictures suggest to us of Akhnaton’s extreme sensitiveness to beauty, makes us think of the fundamental connection between scientific enlightenment and artistic inspiration, put forward so forcefully, nowadays, in autobiographical essays, by eminent creative scientists.³ The knowledge which the Pharaoh expressed by calling the “Lord of Rays” also “Great One of roarings” (or thunders) and by identifying the “Heat-and-light-within-the-Disk” with the Disk itself, came to him, it would seem, as all great ideas do to their discoverers, namely, through some spontaneous intuition following a long period of subconscious preparation. And if, in most cases, the aesthetic element plays a notable part in the discovery of truth; if a particular solution of a mathematical problem, or a particular explanation of physical data, seems to draw the mind to it by its very simplicity and elegance, then we can all the more safely conjecture that the young author of the Hymns and inspirer of the Tell-el-Amarna school of art was urged to put forth his hypothesis of universal oneness partly, if not solely, for the beauty of the endless horizons it opened to his vision; for the impressive harmony it brought into his conception of things.

¹ See The Life of Plotinus, by his disciple Porphyry.

² Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Vol. II (Everyman’s Library), p. 349.

³ For instance, by H. Poincaré, Science et Méthode (Chap. III, pp. 50-59); La Science et l’Hypothèse, p. 186.

His preparation was that very quest for the perfect that appears to have possessed him all his life, the “perfect” being, in his eyes, primarily, that which would totally satisfy his aesthetic sense: flawless beauty. And the consciousness of the unity of all forms of energy in the intangible Soul of the Sun — of the unity of all appearances in the One Reality — seems to have come to him as the sharp, direct feeling of a perfect pattern, half-hidden by the necessary limitations of material existence. It was the vision of an immense orderly scheme, remarkable by its stately simplicity; the product of his own mind, no doubt, but destined, one day, to prove objective. It was, actually, the vision of the permanent underlying beauty of the Universe, to which an all-round artist could alone have access.

Thus Akhnaton loved the world of forms because it is beautiful, and, through it, soon grasped and loved the eternal beauty of the unseen world of essences. The splendour of the Disk that rises and sets led him to the worship of the “Ka” of the Disk, the supreme Essence. When, a thousand years later, Plato put forward, in immortal language, his famous dialectic of love — the glorious ascension of the enraptured soul from beautiful forms to beautiful Ideas, everlasting prototypes of all that appears for a while in the phenomenal play — he expressed nothing else but that which the youthful Founder of the Religion of the Disk had once realised, lived and taught.

* * *

Not only does the king's insight into the nature of the physical world seem to spring mainly from an innate yearning for the beautiful, but his belief in the oneness of life — that truth at the back of his whole scale of values — has apparently the same origin.

The hymns tell the beauty of the Sun and the joy of all creatures at His sight. The works of the Tell-el-Amarna school — of those artists whom Akhnaton had “taught to look at the world in the spirit of life”¹ — show us what the beauty of creatures meant both to the disciples and to the Master. The happy scenes of animal and plant life, such as, for instance, those depicted on the pavements of the king's palace,² have more than a decorative value. They preach the love of living beings for the sake of that beauty which shines in even the meanest among them. They remind us what a masterpiece of the supreme Artist is a quadruped, or a butterfly; a poppy; even a blade of grass; and they prompt us to love the graceful innocent things which only wish to live and enjoy the daylight: the young calf frisking in the sunshine, the wild geese, the fish that leap up from the depth to greet the Sun, the spotless lilies. At the sight of those representations, the modern man recalls the passage which Coleridge puts in the mouth of his “Ancient Mariner,” gazing at the water-snakes:

“O happy living things! no tongue
Their beauty might declare . . .”

Those were the words of a poet who, in the midst of the tragically man-ridden world that we know too well, found in his heart a glimpse of eternal truth. But here, in the scattered evidence which enables one to rediscover the spirit of the Religion of the Disk, we have that same truth expressed under the inspiration of one who endeavoured to remodel the world on the basis of it, and who lost an empire for its sake.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 181.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 178.

For, as we have already stressed, Akhnaton's conscientious objection to war which brought both the end of Egyptian domination in Syria and, indirectly, the downfall of the cult of Aton in Egypt, seems to have been but one aspect of his objection to the infliction of suffering in general. And in the light of all that we know of him through his poems, we may, it seems, safely say that the main source of his love for living beings, from man to plant, and the main reason for him to wish to spare them, lay in his intense awareness of the beauty of life as such. He saw in every sentient creature, patiently brought forth from an obscure germ by the action of divine Heat and Light and graced with all the loveliness of its species, a work of art far too precious to be destroyed or spoilt for the sake of sport or vain glory — even for the sake of “national interest.” And that is apparently why we find, during his reign, neither records of chase nor accounts of battle.

It would seem that he had little time for such “grim beauty” as painters and poets have sometimes tried to bring out of scenes of horror. And that confirms our view that visible beauty, however important in his eyes, was not all to him. Beyond it — and through it — he sought that permanent harmony between fact and thought, action and ideal, existence and essence; that subtler beauty which cannot be discovered from a superficial view of things, and which is the essence of goodness. A scene of horror can only be beautiful seen in its outlines or from a distance. Once one stoops to examine the details that go to make it, one finds that it implies too much ugliness to be described as such. Nothing which presupposes the distortion of living forms through pain can be styled as beautiful, for in healthy sentient life lies the actual masterpiece of universal Energy and the supreme beauty.

Here we may remark that, for Akhnaton as for the greatest artist among Greek philosophers, more than ten centuries after him, the Beautiful and the Good were closely interrelated, if not identical. But instead of saying, as Plato was to do, that “the Beautiful is the radiance of the Good,” it seems, from the idea that we can form of him, that the young Prophet of the Sun would have said that the Good is that which is consistently beautiful. Strictly speaking, it is correct to assert, with several modern authors, that there is no reference to morality in Akhnaton’s Teaching and that, to him, that which is was right.¹ On the other hand, it would be unfair to the Religion of the Disk not to admit that, though it put forth no list of commandments and prohibitions, it had nevertheless a close connection with action. And the practical side of it appears to have rested entirely upon an aesthetic basis. Moral values were, it seems, to Akhnaton, but the highest among aesthetic values. In other words, beauty was, in his eyes, the ultimate criterion of moral as well as of intellectual truth,² and the safest guide to the discovery of both.

* * *

We can thus characterise the Religion of the Disk as a religion of beauty. Whatever it be in addition to that, springs from that fundamental aspect of it. In particular, its three negative features which we have pointed out in a previous chapter — namely, the absence in it of any mythology whatsoever; the absence of any account of supernatural happenings; and the absence of any explicit theory of the next world, marks of rationality to be found in very few other religions if in any at all — seem partly ascribable to a consistently “pagan” spirit. Mythological symbolism was superfluous; the facts of the physical world were beautiful enough to stand at the background of any solemn cult and to inspire any sensitive soul. Nature was beautiful enough, without man craving for the supernatural. And this life, here and now, was beautiful enough for one to live it with all one’s concentrated interest, drawing from it its daily joys and its daily teachings, without seeking to pierce the mystery of the great beyond. At the most, as we have seen, we find, in the prayer on Akhnaton's coffin and in the inscriptions in the tombs of his followers, the idea of a prolongation of individual existence in a blissful state of subtler materiality in which one would still enjoy the sight of the Sun. That is all. The Founder of the Aton cult could not imagine anything more beautiful than the resplendent fact of our parent star. That was the visible expression of the One God. To contemplate it was paradise. To understand the nature of its radiance and its relation to ourselves and to all things was to experience everlasting life. To worship It in truth (i.e., in the proper spirit) was to attain the goal of man — the goal of life. And through the overwhelming appeal of sensuous beauty, that goal was within our reach, and paradise was here. It was perhaps beyond the grave also; but it was here already, on this side of the eternal gates. For, to Akhnaton, bliss seems to have been nothing else but the state in which the fact of unmixed beauty fills one's consciousness — as when one beholds the Sun in the manner he did.

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 120.

² See above, p. 170.

There is, no doubt, as we have said, much more in the hymns than a mere physical enjoyment of the Sun. But a thrill of well-being — intensely physical indeed — at the contact of light, of warmth and of happy living nature; a feeling of plenitude at the sight of the loveliness of the visible world is surely there, at the root of all subsequent idealism. The repeated praise of the sweetness of sunshine; the choice of expressions that suggest, in the most various creatures, an exaltation of all their being at the appearing of the Sun; the predominant idea of universal fecundity, expressed in different pictures of appealing beauty; all go to confirm, in those poems, that essentially pagan joy which we have mentioned above. We use here the word “pagan” in its noblest sense, suggesting thereby how much the inspired king stands, in our eyes, as an upholder of that ideal of healthy, joyful, sensuous perfection — and also of clear rational thinking — towards which Greece and the whole Mediterranean world have strived, long after him, in their days of glory; how much he appears to us, nay, as the historic forerunner of classical Hellas, at least as we imagine it.

He is, we have said, nearer to the Greek ideal, rooted in the depth of his aesthetic nature, than many of those who have claimed, in course of centuries, an unflinching allegiance to Hellenism. What is remarkable is that, from that very sensitiveness to beauty, he seems to have received the impulse that carried him far beyond the stage of experience that corresponds, historically, to Hellenism; far beyond that also, attained, in the name of Christianity and of modern humanitarianism, by people only too aware of the limitations of classical pagan culture.

The love implied in his songs is not that unjustified interest in our species before all others, preached by most of the creeds which have transcended the national and mainly ritualistic religions of antiquity. It springs from the consciousness of the brotherhood of all beings to whom the Sun gives life and loveliness. It is the truly universal love in the light of which the superstition of the chosen species appears as puerile and barbaric as that of the chosen nation; the love for the beast, the fish, the plant, no less than for man, clearly put forward by none of the living religions of the world save a few of those evolved in India or derived from Indian teachings. But while, in those doctrines, such love seems based upon metaphysical considerations or upon moral principles, it appears to be, in the Religion of the Disk, the immediate spontaneous outcome of an overwhelming sense of the beauty of life. If indeed, as for Akhnaton, beauty be the final measure of all values, then surely man is not the centre of the universe and the focus of all desirable activity; for the other children of the life-giving God are as lovely as he, if not more, in their absolute innocence.

* * *

Thus the aesthetic attitude towards life which the modern man, badly acquainted as he generally is with a remoter past, is inclined to style as "hellenic," can lead a true worshipper of beauty — as it did, in fact, lead Akhnaton — to that truly universal love which neither Greek nor Christian consciousness seems to have realised, save occasionally.

Ever since the bitter struggle between the eminently artistic and rational spirit of Hellenism and eminently humanitarian Christianity, in the early centuries of the most widely accepted western era, the best minds of the West, from the author of the “Stromata” onwards, have been yearning for the synthesis which would unite the excellences of the complementary wisdoms. Possibly also, in other areas of culture, the need of a similar synthesis has been experienced between old thought-currents, each one expressing separately the everlasting ideals of aesthetic perfection, of intellectual efficiency and of kindness that knows no limits.

The Religion of the Disk, with its joyous intoxication of sunshine and tangible beauty, finally leading to a most rational outlook on the universe and to the love of all forms of life, seems to provide an answer to the age-long yearning for something that would satisfy all sides of our nature at the same time. The inspiration that fills it is perhaps of the only sort that can lift us to heaven without detaching us from this lovely and lovable earth. And whatever be one’s opinion of him on other points, one has to admit that we do find combined in its Founder — indissolubly blended into one blissful awareness of dancing harmony, in the midst of full-blooming life — the best of the ideal Athenian, more than a thousand years before Plato, and the best of the ideal Indian, some nine centuries before the Buddha.

CHAPTER VIII

THE IMPLICATIONS OF THE RELIGION OF THE DISK

One of the most frequent criticisms brought against the Religion of the Disk by modern authors is that it is devoid of the sense of righteousness. Sir Wallis Budge writes plainly that “no consciousness of sin is expressed in any Aten text now known, and the hymns to Aten contain no petition for spiritual enlightenment, understanding or wisdom.”¹ In another passage, after comparing Aton to Varuna as described in the Rig-Veda, he adds: “But Varuna possessed one attribute which, so far as we know, is wanting in the Aten: he spied out sin, and judged the sinner.”² And J. H. Breasted, though, contrarily to Budge, he on the whole admires the Teaching, tells us that “our surviving sources for the Aton faith do not disclose a very spiritual conception of the deity, nor any attribution to him of ethical qualities beyond those which Ra had long been supposed to possess. Our sources do not show us that the king had perceptibly risen from a discernment of the beneficence to a conception of the righteousness in the character of God, nor of His demand for this in the character of men.”³ There is hardly anyone but Sir Flinders Petrie and A. Weigall who seem fully to appreciate the “great change” which marks Akhnaton’s reign “in ethics also,”⁴ and to recognise the practical value of the Teaching put forward in the hymns, in the tomb inscriptions of Tell-el-Amarna, and

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 115.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 114.

³ J. H. Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 120. Similar criticism is made by J. D. S. Pendlebury in Tell-el-Amarna (Edit. 1935), pp. 156-157 and p. 160.

⁴ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 218. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 152.

in the luminous instance of Akhnaton's life as a ruler and as a man.

Yet even Weigall, when comparing the Religion of the Disk with Christianity, is prompted to state that "this comparison must of necessity be unfavourable to the Pharaoh's creed, revealing, as it does, its shortcomings."¹ This opinion, so entirely different from ours, springs eventually from that idea, more strongly expressed by other authors, that the consciousness of evil is lacking in the Religion of Aton.

It is a fact that in the existing documents relating to the Teaching, there is no exhaustive list of commandments and prohibitions, no precise rules — no rules at all — for the guidance of the disciple's life, such as one finds in the sacred books of most religions. There is no mention of a distributive Justice, and it is possible, even probable, that Akhnaton disbelieved "in the dogma of rewards for the righteous and punishments for the evil-doers."² There is, indeed, nowhere the slightest hint at the existence of a positive Power of evil, age-old Antagonist of a beneficent God and master of deceit, as the Satan of the Bible; nowhere the slightest awareness of what later ethical religions have styled as "sin" — i.e., the transgression of God's orders. Akhnaton's God gave no orders. He is an "amoral" God. We must remember that He is not a man; nor a being superior to man who made man in his likeness. He is the immanent Power within all things; the Source of life — not a person; the One indefinable Principle that burns in heat, shines in light, roars and sings in sound, moves through matter as electricity; the Principle that exists at the root of the ultimate unity of existence. Can such a God be reduced to our petty standards? Can He be "good" or "bad" at our scale? — be "moral" or "immoral"? No immanent God can be. To no God who bears to the physical universe the intimate relation which Akhnaton's "Shu-within-the-Disk" bears to it, can be ascribed a moral personality. His consciousness, if any, is not a personal one. His love for His creatures is as indiscriminate as the warmth of the Sun-beams, that radiate both over the good and over the wicked. The idea of a distributive Justice is a human idea — not God’s concern. Morality is in us; not in Him.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 127.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 95.

* * *

Should then a follower of Akhnaton take the easy course of doing just what he pleases?

The Founder of the Religion of the Disk insisted upon “life in truth.” “There is in his Teaching, as it is fragmentarily preserved in his hymns and in the tomb-inscriptions of his nobles, a constant emphasis upon ‘truth’ such as is not found before or since,” says Breasted.¹ He called himself “Ankh-em-Maat” — “the One-who-lives-in-Truth.” But what is truth? “Maat,” writes that learned scholar in hieroglyphics whom we have many times quoted, Sir Wallis Budge, “means what is straight, true, real, law, both physical and moral, the truth, reality, etc.”² By “living in truth” the king, adds he, “can hardly have meant ‘living in or by the law,’ for he was a law to himself. But he may have meant that in Atenism he had found the truth or the ‘real’ thing, and that all else, in religion, was a phantom, a sham. Aten lived in maat, or in truth and reality, and the king, having the essence of Aten in him, did the same.”³

If this interpretation of maat be the right one, then it appears that a man’s behaviour should be, in Akhnaton’s eyes, inspired by the knowledge of the few facts and the acceptance of the few supreme values which form, as we have seen, the solid background of the Aton faith. These facts were the oneness of the ultimate essence, and the unity of all life, its manifold and ever-changing expression; the fatherhood of the Sun and, through Him, of the Power within Him — Cosmic Energy — and the subsequent brotherhood of all living creatures, not of man alone; the unity of the visible and of the invisible world, of the physical — the material — and of the more subtle, as put forward in the identity of the fiery Disk with the Heat and Light within it. In other words, they were the few general truths which modern research is gradually confirming, and which would still satisfy, it seems, the thinking men of the remotest ages to come. The Religion was the only true religion, and “all but it was a phantom, a sham,” in the sense that it was not a particular creed, with undeniable religious appeal but, also, with necessary limitations destined to become more and more apparent as centuries would pass; not a religion among many, but the framework from which no teaching could seriously depart if it was to be absolutely universal, and to stand victoriously the test of time. It set forth no commandments; it had no catalogue of “dos” and “don’ts.” Yet it could be, and was, a guide to behaviour, for the reason that our behaviour is the outcome of what we are — that is to say, of what we know and of what we love. The Religion of the Disk was based upon the intuitive knowledge of this harmonious universe, dominated (at our scale at least) by the Sun, our “Father and Mother,” and upon the love of its beauty. He who possessed these needed no commandments in order to live according to the Master’s standards — in harmony with the beautiful world, in harmony with life, with his own deeper nature; “in truth.”

¹ J. H. Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 120.

² Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 86.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 86-87.

The visible universe obeys laws — those great cosmic laws, of whatever nature they be, that bring into it that majestic order of which the trained human mind can catch a glimpse; the laws that rule the course of the stars and the play of matter. The invisible world, likewise, has its laws of action and reaction, no less true. He who wishes to “live in truth” should not only think of those divine unwritten laws “both physical and moral,” and act rationally, in small things as well as in great ones, but strive to reflect, at his scale, the beauty of the sunlit earth and the impartial kindness of the Power within the Sun. He should love all creatures as himself — as He loves them, Whose rays cause them to live. He should do no harm to them under any pretext; injury to the humblest beast or bird, on the part of a rational being who should know better, is an insult to the Lord of life, a sacrilege. But that is not enough; he should help them to live and to be happy; to enjoy the light and heat of the common Father and render praise to Him, each one in the manner of its species. He can only be fully rational — in tune with the higher ends of his nature — if he be actively loving, and beneficent to all that lives, as Akhnaton himself, judged by the spirit of his beautiful hymns, appears to have been.

One must remark that this faithfulness to a divine pattern, this feeling of the beauty and importance of life, this active, impartial beneficence were not ordered by the young king as befitting a true follower of his Teaching. They were part and parcel of the personality of whoever was fit to be a disciple. And the Teaching was wasted upon those who, by nature, did not possess a sufficient sensitiveness and a sufficient intelligence to be already inclined that way, in their better moments at least. This is perhaps one of the reasons why Akhnaton seems to have actually preached his doctrine only to a very few people. By the nature of the worship it involved, the Religion of the Disk was, as we have said, suitable to all creatures, from the superman down to the sunflower. But in its practical implications it supposed such a degree of inborn refinement that, far from being applicable to all men, it was, and probably will always remain, a Teaching for the elite. Its morality, essentially aesthetic, and therefore aristocratic, was too free and too generous for the many to understand — a reason why the Aton faith has so often been characterised in our times as entirely “amoral.”

There appears to be some ambiguity about the word “morality.” What commonly passes off as such would be better described as obedience to the rules of some definite society at a definite stage of development; to police regulations in the broader sense. According to that popular conception, what one does is more important than what one is; what one is only matters inasmuch as it cannot but determine what one thinks and feels, and ultimately what one does, when left to one’s self. And what one has to do or not to do is decided by the requirements of the community to which one belongs. In all successful religions, the list of “moral” commandments and prohibitions is intimately linked up with the idea of community, of society; and its practical stability depends upon its susceptibility of receiving various interpretations as the conception of society changes with time and place. Its aim is mainly to make each one of the faithful the worthy member of a human group, or of several broadening human groups — family, tribe or caste, nation, race, humanity.

In the Religion of the Disk, there was no such conception of gregarious obligations. It was not a religion fitting the members of any particular group at any particular epoch; it was the Teaching suited to the fully-conscious individual, in love with the beauty of the Sun and aware, through Him, of his personal relationship to the whole of living creation. The fully-conscious individual — of which the Founder of the religion is himself a luminous prototype — has transcended the bondage of all arbitrary communities. He is actually the member of no group, save of the totality of sentient individuals of all races and species. He owes allegiance to the Father of life alone. He fulfils the “duties” that other men recognise towards their narrow groups, but not for the same reasons nor in the same spirit as they; whenever those duties do not clash with the broader and more fundamental obligation of love towards all life, he fulfils them, in the very name of that deeper obligation. In other cases he does not look upon them as duties. The natural law of his being is the only law of his conduct. And his conduct is consistent with a norm of inner beauty never approached by any group-regulations, precisely because his being has attained the elegance of natural honesty, natural courage and natural kindness. He can do what he pleases, and remain an exponent of reason and of love; nay, indeed, it is only by acting thus, according to his own law, that he is able to remain so; for love and reason are at the root of his being, and he is aware of it.

Breasted says, in his comment on the meaning of “life in truth,” that for Akhnaton “what was right, and its propriety was evident by its very existence.”¹ Surely the learned historian does not intend to say that, to the young

¹ J. H. Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 120.

Pharaoh — who himself acted so differently from others in his private and public life — all that it was the custom to do was right, simply because people did it; still less that, in his eyes, all that a man did was right, just because it had been possible for him to do it. This would be absurd. The king's life-long struggle against organised superstition, and his strange attitude in front of the political "realities" of his age, prove sufficiently that he did not accept any established tradition as a criterion of right and wrong. And his indignant letter to Aziru, on the murder of one of his most faithful vassals, preserved to posterity in his diplomatic correspondence, shows well that no action became justified, in his eyes, on the sole ground of being a fait accompli. To him, all that was, in the ordinary sense — all that had happened, or that generally used to happen — was not necessarily right. But what was absolutely, in the religious sense; that is to say, what was always and everywhere; what was, in the estimation of the higher consciousness, more subtle, more acute, more farseeing than the ordinary — the consciousness of cosmic truth, physical and moral — that was right, and that alone.

* * *

From the previous remarks we should, it seems, conclude that though it comprised no particular series of commandments and prohibitions as most other religions do, the Aton faith was far from being without any definite moral implications. That these concerned what one was to be, more than what one was to do; that they pointed out to the spirit in which one was to act, more than to one's action itself, only stresses all the more their truly ethical character. For if there be a fundamental difference between genuine morality and glorified police regulations, it lies no doubt in the flexibility and freedom of moral actions, compared with those ruled by written law or by custom. A really moral action — or abstention — is a work of art in which the whole personality of the agent is involved, a creation stamped with individuality. The action resulting from mere obedience to precise imperatives is not. Anybody can blindly move according to well-formulated dictates. It is not up to everyone to reflect the serene beauty of the Father of Life; to radiate love — to live in truth. The actual saints of all religions have consciously or unconsciously striven to do so, while average men have always been impressed by the letter of moral injunctions rather than by their spirit.

The real difference between the Religion of the Disk and most other faiths is that, while the latter have provided strict rules of conduct for every person who wishes to adhere to them, Akhnaton's Teaching has not. It merely created an aesthetic atmosphere in which the sensitive soul could easily lift itself towards the everlastingly beautiful, that is both the true and the good. It set forth an object of inspiration — life; and an object of worship — the Sun, source of life — such as whoever loved these with all his senses, with all his heart and all his intellect, would automatically be the most virtuous of men. But it did not go down into details, and tell the disciple what to do or not to do in every particular circumstance of his life. That was left to his own ability for grasping moral truth: that is to say, finally, to a sort of aesthetic intuition. The Aton faith was, as we have already said, an aristocratic one. It ignored the average man with his blunt senses, his awareness to immediate gains and losses, his naturally narrow outlook. It ignored the precise, trivial, compelling necessities of organised society. Those alone could be Akhnaton's disciples who needed not explicit "dos" and "don'ts" in order to be truthful, courageous and kind; those who can be described as "the saints" in opposition to the rank-and-file "sinners"; the elite, in opposition to the general herd of mediocre liars and cowards, too weak even to be consistently bad.

This brings us back to one of our remarks in a previous chapter — namely, that the Religion of the Disk was an expression of the very essence of true religion in the most harmonious language of reason and beauty, rather than a particular creed. We can say of its ethical side something similar to that which we have said of its philosophy: it was, as put forward in the famous royal motto, "living in Truth," the essence of moral life, independent of man-made codes of morals, and freed from the fear of hell-fire no less than from that of human sanctions. Akhnaton gave out no commandments, just as he proclaimed no dogmas. The few who were able to enter the spirit of his Teaching needed none. And those who lacked that sort of aesthetic sense which alone enables one to grasp vital cosmic values, would not have been actually “living in truth” even if, with the help of a moral code, they had been doing all that a true disciple of the young king should do — any more than a man with no taste can become an artist just by following all the technical rules of an art.

* * *

If anything can rouse in a man that yearning to live in harmony with eternal values that dominate him, it is surely not the tedious observance of duties imposed upon him, once and for all, by law or by custom. But it may be the glowing example of a superior individual. All the great teachers of the world — the founders of lastingly successful religions — seem to have been far greater by the personal example they have set than by the precepts they have left, however sublime these be.

The absence of explicit precepts, easily applicable to every circumstance of life, was perhaps (just as the other negative features which we have mentioned in a previous chapter) one of the traits of profound rationality which prevented the Aton faith from remaining an organised religion. While the example of its Founder stands for ever to inspire all those who believe that ceremonial alone should be organised, real religion being essentially personal — and unorganisable. The ethics of the Religion of the Disk were based, we said, upon cosmic values (not merely social ones). One should add that they were based upon cosmic values as realised by one exceptional man. The historic figure of Akhnaton dominated them even still more, perhaps, than it did the other aspects of the Teaching, all of which are inseparable from it. The one duty which the disciples readily accepted was to imitate him whom they called the “Bright Image of the Sun,” the “Son of the Living Aton, like unto Him forever.” And that would be, it seems, the only duty to propose to any man who might wish, in the future, to revive the thirty-three-hundred-year-old religion of love and reason, and make the young Prophet of the Sun, once more, a living force in our world. By imitating him we mean not servilely copying his actions, but imbibing the spirit in which he lived; developing in one’s self the characteristic features of his personality: uncompromising truthfulness, perfect sincerity, allied to the rare courage to stick to what one knows to be right, even at the cost of the highest worldly interests; and along with that, loving kindness, extended to all creatures.

In the tomb of Ay, one of his nobles, one finds in an inscription the words: “He” (Akhnaton) “put truth into me, and my abomination is to lie.” It is difficult to say, in the light of Ay’s subsequent career, how far this assertion was genuine on his part. But it does express the ideal attitude of a disciple of the young king. All wrong, in Akhnaton’s eyes, was but a lie under some form or another; a denial of the positive law of eternal life, which is love; a denial of man’s deeper self, which is in tune with the Cosmos, not at war with it. The follower of the Religion of the Disk had really but to seek the truth of his deeper self, and to live up to it in full sincerity. The example of the Master showed him how beautiful could be the life of a man who did so.

* * *

The importance of Akhnaton himself as a living illustration of his Teaching cannot be overestimated. He was, it seems, fully conscious of it when, in his hymns, he gave to posterity such sentences as the following: “I am Thy Son, satisfying Thee, exalting Thy name. Thy strength and Thy power are established in my heart; Thou art the living Disk; eternity is Thine emanation (or attribute). . . .” “He” (i.e., Aton, the One God) “hath brought forth His honoured Son, Ua-en-ra (the Only One of the Sun) like His own form, never ceasing so to do. The Son of Ra supporteth His beauties”¹; or when he wrote the significant passage already quoted: “Thou art in my heart. There is no other who knoweth Thee except Thy Son Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra (Beautiful Essence of the Sun, Only One of the Sun). Thou hast made him wise to understand Thy plans and Thy power”²; or the following words, still more strange at first sight: “Every man who (standeth on his) feet since Thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, Thou hast raised up for Thy Son who came forth from Thy body, the King of the South and the North, Living in Truth, Lord of Crowns, Aakhun-Aten, great in the duration of his life (and for) the Royal Wife, great in majesty, Lady of the Two Lands, Nefer-neferu-Aten Nefertiti, living (and) young for ever and ever.”³

These bold statements of his relationship to God cannot be understood in their proper sense unless one replaces them in their context, that is to say, in the whole system of ideas at the basis of the Religion of the Disk; especially unless one connects them with that hardly less bold assertion that the “Heat-and-light-within-the-Disk” and the Disk itself — Energy and Matter — are one. This having been proved correct as a result of modern scientific speculations (correct, at least, in the manner of an hypothesis which does actually account for the known facts) cannot be called “dogma.” Yet, religiously speaking, as we have previously tried to explain,⁴ it argues the substantial unity of God (an impersonal God, of course) and Nature, visible and invisible; the existence of the same unchangeable Thing — divine Energy — at the bottom of all things visible and invisible, material and immaterial, which change everlastingly. In other words, for as much as one is able to infer from the hymns — his only surviving works — Akhnaton’s Teaching seems to have been founded on an implicit if not explicit pantheistic monism.

¹ Shorter Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 120.

² Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 134.

³ Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 135.

⁴ In Chapter V.

As we have already endeavoured to make clear in a former chapter,¹ the young king's claim to be the Son of God (without his pretending, as other Pharaohs, to have been miraculously conceived from any particular deity) was nothing but the expression of the total consciousness he had of the presence of the ultimate Essence of all things within him; the assertion, repeated at various epochs, by the author of the Chandogya Upanishad and by the fully "realised" souls of all the world, that he "was That."

What we wish to stress here is that, though he found nowhere around him anyone who possessed, like him, the knowledge of the Unchangeable within the transient, of Godhead within nature and within man, he was aware that this direct, sensuous, so as to say, experience of oneness was the goal of created life. And he was aware that he himself, who had reached it, stood apart from the average man — as far apart from him, indeed, as he from the crowd of still less awakened sentient beings, if not further; apart from him, and yet linked up with him, as each definitely superior species is linked up with the less conscious ones that precede and condition its coming into being. He was a man — physically conceived and born as all men — and yet more than a man. He was, not merely in name but in fact, the Beautiful-Essence-of-the-Sun, since he felt that Essence, that indefinable Energy, running through his nerves; the Only-One-of-the-Sun, since he alone was aware of the real nature of the fiery Disk, while other creatures, though worshipping It, knew It but dimly or not at all; Akhnaton — the Joy of the Sun — since every new step towards more complete consciousness brought new joy (experience had taught him that), and since the Soul of the Sun, which is the Soul of the Universe — the One without second² — became fully conscious of Itself within him; the Son of God, Who was alone to know His Father. As the visible Disk and the invisible, intangible "Heat and Light," the Energy within it, were one, so was he one with that same all-pervading Radiant Energy experienced within him. And he knew it. His nerves knew it. His body — an atom of matter finally tracing its origin to our parent star (like all matter on earth) — was aware of the Power within its depth; of its soul, which is none but the Sun's own Essence, which is God. God and created nature were one in him, Akhnaton, precisely because he was not, by a miraculous birth, set apart from nature, but was a man naturally conceived and born and reared. They were all the more one because he was, also, a man who, with both his exceptional intellectual gifts and his clear insight into eternal truth beyond the reach of pure intellect, lived to the full the happy natural life of all creatures. On the other hand, he could and he did live the natural life of the body and of the mind in perfect beauty and "in truth," only because he fully knew the higher meaning of it; because he was a "realised soul," a perfect Individual — a Son of God.

¹ Chapter V, pp. 119-120.

² "Ekam adityam" in the Sanskrit Scriptures.

* * *

Now, perhaps, we can venture to explain what appears to be the strangest of those assertions of Akhnaton's divinity, to which scholars hardly ever refer in their comments on his religion save, at most, like Sir Wallis Budge, in a spirit of biased criticism which misses the point. The statement we are thinking of is the last one quoted in a preceding paragraph: "Every man who (standeth on his) feet, since Thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, Thou hast raised up for Thy Son who came forth from Thy body, the King of the South and the North, living in Truth, etc. . . . and for the Royal Wife, great in majesty, Lady of the Two Lands, Nefer-neferu-Aten Nefertiti, living and young for ever and ever."¹

Taken literally, this would seem to indicate that Akhnaton believed all men to have been born and to have lived for himself and for his consort, from the dawn of the human race onwards, which is obviously not what he intended to say. But if, as we have tried to show above, the young Pharaoh was aware at the same time of his divinity as a fully conscious centre of Cosmic Energy and of his humanity as one who had human parents; and if, in his eyes, to reach that total consciousness of the divine within one's self was to exhaust the highest possibilities of our species (becoming one's self, so as to say, the culmination of it), then the amazing passage appears in a new light. It has a meaning, and a lofty one, too. It signifies that since the time, far-gone indeed, when God did "lay the foundation of the earth," the whole scheme of life has been steadily tending towards the creation of its supreme type: the God-conscious and therefore godlike human being — the Son of God. It means that every individual man was born with latent possibilities of Godhead which he would generally not feel at all, or feel more or less dimly; which he would perhaps try to express, in art and life, but which the fully conscious superman alone — the cosmic Individual, God and himself in one — was destined to carry to their utmost realisation. And that Individual, aware of his real nature and "living in Truth"; that eternal Man in whose heart were "established" the "strength and the power" of the living Disk, was himself, the "King of the South and the North, Lord of Crowns" — Akhnaton of Egypt, son of Amenhotep Neb-maat-ra, a very definite figure in time and space. He knew none who had, in his days or before, attained to a similar consciousness of their identity with the Soul of the Sun. And we, who have heard the names of several very ancient sages said to have realised Godhead within themselves, know not if they actually flourished before or after him, for their lives are not dated. It may be that some of them indeed preceded him in time. It may be that many more, of whom nobody has heard, preceded them. It may be also that Akhnaton was, in fact, the first man to realise "in his heart," to the full, the presence of that same hidden Energy which radiates in the Sun-disk — that he was the forerunner, in a way, of a new species, superior to man. He is, at least, the first such one whose life can be followed step by step, with historical certitude, and dated with an approximation of but a few years.

¹ Longer Hymn, Translation of Sir Wallis Budge, Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 135.

That idea that he was the culmination of an evolution which had begun with the “foundation of the world” was perhaps at the root of the public honours the young king seems to have rendered to his ancestors. We know that, among those to whom he erected shrines in his newly-founded sacred City, Akhetaton, were the great warrior-like Pharaohs of his dynasty, Thutmose the Third and Amenhotep the Second, the builders of the Egyptian empire — staunch worshippers of the national gods, above all of Amon, to whom they consecrated the spoils of their conquests. No man could have been more alien than they to the gentle king who preached the doctrine of one nation, the earth, united in the love of one God, the Sun. And yet, they had their shrines, “each of which had its steward and its officials”¹ in the City of the One God. Arthur Weigall tells us that it was Akhnaton’s desire to show, in this manner, “the continuity of his descent from the Pharaohs of the elder days and to demonstrate his real claim to that title of ‘Son of the Sun,’ which had been held by the sovereigns of Egypt ever since the Fifth Dynasty, and which was of such vital importance in the new religion.”²

But in the light of our comments on the true meaning of that title (which the Founder of the Aton faith would have claimed anyhow, because he had every right to claim it, even apart from his royal birth), it would seem that those temples to the memory of the dead Pharaohs were erected in quite a different spirit. An unbroken filiation to royal ancestors of a “solar line” two or more millenniums old could not add much weight to the claim to divinity of one who had experienced, through his nerves, the presence in him of the Soul of the Sun. While, on the other hand, if “all men” had gradually developed their possibilities only in order that he might finally appear, in the full-bloom of his individual Godhead — if they had all been “raised up” for him, as he says himself — then surely his own immediate forefathers were, in a still much more direct and effective manner, responsible for his coming. Whatever might have been the gap between them and him — between their world and his, between their gods and his — yet it remained a fact that they and not others had given him that body in the depth of which was rooted his true solar consciousness (not that of historical or legendary connections with any particular deity, but that of vital identity with the Radiant Energy of the One Sun — the One God). They deserved their shrines, not for justifying any dynastic claims of his, but simply for being the human progenitors that had given birth to him, the godlike Individual, the Sun in flesh and blood.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 171.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), pp. 171-172.

* * *

One more point, however, clearly referred to in the passage quoted a few pages above¹ from the Longer Hymn, seems to need explanation, and that is the place given by Akhnaton himself to “the Royal Wife . . . Nefer-neferu-Aten Nefertiti” in the Religion of the Disk.

There can be no doubt that the person here mentioned is actually the Pharaoh’s consort, the beautiful young queen whose portrait-busts in the Berlin Museum are perhaps the most widely admired of all the masterpieces of Egyptian sculpture. Her titles — “great in majesty, Lady of the Two Lands, living and young for ever and ever” — only confirm her identity. And no explanation of any kind can be put forward to account for this allusion to her, save that the Founder of the Aton cult wished to say that which he said, i.e., that he believed the evolution of man to have culminated in himself (the only man he knew to be God-conscious) and in her. The question is therefore: on what grounds was she, in his eyes, entitled to such an exalted position in the hierarchy of creatures that “every man who standeth on his feet” since God “did lay the foundation of the earth,” had been “raised up” for her, no less than for him? In other words, of what significance was she in his Teaching, and in what light should she be looked upon by those who wish to be his followers?

¹ p. 197.

From all available written and pictorial evidence it appears, as we have already seen,¹ that Akhnaton and Nefertiti loved each other dearly. If the young king had taken no “secondary wives,” as had been the custom with his fathers, it was simply because, in this one queen of his and in the children her love had given him, “his heart was happy,” as he himself declares in so many inscriptions. The extraordinary importance he seems here to give his consort may be just a proof of how deeply he felt all that he owed to her. From what one knows of his earnest and sensitive nature, one may infer that he understood better than any other man the supreme value both of tenderness and of pleasure. It is difficult — and it would be perhaps indiscreet — to attempt to say more. Akhnaton is one of those rare characters so admirably balanced and beautiful that they should be felt rather than discussed. And average imagination, which dissociates the spiritual from the physical and the emotional planes instead of comprehending them in their organic continuity, will probably always remain unable to conceive what that sacred intimacy with his queen (faintly reflected in a few attitudes upon the bas-reliefs of the time) actually meant to him, whose body and soul were in tune with each other and with the silent music of Life. The young Pharaoh knew how profoundly the woman who loved him and whom he loved was one with him. And just as he had ordered her features to be represented upon the monuments along with his, and on the same scale, so did he bring in her name and titles, along with his, in the bold statement that he was the Man for whom “all men” had been “raised up” from the beginning of the world. He could not conceive of himself apart from her. We may think that he would have been anyhow the perfect individual whom he was. But he probably believed that, without her, something vital would have been missing in his life. He had needed the warmth of love she had given him, and all the knowledge he and she had acquired together, in their love, to become complete. And therefore, in none of his highest claims did he consider himself alone. He was “he and she.” In him, the perfect

¹ In Chapter IV, pp. 98-100.

Individual reflected and expressed the godlike Couple, for ever one, in divine union on all planes.

This is one interpretation of the meaning of the place given to Nefertiti in the above quotation. There is another. The “Lady of the Two Lands” may perhaps be considered here not only as the Wife, inseparable from Akhnaton himself — “one flesh” with the conscious flesh of the Sun — but also as his best disciple, the model and prototype of all those who wish to follow him. And “all men,” it may be suggested were “raised up” for her in the sense that her approach to eternal truth, through the simplicity of a loving heart, corresponded to an essential stage which they all had to reach before being able to experience within themselves the immanent Soul of the Sun.

Very little, it is true, is known of the extent to which she “understood” her lord’s religion. When the king instituted Merira as high-priest of the Disk, he is supposed to have addressed him as his “servant who hearkeneth to the Teaching” and with “all the works of whom” he was satisfied. At least, those are the sentences put into his mouth in the inscription on the walls of Merira’s tomb. Other courtiers similarly claim to have understood the Pharaoh’s “Teaching of Life”; to “hearken to his words,” etc. We shall never know how far such statements, even when attributed to the king himself, expressed his actual opinion of his nobles or were merely boasts on the part of officials competing with one another in loyal zeal. But from the little history tells us and permits us to guess about what happened in Egypt only a few years after Akhnaton’s death, one can safely say that most of the Pharaoh’s followers (including the high-priest Merira) were not the fervent disciples that they had consistently pretended to be during his lifetime. On the other hand, without the protestations of faith in him and in his Teaching which one reads on the walls of their tombs; without, indeed, any outward claim, it is possible, even probable, that Nefertiti had imbibed more of the spirit of the Religion of the Disk than any of them. That she was the “Royal Wife,” his beloved, was perhaps a reason, but could surely not have been a sufficient reason for the young king to have her standing at his side and officiating with him in most if not all the ceremonies in honour of his God, had she not shown an earnest attachment to the new faith, and had she not grasped the essentials of it through the path of devotion if not also through that of knowledge. And the fact that, in spite of her being a woman, he committed to her charge the temple of the Setting Sun — the “House-of-putting-the-Aton-to-rest” — argues at the same time his utter disregard for custom and his recognition of the queen’s genuine zeal for his Teaching.

Not enough is known of Nefertiti for one to say if she was or not a disciple as “intellectual” as some others might have been — one who could have explained the Teaching rationally, or even written philosophical comments upon it. But she certainly was one who accepted it wholeheartedly and put it at the centre of her life, both because she deeply felt its beauty and because she deeply loved its inspired Promoter. Devotion had doubtless led her to the very gates of knowledge, if not to knowledge itself.

And, in stating that from the beginning of the world “all men” had been “raised up” for himself and for her, Akhnaton has perhaps simply wished to stress how far advanced in the human evolution is the real Disciple — the devotee who gets a glimpse of ultimate truth through his (or her) absolute love for a God-conscious being and for the Sun, God’s visible Face, if not for the divine impersonal Energy that resplends, though in a different manner, in both of these. Of those who had attained the higher stage of complete consciousness of their identity with the Essence of the Sun, he knew none but himself. He has said so: “Thou art in my heart and there is none who knoweth Thee save Thy Son, Neferkheperu-ra Ua-en-ra. . . .” But he knew at least one whose sincerity and wholeheartedness contrasted with the lip-homages of most of his followers, the superficiality or actual indifference of many of which he was probably beginning to become aware; one who, through intense devotion, had transcended herself and was, even without having his direct knowledge of the supreme “Heat-and-light-within-the-Disk,” nearer to him and nearer to It than any other. And that one was his consort — the same individual whose love had perhaps played its part in the awakening of his own deeper consciousness.

It is possible that by declaring “all men” to have been “raised up” for her as for himself, he was alluding to her devotion as typical of a true disciple’s; of one, that is to say, who is on the way to attain the goal of man that he had attained. It is also possible that he simply meant that she was inseparable from himself, the God-conscious Man. But we believe that, still more probably, the two interpretations can be put forth at the same time as complementary. The former may, in a way, be the consequence of the latter in the particular case of Queen Nefertiti who was first Akhnaton’s consort and then only his devout disciple. The latter, in turn, is not independent of the former, in the sense that the beautiful “Lady of the Two Lands” was perhaps such a perfect wife precisely because she was her lord’s disciple and collaborator — one with him on all planes, as we have said. And that oneness on all planes with a God-conscious Teacher is perhaps the highest stage which can be reached by all those to whom is not given, here and now, the direct experience of Godhead within life. The world is therefore “raised up” for the few who reach it, as well as for the fewer still who, like Akhnaton, go further beyond.

* * *

We can now try to sum up the essential features of the Teaching which we have termed the “Religion of the Disk,” and which Akhnaton regarded as the universal religion, and preached as such.

Based upon its Founder’s intuition — we should say, it seems, on his direct awareness — of the equivalence of all forms of Energy, of the identity of Energy and of what appears to the senses as matter, and of his own substantial oneness with that same Energy that is at the root of all existence, it represents, philosophically, as we have stated, a variety of pantheistic monism hardly different (if different at all) from that of the Indian seers who, some centuries later, wrote the Upanishads. It stands apart from other purely speculative systems, inasmuch as it was a cult as well as a philosophy. In it, the immanent Soul of the Sun (and of the Cosmos), “Heat-and-Light which is in the Disk” — Radiant Energy — was the object of a stately public worship comprising music and dancing¹ and the singing of hymns, along with the ritual offering of food, drink, flowers, and incense. The only visible form, however, which the worshipper was allowed to consider, apart from the resplendent Face of our Parent star in heaven, was the image of the Sun-disk with rays ending in hands, symbolising the power radiating from the Sun down to the earth on which we live.

Akhnaton himself occupied a prominent place in the religion² as the “Son of the Sun” or “Son of God,” that word designating not a man miraculously conceived (the young king never put forth that irrational claim), but the Man who, while conceived and born like all creatures, had exhausted the highest possibilities of human nature by becoming directly conscious of the presence of the Soul, or Essence of the Sun — immanent Cosmic Energy — within his nerves.

Queen Nefertiti, both as the Wife who was a part of himself and as the true Disciple who had wholeheartedly accepted him and his Teaching, through love, was second only to him. And it is probable that, had the Religion of the Disk survived, it would have centred round these two figures — especially round its Founder, looked upon (and rightly, too, in the sense which we have made clear) as divine. Along with the intellectual worship of universal Energy, it would have become the devotional cult of the Perfect Individual — the only one to deserve, by his own right, the name of “Son of the Sun.” And any imaginable attempt to revive it would, it seems, if successful, result in the same; so inseparable is the Teacher from his Teaching.

The philosophical conclusions which can be drawn from the hymns (and from minor sources¹) — the equivalence of heat, light, sound, electricity and all manifestations of energy, and the substantial identity of energy and matter — have been, as we have said, confirmed by the general tendency of modern science to resolve matter into atoms, atoms into centres of power, and qualitatively different kinds of power into outward expressions of quantitative differences (in length of wave, etc.). They can therefore to-day be called positive knowledge, though they were, originally, the result of one man's apparently unaccountable intuition. It is to them that Sir Flinders Petrie refers when he calls the Religion of the Disk a religion which could have been “invented to satisfy our modern scientific conceptions.”²

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 92.

² “Taken together they (the tombs of El Amarna) only reveal one personality, one family, one home, one career, and one mode of worship. This is the figure, family, palace and occupations of the king, and the worship of the Sun — which also was his. . . .” — Norman de Garis Davies, The Rock Tombs of El Amarna, pp. 18-19.

The idea of his own oneness with the supreme immanent Reality — solar Energy, i.e., Cosmic Energy — was the result of Akhnaton's inner experience — an experience as compelling and, to the person who lived it, by no means more “irrational” than any sensuous apprehension of facts, and shared by all those whom we call “realised” or “God-conscious” souls.

That other all-important idea of the unity of all life and brotherhood of all living creatures is based, at the same time, upon the general substantial pantheism of the Religion of the Disk; upon the fatherhood of our parent star, nourisher of all beings — a fact; and upon the response of even the meanest of living things to His beneficent heat and light — another fact.

Akhnaton's Teaching can therefore in no way be compared to any of those faiths based upon the supernatural revelation of a personal God through miraculous happenings. It is connected with no miracles, save the everyday miracle of birth and growth, and that miracle of perfect beauty: the life of its Founder. It is rational in the sense that its fundamentals express a human experience: that of universal oneness (an experience reserved, indeed, to a very few individuals, but of which the implications are confirmed by science), and facts of this earth, such as the happy reaction of all creatures to the warmth of sunshine. But it draws its inspiration from the beauty of the Sun and of the natural world, and from the joy of life, more than from any precise theory of the universe, however objective, however “scientific.”

¹ Such as the scarab found at Sadenga, in which Aton is called “great one of roarings (or thunders).” See Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 104-105.

² Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

At least to the extent to which we know of it, it puts forth no definite views about death and the destiny of the dead. Though a prayer, inscribed upon Akhnaton’s coffin, suggests that he personally believed in the survival of consciousness in a much subtler state of corporeality, it seems as if, in his Teaching, the “problem of death” as well as the problem of suffering were deliberately left aside as insolvable when considered at our general human scale, and automatically solved for those who, here and now, live “in truth.”

Ethically, the religion was of the highest standard, implying absolute sincerity in thought, speech and action — sincerity towards one’s self as well as towards others; above all, towards one’s deeper nature — and love, not for man alone, but for all living creatures considered as our brothers. This fact of its being by no means man-centred but “life-centred” places it, in our eyes, far above the later monotheisms that a few modern authors — one serious archaeologist at least, Arthur Weigall; and one famous psychoanalyst, Sigmund Freud himself — have endeavoured to put in parallel with it,¹ or to point out as positively derived from it.² The god who has a “chosen people” and the god who is the father of all men but not, it would seem, of the rest of creatures which he gave man the right to exploit, are equally alien to the all-pervading “Heat-and-Light within the Disk” — immanent Energy manifested through the Sun. And both are but puerile and barbaric tribal gods, compared with that truly universal Father-and-Mother of all life, Whom the young Pharaoh adored.

To be truthful to the bitter end, with courage — with heroism if necessary — and to love all creatures and be kind to them (not only do them no harm, but to do them positive good; to all of them impartially, as our Father, the Sun) is therefore the sacred duty of anyone who looks upon Akhnaton as his Master.

¹ Arthur Weigall (Life and Times of Akhnaton, New and Revised Edit. 1922, pp. 101, 127) stresses the resemblance of the Teaching to Christianity.

² S. Freud (Moses and Monotheism) sees in Moses an Egyptian, follower of Akhnaton, whose Teaching he tried to give to the Jews.

A very definite line of conduct in everyday life, and no less definite reactions to all forms of hypocrisy, cowardice and cruelty; the condemnation of the revolting exploitation of animals and men — especially of that of the more helpless animals — which has kept on dishonouring mankind from before the dawn of history, is logically implied in the admission that we are all brothers in the Sun; co-worshippers, at different levels of consciousness, of the One same Principle of all Life. Equally implied in it is the respect, as far as possible, of trees and plants which are, also, in their own way, happy to thrive in the sunlight — a whole practical philosophy in which the God-conscious Individual in tune with life as a whole (and not man as a chosen species exploiting at will the rest of the living) is the centre, the purpose, the culmination of creation on earth. And this remains true, whether those who once called themselves Akhnaton's disciples lived up to their faith with all its consequences or whether they did not.

Yet, it is correct to say that the Religion of the Disk seems to have comprised no explicit commandments and prohibitions. It logically implied certain actions; it excluded certain others. It ordered nothing; it forbade nothing. It was not a device to keep the average man out of mischief, but a "Teaching of life" addressed to those few whom their rational mind, their straightforward nature, and above all their sensitiveness to the beauty of the living sunny world predisposed to receive it and who, having imbibed its spirit, would naturally live up to its practical implications. It was — it is — as we have said, in one sense the only religion for all living creatures, and in another, a religion only for the elite of men.

Sir Wallis Budge tells us that "the Atenites adored and enjoyed the heat and light which their god poured upon them, and . . . sang and danced and praised his beneficence, and lived wholly in the present. And they worshipped the triad of life, beauty and colour. . . .”¹ This is true in a sense, but there is more to say. That joy of life, here alluded to — and which is at the root of the Aton worship — was not, as Sir Wallis Budge seems to suppose, a superficial and sterile gaiety. It was a deep and elevating experience, an inspiration which led the worshipper as near the God-conscious King, true Son of the Sun — i.e., as near the perfected End of human growth — as the limitations of his individual nature permitted him to reach.

We have just now spoken of the practical implications of the Teaching in the disciple’s daily life. What we have yet to see of Akhnaton’s unusual career illustrates the application of its principles by its very Promoter to a problem of all times: the problem of war; in particular, of war in connection with one’s colonies.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 96.

212-213-214

Part III

TRUTH VERSUS SUCCESS

CHAPTER IXUNREST IN CONQUERED LAND

In order to realise all the importance of what Akhnaton did — or abstained from doing — when the hard “necessities” of war were thrust upon him, one should first keep in mind the most exalted position which he occupied in the world of his days.

As we have stressed at the beginning of this book, the Egyptian empire was, when he took it over by hereditary right, the greatest empire existing. It could certainly not be compared, either in extent or organisation, with what the Roman empire was one day to be, or with what the British empire is at present. Far from it. But still, with its frontiers stretched from the banks of the Upper Euphrates and the Amanus Mountains — the extreme north of Mesopotamia and the south-eastern limits of Asia Minor — down to and even beyond the Fourth Cataract of the Nile; with the terror of the thirteen victorious campaigns of Thotmose the Third, the conqueror (and of the ruthless punitive expeditions of his successor), fresh in every man’s memory; and with the blessings of local freedom coupled with a firm administration and the security of trade which it gave to the small vassal states that mainly composed it, it surely commanded, in the fourteenth century B.C., from the Black Sea to Abyssinia and from the Grecian mainland to Arabia and the Persian Gulf, much of the prestige that the British empire enjoys to-day all over the globe.

It cannot be called the oldest empire of the world: some twenty-five centuries before,¹ Sargon of Agade had once united under his sceptre all lands from the Mediterranean to Baluchistan. But one can say, with Breasted, that “the administration and organisation” of this Egyptian empire “represent the earliest efforts of government to devise an imperial system.”¹ Without perhaps being as efficient as in a modern state of the same size, they were surely thorough enough to render the domination of Egypt practically unshakable for many hundreds of years, provided the succeeding Pharaohs would not lose the active interest of their fathers in foreign possessions, nor give up their good old warrior-like traditions and hesitate to take action at the slightest signs of disloyalty.

¹ According to others, at a much less early date; see Chap. I, p. 13.

Akhnaton was now the emperor of those vast and various countries; the distant divine Pharaoh to whom the wild chieftains of the Far South — Nubians and even Negroes — no less than the princes of the Orontes and of the Upper Euphrates looked up as “the King, the Sun of the lands.” He was the most powerful man on earth. And the richest. The inexhaustible resources of the Sudan and of the faraway tropical forests — gold and ivory, slaves and precious woods — were his. Syria, a land of “abundant honey, wine and oil,”² of rich flocks and harvests, of ivory,³ cedar wood, precious stones, copper, lead and silver,⁴ was his — without counting Egypt herself, in all times “the granary of the East.” Taxes were collected efficiently, and the tribute of the subject princes (of which the amount, though not known to us, must have been considerable) poured in regularly, at least up to the twelfth year of the Pharaoh’s reign. And if we add to this all the wealth already amassed before his accession as the spoil of war, “the beautiful and luxurious products”⁵ of Syrian industry wrested from the palaces of vanquished kings and from the temples of vanquished gods by generations of conquering Pharaohs; if we add the fabulous treasures patiently accumulated by the priests of Amon, and the enormous revenues of their estates, all confiscated by Akhnaton himself, then we may expect, perhaps, to imagine the amount of gold and silver and mercenary manpower of

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 87.

² S. Cook: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 328.

³ S. Cook says that “elephants were hunted at Niy,” Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 328.

⁴ S. Cook: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 329.

⁵ Ibid., p. 328.

which the young Prophet of the Sun could easily dispose, if he liked. It is indeed no wonder that the envious foreign kings who kept on begging for presents from him in their letters, assert so emphatically, on every occasion, that “verily, in the land of Egypt, gold is as common as dust.”

We have seen previously what riches Akhnaton lavished upon his new capital, especially upon the great temple of Aton and the other most important buildings. We have mentioned the magnificent decoration of his own palace. And if the kings of Babylon, of Mitanni, of Assyria, and of the Hittites show, as they do in their letters, that they were hardly ever satisfied with the presents he sent them, we must not, it seems, with Sir Wallis Budge,¹ rush to the conclusion that he lacked the royal generosity of his father. Knowing as we do that many of his correspondents asked for “more gold” in order to achieve some “new temple” which they had begun to build, we should rather see, in the Pharaoh’s alleged “parsimony,” a refusal to contribute with his wealth to the embellishment of the shrines of foreign local gods — false gods such as he had suppressed in his own country for drawing men’s attention away from the One universal Sun. It was not “parsimony.” It was a matter of principles. Whenever he thought it necessary (or harmless) to spend money, the Pharaoh did so without hesitation, in as kingly a manner as any of his predecessors. And even after the building of Akhetaton, even after all the costly works which he undertook all over the empire, to the glory of the One God — the foundation of new cities as centres of His cult, the erection of numerous temples — he still had enormous sums at his command; more than enough to defend his Asiatic dominions, if he chose to do so.

* * *

As we have said, the Egyptian empire, especially the northern half of it, was a conglomeration of innumerable small vassal states. Every Syrian or Canaanitish town of little importance had its “king,” who acknowledged himself as the

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 98.

“servant” of the faraway Pharaoh and paid tribute to him. The whole country was under the immediate supervision of a “governor of the northern countries” or “vice-roy of the North.” A man of the name of Yankhamu was then the holder of that title.

The coastal towns, Amki, Arvad, Simyra, Ullaza, Byblos, Beirut, Sidon, Tyre, Accho and, farther south, Ashdod and Askalon (to name only a few of them), carried on with Egypt a flourishing trade. Some, like Byblos (called Gebal or Gubla in the tongue of its people), had always been more loyal to Egypt than others. In the interior, Niy, not far from the great bend of the Euphrates and the Mitannian border, Aleppo, Tunip (or Dunip), Hamath, Kadesh, Damascus, Megiddo, Shunem, Taanach, Jerusalem, were the principal “cities of the king,” some of them definitely loyal — such as Tunip, Megiddo, Jerusalem — others much less so. Kadesh seems to have been among the permanent centres of disturbance.

The limit of Egyptian conquests lay, as we have stated previously, somewhere above the Amanus Mountains. The kingdom of Mitanni, ruled by an aristocracy of probably Indo-Aryan origin, bordered the empire to the north-east. Its kings had been giving daughters in marriage to the Pharaohs ever since the days of Akhnaton’s grandfather. They also often received Egyptian royal maidens as their wives. And Queen Nefertiti, whose parentage is much disputed among scholars, may possibly have been, as Sir Flinders Petrie believes, a Mitannian princess (with an Egyptian mother and grandmother, which would explain her particular features). “Behind Mitanni,” and farther to the north-east, “the friendly kingdoms later known as Assyria were the limits of the known world.”¹

The Egyptian possessions were limited to the east by the desert, which lay between them and the territory of the Kassite king of Babylon; while to the north-west, beyond the Amanus Mountains, stretched the “Great Kheta” or Hittite confederation, of which the distant capital, Hattushash

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 198.

(modern Boghaz-Keui), stood not far from the present site of Ankara. The Hittites were a warrior-like set of people, and their king, Shubbiluliuma, a crafty and ambitious monarch. It is he who seems to have been at the bottom of all the troubles in Syria throughout Akhnaton's reign.

It is difficult to say how far the Syrian vassals of the Pharaoh had already, under Amenhotep the Third, "grown thoroughly habituated to the Egyptian allegiance."¹ However much this might have been, they were not all so loyal as to remain deaf to the various incitations of Shubbiluliuma's agents, eloquently depicting to them the advantages of independence and promising them Hittite support in order to win it. Foreign rule, after all, never was a pleasant thing; and the chieftains of Syria and Palestine, even after having been educated in Thebes (as most of them were) could not all have enjoyed it. As we shall see, those who did seem to have been a minority, while the others, however outwardly loyal, disliked it, apparently, as thoroughly as the native leaders of any subject people generally do.

It happened in this particular case, that foreign rule was Akhnaton's rule — the rule, that is to say, of the "first prophet of internationalism,"² the only man in his days to consider men of all races in the same light (as children of the same Father), and perhaps the only one, if any, capable of understanding the grievances of subject races if set before him. But they did not know him. They knew the distant impersonal king-god (a Pharaoh like any other) whom they had never seen, and quite a number of Egyptian officials and pro-Egyptian local dynasts — the latter, their personal rivals — of whom they had seen too much. And it is likely that they were, also, more often than not, impatient to replace Egyptian domination by their own personal tyranny over the people. The Hittite king, on his side, was endeavouring to use them in order to bring all Syria, if possible, under Hittite domination.

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 96.

² Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, pp. 127-128.

* * *

All that is known of the unrest in Syria and Palestine in Akhnaton's time can be gathered from a collection of some three hundred and fifty clay tablets — the famous "Tell-el-Amarna Letters" — discovered in 1887 and 1891 on the site of the Pharaoh's ruined capital. These tablets, covered with cuneiform writing, represent what is left of the diplomatic correspondence of the young king and of his father. What was exactly the situation cannot be described with full accuracy of details; nor can one follow its evolution step by step, for the date of many of the Letters is uncertain. Moreover, a great number of precious tablets have been completely destroyed through mishandling. "What has been preserved is therefore but a wreck of what might have been, had any person equal to the occasion placed his hand on them in time."¹

It can, however, be stated that "a great concerted anti-Egyptian movement,"² in which the Hittites were playing the local enemies of Egypt, repeatedly referred to in the letters from northern Syria — and the "Habiru" — the plundering tribes of the desert who joined the rebellion in Canaan — were attacking the loyal vassals of Egypt from the borders of the Euphrates (near the Mitannian frontier) down to the south of Palestine. They were fighting under the leadership of a growing number of chieftains of different races, if we judge by their names. The most prominent of these were, in the North, Itakama — "the man of Kadesh" — the Amorite Abdashirta, and, especially after the death of the latter, his ambitious and unscrupulous son, Aziru; and in the South, Labaya (or Lapaya) and his sons, along with Tagi, soon allied to Milki-ili, his son-in-law. The movement seems to have had two principal centres: the land of Amor, in Northern Syria, and the Plain of Jezreel, in Palestine.

The chiefs who fought most wholeheartedly in the interest of Egypt were Abi-Milki of Tyre, Biridiya of Megiddo (once a centre of resistance to the Pharaohs' northward advance; now a pro-Egyptian city), and, above all, the indefatigable

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 259.

² S. Cook: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 303.

Ribaddi, king of Gebal (Byblos) and Abdikhipa, the faithful governor of Jerusalem. There seem to have been many more sincere supporters of Egyptian rule at the time the troubles started. But as years passed, nearly every new letter from the theatre of war announced the defection of some new “king” — or “kings” — formerly loyal. Even Abi-Milki, for long faithful to his Egyptian allegiance, finished by joining the Sa-Gaz — when tired of waiting in vain for the Pharaoh to help him against them. But all the vassals, including the most notoriously disloyal ones, protest of their loyalty in their correspondence with Egypt. It would appear that the more treacherous they were, the more vehemently they asserted their submission. “To the King, the Sun, my Lord, speaks Abdashirta, the dust of thy feet,” wrote the Amorite agitator to Akhnaton. “Beneath the feet of the King my Lord, seven times and seven times I fall. Lo, I am a servant of the King and his house-dog, and the whole of the land of Amor guard I for the King, my Lord.”¹ And his son, by far the most able and determined enemy of Egypt after Shubbiluliuma himself (of whom he was the tool), wrote in the same tone, while begging the Hittite king to help him to shake off the Pharaoh’s domination and while inciting Zimrida, king of Sidon, and other local princelings to break their old bonds of allegiance and become his allies.

It was surely very difficult for any contemporary observer to distinguish, under the conflicting statements all those chieftains and governors of cities, who was actually loyal and who was not. The Egyptian officers on the spot often made mistakes, as did Turbikha, Yankhamu’s envoy, who unnecessarily hurt the feelings of the Pharaoh’s true friends in Irkata²; or Pakhura, whose mercenaries attacked Ribaddi’s loyal troops, with whom they should have collaborated.³ To march, himself, into Syria, at the head of an army, would not perhaps have helped Akhnaton much in knowing the hearts of his vassals, but it would have put an end to the Syrian squabbles and “saved the situation”; for at the mere news of his approach, every outward sign of unrest would doubtless have disappeared. The very name of Egypt, associated with that of its great conquering kings, was still feared. The crafty old monarch in Hattushash would also have changed his policy, had he been under the impression that his opponent was prepared to fight. Akhnaton seems to have been well aware of Shubbiluliuma’s enmity. He severed diplomatic relations with him — a fact of which the Hittite, whose double game had thus come to an end, complains in a letter which has come down to us.¹ But he did not wish to fight. He did not wish to be feared. And though he perhaps did realise, more than many modern authors seem to believe, that nothing would have stemmed the disintegration of the Egyptian empire but “a vigorously aggressive policy,”² he did not wish to adopt such a policy.

¹ Amarna Letters, K. 60, quoted by James Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 353.

² Letter of the Elders of Irkata, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 360.

³ Letter of Ribaddi, K. 122, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 365.

* * *

The troubles, which appear to have regularly increased all through the young Pharaoh’s short reign, had definitely started under Amenhotep the Third, as proved by the letter in which Aki-izzi of Katna reports to that king an alliance of the Hittites with several chieftains of the Upper Orontes with an aim to attack the plain of Damascus³ (and Katna, which was on their way southwards). Other letters of the same period report attacks on Amki,⁴ at the mouth of the Orontes, and we also learn that shortly before Akhnaton’s accession, a small Egyptian force had been despatched to Syria under an officer named Amenemapet, who recovered Simyra — an important seaport — from the hands of Abdashirta. But from the whole series of appeals for help addressed to Akhnaton himself by his loyal Syrian vassals — especially by Ribaddi, the author of more than fifty of the

¹ Amarna Letters, K. 41.

² J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 354.

³ Letter CXII (W. 139), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 281.

⁴ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 280-281; Letters CVII (W. 132) and CX (W. 125).

“Amarna Letters” — it is clear that, though the confusion had already begun to spread by the time he came to the throne, a very little help to the supporters of Egyptian rule would have been sufficient to save the empire — provided it were sent speedily. At this stage of the war, Ribaddi, menaced in his stronghold of Gebal by Abdashirta and his sons, entreats the king to send him “three hundred men” so that he may “be able to hold the city.”¹ In another despatch he writes: “May it seem good to my Lord, the Sun of the lands, to give me twenty pair of horses.”² But this slight help was never sent.

Abdashirta was killed in some skirmish, and the anti-Egyptian movement, for a time, seemed to slacken. But it soon regained a greater impetus than ever under the ablest of the Amorite leader’s sons, Aziru, who then began, in the words of a modern writer, his “amazing game of mingled cunning and boldness against the greatest empire of his world.”³ War rapidly spread all over the country, and the despatches of the loyal vassals grew more and more disquieting. The Amorites, under the command of Aziru and his brothers, were again hammering at the gates of Simyra. They were now in alliance with Arvad — another seaport, north of Simyra. And the faithful Ribaddi wrote to Akhnaton, his lord: “As a bird in the fowler’s snare, so is Simyra. Night and day the sons of Abdashirta are against it by land, and the men of Arvad by sea.”⁴ While the elders of Irkata, a small coastal town to the south of Arvad, wrote in a no less appealing letter, “Let not the breath of the king depart from us. The town-gates have been barred until the breath of the king shall come to us. Mighty is the enmity against us; mighty indeed.”⁵

But not a word of encouragement came from the distant overlord in whom they had put all their hope. It was as

¹ Letter K. 93, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 352.

² Letter K. 103, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 352.

³ J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 359.

⁴ Letter CLXV (W. 84), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 292.

⁵ Letter CLIX (W. 122), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 290. Quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), pp. 360-361.

though their distressed appeals did not reach him, in his sacred City, or as though they were incapable of touching his heart.

War in Syria continued raging. Ribaddi, in a pressing message, announced that Zimrida of Sidon, Yapa-addu, and other dynasts had joined the rebels, and he begged for troops,¹ for “only Simyra and Irkata” were left to him, and he had to defend them. “Let troops be sent with Yankhamu,”² he repeats, in another despatch. In another he complains that he cannot send ships to Zalukhi and Ugarit (right in the north of Syria) because of Aziru, and tells the king that the Hittites are plundering the lieges of Gebal.³ In another, he explains how acute the food problem has grown in Gebal itself⁴; in yet another, he informs Akhnaton that “the sons of Abdashirta” hold Ullaza, Ardata, Yikhliya, Ambi and Shigata, and asks again for succour, that he might still rescue Simyra from the besieging Amorites. If Simyra surrenders, he fears the fate that is likely to befall him.⁵

At about the same time, among many other increasingly pathetic calls for help, was despatched to Akhnaton from “the citizens of Tunip” in north-east Syria, what is surely one of the most moving official documents of all times. It shows what memories the great warrior-like Pharaohs had left in Syria. It shows, also, to what pitch of disappointment, verging on despair, the apparent indifference of the ruling king had brought the loyal section of the Syrian people, especially in the remoter parts of the empire, where impending danger threatened them on all sides. “Who could formerly have plundered Tunip without being plundered by Menkheper-ra?” (Thotmose the Third), runs the letter; “The gods of Egypt dwell in Tunip. May the king our lord ask his old men (if it be not so). But now we no longer belong to Egypt.” “. . . Aziru has captured people in the land of

¹ Letter CLVIII (W. 78), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 289.

² Letter CLVI (W. 87), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 289.

³ Letter CLII (W. 104), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 289.

⁴ Letter CLXI, Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 290.

⁵ Letter CLXII (W. 86), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 291.

Khatat. Aziru will treat Tunip as he has treated Niy; and if we mourn, then the king of Egypt will also have to mourn. And when Aziru enters Simyra, he will do to us as he pleases, and the king will have to lament. And now, Tunip, thy city, weeps, and her tears are flowing and there is no help for us. For twenty years we have been sending to our Lord, the king of Egypt, but there has not come to us a word from our Lord — not one.”¹

But again no troops were sent. The Pharaoh answered Ribaddi’s letters, but only to tell him to “defend himself,” as it is obvious from the Syrian prince’s reply: “Why has the king, my lord, written to me saying ‘Defend yourself, and you surely will be defended’? Against whom shall I defend myself? If the king would defend his servants, then would I be delivered: but if the king does not defend me, then who will defend me? If the king sends men from Egypt and from Melukhkha, and horses . . . right speedily, then I shall be delivered so that I may serve my lord the king. At present, I have nothing at all wherewith to obtain horses. Everything has been given to Yarimuta to keep life in me.”² This last sentence is evidently an allusion to the precarious food situation which the prince of Gebal was facing; he had had to deprive himself and his people of all other commodities that he might buy grain from the stores of Yarimuta, north of Gebal.³ The tone of the letter shows Ribaddi’s bewilderment at Akhnaton’s attitude, which he fails to understand.

The next event — which Sir Flinders Petrie calls a “landmark” in the history of the loss of the Egyptian empire — was the fall of Simyra. Its helpless defender wrote to the king: “Simyra, thy fortress, is now in the power of the Sa-Gaz.”⁴ The town was completely destroyed by Aziru and his allies. Tyre fell shortly after Simyra.⁵ Abi-Milki, its king, ¹ Letter CLXX (W. 41) quoted by Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 292-293; quoted also by A. Weigall, Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 205.

² Letter K. 112, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), pp. 363-364.

³ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 291.

⁴ Letter CLXXII (W. 56), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 293.

⁵ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 294.

had been describing his plight in every letter he sent to Egypt. But nothing had come of his efforts to attract the Pharaoh's attention upon the situation in Syria. In the end, he had let things take their course.

Ribaddi was now fighting alone against hopeless odds, for a king who seemed deaf to his cries for help and yet who could easily have supported him, had he wished to do so. It appears that, for once at least, after the loss of Simyra, Akhnaton took pity on his faithful servant. A small force of Sutu (Arab mercenaries) was sent from Egypt to Ribaddi's rescue. But that isolated help proved a disaster. For Pakhura, the officer in command of the reinforcements, mistaking friend for foe — or perhaps secretly won over to Aziru and the rebels — attacked the "Shirdanu" troops upon whom Ribaddi was relying for his defence, and made a great slaughter of them.¹ The people of Gebal immediately threw all the responsibility for this misdeed upon Ribaddi himself, whose position in the city soon became untenable. "Since that time," says he, in one of his messages to the Pharaoh, "the city has been exasperated against me; and truly the city says: 'A crime such has not been committed from eternity, has been committed against us.'"² Already his own brother was at the head of the anti-Egyptian faction, and his wife and his whole household (as he tells the king in another letter) were bringing pressure upon him to sever his allegiance to Egypt and "join the sons of Abdashirta."³ At one time we see that he was forced to leave Byblos, and that he found its gates closed against him.⁴ He managed, however, to re-enter it, seriously fearing he would be driven out

¹ Letter CC (W. 77), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 297. J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 365.

² Letter K. 122, quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 365.

³ Letter CCVIII (W. 71), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 209. Letter CCXVI (W. 96), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 299-300. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 213. J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 365.

⁴ Letter CCXVI (W. 96), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 300. J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 366.

for the second time if his messengers again returned from Egypt without help. His last pathetic letters, despatched from the midst of a starving city over which he was daily losing control, are worth quoting in extenso. In this summary review of the Syrian unrest, we shall at least give one or two extracts from them. In one message, Ribaddi compares his present plight as a faithful vassal of Egypt with what his position would have been in the days when the Pharaohs' power was feared in conquered land: "Once," says he, "at the sight of an Egyptian, the kings of Canaan fled from before him, but now the sons of Abdashirta despise the people of Egypt and threaten me with their bloody weapons."¹ His position had even been much stronger in the beginning of the Amorite rebellion: "When Abdashirta formerly came out against me, I was mighty, and behold, now my people are scattered and I am small. . . ."² And letter after letter brings us always that same entreating appeal to Akhnaton to intervene vigorously and save his Asiatic dominions: "Let not my Lord the King neglect the affair of these dogs!"; and always the same unfailing loyalty, firm to the bitter end; that loyalty that found its expression even while Aziru and his men were battering at the walls of Gebal. "So long as I am in the city, I guard it for my Lord, and my heart is right towards my Lord the king, so that I will not betray the city to the sons of Abdashirta. For to this end has my brother stirred up the city, that it may be delivered up to the sons of Abdashirta. O let not my Lord the king neglect the city! For in it there is a very great quantity of silver and gold, and in the temples of its gods there is a great amount of property of all sorts."³ And finally, the last words of a gallant soldier keeping his master informed, to the end, about a situation henceforth hopeless: "The enemy do not depart from the gates of Gebal."⁴ Meanwhile, Ribaddi's son, who had been sent to Egypt to beg for help, waited over three months before he could obtain an audience from the king.

¹ Quoted from Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, pp. 305-306.

² Quoted from Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 306.

³ Letter K. 137, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 366.

⁴ Quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 366.

Gebal was stormed, as so many other cities had been. Ribaddi fell alive into Aziru's hands, and the rebel leader gave him over to his colleagues, the Amorite princes, to be put to death, probably not without torture. With him disappeared the sincerest champion of Egyptian rule in North Syria.

The news of the fall of Gebal must have been a blow to all those who felt for the greatness of Egypt. For not only did the city contain "a great quantity of gold and silver," but it had maintained an unbroken connection with Egypt for long centuries. Montet's excavations in 1921 brought to light on its site the remains of an Egyptian temple dating back to the time of King Unas, of the Fifth Dynasty — one thousand five hundred years before the conquests of Thutmose the Third. Another temple had been built there during the Twelfth Dynasty, and the local god and goddess — the "Lord and Lady of Gebal" — had been identified with Ra and Hathor. So that Ribaddi was right when he wrote to his overlord in Akhetaton: "Let the king search the records of the house of his fathers and see if the man who is in Gebal is not a true servant of the king."¹

But Akhnaton seems to have been more grieved for the death of the faithful vassal who had struggled and suffered for his sake with the bitter feeling of being abandoned, than for the loss of all his possessions. He had probably been for long aware of Aziru's duplicity, and one would think that he only half accepted the clever excuses which the rebel leader put forth each time he was asked an explanation of his behaviour. He had commanded him to rebuild Simyra.² He had summoned him to Egypt to give an account of all the fighting in which he had been involved — perhaps also to answer the accusations brought against him by Abi-Milki, Ribaddi and others. He had sent Khani, a special envoy,³ to see what he was doing, and possibly to bring him back with him to Akhetaton. The Amorite had always very carefully avoided the issue, now begging for a delay,¹ now running away from his headquarters in order not to meet the king's messenger.² And Akhnaton had taken no step against him. He did not insist on knowing more about his intrigues. He probably held Aziru to be an ambitious princeling, impatient to aggrandise his territory — like most dynasts, when they could do so. But he does not appear to have judged him capable of having a helpless prisoner done to death in cold blood. The news of that deed came to him as a painful revelation. And the long letter he wrote to his treacherous vassal on that occasion shows a sad amazement in front of the darkest side of humanity suddenly thrust before him by hard facts. "Dost thou not write to the king thy Lord: 'I am thy servant like all the former princes who were in Gebal'? Yet hast thou committed this crime? . . ."³ Then comes the story of how Ribaddi was handed over by Aziru to the Amorite confederates; and Akhnaton continues: "Didst thou not know the hatred of those men for him? If thou art indeed a servant of the king, why hast not thou arranged for his sending to the king thy Lord?"⁴

¹ Quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 349.

² Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 211. J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 369.

³ J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 370.

To send Ribaddi to Egypt, so that his accusing voice might be heard there, was the last thing which the traitor could have been expected to do. But Akhnaton was too good even to suspect such an amount of deceit and cruelty as that of his unworthy vassal.

* * *

Already before the fall of Byblos — perhaps even before the fall of Simyra — troubles had broken out in Palestine where

¹ Letters K. 160 and K. 164, quoted by J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 369. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 211.

² Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), p. 124. Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 212. J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 370.

³ Letter K. 162, of Akhnaton to Aziru, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), pp. 370-371.

⁴ Letter K. 162, of Akhnaton to Aziru, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 371.

Labaya (or Lapaya) and his sons, and Tagi, had greatly succeeded in bringing the wandering desert tribes — the Habiru — to assist them in a general uprising against Egyptian domination.

From the beginning, the letters of the few loyal dynasts to the Pharaoh had been — like those of Aki-izzi of Katna, of Abi-Milki of Tyre, and of the faithful Ribaddi, in Syria — repeated warnings against increasing danger. “Verily,” had written, for instance, Biridiya of Megiddo, “I guard Megiddo, the city of the king, my Lord, day and night. Mighty is the enmity of the people of the Sa-Gaz, in the land: therefore, let the king my Lord have regard to his land.”¹ Yashdata of Taanach, another loyal chief, soon forced to fly for his life and seek refuge at Megiddo, had also written from there in the same tone. But just as in the case of Syria, no help seems to have been sent.

Labaya, captured by the supporters of Egypt, but allowed to escape by Zurata of Accho, a dynast who was playing a double game, was finally killed at Gina (the En-Gannim of the Bible). But his sons, like the sons of Abdashirta in North Syria, led the anti-Egyptian movement after his death. They did all they could to stir up the other local chieftains, using threats where persuasion failed. “Thus have the two sons of Labaya spoken unto me,” wrote one of these, named Addukarradu, to the king of Egypt. “‘Show hostility to the people of Gina,’ said they, ‘because they have slain our father. And if thou dost not show hostility, we shall be thine enemies’; But,” added he speedily, “I answered them: ‘The God of the king my Lord forbid that I should show hostility towards the folk of Gina, the servants of the king my Lord.’”²

But all were not as firm in their loyalty, and from the Plain of Jezreel, where it had probably begun, the disaffection and civil strife spread, on both sides of the Jordan, and soon reached as far south as Gezer. We get from all sides reports of aggression upon towns which still retain their allegiance to Egypt, and news of robbery along the trade-routes, on the part of the Habiru. In one of his letters, Burnaburiash, king of Babylon, complains to Akhnaton about the plunder of one of his caravans in Egyptian territory, with loss of life, and asks for compensations.¹ The aggressor was none other but Shutatna, the son of that Zurata of Accho, who, in collaboration with one Shumaddhu (Shamu-addu), also a vassal of Egypt, had helped Labaya to escape. On the other hand, Addu-dani (of Gath?) writes that “Beia, the son of Gulati,” has “plundered the city and laid a heavy ransom upon its captives”²; Dangatakala,³ another local dynast, a queen named Ninur,⁴ who styles herself as the Pharaoh’s handmaid, and several others, write entreating despatches, asking Akhnaton for help against the Habiru. Time passed, and no help came. Finally, Jerusalem itself was threatened.

¹ Letter K. 243, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 377.

² Letter K. 250, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 379.

The governor of that city, Abdikhipa, seems to have been in Palestine what Ribaddi was in Syria: a wholehearted supporter of Egyptian rule, taking the Pharaoh’s interests as though they were his own. He had at first allied himself with Shuwardata of Keilah, Zurata of Accho, Milki-ili, and other dynasts and appealed, along with them, to Yankhamu to intervene against the increasing rebellion. But soon those men whom he had trusted proved false, and the situation changed entirely. The governor of Jerusalem wrote to Akhnaton telling him that Milki-ili was siding with his father-in-law, Tagi — one of the chiefs heading the rebellion, and that he had attacked him.⁵ In a subsequent message he announced that, “through the intrigues of Milki-ili and the sons of Labaya,” Gezer, Askalon, and Lachish had become hostile to Egypt; that the royal mail had been robbed in the fields of Aijalon — only fourteen miles from Jerusalem — and that, if no troops came speedily, nothing would be left of the

¹ Letter CXXIV (W. 11), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 285. S. Cook: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 313.

² Letter K. 292 (W. 239); Letter CCLX in Sir Flinders Petrie’s History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 308-309.

³ Letter CCLXIII (W. 216), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 309. A. Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 210.

⁴ Letters CCLXV (W. 173), CCXLVI (W. 174), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 309.

⁵ Letter CCXXXII (W. 186), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 303; also Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 315.

king's lands.¹ We learn from another correspondent that Lachish had seized Mukhrashti, its eastern neighbour,² and again from Abdikhipa, that Milki-ili and Shuwardata had "hired men of Gazri (Gezer), Ginti (Gath), and Kilti (Keilah), and seized the land of Rubuti (Rabbah)"; that "men of Kilti" (Keilah) had taken "Bit-Ninib, a city of the king" in the territory of Jerusalem, and that if no troops were sent the whole land would fall to the Habiru.³

In the meantime, Shuwardata protested of his innocence — "Let the king ask," wrote he, "if I have ever taken a man, or an ox, or an ass from him"⁴ — and even accused Abdikhipa of disloyalty.⁵ Tagi, the rebel leader, who, like Aziru in Syria, never lost an opportunity of reasserting his allegiance to Egypt, even managed to obtain a personal interview from the king. As in Syria, the Egyptian officers on the spot seem either to have lacked insight or to have been, perhaps, themselves, of doubtful loyalty to Akhnaton. They often favoured the disloyal dynasts, and it is perhaps on the report of some of them that Abdikhipa did not obtain from the Pharaoh as ready a hearing as the double-faced Tagi. He complained bitterly of this in his letters. "By the life of the king my Lord," wrote he, "because I spoke thus to the officer of the king my Lord: 'Why dost thou love the Habiru and hate the regents?' therefore I am slandered before the king my Lord. Because I say: 'The lands of the king my Lord are being lost,' therefore I am slandered before the king my Lord."⁶

As time passed, things fared worse and worse for Egypt. The territory north of Jerusalem was now lost as well as the hill country to the west of the city and the entire sea-coast. "Now," wrote Abdikhipa, "the Habiru occupy the cities.

¹ Letter CCLIV (W. 180), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 307.

² Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 315.

³ Letter CCLVI (W. 183), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 307. Also Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 315.

⁴ Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, pp. 315-316.

⁵ Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 315. Letter CCLI (W. 165), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 306.

⁶ Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 315. Letter K. 286, quoted by Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), pp. 379-380.

Not one prince remains; all are ruined.”¹ No longer able to defend himself against the rebel chiefs, let alone to guarantee the safety of the trade-routes without the Pharaoh’s help, he stuck however to his post, as long as he possibly could: “The king has set his name upon the land of Jerusalem, for ever,” wrote he in one of his despatches, “therefore I cannot forsake the land of Jerusalem.”²

The same insistence upon the emergency of the situation and the necessity of immediate action is repeatedly found in all the faithful governor’s letters, to the end. “The whole land of the king my Lord is going to ruin; send Yankhamu to care for the king’s land,” or “If no troops come this year, all the lands of the king my Lord will be lost.” Such sentences reappear as a leit-motif in nearly all the despatches from Jerusalem. Moreover, Abdikhipa, who seems to have been personally acquainted with Akhnaton’s cuneiform scribe, often added to his messages a “post-scriptum” addressed to him. And the post-scriptum was the same as the message itself — a desperate warning: “To the scribe of the king my Lord, thus speaks thy servant, Abdikhipa: Bring clearly before the king my Lord these words: ‘All the lands of the king my Lord are going to ruin.’”³

But no help was sent.

Finally, Palestine seems to have become too unsafe for any man openly loyal to Egypt to remain there. “Turbatsu was slain at the gate of Zilu,” writes Abdikhipa; “and Yaptiaddi” — another supporter of the Pharaoh’s rule — “was also slain at the gate of Zilu. Send troops to Jerusalem or all will be lost.” And he adds: “If there are no troops this year, let the king my Lord send an officer to fetch me and my brothers, that we may die (in Egypt) with the king my Lord.”⁴

There is no evidence that any step was taken by the king of Egypt, at the last moment, in order to recover even a part of his lost territories, or at least to save Jerusalem, which

¹ Letter CXXXIV (W. 181), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 303-304.

² Quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 383.

³ Letter K. 286, quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 381.

⁴ Letter CCXXXIV (W. 181), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 303-304. Letter K. 288, quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 381.

appears to have been his last important stronghold in Asia. From the boundaries of Asia Minor and Northern Mesopotamia down to the Sinai Desert, Egyptian domination now became a thing of the past; a thing, nay, that was never to be again — for though warrior-like Pharaohs were soon to enter again into Canaan and resume the old northward march at the head of their armies, they were to recover and retain but a small portion of the provinces which Akhnaton had allowed “to go to ruin.”

* * *

In the preceding pages we have tried to give, from the Amarna Letters, a rough sketch of the main developments in Syria and Palestine under Akhnaton. We purposely avoided all comments so that the reader might get a faithful picture of the unrest and nothing more. But that picture itself is not complete unless one visualises what horrible realities often lay under the few brief sentences that have come down to us in those thirty-three-hundred-year-old official despatches from the Pharaoh's correspondents. The details given in a few letters are sufficient to help one's imagination. For instance, in his complaint mentioned above about the plundering of one of his caravans, King Burnaburiash informs Akhnaton that, apart from several merchants having been killed by the robbers, “Shumadda has kept one of the Babylonians with his feet cut off; Shutatna has taken another as his slave. . . .”¹

Reports such as this show that man was no better in the fourteenth century B.C. than he is to-day. And if, to the gratuitous atrocities committed by chieftains in no way different from ordinary cut-throats and by the ferocious tribesmen who were in their pay, we add the well-known brutalities inherent to warfare — and especially to civil warfare — in all times, we shall begin to form some idea of the true story told by the Amarna Letters. We shall realise that behind the mention of a single word, the casual reference to a new place to which war had spread, lay the fact of villages reduced to ashes in the midst of devastated fields and vineyards. We shall feel that every enumeration of a few towns “fallen to the Sa-Gaz” — every line that is, for most modern readers, but a list of picturesque names — covers all the horrors of a series of sieges: furious assaults repelled at the point of the sword; burning missiles setting on fire whole clusters of men and beasts (we have a hint of what it was in the desperate letters of Abi-Milki of Tyre and of Ribaddi of Gebal); then, wild men, half-soldiers, half-brigands, maddened by the lust of violence, rushing through the breaches in crumbling walls; pillage, murder, outrage; children and young maidens torn from their frantic mothers; whole populations driven away and sold in the slave-markets of Syria — a natural consequence of ancient warfare which we tend to forget.

¹ Letter CXXIV (W. 11), Sir Flinders Petrie, History of Egypt (Edit. 1899, Vol. II, p. 285).

And that is not all. We must picture to ourselves, fleeing in terror before the Sa-Gaz and the Habiru, the endless lines of Egyptian, Syrian and Canaanite refugees who had lost all they possessed; men, women and children, pouring into Egypt across the Sinai Desert, by hundreds and by thousands, ragged and dirty, exhausted, sick, half-starved — some of them half-insane — with recent scenes of rape, slaughter and torture still vivid before their eyes; the people of whom an Egyptian officer in charge of them said: “They have been destroyed and their towns laid waste, and fire has been thrown (into their grain). . . . Their countries are starving; they live like goats of the mountains.”¹

All this could easily have been avoided. A few war-chariots and a few hundreds of mercenaries sent in time would have sufficed; and Akhnaton had at his disposal, as we have seen, the man-power and resources of the greatest empire then existing. Moreover, he seems to have known the danger that was threatening his dominions; he knew it, perhaps not to the extent the modern historian knows it (with the account of the aftermath of the rebellion open before him), but he knew it enough to feel the necessity of taking some immediate measures if he did not wish to see “the whole land” lost to him. We have recalled that he was suspicious about Aziru’s behaviour; that he summoned him to Egypt and even sent a special messenger to inquire of his dealings — a messenger whom the intriguing Amorite did all he could not to meet. In the letter which he wrote to his faithless vassal, the Pharaoh reproached him for having eaten a covenant meal with the “man of Kadesh” — Itakama — who was an enemy of Egypt, and for having allied himself to him.¹ This proves that he knew all about Itakama’s collaboration with the Hittites. He was probably more aware of the situation than a few modern writers seem to believe. And he wanted peace: “Know thou,” wrote he to Aziru, “that the king desireth not that the whole land of Canaan should be in turmoil.”² And he was fully conscious of his own power to enforce it: “I am very well,” wrote he again, “I, the Sun in the heavens; and my chariots and soldiers are exceedingly numerous; and from Upper Egypt, even unto Lower Egypt, and from the place where the Sun riseth even unto the place where He setteth, the whole country is in good cause and content.”³

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 125.

And yet he did not send help to the faithful vassals who only begged for the privilege of keeping the empire whole in his name.

* * *

It is easy to imagine the bewilderment of the messengers from Syria and Palestine when they found no response to their cries for military aid in the new capital of Egypt; no reaction to their indignant tales of aggression, save perhaps, in the young king’s large dark eyes, a depth of sadness that they were utterly unable to understand — instead of the expected anger and lust for revenge; no preparation for war, in answer to their desperate warnings.

It is easy to put one’s self in the place of Ribaddi’s son, running all the way from beleaguered Gebal with the one fear that he might reach Egypt too late, only to find himself waiting over three months for Akhnaton to grant him an audience; and then, once in the sacred presence of that mighty monarch in whom he had put all hopes, recalling before him the horrors of the siege of Gebal only to get from him, for all answer, the assurance that he felt for the sufferings of his people but that he did not wish to keep by force a land in which so many princes seemed to be opposed to his rule! The young man probably realised that the king was thoroughly sincere; that the sympathy he expressed was not a mere lip-sympathy. He had seen his face darken with immeasurable sorrow all the time he had spoken to him. He had perhaps even seen a tear roll down his pale cheek. No, this was no hard-hearted king who did not care what happened to those who were struggling for him far away. And we can imagine the son of Ribaddi slowly walking down the steps of the palace with one question troubling his mind: “Then, why no help for us? Why? Why?”

¹ Akhnaton’s Letter to Aziru (already quoted).

² Akhnaton’s Letter to Aziru (already quoted).

³ Akhnaton’s Letter to Aziru, quoted by A. Weigall, Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 196.

The bearer of the pathetic letter from the elders of Tunip had in vain tortured his brains in search of an answer to the same question. The bearers of all the despatches addressed to Akhnaton by the few vassal princes and governors of cities who remained loyal to him — of all those despatches that “even now move the reader”¹ — had done the same. Anyone can imagine their feelings.

Thirty-three hundred years later, modern authors were to condemn Akhnaton’s “supineness and apathy”² in the name of their sympathy for the loyal people of Syria and Canaan. “All the letters tell the same story of successful revolt on the part of the subjects of Egypt, and the capture and plundering and burning of towns and villages by the Khabiri, and the robbery of caravans on all the trade routes,” writes Sir Wallis Budge. “And whilst all this was going on, the king of Egypt remained unmoved and only occupied himself with the cult of his god.”³ It is easier to condemn a man — and especially such a man, far in advance of his own times and of ours — than to try to analyse his motives.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 209.

² J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 375.

³ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), p. 102.

* * *

Just as we can realise the distress of the Syrian envoys when returning home without any promises of help, so we can also picture to ourselves what the crafty Aziru probably felt when, after crushing all his opponents, he at last decided that he could now go to Egypt and see the king, who had summoned him there years before. He sailed up the Nile in gaudy apparel, expecting, no doubt, to impress the Egyptians. But he was himself dazzled at the sight of the City of the Horizon of Aton, and still more so at that of Akhnaton's splendid palace. And though the secret supporters he had at the Egyptian court — a nobleman named Tutu, to whom he had been writing regularly, and others, too — had told him that he had nothing to fear from his overlord; though they had spoken to him of the strange new God in Whose eyes the friends and enemies of Egypt were equal, yet he could hardly believe the Pharaoh's leniency. With such wealth at his disposal, he, Aziru, son of Abdashirta, would have hired soldiers from all countries and built an empire for himself, thought he, as he gazed in amazement at the magnificent temples of Akhetaton, or as he walked through the glittering audience hall of the palace, with its over five hundred columns of gold and lapis lazuli. And this monarch had done nothing even to keep the lands his fathers had conquered! What sort of a king was he? A weakling, afraid to fight, or a fool whom the Amorite's clever lies had deceived? The Pharaohs of old would have sacrificed such a fellow as himself, Aziru, their enemy, to the battle-god Amon, with their own axe. Aziru knew it well. But the present king treated him kindly. He reproached him, it is true, with the murder of Ribaddi and of several other loyal princes. But he did not punish him for it. And the Amorite, merely recognising the suzerainty of Egypt as a matter of courtesy, went back to Syria as the ruler of a practically independent State — quite content with himself. His plans had succeeded — so he believed. He had all along deceived that impossible dreamer who now held the throne of the conquerors of Syria. At least, he thought he had. He was incapable of feeling what an amount of suffering there was in Akhnaton's words when he had recalled Ribaddi's capture, betrayal, and death. He still less realised what conceptions of international justice, far beyond his age and many ages to come, lay behind the king's attitude towards himself as the head of the Amorite rebellion — the "Syrian nationalist," as we would say to-day. He saw Akhnaton; he spoke to him; yet he remained as alien to him and as ignorant of him as ever: an exalted savage, in presence of "the first man in whose heart was no trace of barbarism."¹

We can also, to a very great extent, imagine the comments of the victims of the Syrian war, the hungry, ragged, tired men who poured into Egypt by thousands across the border of Canaan and the Sinai Desert. The king, thought they, was the cause of their plight. He had abandoned them. He was now doing his best to relieve them, feeding them, housing them, clothing them, making the best possible arrangements to comfort the sick and bury the dead, to the utmost capacity of his officers. But could he give them back what the Sa-Gaz and the Habiru had burnt and destroyed? — and their dear ones who had been killed? — and all that their homes had meant to them? Why had he not sent troops to protect them, when it was still time?

The agents of the priests of Amon and of the other national gods — the enemies of the king — would go and tell them "why." They were many; they had never ceased being at work in Egypt; and possibly they had played a part in the Syrian rebellion itself, stirring up the vassals against their overlord. The king, they told these distressed people, was an apostate, a "heretic," an enemy of all the gods. How could one expect him not to be an enemy of men also? The wrath of Amon and of all the gods was upon Egypt and her people because of him. Amon had made Egypt great. He had guided the armies of her kings to victory. He would have helped them for ever to maintain peace and order in a flourishing empire. But the present Pharaoh had raised his hand against the “king of gods.” He had sought to destroy him. And now Amon was taking his revenge upon him and upon the nation that still tolerated him. And the unfortunate folk believed what they were told, for they feared the priests and feared the gods of Egypt. And so they grew to hate the best of kings, who loved them.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 251.

As for the priests of Amon themselves, they so loathed Akhnaton’s rule that they welcomed anything that would put an end to it. Outwardly full of patriotic grief at the news of Egypt’s disasters, they rejoiced in their hearts, counting the days of him whom they already called “that criminal.” Every new blow to the Pharaoh’s prestige prepared the day when they would again seize power and dominate both the king and the country more strongly than ever.

Finally, we can imagine the gradual disaffection of the courtiers — even of many of those who, at first, had enthusiastically “hearkened to the king’s Teaching” — when they saw where the principles of the Religion of the Disk were leading the country. More and more Akhnaton must have discerned that the homages paid in his presence to his God were considered by numbers of those who rendered them as merely a part of the court etiquette. He must have realised, as time passed, and as things went worse in Syria, that he was more and more alone — out of touch with his people, out of touch with his nobles, out of touch with his age, with the tradition of his country, with the tradition of the world; with the present and the past; perhaps out of touch with the future, too, for ever; a man without roots in any soil, without a hold over any other men; an isolated Individual, in tune, it was true, with the everlasting Soul of the Sun, but without a place anywhere in the human world.

A time probably came when nobody loved him apart from his devoted queen and a handful of faithful friends. And even those were too far below him to understand him to the end. Their love was soothing. But still he was alone. He had always been alone, as one who lived on the plane of eternal truth in the midst of admirers and enemies who all lived in relative truth, if not in falsehood — in time. He only realised it, perhaps, to a greater extent than ever, now that his truth of all times and all lands — the brotherhood of living creatures, and therefore of men — came into open clash with the belief of his age: the necessity of defending an empire on the existence of which was based his own world-supremacy as king of Egypt.

Let us examine, in the light of what we know of the Religion of the Disk, that conflict between the God-conscious, eternal Individual — above country and above time¹ — that Akhnaton was, and the average man, carrying even into the most exalted states the prejudices of his environment, that his contemporaries wanted him to be. We shall perhaps then understand what motives more powerful than self-interest, and more powerful than pity, gave the young Pharaoh the strange courage to set aside the heart-rending letters of his loyal vassals (even those of Ribaddi, of Abdikhpa; even that of the elders of Tunip), and watch his empire go to pieces without interfering.

It may appear less easy to picture to one's self his reactions to the Syrian events than those of either his vassals (loyal or disloyal), his courtiers, his enemies, or his lesser subjects. But to try to do so is essential, for only thus can we hope to understand the value of Akhnaton's example, and the everlasting actuality of his forgotten Teaching.

Breasted, speaking of Aziru's being granted a year's delay, when the king could easily have insisted on his appearing before him at once, says that this "shows the astonishing leniency of Akhnaton, in a manner which would indicate that he was opposed to measures of force such as his fathers had employed."²

There can be no doubt that there was, at the root of the Pharaoh's behaviour towards the men seeking to wreck his empire (or opposing his reforms in Egypt) a spontaneous propensity to kindness. Akhnaton was the last man to be harsh, even to his declared enemies. He realised too well what suffering meant to inflict it or have it inflicted, under any pretext, upon man or beast — even upon a traitor as a punishment; and violence — let alone cruelty — was altogether out of keeping with his tender, sensitive nature.

¹ The real key to Akhnaton's strange "pacifism" lies precisely in the fact that he was a man "above Time" who endeavoured to impose his lofty ideals upon this Dark Age (both his and ours) without taking into account the fact that violence is the law of any revolution within Time, specially in the Dark Age. (The Kali Yuga, of the Hindus.)

² Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 124.

But that would not be enough to explain his apparent apathy throughout the Syrian unrest. The appeals from Irkata, from Simyra and from Tunip, from Byblos and from Jerusalem for immediate succour, were sufficiently distressing, sufficiently pathetic to move the most callous overlord to prompt action. The sufferings of his faithful supporters must have been at least as painful to Akhnaton as those of the discontented cities that welcomed the rule of Amorites (and finally that of the Hittites) in place of his. His attitude was not dictated by mere sentiment. Had it been so, it is probable that, in spite of his reluctance for bloodshed, he would have thrown in all his might on the side of the helpless vassals who begged for his “strong hand” to deliver them. To answer the cry: “Tunip, thy city, weeps . . .” he perhaps would have gone to Syria himself. But it was not a matter of feelings alone. It was a question of principles. “Marshalling the material available for the study of this period of history,” writes Arthur Weigall, “one can interpret the events in Syria in only one way: Akhnaton definitely refused to do battle, believing that a resort to arms was an offence to God. Whether fortune or misfortune, gain or loss, was to be his lot, he would hold to his principles, and would not return to the old gods of battle.”¹

A very important question arises — a question which, as far as we know, has not yet been put forward by any of the writers who exalt or condemn Akhnaton’s “pacifism” — and that is whether or not the young Founder of the Religion of the Disk would have resorted to arms in order to defend Egypt herself, in the eventuality of foreign aggression. No answer can be given, for in his days Egypt was not attacked. Still the point remains; and it is an interesting point. Had the enemies who stood before him been, not the Amorites, the Habiru, the Sa-Gaz — the natives of Syria and Palestine fighting to chase out of their own country its Egyptian overlords and their local supporters — but people from a foreign land rushing across the desert to seize and lay waste his lovely Nile Valley; to destroy the splendid City which he himself had built to be the centre of a world-religion of beauty, the question (even if history can suggest no reply to it) can at least be put: would then Akhnaton have stood back and watched the disaster without trying to prevent it? Would he have tried to prevent it by means other than a resort to armed force? And if those means failed, or were unthinkable (as in the case of an inroad of barbaric hordes that force alone can stop) would he, then, have fought with that self-same indomitable courage that he actually exercised in order to remain inactive?

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 202.

He undoubtedly believed in a religion of universal love which, even if superficially practised by governments as well as by individuals, would make international relations friendly. Did he believe, however, that in a world in which aggression is an impending possibility, a nation should always be, even in peacetime, prepared for war, with up-to-date armaments in sufficient quantity? One would think so, from the few sentences of his letter which we have quoted above.¹ But he never used that power to defend his dominions, to keep conquered land under his sway. Again, would he have done so to protect his native soil?

We leave the reader to think of these questions to which, in the present state of our knowledge, no definite answer can be given on a sound historic basis. The point we wished to stress in raising them is that the immediate problem to which Akhnaton, by his non-intervention in the Syrian unrest, gave the boldest practical solution ever put forth, is not that of war accepted for the defence of one's own country, but that of war waged to defend one's foreign possessions — to keep one's colonies and vassal States under control. And the solution provided by him for the first and, it would also seem, for the last time in history, consisted of nothing less than to watch the struggle of the conquered country's nationalists (as we would call them to-day) against the local supporters of foreign rule, without interfering; to allow the "disloyal" elements to become the masters in their own land, if they really commanded a sufficient following; to let the princes and people of a restless empire fight out their own conflicts, solve their own problems, and create their own history. Furthermore, it consisted of nothing less than to allow even foreign powers to take the upper hand in the affairs of the disaffected land, if such was the consequence of the policy of its successful leaders. In the particular case under study, the one actually to benefit from Aziru's machinations against his Egyptian overlord was ultimately neither Aziru himself nor his people — the Amorites — nor any Syrian impatient of foreign domination, but Shubbiluliuma, king of the Hittites. And Hittite rule was to prove far more exacting, far more ruthless, far more unbearable than the Egyptian. Yet Akhnaton contented himself with severing diplomatic relations with Shubbiluliuma; at least, Shubbiluliuma's written grievances would tend to prove that he did so. But he did nothing to prevent the advance of the Hittite troops and their union with the forces of the local anti-Egyptian princes. He did nothing either to help his loyal vassals, or to help the movement for independence, of which he probably foresaw the gloomy aftermath.

¹ See p. 225.

He acted — or better, abstained from acting — as though the land conquered by his fathers were not his. In other words, from the time he understood that a number of Syrian and Canaanite local dynasts did not want his rule, he ceased to consider himself as their overlord. He styled himself as such, it is true, in the letters that he sent even to such disloyal princes as Aziru. But that was because Aziru and all the others, however wildly anti-Egyptian, maintained a pretence of loyalty in their official correspondence with him. In fact, he never treated them or endeavoured even to treat them as an overlord desiring to stress his rights would have done.

* * *

One must not imagine that Akhnaton's position as an absolute "non-imperialist" at the head of an empire was an easy or a pleasant one. He suffered, in order to maintain it, and to leave the world the unique example which he left, even in what appeared to be an all-round failure. The modern commentators of his history seem to forget this fact, when they hasten to tax him with "supineness and apathy." He suffered; and no man having a heart can remain unmoved at the idea of the superhuman courage with which he stood to the end, in the midst of increasing disaster and hatred, firm in the truth which he had realised.

It is true that, far from experiencing the greed of a conqueror, he was alien to that particular pride which many great rulers seems to have drawn from the tranquil possession of other people's territory. Even his own territory he regarded first as "his Father's" — as the domain of the Sun, where man and beast were to thrive in love and happiness; not as the property of any earthly monarch. "Hills, deserts, embankments, high-lands, low-lands, islands, villages, men, beasts . . . all things which the Aton produces, and on which His rays shine, they shall be for the Father, the living Aton . . ." had he said in one of the boundary-inscriptions when he had laid the foundations of his sacred City — the model of a world governed by his spirit. And one may believe, from his attitude towards his dominions, that he regarded them, too, from the beginning, not as his personal property, nor as an annexe of Egypt, but as lands of the Sun — as were, in his eyes, all lands on earth; as countries that existed, not for a few Egyptians to draw profit out of them, but for them themselves to flourish and be happy, with all the creatures that the One Sun of the whole world nourished upon their surface. To believe in the "rights" of one nation over others would have been to him (from all we know of his religion) a return to the idolatrous worship of local gods. He did not, he could not, regret the loss of Syria and Palestine in themselves.

But he could not lightly brush aside his feelings for his subjects who struggled and suffered there, in the midst of the turmoil of civil war, supporters of Egypt against the supporters of Amor or of the Hittites. His vivid imagination, of which we have a proof in his poems, must have brought before his eyes, so as to say, all the horror of the battles and sieges which the messengers described to him with the eloquence of despair. And he knew he could put a stop to that horror, and bring back peace and normal life to Syria whenever he liked, with one single order. Only that order would have implied that the loyal vassals fighting for him had more the right to rule Syria than the disloyal ones, fighting for themselves (or, unknowingly, for the king of the Hittites); that Syria was his, because his fathers had conquered it, before being, like all the world, the free land of Him Who made it and fed it — the Sun's. Such an order he could not give. The universal fatherhood of the Sun meant, to him, the universal brotherhood of nations no less than of individuals. To him there could not be two standards of behaviour: one for individual men and the other for States. One nation could not overrule another, unless the people of that other were happy to remain under its domination. One man — even he; nay, especially he, the conscious Son of the Sun — could not assert his suzerainty over others against their will as clearly expressed as was the will of the Syrian and Canaanite princes in their long-stretched anti-Egyptian agitation. Such overlordship bred hatred, even as conquest itself bred hatred. It was an expression of separateness; a denial of the world's unity. He, Akhnaton, Son of the Sun, and one with the One Father of all life, could not go against the law of love which was the great law of life, revealed to him from within.

On the other hand, he could not abdicate — run away from the pressing empire problems. He could not say: "I have not conquered the empire; it is no concern of mine." The facts were there; he had to face them, if his lofty religion was to be of any meaning in the living, struggling world. By remaining in constant and painful touch with the realities of a widespread colonial revolt — the consequence of conquest, that is to say of greed, that ultimate source of all wars — and yet by refusing to keep his empire by force; by retaining to the end a non-imperialistic attitude, he had to demonstrate that the law of love and freedom, in which he believed, should be and can be the basis of international relations. He had to remain deaf to the cries of distress of those who loved him and wanted his rule, in order to allow all the princes of Syria to have their say and play their part in the affairs of the land of their fathers, and to put, once for all, an end to the situation which had led to the anti-Egyptian unrest — to the injustice and hatred resulting from the Egyptian conquest. In order to be true to the Sun, his Father, Who made all lands and favours none, he had to take the course which he took.

But it was not a pleasant course — far from it. Akhnaton stood aloof from the war that was raging throughout his Asiatic dominions; he did not remain unmoved. On the contrary, one cannot but believe that the desperate letters he received from his faithful servants were to him “as so many sword-thrusts,” and “one may picture him praying passionately for strength to set them aside.”¹ He gladly sacrificed the riches of Syria to the central idea of his religion and to the consistency of his life. He accepted the loss of the cities which, like Byblos, contained “a quantity of gold and silver and a great amount of property of all sorts.”² It was less easy for him to forsake, even in the name of the same high principles, the men who were dying for the cause of imperial Egypt on the ramparts of those cities, with the love of his name in their hearts. Those alone who can realise the depth of his love — and they are not many — can hope to realise something of that “very Agony”³ which he suffered when reading the lamentable despatch from the people of Tunip, or Ribaddi’s last messages from the midst of a starving city. And what added to his suffering was, no doubt, the fact that it was impossible for him to make anyone understand the motives of his apparently strange attitude. Nobody, not even those who professed to be his followers, could, it seems, make out why his devotion to Aton, the One Sun, the One God, should clash with his imperial “duties.” For they could not realise what the One Sun meant to him. They thought that he who had built in Syria a town destined to be, like Akhetaton itself, a radiating centre of the new faith, would naturally do anything in his power to keep Syria under control, that he might win it over entirely to his God. They could not realise that Akhnaton's impersonal God, the Energy within the Disk, was not one to whom worshippers can be brought by a show of force; that knowledge, genuine religious experience, the vivid consciousness of universal unity and universal order were at the basis of his cult, and that the hatred generated by conquest and kept alive in the conquered people by measures of violence, was utterly uncongenial to the creation of those conditions. The far-sighted logic of his attitude was alien to them. Even his beloved queen, Nefertiti, could probably not follow him. She just accepted what he did, out of personal devotion to him, without judging him, and kept her confidence in his mission, till the end, because she loved him.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 209.

² Letter K. 137, quoted above.

³ Arthur Weigall: Life and Times of Akhnaton (New and Revised Edit. 1922), p. 207.

And if his closest friends and disciples could not transcend with him the deep-rooted imperialism of their time (and of many a time to come), how was he to justify his attitude in the eyes of the men who were fighting for him in faraway Syria, most of whom still clung (as their letters show) to the national gods that he had abolished? How was he to tell the messenger who brought him the distressed letter from Tunip, why he was sending him back without a promise of help? How was he to explain to Ribaddi's son why he could send no troops to his father or to anyone? (That is perhaps the reason why he kept the young man waiting three months and a half before deciding to speak to him.)

Still, he himself could not help seeing both sides of the conflict. He felt sympathy for his faithful vassals; he could not help feeling sympathy also for the "unfaithful" ones who were seeking to overthrow his rule, as his fathers had once overthrown the rule of the foreign Hyksos kings in Egypt. He could not help knowing that, at the root of all the trouble, lay the hatred that conquest always generates in a conquered people.

The One Father — the Sun — had made all nations "distinct in speech and in the colour of their skin,” and He poured His life-giving rays over all of them. All were to live, happy and beautiful, and at peace. Conquest, the fruit of greed, was, like all forms of outrage, conceivable only to those who did not love the One Sun enough to love all His creatures impartially. And he, the Son of the universal Father — he who felt His divine Energy vibrating through his own nerves — could not lend himself to the holding down of a restless conquered land. He could not prolong a state of things which ignorance, self-pride, and greed had once created. He was to have nothing to do with “imperial duties” that were in contradiction with the principle of impartial love. It was not for him, who lived in Truth, to defend an order based upon falsehood.

* * *

Akhnaton died prematurely. And it is possible that the grief he felt for those whom he appeared to be abandoning hastened his death. “With him,” writes Breasted, passed away “such a spirit as the world had never seen before,”¹ and we add: such as was never to reappear since. Eleven hundred years after him, India’s great emperor Asoka was one day to renounce war in the name of the Buddha’s message of universal love. But the question did not arise for him to retain or to lose for its sake the lands he had inherited from his fathers. He was allowed to die leaving his vast dominions prosperous and whole. Akhnaton seems to be the one king in history who, for the sake of a philosophy which logically excluded the support of any form of aggression, actually lost a great empire. The tragic circumstances which we have tried to recall and, on the other hand, the tremendous might and wealth that the young Pharaoh could have used to defend his imperial rights, make his sacrifice all the more remarkable.

And his message of love as a basis of international relations, in the place of the time-honoured law of violence; his refusal to subscribe to conquest as a fait accompli of which the advantages to the conquering nation should be maintained anyhow — an attitude too modern for most rulers of men in our times — are all the more impressive precisely because they were proclaimed, not from a demagogue's platform by a handful of hungry mob-agitators, but from a throne, by the hereditary owner of the greatest empire of his days; by an absolute monarch, fully conscious of his immense wealth and power; by an emperor, whom his subjects were taught by tradition to look upon as divine — without their realising how truly godlike he actually was.

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 127.

CHAPTER XTHE REWARD OF WAR

It is clear from the evidence of the Amarna Letters that, had he consented to use violence, Akhnaton could easily have stemmed the tide of events and saved the Egyptian empire, thus giving a different direction to the whole political evolution of the Near East for many centuries.

Several modern writers have criticised him for not having done so, some indeed with as much bitter vehemence as though they saw in his “pacifism” a dangerous example to the present-day owners of foreign empires. But none seem to have noticed that, apart from all political considerations, the very history of civilisation in the Near East — and subsequently in the West — would probably have been much altered had the young Pharaoh cared to quell rebellion in his Syrian dominion in the fourteenth century B.C.

However useless it may appear to ponder over possibilities which have never materialised, yet we may be excused for doing so if the sheer vision of such possibilities helps us to realise more completely the true meaning of an extraordinary man, and to interpret his decisions with a keener knowledge of their remote consequences.

* * *

So let us suppose for a moment that, unlike himself, Akhnaton had yielded to the supplications of his few loyal vassals and sent them timely help against the Amorite chieftains and their supporters. Let us even suppose that he had marched in person into Syria, with archers and chariots and all the awe-inspiring apparel of war, as any of his fathers would have done.

It is highly probable — practically certain — that in such a case the “sons of Abdashirta” would have been utterly defeated from the start, and the Syrian rebellion nipped in the bud. In spite of long years of peace, Egypt was still a first-rate military power and, moreover, the aid that was needed to re-assert her prestige was, in the beginning, extremely slight. (Let us remember Ribaddi's letter to Akhnaton, before his position in Byblos became tragic: "May it seem good to the king my Lord to send me but three hundred soldiers and twenty pair of horses, and I will hold the city. . . .")

The youthful Founder of the Religion of the Disk would have returned in triumph to his capital, and the new City of the Horizon of Aton would have gazed upon one of those impressive displays of warrior-like pomp such as Thebes had witnessed in former days. And the bitterness and resentment caused by the erasure of the name of Amon from every stone and by the king's other decrees, and by his whole struggle against the national gods, would have been forgotten in a cry of victory; and Egypt would probably have accepted the rational worship of Aton, the One and Only God, without further murmurs.

Not that the people or even the nobles would have understood it, or felt its beauty, any better than they actually did. But they would have accepted it, as the expression of the sweet will of a popular king. The fact that, in spite of his revolutionary decrees, not a single rising is reported against his government in Egypt during all his reign, proves that Akhnaton was popular enough among his subjects, although of course hated by the priests. The only thing the Egyptians could not bring themselves to do for his sake was to renounce their traditional objects of worship in favour of a higher one. The only force that could have — and probably would have — led them to forsake even their beloved gods, at the command of him whom they still regarded as a god incarnate, was the prestige of victory added to that of royalty.

The orders of a monarch who has brought an empire to ruin, even if he be of divine descent, do not indeed carry the same weight as those of a triumphant king. There is, in armed success, a magic that commands respect, whatever be the personal views of the lucky warrior. One has seen in modern times, nay, in our own days, men inferior by far to Akhnaton in genius and in character succeed in stamping their will upon a reluctant nation, just because they had, first, led that nation to victory upon the battlefield. And we believe that nothing would have reconciled the unwilling Egyptians to the new order installed by their inspired ruler as the knowledge that he had saved them and their empire from imminent danger. And if it be true, as some have suggested, that shadowy elements of treason lurked at the very court of Akhetaton,¹ then nothing would have confounded the hopes of the king's enemies at home so much as the sight of their Syrian accomplice, the crafty Aziru, led in chains through the streets of the capital, with some hundreds of other captives of rank.

The more we think of the situation created in Egypt by Akhnaton's zeal for truth, the more we are convinced that brilliant military achievements beyond the Sinai Desert were the one and only means for him to secure the lasting success of his reforms at home.

* * *

The enduring success of Akhnaton's religion in Egypt would have meant more than a change of cult. It would have meant new standards in art and in behaviour; sincerity of thought, freedom of expression, a critical, disinterested, truth-loving attitude in all walks of life; in one word, a new life.

What is left of the Amarna sculpture and painting shows us the beginning of an amazing return to personal inspiration in art, to naturalness, to freedom. With the failure of the Religion of the Disk, the artistic movement linked with it was stifled to death at its very outset. What it would have been, had it lived, is difficult to say. But one may imagine, from its earliest creations, which are well known to us, that it would have anticipated ideals of beauty that we now call "modern," putting far greater stress upon expression than upon lines, and striving to reveal the inner nature, the “meaning,” so as to say, of things, rather than their exact or embellished physical likeness.

¹ J. Baikie: The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 362.

We can somewhat picture to ourselves the subsequent development of Egypt had her art, henceforth, been inspired by the Amarna standards, had her religion remained that which Akhnaton preached, and had there appeared, from time to time, especially among her ruling classes, true disciples of the One-who-lived-in-Truth, who would have modelled their lives upon his; had, in one word, her whole civilisation retained, even to a faint degree, the double mark of rationalism and of universal kindness and the essentially aesthetic outlook on life that characterised her only truly divine king. Then, even making the indispensable allowances for human wickedness and stupidity, the country, merely by seeking to walk in the trail of such a man as Akhnaton, would have put itself far ahead of all the neighbouring nations. It would have been a modern country in the midst of the Ancient World — but a modern country retaining all that was lovely in ancient life; a modern country without the horrors that our world of to-day has brought into existence by the import of greater technical efficiency combined with less reason, less inspiration, and less love.

* * *

But Egypt was not alone concerned. She occupied in the world, then, the position of a great power. Her gods, like those of all leading nations, were worshipped beyond her boundaries. It is possible, even probable, that the cult of Aton had not reached, in Akhnaton’s days, the limits of the Egyptian dominions. The elders of Tunip do not seem to have heard of it, otherwise how could they write to the king that “the gods of Egypt” dwell in their city? But there is little doubt that, had it once been able to establish itself firmly in the Nile Valley, the Religion of the Disk would have spread throughout the empire and even to allied countries; to all lands where the power of the Pharaoh was dreaded and his name held in reverence. From Napata to Carchemish, over a stretch of twenty degrees of latitude, the name of Aton, the God above all gods, would have become familiar to people of the most various races; to the sturdy mountaineers of the regions bordering Assyria; to the subtle, mystic, pleasure-loving people of Syria; to the fair Northerners of Aryan descent who ruled the land of Mitanni, as well as to the dusky Nubians and Ethiopians, and to the Negroes of the farthest South.

How little those myriads of men would have grasped of the true spirit of Akhnaton's Teaching it is useless to say. But even a partial and altogether outward knowledge of it would have sufficed to impress upon them the idea of the excellence of a natural worship, of cosmic significance, over their thousand and one man-made cults of local scope. It would have sufficed, also, to inspire all those who were susceptible of some refinement with the feeling of the beauty of the world and of the unity of all life.

And possibly Egypt and the adjoining countries would have remained, to this day, faithful to the cult of the One God manifested in the Sun. It seems indeed doubtful whether any later monotheistic creed would have found adherents among thinking people already acquainted for centuries with Akhnaton's Teaching.

* * *

And that is not all. The worship of Aton, had it remained the State-religion of Egypt — of a victorious Egypt, mistress of her empire — would have undoubtedly influenced the whole evolution of Western thought and culture.

Even in her decline, after every sort of originality had been killed in her priest-ridden people, Egypt, which had sunk to the level of a third-rate nation, still exerted a lasting influence upon Greece. What would that influence have been, had Egypt remained powerful a few centuries longer, and had the simple and rational Sun-worship preached by Akhnaton continued to hold sway over her, instead of the more and more formal, the more and more fossilised cult of her primitive gods? A glance at these possibilities will be enough to show what Akhnaton could perhaps have done, had he but consented to utter a word in favour of war.

As we have already many times remarked, the whole of the young king's Teaching is characterised by an unusual rationality, allied to an overwhelming sense of beauty. It is probable that, in the days of its Founder — two hundred years before the Trojan War — no account of it reached the shores of Greece. And had, by chance, some exiled Egyptian ever carried it there, we do not know what impression it would have left upon the people of Tiryns and Mykaenae. But had the scientific-minded leaders of Grecian thought come in contact with the Teaching some centuries later, at the time Greece was ready to enter the maturity of her classical age, then, we believe, the history of Western civilisation would have been different.

The sceptical Athenian mind, while continuing to pay a customary allegiance to "the gods of the city," would have welcomed that rational creed that put stress upon nothing which is outside the reach of man's experience; that related no incredible deeds, no childish fables. The few who aspired to something more than intellectual certitude would have recognised the truth in a Teaching that implied the oneness and sacredness of life. And the Greeks at large would have felt in Akhnaton's worship — and in his hymns, and in the story of his life, also — a thing of beauty unsurpassed even in their own land of light and harmony.

And slowly the time would have come for a great change in the consciousness of the ancient world; the time when, tired of conflicting philosophies as well as of rites and mysteries of which they had forgotten the sense, the Greeks would have begun to aspire to Something unknown which they could neither define nor invent; the time when, in one word, the need of a broader and kinder outlook even than that of the best Athenians would have begun to be felt throughout the Hellenised world. Then, instead of turning her eyes to any new creed, perhaps Greece would have simply drifted from the worship of her many gods to that of the Only One revealed to men and to all creatures through the flaming Disk of the Sun. And without sacrificing anything of her passionate love of life and visible beauty, without also forcing herself to accept any dogmas “beyond reason” or “above reason” — or against reason — perhaps she would have made the fourteen-hundred-year-old Religion of the Disk the creed of her people for all times to come.

There would have been no conflict between an “old” and a “new” order, but merely a gradual absorption of the popular religions of Greece and Rome into the decorous simplicity of a more rational, more spiritual, and more ancient one, already held in regard by the elite of the Greek-speaking East.

And slowly but steadily, along with the culture and learning of the Mediterranean, the antique worship of Aton would have spread over barbaric Europe, replacing the popular cults of the North after those of Asia Minor, Greece and Italy. On the borders of the Danube and of the Rhine, on the misty shores of the Baltic and of the North Sea, temples containing no image but the Sun Disk with rays ending in hands would have been erected in honour of the One God — Cosmic Energy.

And one day, the Spanish caravelles would have carried the lofty symbol across the Atlantic, and the Religion of the Disk would have become the religion of the West.

* * *

Would the West, then, have been any better than it is? Probably not. Since with all the overwhelming loveliness of his living personality Akhnaton could not, in his days, improve human nature, it is doubtful whether his surviving Teaching — somewhat distorted, as might be expected, by clumsy interpreters — would have been able to accomplish that miracle.

Most probably the same passions would have disturbed the peace of the world. But they would not have been fanned by religious fanaticism, and that alone would have made an enormous difference. The opposition of the different national polytheisms to the universal worship of such a God as the Sun would never, it seems, have taken the form of such a ferocious conflict as witnessed in the first centuries of the Christian era between the same old national cults and the Gospel preached by Paul of Tarsus. The adoration of light is a thing so natural — and, in its crude forms, so universally spread — that it would have been easy to convince both philosophers and barbarians of its excellence. The Emperor Julian would have been the first one to encourage a creed more rational and no less aesthetic than those of his Greek masters. And the Western world would never have known such atrocities as the ghastly murder of Hypatia or the mass-massacre of the Saxons. There would have not been any equivalent of the Crusades, or of the wars of the Arabs for the conversion of Infidels, or of the Holy Inquisition. Greed and cruelty would have remained, but in order to gratify such base passions it would hardly have been possible to exploit a religion free from puerile hopes no less than from superstitious fears, and whose Founder had never made a duty of proselytism.

No doubt, one day, the newly-discovered hemisphere would have been overrun by the same merciless adventurers in search of gold; and the same battles would have raged in Mexico, in Guatemala and in Peru, around the last bastions of American independence. But they would have been battles frankly fought for the possession of earthly goods, not for the triumph of the Faith, not for the salvation of souls, not “for the greatest glory of God.” The interview of Pizarro and Atahualpa would have been different. In the God of the Inca, “Who lives for ever in the sky,” the Spanish conqueror would have recognised his own God. And both he and the Peruvian king would have felt that, whatever be their behaviour towards each other, they — and their people — had in common something vital. And, while subjugated by a superior science of arms, the fortunate people of the New World would have learnt to link what was the best in their own traditions with a purer and more rational worship of the Sun.

And that is not all.

It seems probable that, had it become and remained the religion of Europe and America (and Australia), the Religion of the Disk would have largely contributed to bridge the gap between East and West and to hasten the day of universal understanding.

However different may appear the pre-eminently dynastic Sun-cult of modern Japan from the essentially universal, non-political cult of Aton, the fact remains that it is still Sun-worship. And a disciple of Akhnaton would not feel himself out of place amidst a group of pilgrims devoutly greeting, from the top of one of Japan's sacred mountains, the rising in glory of the One eternal "Lord and Origin of life." And, as for the Hindus, their highest conception of Sun-worship (expressed in the Gayatri Mantra, that every true Brahman recites at dawn, his folded hands lifted in praise to the rising Sun) is practically identical with that upheld by Akhnaton. It is the adoration, not of the material Disk, but of the Energy within the Disk. And if there be a country in which the Egyptian king's Teaching still gives, to the very few who know of it, the impression of something entirely familiar, that country is surely India.

Now let us for a while try to imagine what the relations of Europe with the East would have been — nay, what the relations of India and the Far East would have been with the people of West Asia — had the timely success of the Religion of the Disk rendered the expansion of any later monotheism unnecessary and therefore impossible. The oppositions that lie at the bottom of the great conflicts of the Middle Ages — opposition of Christian Byzantium to Zoroastrian Persia; of Christian Europe to the growing power of Islam; of Islam, both to Christian Europe and to the older cultures of Persia and India — would never have existed, and the history of the Middle Ages would have been entirely different. Later on, European merchants and adventurers might well have aimed at political and economic domination over the technically less developed nations of Asia; but the idea of cultural domination, brought about through religious proselytism, would have occurred to nobody. At most, the people of Persia, of India and of further Asia might have learnt to look upon the Founder of the Western Sun-worship as an equal of their own greatest teachers, and his name, already revered from Abyssinia to Iceland and from Peru to the Arabian Desert, would have become familiar to the limits of the earth. And the people of Europe and America would have considered with friendly sympathy foreign religions of a naturalistic, non-dogmatic character, if not always similar to their own, at least less different from it than they appear now to be.

In spite of the same colonial wars, prompted by the same lust for riches and power, there would have been more understanding, more cultural unity — or, in a way, less opposition — between East and West. And the world to-day would have been, if not more peaceful, at least better prepared to realise its fundamental unity within everlasting diversity. On the whole, it would have been, it seems, a better world.

* * *

This retrospective vision of centuries of would-be history is staggering. Yet we believe it is not the projection of a pure fancy. That gigantic dream of ours was, thirty-three hundred years ago, a living possibility. That more rational, more harmonised, more beautiful world, united under the symbol of the Sun-disk with rays ending in hands could have, and probably would have become the reality of to-day, had then the one man with a clear vision of the truth used his wealth and power to keep the empire of his fathers, and to force his will upon his people and upon men at large.

That better world — and that far-shed glory; that praise of men from ocean to ocean and from pole to pole, for ever — was the possible reward of a short and successful punitive expedition against a handful of agitators. Less than that; it was the reward of an order to Horemheb, or to any other of his generals, to march into Syria, without the king even taking the trouble of going there himself; the remote consequence of a mere word.

But, for the reasons we have seen — and perhaps for others, too — that word was never uttered.

While the distressed letters from his loyal vassals came pouring in from Syria, Akhnaton quietly continued to greet the rising and setting Sun as though, to him, nothing else counted. He read the pathetic messages one after the other — in what spirit and with what reactions he alone knew. And he spoke not. He refused to set in motion the long series of events that would have given him, perhaps, in course of time, uncontested spiritual domination over the Western World.

CHAPTER XI

THE PRICE OF PERFECTION

There can be little doubt that, as time passed on, and as hard facts forced themselves upon him, Akhnaton became more and more aware of the difficulty of the task he had chosen. The strongly organised opposition of the priests that he never succeeded in breaking,¹ and above all the indifference which he detected, under a show of courteous sympathy or even of praise, in the greater number of those upon whom he had relied, taught him that there was nothing to expect from persuasion. And it seems impossible for him not to have understood, with his keen intelligence, that the only way to lasting religious domination left to him was that of immediate violence.

The common people of Egypt — like the common people of all countries in all times — were to be led like a flock of sheep. They would listen to the priests as long as there were priests to be listened to. Akhnaton knew it. The one and only way to put an end to the influence of Amon's servants upon the ignorant folk was to have them exterminated. But, as we have already seen, the king did nothing of the kind. He was content to confiscate the scandalous wealth of the priests; and he let their persons go uninjured. As for the educated and well-to-do Egyptians, who knew what the greatness of Egypt and her empire meant to them in riches and prestige, their permanent adherence to the new Teaching depended largely upon its value as a national creed. There are reasons to believe that even such a man as Merira, the High-priest of Aton, on whom the king had founded great hopes, failed to stand by his Master when he realised that the Religion of the Disk was costing Egypt her empire. Akhnaton knew that also. And a time must have come when he beheld, with desperate lucidity, the choice set before him: either to wage war upon Aziru and his allies, to re-assert the right of Egypt to be the leading nation, and to win for himself, in return, the triumph of the cult of Aton; or else, to continue following the path he had taken, and to end in disaster, in anathema, and finally in oblivion.

¹ Breasted: Cambridge Ancient History (Edit. 1924), Vol. II, p. 126.

* * *

The religious success that the Pharaoh could contemplate as the reward of a compromise would surely seem small to us, compared with that staggering domination of more than half the globe that we have tried to describe in the preceding chapter. It was, however, no less impressing to him who considered its possibility. To Akhnaton, the country that contained the unknown sources of the Nile, and the mysterious lands that lay beyond the pale of Hatti, of barbaric Assyria and of distant Elam, may have seemed to be the limits of the earth. But knowing, as he certainly did, what a force Egypt represented in the midst of the surrounding nations, he must have clearly realised that, if successful at home, his religion would have spread even to the farthestmost regions that he could imagine. And the triumph which he thus anticipated must have appeared to him as universal. It was the triumph of reason, the triumph of truth; the beginning of a kindlier and more beautiful world. It was the fulfilment of his lifelong struggle, which had so far seemed fruitless; the magnificent reward that would outweigh for all times to come the bitterness of the few years in which he had stood alone, misunderstood or hated — it was his triumph.

If we recall the foundation of Akhetaton, the new capital of Egypt, in the midst of solemn festivities, it cannot but strike us that, once at least in his short career, Akhnaton had desired success. An inscription, carved out on one of the boundary-stones of the City, and relating to the king's burial, reflects his joyous hopes. "And there shall be made for me a sepulchre in the Eastern hills," runs the writing; "my burial shall be made there in the multitude of jubilees that Aton, my Father, hath ordained for me, and the burial of the queen shall be made there in that multitude of years.” Obviously, he then visualised the life that spread before him, as a long succession of radiant years in which the truth that he felt so deeply would triumph through him. He had the self-confidence of youth, the unhesitating optimism of intense desire allied to boundless power. It was his will to change the face of things; he had no doubt that he would do so. And he was too human not to feel the thrill of coming glory.

And now, that glory was at hand, if he so wished. The words inscribed upon stone at his command, ten years before, could still be true. At the cost of a slight compromise — so slight that nobody would ever find it out — his name, otherwise destined to be cursed and to perish, could still be honoured “in a multitude of jubilees,” not during his lifetime (his health was ruined, and he knew his end was near), but during the countless centuries the world had yet to live. If he so wished, the future of mankind could still be brightened by his light, and marked with his sign.

The few sincere disciples he still retained at court — with probably the admirable exception of his consort — were impatient to hear him utter the word that implied compromise and success; to hear him give the order to save the empire.

Why then did Akhnaton remain silent?

* * *

Surely the young Pharaoh did not thrust aside the responsibilities of his position out of sheer carelessness, as some of his malevolent modern detractors have tried to insinuate. To suppose such a thing would be to ignore the unquestionable seriousness of his whole life.

As we have said, there seems to have been, at the back of Akhnaton’s attitude towards the Syrian events, an innate repulsion for bloodshed. The idea of war, like that of persecution, was repugnant to his sensitive nature. The brutalities inherent to any punitive expedition seemed to him too irredeemably ugly even to be tolerated as a necessary evil.

But it would not be doing full justice to his memory to look upon the king of Egypt as the Bronze Age equivalent of our modern pacifists. Akhnaton was neither a Christian nor a democrat. His religion was, as we have seen, before all, an aesthetic one. His morality sprang from his all-pervading sense of beauty. His conscientious objection to war was not the product of any narrow, uncritical love confined to the human species, but the logical consequence of his serene understanding of universal harmony. He desired to see the behaviour of intelligent beings (and especially his own) reflect, as far as possible, the beautiful inner order of the Cosmos. And he hated all forms of cruelty — the worst conceivable expressions of moral ugliness.

And the instance of history would tend to point out that, among these, there were some that shocked him more than war did. For it may be remembered that, in his new City consecrated to Aton, he built shrines to the memory of his ancestors, Amenhotep the Second and Thutmose the Third, who were among the foremost warriors of the ancient world, and that he did, at least once — after the fall of Simyra — allow an Egyptian officer to go to Ribaddi's rescue, with a small force of mercenaries. And, a little later, in the long indignant letter which he addressed to Aziru after Ribaddi's tragic death, he threatened his treacherous vassal in words that show clearly enough that he was perfectly conscious of his rights as an imperial sovereign and that, whatever his distaste for violence, he was the last man to consider it sinful to chastise a scoundrel and reaffirm the dictates of justice. "If thou, for any cause, wishest to do evil," says he to the Amorite, "or if thou even settest words of evil in thy heart, then wilt thou die, together with thy family, by the axe of the king thy Lord."¹

On the other hand, in glowing contrast with the annals of other Pharaohs and of kings of various countries, before and after him, there has not yet been found, among all the documents of Akhnaton's reign, a single record of chase, as we remarked in a previous chapter. And it may be inferred that he condemned that cruel sport far more uncompromisingly than he did the more gallant fighting of man against man — an assumption which fits well with all that we know of the king through his hymns.

¹ Letter K. 162, quoted by J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), pp. 371-372.

We therefore think it would be a mistake to suppose that the sole cause of his inaction in the Syrian affair was Akhnaton's belief in a creed condemning war indiscriminately. Had it been so, such a consistent man as he was would never have allowed Pakhura to go north with his soldiers; nor would he, in the only letter of his which we possess, have spoken as a monarch instead of speaking as a preacher. It is much more probable that Akhnaton's attitude to war was a negative one; an attitude of non-interest, rather than one of systematic opposition.

The Founder of the Religion of the Disk seems to have seen both sides of the problem of violence. All atrocities disgusted him, whatever were the "higher motives" that urged men to commit them. And he was aware — as the most intelligent among our modern "conscientious objectors" — that war leads nowhere in the long run. He saw things, not from a national point of view, not even from a human point of view, but from that of Cosmic reality. And therefore it mattered little to him whether Egypt had an empire or not. He was not prepared to encourage the brutalities which he repudiated in his heart, just for the sake of securing for his people the undisturbed possession of Syria's resources. It was his concern for Ribaddi, whom he personally loved, not the lust for territorial greatness, that urged him once to permit help to be sent to him, and another time to write to his murderer with the sternness of a judge. But he knew all the time that the horrors of war were unavoidable as long as man did not change his heart. And his life-long struggle against superstition, greed and deceit had made him aware that such a change is not easy, perhaps even not possible on a broad scale — a thing which our modern pacifists too often forget. He knew that, with all the power inherited from generations of king-gods, he could do nothing to stop the fighting going on within his realm. The only reasonable course left to him was indeed to keep himself aloof from it, serene and alone as he had always been. And that is precisely what he did.

* * *

But what astonishes the modern man perhaps more than Akhnaton's total absence of "imperialism" is his apparent indifference to the success of his religion, which largely depended, as he knew, upon his own prestige as a "strong" monarch, in the worldly sense. If he so loved his faithful servant, Ribaddi, as to allow, at least once, some troops to be sent to his rescue (and that, in spite of his personal distaste for war) then, how did he not consider it worth while despatching more substantial help to all his loyal vassals, including Ribaddi, and, if necessary, marching into Syria himself, if not to defend the interests of Egypt, at least to secure, through the glamour of victory, the adherence of Egypt to his Teaching?

The only answer is that he probably cared less for the success of his Teaching than for its purity. And he knew that success and purity seldom go together. He was not over-impressed by numbers, as lesser men often are. He knew their futility in the long run. What he wanted was that those who would "hearken to his Teaching" should mould their lives upon it — "live in truth," as he did. And experience had made him aware that very few were able to do so.

When, followed by more than eighty thousand people,¹ he had left Thebes and laid the foundations of his new capital, he may have for a time rejoiced at the idea of his Teaching spreading to the limits of his dominions and beyond. If not, one could hardly explain why he took the trouble of founding at least two other centres of rational Sun-worship, one at each end of his vast empire. But at the time the Syrian rebellion had reached its climax, Akhnaton had probably become conscious of the uselessness of all efforts to make his religion a success among men, if it was to remain as beautiful and as rational as he had conceived it. He knew that, in spite of all the care he had taken to make it accessible to the most intelligent of his courtiers, he had no true disciple, except perhaps his loving consort. And there is a note of pessimism in the well-known verse of the hymn to Aton: “There is none who knoweth Thee, save Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-ra Ua-en-ra. . . .” It expresses, no doubt, as we have said before, the certitude that God, or the Supreme Reality, has no meaning but for the individual soul who feels itself identical with Him, in its essence. But it may equally well be taken as Akhnaton’s sad admission, after years of fruitless efforts, that truth of the nature of that which he possessed is uncommunicable, and that those who abide in it shall always remain alone.

¹ Arthur Weigall: Short History of Ancient Egypt (Edit. 1934), pp. 149-150.

In that case, what was the value of worldly success? Of name? Of fame? Even of the recognised spiritual leadership of half the globe or more? It was as nothing.

Akhnaton knew that by keeping his empire whole he could soon propagate his religion as far as the remotest countries he could think of. But he could also foresee that the cult that would perhaps, one day, unite those distant lands in the glorification of his name would no longer be the religion of Life in truth as he had conceived it, and taught it, and lived it — pure, rational, unstained by fear or cruelty, daily drawing its inspiration from the joy of the rising Sun. No. It would perhaps be something better than what men had called “religion” until then; it would perhaps even be something better than what the majority of mankind would ever accept, in the future, as a guide to a higher life. But it would never be, on a broad scale, that glorious worship he had dreamt of in his days of youthful hopes — the true Religion of the Disk.

It was certainly no use silencing his personal disgust for bloodshed, and compromising with his principles, merely to magnify, in space and time, the disappointing triumph he had already experienced during his short career. If the elite of Egypt had not really accepted his Teaching, what would the empire at large and the nations beyond the empire make of it, even if one day they could be brought to pay an outward homage to it? What would most men of the future ages make of it, when in their hearts they probably would not feel its truth; when they would not understand it, not love it, not want it? Akhnaton saw clearly that his religious leadership, when extended to millions, would amount to nothing but the gradual reinstalment of superstition, under the cover of his name — the degradation of his dearest dreams. And he refused to give his sanction to it. We have seen already that he had never tried to spread his lofty cult among the commoners of Egypt, knowing that it would doubtless have been wasted upon them. And one may safely believe that, even if he could have imagined, as we do now, the possibility of the Religion of the Disk becoming one day the official faith of such faraway continents as America and Australia, at the cost of a compromise that could seem trifling, he still would not have stirred his little finger to promote such a success. The disappointment of triumph on a small scale and for a few brief years was enough.

* * *

We should say more. A compromise with what appeared to him as ugly or irrational was, in Akhnaton's estimation, nothing but a lie in disguise, and could therefore never be overlooked as a trifle. The young Pharaoh understood more vividly than any man the joy of all creatures to live and see the beauty of the Sun. If he could do nothing to stop the bloodshed in Syria, at least he would do nothing to encourage it. (Perhaps even the threat he formulated in his letter to Aziru was but a verbal intimidation, destined to make the Amorite give up his treacherous intrigues.)

As we have already remarked, Akhnaton does not seem to have shared the contempt affected by some of our contemporaries for all conquerors. But he knew how different the implications of his own Teaching were from those of the creed of his ancestors, who worshipped national gods. For them, to glory in their conquests had been natural. But for him, to be responsible for a war would have been to lie to himself. And neither the repeated warnings of his governors that his empire was going to ruin if he did not intervene speedily, nor the tears of the men of faraway Tunip, who still blessed his name in their distress, nor the more lofty consideration that victory would extend far and wide the sway of his religion of love and reason, could move him to subscribe to such a lie. Akhnaton was not one of those who justify the use of any effective means provided they forward a “higher end.” In his eyes, the mere fact of introducing falsehood into his own life would have killed for ever the spirit of the Religion of the Disk. It was better to sacrifice, then and there, its chances of worldly domination. In consequence, no answer came to the call of the loyal vassals of Egypt in Syria and Canaan. And, in the words of Abdikhipa, governor of Jerusalem, “all the lands of the king” were actually lost.

* * *

From the moment Akhnaton refused to bend his uncompromising logic to the exigencies of ordinary colonial policy, the fate of his beautiful Sun-worship, at least as a State-religion, was sealed. No later compromise could henceforth be introduced, by subtle casuistry, to make it “fit in” with the accepted conceptions of national grandeur, or with the accepted opinion that any course of action is good which leads to the attainment of a “higher goal.” The Founder of the Religion of the Disk — unlike that of more than one other religion — had once and for all barred the possibility of such convenient adjustments, by the bold example of his own solution of the problem of religion and State. He had made it clear that, to him, there was no higher goal than that of “life in truth,” which is another word for individual perfection.

It is to the ideal of individual perfection that he sacrificed both his existing empire and his possible spiritual domination over a still much greater area of the globe.

There are portraits of him which show us a thin, sickly face, with deep wrinkles each side of the mouth, and bones jutting out: the face of a young man worn out by sorrow and possibly also by some wasting disease. These portraits bear little resemblance to those of his early youth, except for the unbending determination that can be read in the king's features. Given every allowance for the exaggerations and distortions that seem to have been part of the "style" of several artists of the court, there can be no doubt that they reveal to us something of the appearance of their royal model at some stage of his life, probably at the last stage. If so, they help us to some extent to visualise, so as to say, Akhnaton's heroic stand to the bitter end.

He was still very young — at an age when most great men have not yet begun to do the work for which they are born; but he was a physical wreck, and conscious that his end was drawing nigh. He had no son to succeed him; no disciple capable of continuing his work. He had married his eldest daughter, the heiress to the kingdom, aged twelve, to a young man of royal blood, Smenkhkara, who was devoted to him and to his cause, and whom he was soon to associate to the throne. Out of reverence and gratitude, Smenkhkara had taken, in official documents, the title of "beloved of Akhnaton." But the king knew that, with all his good intentions, that prince would not for long be able to postpone the fierce reaction that was to break out. He knew that the dispossessed priests of Amon were gathering more and more strength as news of national disaster rapidly spread throughout Egypt. He knew that, in the very near future, the Religion of the Disk would be swept out of the land, perhaps never to be revived again anywhere in any age. He knew that the uncommunicable truth he had cherished all his life would never again be made to inspire the conduct of a State. And he had no grounds to imagine that the scientific principles that underlay his Teaching — and that he had grasped intuitively — would receive, in three thousand three hundred years to come, an illuminating demonstration, and become the basis of what is to us modern science. To him it must have seemed as if his whole mission had been a complete failure.

Yet he knew that his Teaching was true, and that truth cannot be destroyed. His name might be forgotten, but the fundamentals of the religion of order and love which he had discovered within the Sun and within himself would endure for ever. Sooner or later, the human mind would have to rediscover them. And if one day some accident should bring his Teaching to light again, then, at least, it would be unmarred by any practical compromise. And the most enlightened and the best of men would be able to love it without reservation. One day, perhaps, in many, many years to come, a few among the wise, truthful, and strong would revere him precisely for his refusal to tamper with truth. The unknown devotion of one of those few would be enough to outweigh the loss of an empire, the failure of a life of struggle, and millenniums of oblivion.

And even if those one or two obscure disciples were never to be born; if the Teaching for the sake of which he had lost everything were never to bear fruit, even in the heart of a single man; if the world to come would always listen to the priests of its national gods and never to him, the Priest of the universal Sun — the One real God — if he, Akhnaton, were to remain for ever a useless dreamer, not even dangerous enough to provoke the wrath of more than a few fanatics, then what of it all?

The Sun would nevertheless continue to follow, day after day, His glorious course, and it would still be true that “breath of life is to see His beams.” Light and heat, and the spark that produces life, would still be the manifestations of the One Energy — the Soul of the Sun; rhythm would still remain the principle of the Universe, whether man cared to know it or not. Akhnaton’s Teaching would still be true, and his life a thing of beauty for ever. Had the king of Egypt, in a moment of weakness, sacrificed the logic of his being to the lure of success, the future of mankind would perhaps have been, as we have seen, less gloomy, on the whole, than it actually was. But Akhnaton’s personal history — an indestructible fact in the infinity of time, whether remembered or not — would not have been that flash of beauty which it is. The world would have been poorer of one perfect Individual.

And that was enough to make any loss worth while. His contemporary Egyptians — even many of those who professed to be his disciples — seem to have preferred his empire to himself. But we prefer him to all the empires of the earth. And provided they be sufficiently sensitive to the real value of man, which lies in the individual, the men of ages to come will feel as we do.

* * *

Akhnaton died in the twenty-ninth year of his age which was the eighteenth year of his reign. We know nothing of his last days or of the circumstances of his death. We can only try to imagine them. We can think of him gradually thrusting aside the burden of government after the elevation of Smenkhkara to the rank of co-regent, and living in retirement in his summer-house, in the midst of the beautiful gardens that lay to the south of his City. Nefertiti, who was to survive him, waited upon him till the end. From his sickbed, Akhnaton gazed at the deep blue sky — light and peace — and his heart was happy. We like to imagine his dying in beauty, as he had lived, in a last effort to lift his enfeebled hands in praise to the rising Sun.¹

* * *

His lofty religion was swept out of Egypt.

After the ephemeral reign of Smenkhkara, the priests of Amon regained great power. Akhnaton's second daughter, Makitaton, had died while yet a child, during her father's lifetime. The priests now forced his third daughter to change her name from Ankhsenpaton to Ankhsenpamon and to marry an insignificant young noble, Tutankhaton, renamed

¹ Profane history does not disclose whether Akhnaton had a natural death, or a violent one at the hands of the Amon priesthood. Rosicrucian (AMORC) tradition, however, does relate the incident of his transition. We quote in part from the archives of the Order in this regard: “. . . The untimely departure of . . . Beloved Past Master Amenhotep IV (Akhnaton) whose transition occurred on July 24, 1350, B.C. (based on the current calendar) . . . on the memorable day of his transition he forsook all earthly things and found joy in the Holy Sanctum adjoining his bed chamber in his palace. Here in the midst of meditation he was inspired to evoke the law of. . . Raising both his hands in meditation to . . . he pronounced the lost word. Then as peace and quietness came to his hungry soul, he knelt in prayer. . . In this position he finally vowed his obligations to God and to all his fellow men who preceded him for the knowledge they had given to the world, and then raised both arms to the Cosmic that it might reach down and raise him to heights sublime.”

Tutankhamen, whom they placed upon the throne and used as a puppet. In the name of Tutankhamen, the local gods were definitely restored. The court returned to Thebes. . . .

Akhnaton's City was pulled down stone by stone, and ruined so completely that men forgot where it had once stood. His body, torn from the tomb in the Eastern hills where he had desired to rest, was reburied in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, near Thebes. His name was effaced from the monuments, from his own coffin — even from the ribbons of gold foil that encircled his mummy, so that his soul, henceforth anonymous and deprived of the customary prayers and offerings, might wander for ever in hunger and agony.

In the pride of their recent triumph, the priests composed the exultant hymn of hate now preserved upon an ostrakon in the British Museum:

“Thou findest him who transgresses against thee;
Woe to him who assails thee!
Thy city endures,
but he who assailed thee falls.
The sun of him who knows thee not goes down, O Amon!
But as for him who knows thee, he shines.
The abode of him who assailed thee is in darkness;
but the rest of the earth is in light.
Whoever puts thee in his heart, O Amon,
Lo, his sun dawns.”¹

And the world was once more, apparently at least, as though Akhnaton had never been born.

¹ “. . . Little more than a howl of savage joy at the downfall of Akhnaton and all his works.” — J. Baikie, The Amarna Age (Edit. 1926), p. 398.

CHAPTER XII

AKHNATON AND THE WORLD OF TO-DAY

With Tutankhamen began for the Western World an era of spiritual regression which is lasting still.

Sincere and serious as it is, this opinion of ours may at first sight appear as a mere paradox. But it is not so.

Whatever one may think of Akhnaton's Teaching, one has to concede at least three points concerning it. First, the Religion of the Disk was a universal religion, as opposed to the former local or national religions of the ancient world. The supreme Reality round which it centred — call it the Soul of the Sun, the Energy within the Disk, or give it any other name — was not only Something worthy of the adoration of all men, but also Something actually worshipped, knowingly or unknowingly, by all creatures, including plants. And all creatures, brought forth and sustained by the One Source of life — the Sun — were one in Him. Never in the world west of India had the idea of universal Godhead been so emphatically stressed, and the brotherhood of all living beings more deeply felt. And never were those truths to be stressed again more boldly in the future.

Secondly, it was a rational and natural religion¹ — not a dogmatic one. It was neither a creed nor a code of human laws. It did not pretend to reveal the Unknowable, or to regulate in details the behaviour of man, or to offer means to escape the visible world and its links. It simply invited us to draw our religious inspiration from the beauty of things as they are: to worship life, in feeling and in deed; or, to put it as an outstanding nineteenth-century thinker¹ has done, to be “true to the earth.” Based as it was, not upon any mythology, nor any metaphysics, but upon a broad intuition of scientific truth, its appeal would have increased with the progress of accurate knowledge — instead of decreasing, like that of many a better-known religion.

¹ "Its strength" (of Akhnaton's religion) "lay in its nearness to obvious truth and obvious blessings. It compromised happily between crude material idolatry and a mysticism which had no connection with life. Its deity was so supermundane that no taint of earth or materialism clung to it, and yet so visibly the creative and regulative Power of all that is mundane that its worship was in touch with the most insistent realities. . . . It achieved a happy success in a direction where most of them (i.e., the great religious systems) have signally failed — a basis in reality instead of speculation, and a natural rather than induced piety." — Norman de Garis Davies, The Rock Tombs of El Amarna, p. 47.

Finally — and this was perhaps its most original feature — it was, from the very start, a Teaching that exalted the individual perfection (life in truth) as the supreme goal, and at the same time a State-religion. Not only the religion of a State, but a religion for the State — for any and every State — no less than for the individual. It was a Teaching in which (if we may judge by the example of its Founder) the same idea of “truth” that was to inspire personal behaviour through and through was also to determine the attitude of a monarch towards the friends and foes of his realm, to guide his decisions regarding peace and war; in one word, to dominate international relations. It implied, not the separation of private and public life, but their identity — their subjection to the same rational and aesthetic principles; their common source of inspiration; their common goal.

Such was the message of Akhnaton, the only great religious Teacher, west of India, who was at the same time a king; and perhaps the only undoubtedly historic originator of a religion on earth,² who, being a king, did not renounce kingship but tried to tackle the problems of State — particularly the problem of war — in the light of religious truth.

* * *

The thirteen years of Akhnaton’s personal rule were but a minute in history. But that minute marks a level of perfection

¹ Nietzsche.

² Many will rightly remark that the deified Indian hero, Krishna, was a king, and that he not only put forth the doctrine of warrior-like action performed in a spirit of complete detachment (as expressed in the Bhagavad-Gîta), but applied it himself to politics, throughout the Kurukshetra War. However, such an enormous amount of legend now surrounds the person of Krishna, that it is practically impossible to assign him a place in history — to say nothing of giving him even an approximate date.

hardly ever approached in subsequent years (save perhaps in India, during the latter part of the reign of Asoka, or under Harshavardhana, or again, after many centuries, in the latter part of the reign of Akbar).

From the far-gone days of Tutankhamen down to the time in which we live, the history of the Western world — that is to say, roughly, of the world west of India — presents an ever-broadening gap between the recognised religions and rational thought; a more and more complete divorce, also, between the same recognised religions and life, especially public life.

When, under the pressure of his masters, the priests of Amon, Tutankhaton, renamed Tutankhamon, signed the decree reinstalling the national gods of Egypt in their former glory, he opened an era of intellectual conflict and moral unrest which has not yet to-day come to an end. Before Akhnaton, the world — the Western world at least — had worshipped national gods, and had been satisfied. After him, it continued to worship national gods, but was no longer fully content with them. For a minute, a new light had shone; great truths — the universality of the supreme Essence; the oneness of all life; the unity of religious and rational thought — had been proclaimed in words, in song and in deeds, by one of those men who appear once in history. The man had been cursed, and it was henceforth a crime even to utter his name. He was soon forgotten. But there was no way to suppress the fact that he had come. The old order of blissful ignorance was gone for ever. Against its will, the world dimly remembered the light that the priests had sought to put out; and age after age, inspired men of various lands set out in search of the lost treasure; some caught a glimpse of it, but none were able to regain it in its integrity. The Western world is still seeking it — in vain.

* * *

To make our thought clear to all, let us follow the evolution of the West from the overthrow of Akhnaton's work to the present day. By "West" we mean Europe, Europeanised

America (and Australia), and the countries that stand at the background of European civilisation — that is to say, Greece and a great part of the Middle East.

With the earliest “physiologi” of Ionia — eight hundred years after Akhnaton — rational thought made its second appearance in the West. And this time it did not wither away after the death of one man, but found its mouthpieces in many. Generations of thinkers whose ambition was intellectual knowledge — the logical deduction of ideas and the rational explanation of facts — succeeded one another. Among them were such men as Pythagoras and Plato, who united the light of mystic insight to the clear knowledge of mathematics, and who transcended the narrow religious conceptions of their times. But the Greek world could never transcend them; and Socrates died “for not believing in the gods in whom the city believed” — the national gods — though there had been no more faithful citizen than he. Those gods, adorned as they were with all the graces that Hellenic imagination could give them, were jealous and revengeful in their way. They would have been out of date (and harmless) had men accepted, a thousand years before, the worship of the One Essence of all things, with all it implied. But they had not; and the conflict between the better individuals and the religion of the State had begun. Rational thought was left to thrive; but not so the broad religious outlook that was linked with it. Theoretically — intellectually — any universal God (First Principle, supreme Idea of Goodness, or whatever it be) was acceptable. But the conception of Something to be loved more than the State and worshipped before the national gods was alien to Greece, to Rome, and in general to all the city-minded people of the Mediterranean. Seen from our modern angle of vision, there was a strange disparity between the high intellectual standard of the Hellenes of classical times — those creators of scientific reasoning — and their all-too-human local gods, in no way different from those of the other nations of the Near East.

There appears, also, to have been in their outlook a certain lack of tenderness. One can find, it is true, in the Greek tragedies, magnificent passages exalting such feelings as filial piety or fraternal love. But the other love — that between man and woman — they seem to have conceived as little more than a mainly physical affair, a “sickness,” as Phaedra says in Euripides’ Hippolytus. And their relation to living nature, outside man, seems to have been confined to an aesthetic interest. Bulls being led to the sacrifice and horses carrying their youthful cavaliers in the Panathenaic procession are admirably sculptured on the frieze of the Parthenon. But apart from some really touching verses in Homer (such as those which refer to Ulysses’ faithful old dog, who recognises him after twenty years’ absence) there is hardly an instance, in classical Greek literature, in which a friendly feeling for animals is expressed — not to speak of attributing to them yearnings akin to ours.

Christianity is the next great wave in the history of Western consciousness. And one can hardly conceive a sharper contrast than that which exists between the clear Hellenic genius and the spirit of the creed destined to overrun Hellas, Europe, and finally America and Australia. It was originally — as preached by Paul of Tarsus, the Apostle of the Gentiles — an irrational and unaesthetic creed, fed on miracles, bent on asceticism, strongly stressing the power of evil, ashamed of the body and afraid of life. But its God was a universal God and a God of love. Not as universal, it is true, as might have been expected from a supreme Being proposed to the adoration of a rationally-trained people; nor as impartially loving as a follower of the long-forgotten Religion of the Disk would have imagined his God to be. It was a God who, in fact, never shook off entirely some of the crude attributes which he possessed when worshipped by the Jews as their tribal deity; a God who, of all living creatures, gave man alone an immortal soul, infinitely precious in his eyes, for he loved man in the same childishly partial way as old Jehovah loved the Jewish nation; a democratic God who hated the well-to-do, the high-born, and also those who put their confidence in human intellect instead of submitting to the authority of his Gospel; who hid his truth “from the wise and the learned, but revealed it to the children.”

Still, with all its shortcomings, the mere fact of Christianity's being a creed to be preached "to all nations," in the name of a God who was the Father of all men, was an immense advantage over the older popular religions. The element of love and mercy that the new worship undoubtedly contained — however poor it might be, compared, for instance, to that truly universal love preached in India by Buddhism and Jainism — was sufficient to bring it, in one way at least, nearer to the lost religious ideal of the West even than the different philosophies of the Hellenes (if we except from them Pythagorism and Neo-Pythagorism).

And it had over them all — and over the antique Teaching of Akhnaton himself — the practical advantage of appealing both to the intellectually uncritical, to the emotionally unbalanced, and to the socially oppressed or neglected — to barbarians, to women, to slaves — that is to say, to the majority of mankind. That advantage, combined with the genuine appeal of a gospel of love and with the imperial patronage of Constantine, determined its final triumph. From the shores of the Eastern Mediterranean, it slowly but steadily spread, as one knows, to the whole of Europe and to all lands that European civilisation has conquered.

But the Western world could not definitely forget centuries of rational thought. Nor could it renounce for ever that avowed ideal of visible beauty, of strength, of cleanliness — of healthy earthly life — that had been connected with the various religions of the ancients. As far as it was possible — and many more things are possible than one can imagine — it soon re-installed Greek metaphysics and polytheism under a new form in the very midst of Christianity. And later on, the Greek love of song and pleasure, and the deification of the human body, in the plastic arts as well as in life, prevailed in the spiritual capital of Christendom and throughout most Christian countries. The Western man gradually came to realise what an amount of inconsistency there was in that mixture of Hellenic and Hebrew thought (and remnants of popular myths, much older than Greece and Moses) which composed his traditional religion. He then grew increasingly sceptical, and Christianity remained for him little more than a poetic but obsolete mythology, in some ways less attractive than that of Greece and Rome. The tardy reaction of the bold critical spirit of classical Hellas against judeo-scholastic authority had come; and modern Free Thought — the triumph of Euclid over Moses — had made its way.

* * *

Eight hundred years before the Renaissance, and twelve hundred years before Darwin, a very different, but equally important reaction had taken place in the eastern and most ancient portion of the Western world. And that had given birth to Islam, which one could roughly describe, we believe, without any serious misinterpretation, as Christianity stripped of its acquired Pagan elements — especially of its Greek elements — and brought back to the rigorous purity of Semitic monotheism.

The fact that Islam appeared and thrived long before the rebirth of critical thought (and of classical taste) in Europe, and that its whole political history seems to run quite apart from that of most European countries, must not deceive us. If we consider the Western world as a whole (Europe and its background), and not only the small portion of it which one generally has in mind when speaking of “the West,” then we have to include in it the countries of the Bible — Syria, Egypt, Arabia, Iraq — no less than Greece; for they are the geographical and cultural background of Christianity, the religion of Europe for centuries. And if this be so, we have, in this outsketch of the history of culture, to take account of Islam as one of the most important religious upheavals of the West, however paradoxical this coupling of words may seem.

Like Free Thought — its latter European parallel — Islam (at least, as we understand it; we may be mistaken) was a broad movement brought about by the incapacity of Christianity to fully satisfy the exigencies of the human mind. But the weaknesses of the Christian faith that the two reactions were destined to make up for were not the same ones. Free Thought was essentially an intellectual reaction against the dogmatism of the Christian Church and the puerility of the stories (of whatever origin) that go to make up the Christian mythology. Its growth was naturally slow, for man takes time to question the value of his cherished beliefs on intellectual grounds. Only in the nineteenth century did it begin to affect the bulk of the people, and still to-day its influence remains confined to those countries in which elementary scientific education is granted to many individuals.

Islam, on the contrary, was a definitely religious movement — a wild outcry against every form of polytheism under whatever disguise; a reassertion of the continuity of revealed monotheism through Abraham, Moses, and Jesus of Nazareth; a reaffirmation of the brotherhood of all men, that basic truth taught already by Christ to the Jews, but less and less remembered by the Christians. It appeared more rapidly and more suddenly, for the evils against which it rose were more shocking to the simple sincere man in search of the One God, and therefore easier to detect than logical fallacies or historical inaccuracies — even than physical impossibilities. It was easier — not perhaps, recently, for us, but then, for a man of strong beliefs, fed on Jewish tradition — to detect idolatry under every form of image-worship than to feel, for instance, how ridiculous is such a tale as that of Joshua causing the Sun to stand still.

* * *

But the two reactions — the early medieval and the modern, the religious and the intellectual, the one of Semitic origin and the other started by thinkers mostly of Aryan blood and speech — failed to give the world west of India the feeling that a goal had been reached. They failed even to give it, for more than a century or two, the impression that it was on its way to reach a state of intellectual and emotional equilibrium preferable to that attained in a relatively recent past.

True, for many generations, the Islamic portion of what we have broadly called “the West” seems to have enjoyed through all the vicissitudes of its political history, the mental peace that a few definite, simple, overwhelming religious convictions bring to people in whose life religion holds the first place. True, the problem of religion and State — that the Free-thinkers of Europe never had the opportunity (or the power) to tackle in a practical manner — was for a short time solved, to some extent, under the early Khalifs. But rationalism, strengthened by the fact of modern science, even when it has not altogether shaken the basis of their faith, seems to be influencing more and more many an educated Muslim of the present day in a sense similar to that in which it influenced so many Christians, from the sixteenth century onwards. The result of that influence upon the most liberal of the contemporary Turks, Persians, Egyptians, and even some of the Muslims of India, is obvious. On the other hand, the solution of the problem of religion and State as put forward by the Khalifs, in the early days of Islam, is too closely linked with a particular religious faith to be extended, at the present day, to all countries. It rests upon a somewhat strictly theocratic conception of the State, and upon a rigid line of demarcation between all men who have accepted the revelation of the Prophet — the faithful — and the others. And, rightly or wrongly, the modern world seems evolving in the sense of the separation of the State from religious questions of purely dogmatic interest.

* * *

Now, if we turn to the latter reaction against the shortcomings of Christianity — namely, Free Thought — we find that it has left the people who have matured under its influence in a state of moral unrest far greater than that of those Mussulmans whom their inherited medieval outlook on life no longer satisfies.

Thanks to the undeniable influence of Free Thought, the conclusions of intellectual investigation are not to-day subordinate to Christian theology as they once were. When a scientific hypothesis concerning the texture of atoms or the origin of man is put forward, it matters little whether it tallies or not with the narrative of the Genesis. Even good Christians are ready to accept it, provided it explains facts. Moral questions, too, have been nearly completely freed from the overshadowing idea of a supernatural imperative. Right behaviour is valued because it is thought to be right — no longer because it is the behaviour ordained by God.

But that is about all the difference between the modern “rationalist” outlook and the Christian outlook before the Renaissance. Theoretically, it may seem considerable. In life, it is hardly felt. Important as it is, the fact that, in the field of pure knowledge, thought is now independent from clerical or scriptural authority, plays little part in the formation of the spirit of our times. Thoughts, opinions, intellectual conclusions are, indeed, constructive only to the extent they determine our reactions in the field of behaviour. And there we fail to see how the old authorities have ceased to hold their sway. Except for sexual morality — in regard to which the modern man has become more and more lenient because it suits his fancy, but has not yet, however, outdone the magnificent toleration of many a cardinal of the sixteenth century — the behaviour styled as “right” is precisely that which is in accordance with Christian standards; that which approaches the charitable, democratic, and somewhat narrow ideal of the Christian Gospel; that which obeys the Commandment: “Love thy neighbour as thyself.” The builders of the Parthenon had not gone even as far as that, it is true. But modern rationalism has never gone further than that. It may have, to some extent, taught the present-day Westerner to think in terms of Cosmic Realities. But it has not yet taught him to feel in terms of cosmic values. It has denounced Christian metaphysics as obsolete; but it still clings to the no less obsolete man-centred conception of right and wrong. It no longer maintains that man alone has an immortal soul, and it has forsaken the naïve idea that the world and all it contains was purposely created for man. But it seems to see no harm in man’s exploiting, destroying, or even torturing for his own ends the beautiful innocent creatures, animals and plants, nourished by the same sunshine as himself in the womb of the same mother earth. For all practical purposes, it seems to consider them no more worthy of attention than if they were, indeed, created for him — by that very God who caused the fig-tree in the Gospel to wither in order to teach a lesson to Christ's disciples, and who allowed the evil spirits to enter the Gadarene swine in order to relieve a human being from their grip.

There are, of course, free-thinkers who have personally gone beyond the limits of Christian love and embraced all life in their sympathy. Many a broad-hearted Mohammedan saint, also (such as Abu-Hurairah, the "Father-of-cats"), has shared the same conception of truly universal brotherhood. But these individual cases cannot blind us to the fact that neither of the two great movements that sprang up, so as to say, to supersede Christianity, has actually emphasised that fundamental truth of the unity of all life (with its practical implications) which the Christian Scriptures had omitted to express. There are, no doubt, remarkable Christians — for instance, Saint Francis of Assisi — who have grasped that truth and lived up to it. Still, in the omission of the Gospel to put the slightest stress upon it lies, in our eyes at least, the main weakness of Christianity compared with the great living religions of the East — Vedantism, Buddhism, Jainism — and also, nearer its birthplace, with the lost Religion of the Disk. The only two large-scale attempts ever made west of India to restore to men the consciousness of that all-important truth were Pythagorism (and, later on, Neo-Pythagorism) in Antiquity, and nowadays Theosophy — both movements that owe much to direct or indirect Indian influence. The interest shown for the latter by many of our educated contemporaries points out how much ordinary Free Thought — a scientific conception of the world, plus a merely Christian-like ideal of love and charity — is insufficient to meet the moral needs of the most sensitive among us.

* * *

There is more to say. Modern Free Thought has completely dissociated, in the minds of most educated people, the idea of positive knowledge — of science — from that of worship. Not that a man of science cannot be, at the same time, a man of faith — he often is — but he considers the two domains as separate from each other. Their objects, he thinks, cannot be interchanged any more than their aims. One does not know God as one knows the data of sensuous experience or the logical conclusions of an induction; and however much one may admire the supremely beautiful picture of visible reality that modern science gives us, one cannot worship the objects of scientific investigation — the forms of energy, the ninety-two elements, or such.

And the tragedy is that, once a rational picture of the world has imposed itself upon our mind, the usual objects of faith appear more and more as poetic fictions, as hidden allegories, or as deified moral entities. We do not want to do away with them altogether; yet we cannot help regretting the absence, in them, of that character of intellectual certitude that makes us cling so strongly to science. We feel more and more that moral certitude is not enough to justify our wholehearted adoration of any supreme Principle; in other words, that religion without a solid scientific background is insufficient.

On the other hand, there are moments when we regret the lost capacity of enjoying the blessings of faith with the simplicity of a child — without the slightest mental reservation, without strain, without thought. We wonder, at times, if the men who built the Gothic cathedrals were not, after all, happier and better men than our contemporaries; if the tremendous inspiration they drew from childish legends was not worth all our barren “rational” beliefs. We would like to experience, in the exaltation of the “realities” which we value, the same religious fervour which they used to feel in the worship of a God who was perhaps an illusion. But that seems impossible. Men have tried it and failed. The cult of the Goddess Reason put forward by the dreamers of the French Revolution, and the cult of Humanity, which Auguste Comte wished to popularise, could never make the Western man forget the long-loved sweetness of his Christian festivals, interwoven with all the associations of childhood. How could one even think of replacing the tradition of Christmas and Easter by such dry stuff as that? Science, without the advantages of religion, is no more able to satisfy us than religion without a basis of scientific certitude. Prominent as some of them may be, the men who nowadays remain content with Free Thought are already out of date. The twentieth century is growing more and more aware of its craving for some all-embracing truth, intellectual and spiritual, in the light of which the revelations of experience and faith, the dictates of reason and of intuition — of science and religion — would find their place as partial aspects of a harmoniously organic whole. The evolution that one can follow in the outlook of such a man as Aldous Huxley is most remarkable as a sign of the times.

* * *

Along with the divorce of religion from science, we must note the divorce of religion from private and public life. As Aldous Huxley timely points out in one of his recent books,¹ the saints proposed to our veneration as paragons of godliness are rarely intellectual geniuses; and the intellectual geniuses — scientists, philosophers, statesmen — and the artists, poets, writers who have won an immortal name are hardly ever equally remarkable as embodiments of the virtues which religion teaches us to value. So much so that we have ceased to expect extraordinary intelligence in a saint, or extraordinary goodness in a genius according to the world, and least of all in a political genius. For nowhere is the separation of religion from life more prominent (and more shocking) than in the domain of international relations.

The much-quoted injunction of Christ to “render unto Caesar that which is Caesar’s and unto God that which is God’s” illustrates — as it is generally interpreted — a division of duties which has survived the belief in dogmatic Christianity. Whether he be a Christian or a Free Thinker — or a Mussulman, in one of the modern Islamic States that have undergone the influence of European ideas — the Western man, as a man, is guided, in life, by certain principles different from, and sometimes in contradiction with those that lie at the basis of his outlook as a citizen. Caesar and God are more often than not in conflict with each other. And when this happens — when there is no way of serving both — then the Western man generally serves Caesar first, and offers God, in compensation, some scraps of private piety. But more and more numerous are growing those who denounce this duality of ideals as a sinister product of deceitful casuistry.

¹ In Ends and Means (Chapter on Education).

In the ancient world, as long as religion was a national concern, and connected with practices rather than with beliefs, its actual separation from life was impossible. In one way, that may seem better than what we see now. And the bold ideologists who, in recent years, in Europe, have endeavoured to wipe out altogether the spirit if not the name of Christianity and to raise the Nation — based on the precise physiological idea of race — as the object of man's ultimate devotion, those ideologists, we say, may seem wiser and more honest than their humanitarian antagonists. If religion indeed, does not, as it is, respond any longer to the needs of life, it is better to change it. It is far better to openly brush aside two thousand years of errors (if errors they be) and to come back to the national gods of old, and to be true to them to the bitter end, than to keep on rendering divine honours to the Man who said: "Love thy neighbour," and to wage a war of extermination upon men of rival nations whom one has not even the excuse of considering as "infidels" or "heretics." There is no hypocrisy in the votaries of the religion of Race, as in those of the religion of man. The only weakness one could point out in their creed — if the latter be artificially separated from the Religion of Life, of which it is, fundamentally, and remains, in the minds of its best exponents, the true expression — is that it has been transcended, and that therefore it is difficult to go back to it, even if one wishes to. The religion of man itself has been transcended long before its birth. The truth is that both are too narrow, too passionately one-sided, too ignorant of great realities that surpass their scope, to satisfy any longer men who think rationally and who feel the beauty and the seriousness of life, unless they be integrated into the Religion of Life.

To frankly acknowledge a moral ideal still narrower than that of Christianity or humanitarian Free Thought will not ultimately serve the purpose of filling the gap between life and religion. The higher aspirations of the spirit cannot entirely be suppressed. The gap will soon reappear — this time between the religion of race, nation or class, and the life of the better individuals; a sad result. That gap will always exist, under some form or another, as long as a religion of integral truth, transcending man, and of truly universal love is not acknowledged, in theory and in practice, by individuals and groups of individuals.

Moreover, the mystic of race (or of nation, or of any entity with a narrower denotation than that of “man”) is, nay, under its narrowest and least enlightened aspect, unassailable, unless and until the ideology of man, inherited by Free Thought from Christianity, is once and for ever pushed into the background in favour of an ideology of life. For if, indeed, one is to believe that living Nature, with all its loveliness, is made for man to use for his profit, then why should not one admit, with equal consistency, that the bulk of mankind is made for the few superior races, classes or even individuals to exploit at will?

Ultimately, one has to go to the limit, and acknowledge cosmic values as the essence of religion, if religion is to have any universal meaning at all. And if it is to be something more than an individual ideal; if it is no longer to remain separated from the life of States; if truth, in one word, is ever to govern international relations as well as personal dealings, then one has to strive to put power into the hands of an intellectual and moral elite — to come back to Plato’s idea of wise men managing public affairs, makers of laws and rulers of men, uncontested guides of reverentially obedient nations.

* * *

We have just seen how, in the world west of India, one great thought-current has succeeded another from the days of Tutankhamen onwards, without defining the relation of religion to science and to politics; without giving birth to a creed that all of us, including the most rational-minded and the kindest, could look up to and admire without reservation; without suggesting to us an ideal approach to such questions as that of imperialism and war by the example of any exalted “precedent.”

And there is, at the same time, all through the history of that vast area, an underlying yearning for such a perfect creed as would fulfil all the aspirations of its successive cultures — a yearning for rationality in religion, for love extended to all living things, and for a conception of international relations based on the same principles as those which should guide individual behaviour.

Expressed more or less emphatically in the lives of the best individuals of each epoch, that craving for an all-round perfection has never found its mouthpiece in any of the great historic thought-currents of the West themselves. Each of the successive waves of consciousness that we call Hellenic thought, Christianity, Islam, and modern Free Thought, has put stress upon one or another point — on logical reasoning and on beauty; on the love of man; on the oneness of God; on scientific certitude — striving to realise one side of an ideal Teaching which none of them could conceive in its whole.

One or two schools of Hellenic philosophy, such as Pythagorism and Neo-Pythagorism, strongly influenced by the East, have probably come nearer to that lost ideal of total truth than any other expression of Western thought. What we know of the life and teachings of Apollonius of Tyana — that “god among men,” as a modern author¹ has called him — is sufficient to support this statement. But it is doubtful whether the doctrine of his sect, or that of any other remarkable Greek school, could be revived to-day in its integrity. No doctrine which is too precise concerning questions about which knowledge is not definite can be “a possession for ever.” And the Pythagorean theory of numbers, for instance, many not appear satisfactory to the modern mind as it did to the disciples of old. For, if it has not been disproved, as the cosmogony of the Stoics or so many other particular theories linked with ancient philosophies — if it even be irrevocable in some of its aspects, as the mathematical side of Plato's philosophy is said to be by some writers¹ — it has at least been surpassed in an ever-broadening mathematical outlook, and cannot, therefore, be considered to-day as sufficient.

¹ Mario Meunier: Apollonius de Tyane, ou le séjour d'un dieu parmi les hommes, Paris, 1936.

Apart from that, there is one point which none of the great doctrines of the past three thousand years have touched, and that is the question of the application of their own principles to the practical life of nations, and to international relations. The reason for this is probably that, with the one exception of Akhnaton, none of the initiators of new thought in the West were kings, like some of the most popular Indian teachers; none even ministers of state, like Confucius. Plato himself, for whom the best government is that in which the ruler is a lover of wisdom, had personally no voice in the direction of Athenian policy.

* * *

Let us now look back to Akhnaton's Teaching, of which we have recalled the main features at the beginning of this chapter. The more we examine it, in the light of thirty-three hundred years of history, the more we are convinced that it is the perfect religion in search of which the Western world is still groping without being able to re-imagine it.

It has, over whatever other creed has been invented, west of India, as an answer to the higher aspirations of man, the advantage of being simple and complete. It is perhaps indeed the simplest among the lofty teachings of the whole world; a framework, suggesting an attitude towards the possible problems of individual and public life, rather than a system offering solutions of those problems once and for all. It is not only free from all mythology, from all metaphysics, from affirmations of any sort about things that are not known for certain, but it has hardly any tenets. To call it a creed is nearly a misuse of the word. It comprises no “theory,” even about the world of facts. It is not a doctrine concerning science — which could grow out of date. Yet, it is based upon a bold scientific intuition which has not only been proved correct, but is broad enough to contain and sum up, after so many centuries, the essential of man’s positive knowledge of the universe, and which thus confers upon the whole of it the permanent strength of intellectual certitude. It has no catalogue of imperatives, and makes no mention of right and wrong. Yet, the fervent love expressed in Akhnaton’s hymns implies the noblest behaviour towards all living things — even towards one’s enemies — and historic events have shown that the implication was not an empty one.

¹ D. Néroman: La Leçon de Platon (Niclus Edit., Paris, 1943).

Finally, the fact that the promoter of the Teaching was the ruler of a first-rate military power, with foreign possessions and vassal States — colonies and protectorates, as we would call them nowadays — and that he put the spirit of his religion in action on an international scale, is of great importance. For the time has come when the world feels that religion cannot remain foreign to burning questions of international interest such as that of war. No teaching which ignores those questions can therefore really appeal to modern consciousness. If God and Caesar are in conflict with each other — as we see they so often are — then they cannot both claim our allegiance. If we do not deify the Nation and sacrifice God, renouncing all values beyond the national ones, then we must consider the problem of war and conquest in the light of the highest religious values and, if necessary, sacrifice the interest of the Nation. No great Western teacher has done so, save Akhnaton. None could do so, for none had the power to make peace and war. And the few among our modern pacifists who boast of doing so now, put forward their claims from an armchair, for none of them has any say in the decisions of his country’s government.

If, by taking the unusual course which he did, Akhnaton lost an empire, he at least left the world an example for ever which was worth its while. In all simplicity, without theorising on right and wrong, he showed us in what direction is to be sought the solution of the war problem, if one does not want to sacrifice truth (that is to say, God) to the State.

Sir Flinders Petrie was already aware of the undying value of the Religion of the Disk when he wrote in his History of Egypt, at the dawn of the present century: “If this were a new religion invented to satisfy our modern scientific conceptions, we could not find a flaw in the correctness of his (i.e., Akhnaton’s) view of the energy of the solar system. . . .” “He (Akhnaton) had certainly bounded forward in his views and symbolism to a position which we cannot logically improve upon at the present day. Not a rag of superstition or falsity can be found clinging to this new worship, evolved out of the old Aton of Heliopolis, the sole Lord of the Universe.”¹

Petrie puts special stress upon the scientific accuracy of the Teaching and upon its rational value. We add that the truly universal love it implies is equalled only in the religions originated in or borrowed from India. So much so that — putting together the kindred seers of the East, sons of one same civilisation, and taking them as a whole — the great idea of the unity of all life and brotherhood of all creatures seems to have had two parallel exponents in antiquity, and the world two everlasting teachers: India and Akhnaton.

* * *

There is still more to say. Since the discovery of Eastern thought by the Europeans, in the eighteenth century — that second Renaissance, less dazzling, but no less if not more important than the sixteenth century one — the world has been increasingly craving for something in which the East and West could meet and feel themselves one in spite of all their differences.

We are living now in a period of transition between an old and a new spiritual order, bearing to the world of yesterday a relation somewhat similar to that of the Hellenistic period to classical antiquity; an epoch in which, for the second time, the East and the West — India and Greece, to take the two countries that have had the greatest influence upon the culture of man as a symbol of the two halves of mankind — have come in contact with each other, and are trying to know and understand each other and to create together, if they can (this time on a world-wide scale), a work of truth and beauty unparalleled in the history of their separate achievements.

¹ Sir Flinders Petrie: History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, p. 214.

They feel the need of a common faith that would become the basis of their future collaboration, the foundation of a really universal fraternity of souls, and perhaps also, one day (if men grow less foolish, and less numerous, too), of a world-wide commonwealth of free nations, at peace with one another.

None of the living creeds professed west of India to-day is sufficiently comprehensive for a thoughtful Hindu to look upon it as fit to be ranked with his own religion or with any of those that sprang from it. None can match Buddhism and Jainism in the preaching of universal kindness; none can match Vedantism, in the conception of divine Reality. That is probably why there are people who suggest to reverse the out-dated activities of the Christian and other missionaries, and to preach to the West the main general tenets of Indian religion. And it is to be noted that, contrarily to the crowds of ignorant Easterners converted to the religions of the West, mostly for purely social reasons, the few Euro-Americans who have adhered to Eastern creeds are mainly men above the average, who have done so for religious or moral reasons alone.

Still, we believe that the attempt, successful as it may be in individual cases, and infinitely more justified than that of the Western missionaries, cannot easily be generalised. The faith of the world cannot be any particular faith linked up with a definite tradition, a given theology (or given metaphysics) to be found in a more or less elaborate literature of sacred texts and learned commentaries. Races differ in their genius. If any creed is to unite them all to some extent, that must be an extremely broad one, with which none of man's deeper aspirations will clash, and which will need, on the part of each individual, no difficult adaptation to a trend of thought alien to his own.

The religions of India, apart from the intricate metaphysical speculations intertwined with them (and which it is difficult to detach from them without altering them profoundly) seem to have in common a more or less marked tendency to ascetic renunciation. It would, of course, be easy to find texts in which the importance of life and action in the world is stressed to the utmost. But the ultimate goal remains to transcend individuality; to drown personal consciousness in the realisation of an unnameable Infinite, beyond all imaginable thought or even feeling. If not ascetic life, at least an ascetic outlook on life, an awareness of the transience and therefore of the inanity of the visible world, is commended at every stage of man's evolution. And it is this, perhaps, above all, that makes it so difficult for most Westerners to grasp the essence of Indian religion. They understand the Hindu (or Buddhist) point of view, intellectually; they cannot really make it theirs, for their outlook on life and on the visible world is quite different. They may, for instance, accept the doctrine of reincarnation — that basic belief of the East. But they will find it hard, in general, to desire not to be reborn as individuals. It is perhaps only in the higher stages of mystic experience that the two ideals of salvation in eternal life and of “deliverance” from all individual existence meet and merge into each other. But that experience is beyond most people's reach.

We therefore think that it is difficult to make the East — namely, the spiritual sons of India — and the West — the spiritual sons of West Asia and Greece — meet on purely Eastern religious grounds. The common faith in which the two can walk hand in hand is to be sought elsewhere.

Why not try to revive the forsaken Religion of the Disk among the elite of all countries, and make it the basis of the new spiritual order uniting East and West?

If one takes “the West” in the broad sense that we have given to that word, then Akhnaton's Teaching seems, as we have stated above, the one product of the Western mind that can stand in parallel with the great teachings of India, both for its lofty conception of the Energy-within-the-Disk — hardly different from the central idea of the Gayatri mantra of the Hindus — and for the love of all living creatures which it implies.

Far from looking upon it as anything alien to her own religious genius, India could therefore see in it another proof of that essential oneness in man's highest inspiration, which she has never ceased to proclaim through the mouth of her greatest sons; something so akin, indeed, to her own oldest recorded contribution to religious thought that some authors¹ have hastily supposed it to be a result of Indo-Aryan influences upon its Promoter.

On the other hand, it differs from the great Eastern teachings of world-wide scope precisely in that it is not a teaching of renunciation. It emphasises the joy of life, the sweetness of sunshine to all beings, the loveliness of the visible world. And the only few lines through which we can hope to form an idea of its Founder's own conception of the hereafter express a joyous confidence in the coming of a new individual life, presupposing even, perhaps, some sort of subtle corporeality. In this attitude of his to personal existence and to the beautiful world of forms and colours which he transcends without ceasing to feel their infinite value, Akhnaton remains a child of the West, whom the West can understand.

It seems difficult indeed to find a historic figure uniting, to the same degree as he, the complementary qualities of what we may call the two poles of human perfection: uncompromising logic, and boundless love; rationality, and the intuition of the divine; the smiling serenity of Greek wisdom, and the fiery earnestness of the East; the love of glorious life in flesh and blood and, at the same time, the tranquil indifference of the saint to every form of worldly success. No man deserves more than he the double homage of the two great sections of mankind: the undivided admiration of the West; the respect of the East.

And the one powerful country of the world in which dynastic Sun-worship is still to-day the State-religion — Japan — could hardly fail to recognise the supreme beauty of a nature-loving, Sun-centred Teaching, preached by a king of one of the oldest solar dynasties of the past. Among the Western cults, old and new, the Religion of the Disk might perhaps be the one which, if only better known, would appeal to the heart of that proud nation, stirring in it, beyond and above its age-long devotion to symbols of national Godhead, a holy fervour towards the truly universal Sun, God of all life.

¹ Sir Wallis Budge: Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism (Edit. 1923), pp. 113, and following.

* * *

In January, 1907, a skeleton — all that remained of the world's first rationalist and oldest Prince of Peace — was discovered by Arthur Weigall and Ayrton in a tomb in the royal necropolis near the ruins of Thebes. At the foot of the coffin was inscribed the prayer, previously quoted, most probably composed by the dead king himself, in praise of the One God for the sake of Whom he had lost everything.¹

On the top of the coffin were the name and titles of the Pharaoh:

“The beautiful Prince, the Chosen-son of the Sun, King of Upper and Lower Egypt, Living in Truth, Lord of the Two Lands. Akhnaton, the beautiful Child of the living Aton, whose name shall live for ever and ever.”

The name had been erased, but the titles were sufficient to reconstruct the inscription in its whole.

The tomb had once been that of Akhnaton's mother; and the body of the young Pharaoh had been brought there from Akhetaton, after the desertion of the sacred City by the Egyptian court, under Tutankhamen, and laid next to the remains of the deceased queen. But soon after, the priests of Amon, restored to power, had found it proper to remove Queen Tiy's mummy to another place; and Akhnaton's body, wrapped in its double sheets of pure gold, had been left alone in the sepulchre. Century after century it had remained there, forgotten. And as the priests had not cared to seal the entrance of the lonely chamber properly, the dampness of the air had penetrated it and had slowly caused the embalmed flesh to decay. So that, after three thousand and three hundred years, when human eyes once more beheld the young king who had sung the glory of life, nothing was left of his mortal form but dry bones.

¹ “I breathe the sweet breath that comes forth from Thy mouth; I behold Thy beauty every day. It is my desire that I may hear Thy sweet voice, even in the North wind, that my limbs may be rejuvenated with life, through love of Thee. Give me Thy hands holding Thy spirit, that I may receive it and live by it. Call Thou upon my name unto eternity, and it shall never fail.” (Quoted in Chapter V, p. 132)

The discovery was a subject of discussion among scholars for some time. Apart from that, it remained unnoticed. After examining the skeleton, Professor Elliot Smith declared that the Pharaoh could not have been more than twenty-eight or twenty-nine when he died. A learned German scholar, Professor Sethe, supposing him to have been older, doubted that the bones were actually his. A great deal was written about the matter, until it was practically proved that they were.¹ Arthur Weigall, a few years later, published his beautiful book, The Life and Times of Akhnaton, in which he asserts himself as a genuine admirer of the Pharaoh and of his Teaching.

But no such interest as was roused, in 1922, by Lord Carnarvon's discovery of the tomb of Tutankhamen, was stirred among the public at large. There were no articles written for lay people in the Sunday editions of the daily papers about the most perfect man whom the Western world had produced; no romantic history for popular consumption came forth overnight; no lectures were given in literary and semi-literary circles; no tea-table talk took place around the Pharaoh's name. For little had been found of those treasures which impress the imagination of crowds: no jewels (save a beautiful golden vulture, with wings outstretched); no gems; no gilded furniture; nothing but the skeleton of a god-like man who had died, rejected and cursed thirty-three hundred years before.

Yet that man was the one the world had been unconsciously seeking all the time, through centuries of moral unrest, disillusionment and failure.

¹ J. D. S. Pendlebury (Tell-el-Amarna, Edit. 1935, pp. 31-32) still maintains, however, that Akhnaton's mummy was probably destroyed by his enemies, and that the remains found by Arthur Weigall in 1907 were therefore not his.

* * *

Confident in their suddenly re-acquired power, and maddened by the joy of revenge, the priests of Amon had decided to wipe out every trace of Akhnaton's memory for ever. The temples of the various gods were restored and their cult reinstalled in all its former splendour. And a curse was proclaimed throughout the land against him who had dared to forsake the traditional path and preach the Way of the One God.

Let us remember the hour of his defeat. Let us think of the national cult; let us picture to ourselves the huge affluence of pilgrims from all parts of the empire, assembled there to see the old order begin again; to hear, as before, the old prayers and the old songs in honour of the god of Thebes — of the god of Egypt — who had made Egypt great, and who would have helped her to remain so, had it not been for the “apostate” king, who had risen against him; let us imagine the smoke and fragrance of incense, the music of the holy instruments amplified through the successive halls of granite; the flame of the sacrifice, reflected upon the dusky faces, and upon the golden hieroglyphics shining in the darkness in praise of Amon, king of gods. And in the midst of all this, echoing from hall to hall, telling the world of that day and the world to come that the “criminal of Akhetaton” had been vanquished, and that Egypt was herself once more, the song of triumph and of hate:

“Woe to him who assails thee!
Thy city endures,
but he who assailed thee falls.”

the song of the victorious crowd led by its cunning shepherds — of the Nation, of all nations; of the average man, walking in the footprints of his fathers — over the dead body of Him Who, being one with the Sun, walked in His own light; of the divine Individual:

“The abode of him who assailed thee is in darkness,
but the rest of the earth is in light. . . .”

In that crowd from all parts of the empire, there were men who had known King Akhnaton in the days of his glory; men who had received from him gifts in gold and silver, and to whom he had spoken kind words, and on whom he had relied, believing them to be faithful. But not one of them stirred as he heard the frenzied hymn of hate. The priests of Amon had what they wanted. The world obeyed them — not Him. And it has continued obeying them ever since, cherishing its manifold superstitions and paying homage to its tribal gods. To the present day, no man has yet raised his voice and openly challenged their triumph in the name of the Child of Light whom they persecuted beyond death.

But there is one thing that the priests could not do, and that was to keep the world from groping in search of the dream — or the reality — for which he had lived. They could not stop the evolution of the spirit, nor put an end to the quest of truth.

While Akhnaton's memory was rapidly being effaced, the quasi-universality of Sun-worship was a fact. However wanting were the different conceptions of the Sun held in different countries, still it was to the fiery Disk that all men rendered praise, in some way or the other, justifying the words of the inspired king. And no force on earth could keep that unanimity from meaning what it did.

And as time passed, the better men of the Western world began to feel the limitations of their man-made religions; to crave for a faith that should be founded solely upon the facts of existence; a faith that should include the whole scheme of life, and not man alone, within its scope; a faith that should also find its practical application in questions of international interest (mainly in the question of conquest and war) no less than in the private behaviour of individuals; and at the same time, a faith that should be simple, extremely simple — the world is tired of intricate metaphysics, of sterile mental play centred around ideas that correspond to nothing important in living life. In other words, as one imperfect creed after another rose and thrived, and decayed in its turn, leaving behind it disillusionment and doubt and moral sickness, the better men have been unknowingly seeking for the lost truth preached by King Akhnaton.

Deprived of name and fame and of the love of men, the royal youth lay in the desecrated tomb in which his enemies had put his body, while centuries rolled on. And no one knew that the light that the best ones were still seeking was his light. The discovery of his bones was no more noticed than any other archaeological discovery. In all appearance, his persecutors still held their sway. Only they could not silence the yearning of Western consciousness for a truly rational religion in tune with life, uniting the scientific spirit to all-embracing love. Nor could they suppress the need of the whole world for a permanent understanding of East and West, on the basis of an extremely simple faith in which the two could recognise the expression of their complementary ideals.

The discovery of Akhnaton's remains, thirty-seven years ago, was hardly spoken of, save in very restricted scholarly circles. But times were already beginning to ripen for the recognition of his Teaching as the Gospel of a new and better world — for his long-delayed triumph. Sir Flinders Petrie had proclaimed the eternal actuality of the Religion of the Disk in the early eighteen-nineties. Less than ten years later,¹ one of the greatest artists of the modern West, the Greek poet, Kostis Palamas, referring to the unending conflict between the Pagan and the Christian spirit — the conflict at the centre of European culture — had written:

“A day will come when you will walk hand in hand, Pagans and Christians, with your eyes open,
nourished with the herb of Life.
Fantasies will appear to you as fantasies, and you will stretch out your hands so that, of all that is vital, you, too, might hold something. . . .”²

¹ The poem was composed, as the author himself says in his preface, between 1899 and 1906.

² From The Twelve Discourses of the Gypsy, 2nd Edition, Athens, 1921, p. 84.

He did not suggest what particular Teaching could supersede the conflicting wisdoms, and make them appear as “fantasies,” as “illusions” to their followers. And we do not know if he was at all acquainted with Akhnaton’s religion. But his verses are none the less prophetic. They express the increasing awareness of the Western world that the time has come for the triumph of some true faith of life which will give it, in one whole, all that the Athenian miracle — the miracle of reason and beauty — and the equally beautiful “folly of the Cross” — the miracle of love as the West knows it — have given it separately, and still more.

We believe that no faith could respond to this expectation better than Akhnaton’s worship of Cosmic Energy, Essence of Life, through the beautiful Disk of our Parent Star in which It radiates as light and heat.

After killing the Religion of the Disk and thrusting their country back into the path that was to lead it to slow decay, the priests of Egypt believed that Akhnaton and his Teaching were dead for ever. They were sure no man would ever rise in favour of him whom they had condemned, and they departed content from the great temple where his doom had been solemnised. And we have seen that, for three thousand three hundred years, their unholy verdict held good. One can think of no other historic instance of hatred being successful for such a long time.

But the hour has come for the age-old injustice to end. It is the duty of the modern man to challenge the judgement of the priests of the outdated local deity, and to undo what they have done; to answer their hymn of hate, and to proclaim the glory of the most lovable of men; to teach the children that are growing up to hold his name sacred, to look up to him as to their own beloved King and, above all, to live in accordance with his Teaching of life.

May we consider that duty also as a privilege — perhaps the greatest privilege of our troubled times — and may we feel proud to accomplish it without failure. And then, even as the Sun reappears in the East after a long night, Akhnaton, His High-priest and Son, “who came forth from His substance,” shall rise again from the dust of dead history, in youth and beauty, and live in the consciousness of our times and of all times to come, and rule the hearts and lives of the elite of the world, “till the swan shall turn black and the crow turn white, till the hills rise up to travel and the deeps rush into the rivers.”

Calcutta, May 1942 — New Delhi, 24th January, 1945.

HYMNS OF AKHNATON TO THE SUN

LONGER HYMN

Thy appearing is beautiful in the horizon of heaven,
 The Living Aten¹, the beginning of life;
 Thou risest in the horizon of the east,
 Thou fillest every land with thy beauty.

Thou art very beautiful, brilliant and exalted above earth,
 Thy beams encompass all lands which thou hast made.
 Thou art the sun, thou settest their bounds,
 Thou bindest them with thy love.
 Thou art afar off, but thy beams are upon the land;
 Thou art on high, but the day passes with thy going.

Thou restest in the western horizon of heaven,
 And the land is in darkness like the dead.

They lie in their houses, their heads are covered,
 Their breath is shut up, and eye sees not to eye;
 Their things are taken, even from under their heads, and they know it not.

Every lion cometh forth from his den,
 And all the serpents then bite;
 The night shines with its lights,
 The land lies in silence;
 For he who made them is in his horizon.

The land brightens, for thou risest in the horizon,
 Shining as the Aten in the day;
 The darkness flees, for thou givest thy beams,
 Both lands are rejoicing every day.

Men awake and stand upon their feet,
 For thou liftest them up;
 They bathe their limbs, they clothe themselves,
 They lift their heads in adoration of thy rising,
 Throughout the land they do their labours.

¹ The name of the Solar Disk is written Aten by some authors, such as Sir Flinders Petrie, Sir Wallis Budge, Griffith, etc., and Aton by others, such as A. Weigall and J. Breasted. All through this book we have written Aton.

The cattle all rest in their pastures,
 Where grow the trees and herbs;
 The birds fly in their haunts,
 Their wings adoring thy ka,
 All the flocks leap upon their feet,
 The small birds live when thou risest upon them.

The ships go forth north and south,
 For every way opens at thy rising.
 The fishes in the river swim up to greet thee,
 Thy beams are within the depth of the great sea.

Thou createst conception in women, making the issue of mankind;
 Thou makest the son to live in the body of his mother,
 Thou quietest him that he should not mourn,
 Nursing him in the body, giving the spirit that all his growth may live.
 When he cometh forth on the day of his birth,
 Thou openest his mouth to speak, thou doest what he needs.

The small bird in the egg, sounding within the shell,
 Thou givest to it breath within the egg,
 To give life to that which thou makest.
 It gathers itself to break forth from the egg,
 It cometh from the egg, and chirps with all its might,
 It runneth on its feet, when it has come forth.

How many are the things which thou hast made!
 Thou createst the land by thy will, thou alone,
 With peoples, herds and flocks,
 Everything on the face of the earth that walketh on its feet,
 Everything in the air that flieth with its wings.

In the hills from Syria to Kush, and the plain of Egypt,
 Thou givest to every one his place, thou framest their lives,
 To every one his belongings, reckoning his length of days;
 Their tongues are diverse in their speech,
 Their natures in the colour of their skin.
 As the divider thou dividest the strange peoples.

When thou hast made the Nile beneath the earth,
 Thou bringest it according to thy will to make the people to live:
 Even as thou hast formed them unto thyself,
 Thou art throughout their lord, even in their weakness.
 O lord of the land that risest for them.

Aten of the day, revered by every distant land, thou makest their life,
 Thou placest a Nile in heaven that it may rain upon them,
 That it may make waters upon the hills like the great sea,
 Watering their fields amongst their cities.
 How excellent are thy ways!

O Lord of eternity, the Nile in Heaven is for the strange people,
 And all wild beasts that go upon their feet.
 The Nile that cometh from below the earth is for the land of Egypt,
 That it may nourish every field.
 Thou shinest and they live by thee.

Thou makest the seasons of the year to create all thy works;
 The winter making them cool, the summer giving warmth.
 Thou makest the far-off heaven, that thou mayest rise in it,
 That thou mayest see all that thou madest when thou wast alone.

Rising in thy forms as the living Aten,
 Shining afar off and returning.
 The villages, the cities, and the tribes, on the road and the river,
 All eyes see thee before them,
 Thou art the Aten of the day over all the land.

Thou art in my heart, there is none who knoweth thee, excepting thy son Nefer . kheperu . ra . ua .
 en . ra;
 Thou causest that he should have understanding, in thy ways and in thy might.

The land is in thy hand, even as thou hast made them;
 Thou shinest and they live, and when thou settest they die;
 For by thee the people live, they look on thy excellencies until thy setting;
 They lay down all their labours when thou settest in the west,
 And when thou risest, they grow. . . .
 Since the day that thou laidest the foundations of the earth,
 Thou raisest them up for thy son who came forth from thy substance,
 The king of Egypt, living in Truth, lord of both lands, Nefer . kheperu . ra . ua . en . ra,
 Son of the sun, living in Truth, Akhenaten, great in his duration; Nefer . neferu . Aten Nefer . iti, living and flourishing for ever eternally.

Translated by Griffith, quoted by Sir Flinders Petrie in A History of Egypt (Edit. 1899), Vol. II, pp. 215-218.

SHORTER HYMN

A Hymn of Praise to the living Horus of the Two Horizons, who rejoiceth in the horizon in his name of “Shu, who-is-in-the-Aten”-(i.e., Disk), the Giver of Life for ever and ever, by the King who liveth in Truth, the Lord of the Two Lands, NEFER-KHEPERU-RA UA-EN-RA, Son of Ra, who liveth in Truth, Lord of the Crowns, AAKHUNATEN, great in the duration of his life, Giver of Life for ever and ever.

(He saith)

Thou risest gloriously, O thou Living Aten, Lord of Eternity! Thou art sparkling (or coruscating), beautiful, (and) mighty. Thy love is mighty and great . . . thy light, of diverse colours, leadeth captive (or, bewitcheth) all faces. Thy skin shineth brightly to make all hearts to live. Thou fillest the Two Lands with thy love, O thou god, who did(st) build (thy)self. Maker of every land, Creator of whatsoever there is upon it, (viz.) men and women, cattle, beasts of every kind, and trees of every kind that grow on the land. They live when thou shinest upon them. Thou art the mother (and) father of what thou hast made; their eyes, when thou risest, turn their gaze upon thee. Thy rays at dawn light up the whole earth. Every heart beateth high at the sight of thee, (for) thou risest as their Lord.

Thou settest in the western horizon of heaven, they lie down in the same way as those who are dead. Their heads are wrapped up in cloth, their nostrils are blocked, until thy rising taketh place at dawn in the eastern horizon of heaven. Their hands then are lifted up in adoration of thy Ka; thou vivifiest hearts with thy beauties (or, beneficent acts), which are life. Thou sendest forth thy beams, (and) every land is in festival. Singing men, singing women (and) chorus men make joyful noises in the Hall of the House of the Benben Obelisk, (and) in every temple in (the city of) Aakhut-Aten, the Seat of Truth, wherewith thy heart is satisfied. Within it are dedicated offerings of rich food (?).

Thy son is sanctified (or, ceremonially pure) to perform the things which thou willest, O thou Aten, when he showeth himself in the appointed processions.

Every creature that thou hast made skippeth towards thee, thy honoured son (rejoiceth), his heart is glad, O thou Living Aten, who (appearest) in heaven every day. He hath brought forth his honoured son, UA-EN-RA, like his own form, never ceasing so to do. The son of Ra supporteth his beauties (or beneficent acts).

NEFER-KHEPERU-RA UA-EN-RA (saith)

I am thy son, satisfying thee, exalting thy name. Thy strength (and) thy power are established in my heart. Thou art the Living Disk, eternity is thine emanation (or, attribute). Thou hast made the heavens to be remote so that thou mightest shine therein and gaze upon everything that thou hast made. Thou thyself art Alone, but there are millions of (powers of) life in thee to make them (i.e., thy creatures) live. Breath of life is it to (their) nostrils to see thy beams. Buds burst into flower (and) the plants which grow on the waste lands send up shoots at thy rising; they drink themselves drunk before thy face. All the beasts frisk about on their feet; all the feathered fowl rise up from their nests and flap their wings with joy, and circle round in praise of the Living Aten. . . .

LONGER HYMN

A hymn of praise of Her-aakhuti, the living one, exalted in the Eastern Horizon in his name of Shu-who-is-in-the-Aten, who liveth for ever and ever, the living and great Aten, he who is in the Set-Festival, the Lord of the Circle, the Lord of the Disk, the Lord of heaven, the Lord of earth, the Lord of the House of the Aten in Aakhut-Aten (of) the King of the South and the North, who liveth in Truth, Lord of the Two Lands (i.e., Egypt), NEFER-KHEPERU-RA UA-EN-RA, the son of Ra, who liveth in Truth, Lord of Crowns, AAKHUN-ATEN, great in the period of his life (and of) the great royal woman (or wife) whom he loveth, Lady of the Two Lands, NEFER-NEFERU-ATEN NEFERTITI, who liveth in health and youth for ever and ever.

He saith:

Thy rising (is) beautiful in the horizon of heaven, O Aten, ordainer of life. Thou dost shoot up in the horizon of the East, thou fillest every land with thy beneficence. Thou art beautiful and great and sparkling, and exalted above every land. Thy arrows (i.e., rays) envelop (i.e., penetrate) everywhere all the lands which thou hast made.

Thou art as Ra. Thou bringest (them) according to their number, thou subduest them for thy beloved son. Thou thyself art afar off, but thy beams are upon the earth; thou art in their faces, they (admire) thy goings.

Thou settest in the horizon of the west, the earth is in darkness, in the form of death. Men lie down in a booth wrapped up in cloths, one eye cannot see its fellow. If all their possessions, which are under their heads, be carried away, they perceive it not. Every lion emergeth from his lair, all the creeping things bite, darkness (is) a warm retreat. The land is in silence. He who made them hath set in his horizon.

The earth becometh light, thou shootest up in the horizon, shining in the Aten in the day, thou scatterest the darkness. Thou sendest out thine arrows (i.e., rays), the Two Lands make festival, (men) wake up, stand upon their feet, it is thou who raisest them up. (They) wash their members, they take (their apparel), and array themselves therein, their hands are (stretched out) in praise at thy rising, throughout the land they do their works.

Beasts and cattle of all kinds settle down upon the pastures, shrubs and vegetables flourish, the feathered fowl fly about over their marshes, their feathers praising thy Ka. All the cattle rise up on their legs, creatures that fly and insects of all kinds spring into life when thou risest up on them.

The boats drop down and sail up the river, likewise every road openeth (or showeth itself) at thy rising, the fish in the river swim towards thy face, thy beams are in the depths of the Great Green (i.e., the Mediterranean and Red Seas).

Thou makest offspring to take form in women, creating seed in men. Thou makest the son to live in the womb of his mother, making him to be quiet that he crieth not; thou art a nurse in the womb, giving breath to vivify that which he hath made. (When) he droppeth from the womb . . . on the day of his birth (he) openeth his mouth in the (ordinary) manner, thou providest his sustenance.

The young bird in the egg speaketh in the shell, thou givest breath to him inside it to make him to live. Thou makest for him his mature form so that he can crack the shell (being) inside the egg. He cometh forth from the egg, he chirpeth with all his might, when he hath come forth from it (the egg) he walketh on his two feet.

O how many are the things which thou hast made!

They are hidden from the face, O thou One God, like whom there is no other. Thou didst create the earth by thy heart (or will), thou alone existing, men and women, cattle, beasts of every kind that are upon the earth, and that move upon feet (or legs), all the creatures that are in the sky and that fly with their wings, (and) the deserts of Syria and Kesh (Nubia) and the Land of Egypt.

Thou settest every person in his place. Thou providest their daily food, every man having the portion allotted to him, (thou) dost compute the duration of his life. Their tongues are different in speech, their characteristics (or forms) and likewise their skins (in colour), giving distinguishing marks to the dwellers in foreign lands.

Thou makest Hapi (the Nile) in the Tuat (Underworld), thou bringest it when thou wishest to make mortals live, inasmuch as thou hast made them for thyself, their Lord who dost support them to the uttermost, O thou Lord of every land, thou shinest upon them, O ATEN of the day, thou great one of majesty.

Thou makest the life of all remote lands. Thou settest a Nile in heaven, which cometh down to them.

It maketh a flood on the mountains like the Great Green Sea, it maketh to be watered their fields in their villages. How beneficent are thy plans, O Lord of Eternity! A Nile in heaven art thou for the dwellers in the foreign lands (or deserts), and for all the beasts of the desert that go upon feet (or legs). Hapi (the Nile) cometh from the Tuat for the land of Egypt. Thy beams nourish every field; thou risest up (and) they live, they germinate for thee.

Thou makest the Seasons to develop everything that thou hast made:

The season Pert (i.e., November 16 to March 16) so that they may refresh themselves, and the season Heh (i.e., March 16 to November 16) in order to taste thee. Thou hast made the heaven which is remote that thou mayest shine therein and look upon everything that thou hast made. Thy being is one, thou shinest (or, shootest up) among thy creatures as the LIVING ATEN, rising, shining, departing afar off, returning. Thou hast made millions of creations (or, evolutions) from thy one self, (viz.) towns and cities, villages, fields, roads and rivers. Every eye (i.e., all men) beholdeth thee confronting it. Thou art the Aten of the day at its zenith.

At thy departure thine eye . . . thou didst create their faces so that thou mightest not see . . . ONE thou didst make . . . Thou art in my heart. There is no other who knoweth thee except thy son Nefer-kheperu-Ra Ua-en-Ra. Thou hast made him wise to understand thy plans (and) thy power. The earth came into being by thy hand, even as thou hast created them (i.e., men). Thou risest, they live; thou settest, they die. As for thee, there is duration of life in thy members, life is in thee. (All) eyes (gaze upon) thy beauties until thou settest, (when) all labours are relinquished. Thou settest in the West, thou risest, making to flourish . . . for the King. Every man who (standeth on his) foot, since thou didst lay the foundation of the earth, thou hast raised up for thy son who came forth from thy body, the King of the South and the North, Living in Truth, Lord of Crowns, Aakhun-Aten, great in the duration of his life (and for) the Royal Wife, great of Majesty, Lady of the Two Lands, Nefer-neferu-Aten Nefertiti, living (and) young for ever and ever.

Translated by Sir E. Wallis Budge, in Tutankhamen, Amenism, Atenism, and Egyptian Monotheism, London, 1923, pp. 116-135.

LONGER HYMN

Thy dawning is beautiful in the horizon of the sky,
 O living Aton, Beginning of life!
 When thou risest in the Eastern horizon,
 Thou fillest every land with thy beauty.
 Thou art beautiful, great, glittering, high above every land,
 Thy rays, they encompass the lands, even all that thou hast made.
 Thou art Re, and thou carriest them all away captive;
 Thou bindest them by thy love.
 Though thou art far away, thy rays are upon earth;
 Though thou art on high, thy footprints are the day.

When thou settest in the western horizon of the sky,
 The earth is in darkness like the dead;
 They sleep in their chambers,
 Their heads are wrapped up,
 Their nostrils are stopped,
 And none seeth the other,
 While all their things are stolen

Which are under their heads,
 And they know it not.
 Every lion cometh forth from his den,
 All serpents, they sting.
 Darkness . . .
 The world is in silence,
 He that made them restest in his horizon.

Bright is the earth when thou risest in the horizon.
 When thou shinest as Aton by day
 Thou drivest away the darkness.
 When thou sendest forth thy rays,
 The Two Lands (Egypt) are in daily festivity,
 Awake and standing upon their feet
 When thou hast raised them up.
 Their limbs bathed, they take their clothing,
 Their arms uplifted in adoration to thy dawning.
 (Then) in all the world they do their work.

All cattle rest upon their pasturage,
 The trees and the plants flourish,
 The birds flutter in their marshes,
 Their wings uplifted in adoration to thee.
 All the sheep dance upon their feet,
 All winged things fly,
 They live when thou hast shone upon them.
 The barques sail up-stream and down-stream alike.
 Every highway is open because thou dawnest.
 The fish in the river leap up before thee.
 Thy rays are in the midst of the great green sea.

Creator of the germ in woman,
 Maker of seed in man,
 Giving life to the son in the body of his mother,
 Soothing him that he may not weep,
 Nurse (even) in the womb,
 Giver of breath to animate every one that he maketh!
 When he cometh forth from the body . . . on the day of his birth,
 Thou openest his mouth in speech,
 Thou suppliest his necessities.

When the fledgling in the egg chirps in the shell,
 Thou givest him breath therein to preserve him alive.
 When thou hast brought him together
 To (the point of) bursting it in the egg,
 He cometh forth from the egg
 To chirp with all his might.

He goeth about upon his two feet
When he hath come forth therefrom.

How manifold are thy works!
They are hidden from before (us),
O sole God, whose powers no other poessesseth.
Thou didst create the earth according to thy heart
While thou wast alone:
Men, all cattle large and small,
All that are upon the earth,
That go about upon their feet;
(All) that are on high,
That fly with their wings.
The foreign countries, Syria and Kush,
The land of Egypt;
Thou settest every man into his place,
Thou suppliest their necessities.
Every one has his possessions,
And his days are reckoned.
Their tongues are diverse in speech,
Their forms likewise and their skins are distinguished.
(For) thou makest different the strangers.

Thou makest the Nile in the Nether World,
Thou bringest it as thou desirest,
To preserve alive the people.
For thou hast made them for thyself,
The lord of every land, who risest for them,
Thou Sun of day, great in majesty.
All the distant countries,
Thou makest (also) their life,
Thou hast set a Nile in the sky;
When it falleth for them,
It maketh waves upon the mountains,
Like the great green sea,
Watering the fields in their towns.

How excellent are thy designs, O lord of eternity!
There is a Nile in the sky for the strangers
And for the cattle of every country that go upon their feet.
(But) the Nile, it cometh from the Nether World for Egypt.

Thy rays nourish every garden;
When thou risest they live,
They grow by thee.
Thou makest the seasons

In order to create all thy work:
 Winter to bring them coolness,
 And heat that they may taste thee.

Thou didst make the distant sky to rise therein,
 In order to behold all that thou hast made,
 Thou alone, shining in thy form as living Aton,
 Dawning, glittering, going afar and returning.
 Thou makest millions of forms
 Through thyself alone;
 Cities, towns, and tribes, highways and rivers.
 All eyes see thee before them,
 For thou art Aton of the day over the earth.

Thou art in my heart,
 There is no other that knoweth thee
 Save thy son Ikhnaton¹.
 Thou hast made him wise
 In thy designs and in thy might.
 The world is in thy hand,
 Even as thou hast made them.
 When thou hast risen they live,
 When thou settest, they die;
 For thou art length of life of thyself,
 Men live through thee,
 While (their) eyes are upon thy beauty
 Until thou settest.
 All labour is put away
 When thou settest in the west.

Thou didst establish the world,
 And raise them up for thy son,
 Who came forth from thy limbs,
 The King of Upper and Lower Egypt,
 Living in Truth, Lord of the Two Lands,
 Nefer-khepru-Re, Wan-Re (Ikhnaton),
 Son of Re, living in Truth, lord of diadems, Ikhnaton, whose life is long;
 (And for) the chief royal wife, his beloved,
 Mistress of the Two Lands, Nefer-nefru-Aton, Nofretete
 Living and flourishing for ever and ever.

Translated by J. H. Breasted, in Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt, Chicago, 1912, pp. 324-328.

¹ The King's name is given different spellings by different Egyptologists. Sir Flinders Petrie writes it Akhenaten; Sir Wallis Budge, Aakhun-Aten; J. H. Breasted, Ikhnaton; and Arthur Weigall, Akhnaton, the spelling which we have adopted in this book.

This e-book was brought to you by the efforts of the hard-working folks at the Savitri Devi Archive. It is free, of course, for anyone to download and read. However, if you want to put it on your own website, please make sure to credit us. Linking back to the Savitri Devi Archive would be highly appreciated as well.

A WARNING TO THE HINDUS

by Savitri Devi

Calcutta
1939

Dedicated to Divine Julian
Emperor of the Greeks and Romans

* * *

May future India make his impossible dream a living reality, from one ocean to the other

Contents

	Foreword by Sree G.D. Savarkar	9
	Preface	13
	Introductory	17
Chapter 1	Indian Nationalism and Hindu Consciousness	27
Chapter 2	The Human Value of Hinduism: Free Scientific Thought Applied To Religious Matters	43
Chapter 3	The Human Value of Hinduism: Indian Paganism, The Last Living Expression of Aryan Beauty	52
Chapter 4	The Defence of Hindudom: A Danger Signal	63
Chapter 5	Social Reforms	78
Chapter 6	A Change of Mentality Among The Hindus: The Development of Nationalism	99
Chapter 7	A Change of Mentality Among The Hindus Preparation For Resistance	131

Foreword

Thought-currents are the makers and unmakers of nations and peoples. Regenerating, invigorating, enabling and aspiring ones raise them while degenerating, emasculating and self-deluding ones bring ruination upon them.

In all walks of life, for a very long time, the Hindus have been fed on inertia-producing thoughts which disabled them to act energetically for any purpose, in life, other than “moksha,” that is to say escape from this world — where to? God knows. And this is one of the causes of the continuous enslavement of our Hindu Rashtra, for centuries altogether.

Inspite of this state of things, time and again the undying vitality of Hindu manhood has asserted itself so vigorously as to make the enemies of Hindudom tremble before its “Nrisingha” nature. But it was inspite of the extraordinarily heavy pressure of the most unhealthy mental apathy towards worldly things that this outburst of the manly spirit was witnessed.

This unworldly mental attitude of the Hindu mind kept the nation from being conscious of its Hindu nationhood.

In the meantime, circumstances forced the Hindus to think in terms of nationhood, but, unfortunately, instead of the right one, they conceived a perverted idea of nationality. They tried to forget their collective self in order to bring foreign elements within the orbit of what they considered to be the “nation” — a strange “nation” indeed, in which men of foreign culture and foreign interests are given the upper hand, while the true children of the soil (faithful to its civilisation), are being reduced to helotry. And thus the Hindus encouraged the foreign elements, namely the Moslems, to foster the anti-national ambition of establishing their supremacy in India, either allied to the British or of their own.

As a result, the very existence of the Hindus as a nation has been increasingly threatened. Day by day, the situation is becoming more and more serious, and a time is almost at hand when, it is feared, it will be quite an impossible thing to think of the Hindu nation being saved. Anyhow, an herculean effort is needed to, save it, and the first and most important step towards such an effort is to produce an extraordinarily forceful thought-current through the collective Hindu mind; a thought-current which will, inspite of their still apathetic mental condition, create, among the Hindus, the positively assertive attitude of Hindu nationalism.

With the knowledge of this diagnosis, a few people have come forth who are doing their best to enable the once glorious and now unfortunate Hindu nation to come out of these critical times victoriously. And the authoress of this little book may safely be given due credit for producing the most necessary thought-current and thus, for rendering the most urgent service to this Hindu nation of ours.

She has one advantage over the usual workers from within the Hindu fold. She was Greek by nationality. It is owing partly to her appreciation of Hindu art, thought and “dharma,” and partly to deeper reasons that she was drawn to our society and that she adopted what we call “Hindutwa” for the rest of her life. But naturally, being a European, she could, though from within, study the condition of the Hindus in a detached manner. And this book contains the mature and thoughtful conclusions drawn by her, conclusions which, in no case, can be taken as the outcome of that partial attitude which one of the born-Hindus may be said to possess.

This highly inspiring and thought-provoking book will make the Hindus realise where they stand, and what dangers are threatening their very existence as a nation; it will put them on the right turn of national thinking. And this new attitude, if whole-heartedly adopted throughout the length and breadth of this country, will raise them, and help them to assert their national existence which the world shall not be able to ignore.

After this much, I introduce this book to the Hindu readers, and take leave of them hoping to be excused for having stood in the way between them and its valuable contents.

G. D. Savarkar

Sree G. D. Savarkar has given a translation of this book in Marathi language.

Preface

These pages were written after a year and a half work with the Hindu Mission (headquarters: Kalighat, Calcutta) in Bengal and Assam. They express a very old national outlook on religion, in the light of recent personal experiences. The Hindus who have a long and continuous experience among their countrymen, both in the social and political field, are humbly requested not to take offence of any such statements of a junior worker, which may seem premature to them.

The last chapter of the book, concerning the Hindu militia and the cultivation of the art of self-defence among the Hindus, reflects mainly the ideas preached by Srimat Swami Satyananda, the President of the Hindu Mission, and given by him a beginning of application in Assam, with the collaboration of the physical trainer and leader of the Hindu volunteers in Shillong. These same ideas are at the back of the vast youth movement started by Dr. Moonje and the Hindu Maha Sabha.

Rather than of a Hindu militia, we would have preferred to speak of an Indian militia, that is to say, not of a body trained for the protection of the Hindus alone, but of a widespread organisation of young men of all communities, trained for the defence of India's rights, and solely aiming at the reconquest of India's freedom and the rise of India's power. We would have preferred undoubtedly, to speak merely of Indians wherever we have spoken of Hindus, throughout this book, and we would have certainly done so, had all the people of Indian birth been at peace, united in the reverence of the same culture and the love of the same land.

We would be only too glad to see our brethren at peace with us, and we are sure that it is not impossible for them to unite with us in view of our highest common interest. This is indeed possible, provided they put India above everything, and we too; provided they are prepared, with us, to push all religious quarrels at the background and make the culture of India their culture, and the love of India their worship.

Unfortunately, the situation is such that we are forced to use, for our own self-defence against the communal exclusivism of many of our brothers, the precious energy which would have been much better employed, combined with theirs, against our common foes.

But I repeat: we do not hate our Indian brothers, Mohammadans, Christians, or whatever they may be; we have no grudge against them. The only thing we hate is anti-national religious fanaticism, from wherever it may come. We know that we have shared, in the past, the same eternal Indian culture with those who have since then, become the Indian Mohammadans and Christians, and, in the same spirit and with the same earnestness as we preach India above all sects to the Hindus, we urge those Indians who believe in so-called world-religions to put India above them. We call them back to our common national culture and civilisation, for the sake of the Nation. If they love the Nation, let them come and join us. They are welcome.

But whoever does not care for India and her culture, whether he be born a Mohammadan, a Christian or even a Hindu, should have no place in the country but, at most, as a temporarily sojourning foreigner. Whoever loves any community more than India, should go out of India.

I sincerely thank the President of the Hindu Mission and all the Hindus, my co-workers and friends, who have encouraged me by their support, and also enlightened me by their experience. I thank also the President of the Hindu Maha Sabha, V. D. Savarkar, Dr. Moonje, and the other leaders and prominent members of the Hindu Maha Sabha with whom I had the honour to come in touch, for the inspiration I drew from them.

Calcutta, May 1939
The Authoress

Introductory

Discussions about “religion” often fall into confusion because “religion” is a matter that can be considered from entirely different points of view. Two people speaking about “religion” may be, in fact, though unknowingly, speaking about two, things quite apart from each other. So, what is “religion”? This is the first question to be answered.

* * *

One often considers, in “religion,” merely certain moral teachings.

Nearly every main religious book contains some sort of teaching concerning the moral conduct of man, such as: “Thou shalt not steal,” “Thou shalt not kill a man,” or: “Thou shalt not kill any living creature,” “Thou shalt not get drunk,” etc., There are, no doubt, differences in the moral scale of values in different religions. For instance, to kill an animal is a sin, from the Jain point of view; from the Christian point of view, it is not. But any moral teaching presupposes some sort of society. Therefore, there is a minimum of prohibitions which we find in the moral code of every possible religion. Always and everywhere, such actions are “sinful” that are definitely anti-social, in the place and at the time where they are forbidden. And such actions which cannot but be anti-social (such as, for instance, murder of man for personal motives) cannot be commended, or even tolerated, according to any possible code of morals. They constitute the stable minimum of prohibitions, which is common to all religions considered from the point of view of “morality.”

* * *

Religions seem to differ more profoundly, when considered as metaphysical systems. Here, the very fundamentals are different, and there is not even a minimum of admitted notions, which can be taken as the common philosophical basis of all possible religions. The conception of Godhead, as well as that of creation, of soul, etc., is different, from one religious system to another. A religion can also well exist without the idea of God appearing at all, in the metaphysical outlook of its followers. Such is the case of Buddhism, of Jainism, and perhaps of other systems, less well known. The idea of salvation is also not an essential one; Shintoism has developed apart from it; and so had the national religions of Greece and Rome, long ago. Moreover, to a Christian and to a Hindu, for instance, who both put stress upon that idea, “salvation” means such an entirely different thing, that it is impossible, philosophically speaking, to call it a “common” notion of Hinduism and Christianity.

And if, neglecting to speak of different religions from a moral or intellectual point of view, one considers them merely in a spiritual light, as various paths to self-realisation, then, naturally, unity will appear. But it will not be unity among different religions; it will be the identity of the ultimate result of all religious disciplines, as regards man. The place to which the various paths lead is the same, and, to the seekers of wisdom, that may be the only thing worth considering. But the paths remain different. In this world, religions do not meet, even as paths leading to a truer world.

* * *

But, if no unity among religions can be found on the basis either of common metaphysical notions, either of common spiritual discipline, at least, a broad two-fold classification can be made, on a psychological ground.

There are religions, such as Christianity and Islam, based upon teachings which are considered by their followers as the only absolute truth. These teachings are, therefore, supposed to be essentially good for all mankind, and it is the duty of every believer to preach them, by word and by deed, so that every man may accept them and be saved. Such religions style themselves as world-religions. The ideal of their followers is the unification of all mankind, on the basis both of certain moral and spiritual teachings, and of certain metaphysical beliefs, looked upon as absolute truth, expressed once for all at a certain time, in a certain place, by a certain person, and recorded in a certain sacred book to which, naturally, no alteration and no addition can be made.

Uses and customs can easily differ, from place to place, according to geographical, political, and other conditions, provided their existence is not a denial of any of the fundamental beliefs upon which the whole religious structure lies. Culture itself can differ, from nation to nation, as long as these common beliefs remain. What greater difference can there be, for instance, than that between the culture of a Presbyterian Scotchman and of a Catholic Spaniard, or of a Syrian Christian, or of an Abyssinian? Yet, there is, between them, a minimum of common beliefs, sufficient to justify their common claim to be called “Christians.” The same thing could be said about a Mohammadan from Arabia or Iraq, compared to a Mohammadan from Java.

We call “creedal religions” all religions of the type of Christianity or Islam, in which the link among the faithful is necessarily common beliefs, but not necessarily common civilisation or culture.

* * *

But there are religions which do not rest upon any moral or metaphysical “truth,” considered as absolute. Their followers may or may not accept a certain number of common beliefs, and, if they do, still they do not condemn the many possible beliefs, in religions different from theirs, as “false,” nor do they look down upon them as “precious teachings entangled with superstition.” In fact, the followers of each one of such religions generally do differ from one another on the ground of metaphysics, of morals, or of religious discipline. Take the instance of the cultured ancient Greeks, followers of the same national religion but, at the same time, followers of different (and antagonistic) philosophies. There was, in that national religion of theirs, no common metaphysical system, comparable with that which we find in hellenised Christianity. Take the instance of the cultured modern Hindus, of different sects. There is very little common in their religious outlook, or in the particular discipline they may follow. One worships a personal God; one worships

God as impersonal; a third one does not believe in God at all; one practises hate yoga, another practises nothing but bhakti. Still, they are all Hindus, just as the ancient Greeks, inspite of their opposite metaphysical views, or of their personal devotion to entirely different Gods, were the followers of the same “religion.”

It is easy to see that the word “religion,” in this case, bears a totally different meaning from that which it had, while applied to “creedal religions” such as Christianity or Islam.

Here, there is no truth, whether concerning God, soul, salvation, creation, or anything else, which should be considered as absolute by all men. Every truth is relative, being the outcome of man’s experience, which is necessarily limited. And therefore, metaphysics (the common ground of religious thought, in “creedal” religions) are a matter of individual outlook. Spiritual realisation is also individual. The knowledge that it gives cannot be transmitted to a crowd. Even the path to realisation cannot be shown but to those who have undergone, through previous experience, a sufficient evolution.

In other words, in religions which are not creedal, there can be no conflict between “religion” and “philosophy,” no more than between “religion” and “science,” for a broad spirit of free research — that what is called, in modern language, scientific spirit — is applied there, without restriction, to every sphere of life, including spiritual realisation. And there can be no common beliefs commended to men at different stages of evolution. There can be no one-sided outlook on God, soul, etc., “good for all mankind,” to be preached from country to country.

Hinduism is the most perfect type of such “religions” which we shall call, presently, for sake of convenience, “non-creedal,” until further analysis allows us to characterise them more positively.

We have said that, when one speaks of “religion,” one often speaks, in reality, of morals or metaphysics. One still more often speaks of a certain culture and civilisation, characterising a certain society.

* * *

Even the idea of a “creedal” religion is not entirely free from this historical notion of civilisation and society. The creed is one thing, and society is another, that is true. But a creed without any society organised upon it, stands nowhere as a religion, while a society, without any creedal unity, but of which the members share a common civilisation and a common culture, has a sound existence of its own, as a society. The great difference between creedal and non-creedal religions lies in the fact that, while the principle of unity and the sense of brotherhood are to be found, among the followers of a creedal religion, in commonness of belief, (and not necessarily of culture and civilisation) that principle of unity and that sense of brotherhood are to be found, among the followers of a non-creedal religion, in commonness of culture and of civilisation, (and not necessarily of belief).

Two Indians, of whom one believes in God and one does not, are two Hindus, provided they both share that culture and civilisation which is the only thing all Hindus are supposed to have in common, which is, really, “Hinduism.” While an American or a Frenchman who has accepted one of the doctrines of manifold “Hindu philosophy,” Vedantism or any other, or any special type of Hindu devotion is no Hindu as long as he has not adopted such a style, not only of thinking, but also of living, by which he enables himself to become one of the units of Hindu society; moreover, socially speaking, he is no Hindu as long as a sufficient portion, at least, of Hindu society, has not accepted him as one of its members. It is in one's own hand to become a Christian. It is not in one's own hand alone to become a full-fledged Hindu, (or a follower of any other non-creedal religion).

Civilisation and culture are not free from geographical, as well as historical conditions. A follower of a non-creedal religion has necessarily, along with the greatest spirit of relativity, (and therefore of toleration) in every matter where his religious "philosophy" is concerned, a geographical sense of religion, in every matter where "religion," to him, means society. One can dream of unifying mankind through certain beliefs, (though this also, is an illusion) but one cannot even imagine the same civilisation, the same style of life, the same type of society all over the world. Therefore, in a non-creedal religion, no missionary activities can be conceived beyond certain geographical boundaries.

* * *

One may wonder, after this, if there is anything or not which is neither morality, nor metaphysics, nor society, but "real" religion. And if there be such a thing, what is it? Can it not be defined anyhow, except negatively?

The only thing which can, it seems, apart from all the rest, be called "real" religion, is spiritual experience.

It is clear that, however different religions may be, religion is one, if considered in that light alone. And it is in considering spiritual experience, which ends in the realisation of truth, that teachers like Sri Ramakrishna were able to say that, “just as all rivers run to the sea,” so do all religions have but one goal, one end: self-realisation.

Spiritual experience certainly gives knowledge concerning certain metaphysical entities and certain metaphysical problems. But it is to be carefully distinguished from metaphysics, for it is not something which can be discussed, and reasoned upon through the power of intellect alone, as generally metaphysics are. It has to be gone through. (In fact, the existence of metaphysics apart from spiritual experience, is a sign of the weakness of man, who feels as if he must have ideas about what he does not know and cannot understand. And all really great metaphysical systems, which have marked their influence upon the evolution of human thought, rest upon the background of some spiritual experience.) Creedal religions, such as Christianity, are right when they say that their dogmas cannot be understood through intellect. From the point of view of real religion, (spiritual experience) these religions are only incomplete when they ask one to believe in their dogmas, without giving him the means to realise the truth contained in them, and also, when they assert that there is no salvation for whoever does not accept those dogmas.

* * *

But spiritual experience is personal. It cannot be transmitted. Even the desire of acquiring it cannot be created in everybody. And, merely intellectual acceptance of the truth contained in the words of a certain realised man, or blind faith in the writings of an “inspired” book, cannot stand for spiritual experience — for self-realisation. That is why one can find, among the followers of creedal religions, a certain morality, a great amount of theology, but such a little real religion, (personal realisation of truth) compared to what could be expected.

What can be done is not to teach spirituality, but, through the habits of life, through customs and ceremonies, through art and culture, and daily dealings, to create an “atmosphere” in which spiritual experience appears to be the ultimate experience of man. No common creed is necessary for that. Only certain permanent influences, in certain special social surroundings, are. And that is what the Hindus have understood, from time immemorial up to the present day. The great religious value of Hinduism — manifold on the ground of morals, as well as of beliefs, but unified by culture, by artistic expression, by the “style of life” it evolves — lies in that fact.

But this is not the only reason, this is not even the main reason for which we want to preserve and strengthen Hindu civilisation, and organise Hindu society throughout India.

Apart from the high philosophies contained in the Hindu Scriptures and from the high spiritual ideal realised by the Hindu seers, we want to defend Hindu civilisation and society, against the increasing forces of rival proselytising societies strongly united by the consciousness of a common creed. Even if India itself were to disappear just now, the philosophical and spiritual inheritance of the Hindus would remain. Mankind would preserve it, because it is worth preserving. It is immortal, and needs no one to defend it. What we want to defend, we repeat, is Hindu society, the Hindu people, the bearers of Hindu civilisation, whose number is decreasing every day. They are the body of Hinduism, of which the high philosophies and spiritual realisations are the everlasting soul.

Our point is that Hindu society must not perish; nor must it stagnate in its present state of weakness. We want it to live because we know it can be mighty and beautiful, and also, because it is Indian, nay, because it is India herself.

We have no other reason to defend it.

Chapter 1

Indian Nationalism and Hindu Consciousness

What we have just said about creedal and non-creedal religions, leads us to the statement which can be considered as the main thesis of this essay: Hinduism is the national religion of India, and there is no real India besides Hindu India.

We know, there are people in India, nowadays, (and, unfortunately, not merely among the non-Hindus) who are ready to criticise this statement. They tell us that “religion is a personal concern; why should not every Indian follow the one he pleases? That has nothing to do with his national feelings.” They tell us that “in all civilised countries, nationality and religion are two separate entities.” They tell us that, “in Japan, for instance — the most progressive country of Asia — people of the same family may frequent different temples, belong to different religions, and yet be united.” And they add: “In India, why should it not be the same?”

All these remarks presuppose the same fundamental confusion of the two entirely different meanings of the word “religion,” that is to say, creed and culture. They are perfectly justified as long as one speaks of “religion” as a creed. They do not hold, when “religion” means a culture and a civilisation, without any special creed, which is the case with Hinduism.

Religion is a personal concern. That is true if, by “religion,” you mean a spiritual path. No Hindu will deny that paths leading to the realisation of one’s soul are infinite in number. None either will deny that creeds also may be contrary, and yet all true, for truth has contrary aspects; that, in the same family, one can worship a personal God, another, a number of Gods and Goddesses, and a third one, no God at all, and yet, all three may be united in the most perfect brotherhood. It is only those who believe that one only creed is true, while all the others are false and harmful, who can insist on forcing the same faith upon the whole world. But the Hindus never shared this belief.

As far as religion means a path to salvation, to “realisation of one’s inner self,” to “Godhood,” etc., not only it should be, but it always is, in fact, separate from nationality, and beyond the interference of State. Even in the case of a religion supposed to unite all its followers on the basis of a common creed, the spiritual path that each one takes, is different, and outside State control; for it is psychologically impossible for different people to “realise” the truth, expressed by the same dogmas, in exactly the same way. The most an autocratic State can do, if it must poke its nose into religious matters, (“religious” meaning spiritual, or even merely metaphysical), is to force unto the people the exterior acceptance of the same dogmas, under threat of punishment. That is what Christian States have tried in Europe, during the days of the Holy Inquisition. And that is the limit of what can be tried. It has proved a failure; for never an entire nation of so-called Christians has been united in the same faith, (in the same creed), not to speak of the same inexpressible realisation of God. If you only just examine the personal faith of a few Christians of the same nationality, you will easily be convinced of the truth of this statement.

In the “civilised” countries where “religion” and nationality, Church and State, are supposed to be separate, creed and nationality are separate, and always were, inspite of infructuous efforts to establish State dogmas. But culture and nationality are not separate; civilisation and nationality are not, and never will be.

Nowadays, a Frenchman who is a Catholic and a Frenchman who is a Theosophist, and another one who is a Seventh Day Adventist, are all three Frenchmen, not merely because they all speak French and have the same French ancestors, and live on the same soil. They are all three French because, inspite of minor differences (the Theosophist may be a vegetarian and the Catholic a meat-eater; their opinions may also differ, concerning the nature of God), they share common daily thoughts, common habits; a common way of dressing, of sitting, of furnishing their houses; some common standardised ideas about literature, art, music, science; in one word, that what we call “French culture” and “French civilisation.”

French culture is not a religion, for sure. But it is an aspect of the broader and more complex “European culture” and “European civilisation” which is that culture and civilisation that developed in the West of Europe, under the double influence of Christianity and Rationalism. We cannot call it Christian culture and civilisation, for Christianity alone has not produced it. And though the part played in its development by Christianity is great, no doubt, it is difficult to determine. Christianity being a “creed” before anything else, could not be the only factor in this huge creation of this world.

The fact that “religion” means (at least in the modern East), culture and civilisation as well as personal creed, misguides us when we bring forth, as an example of progress, the countries where “Church and State” are separate. If “Church,” if “religion,” is taken in its later sense, that of civilisation and culture, then, religion and State, or, better say, religion and society, are separate nowhere, not even in the West. Just try to imagine the case of a Frenchman who would live entirely, in his daily life, according to Mohamman lines! The case is not impossible. But the gentleman, in spite of his European face and of his ancestry, would no longer be a Frenchman. He would be some sort of non-European, exiled in France.

The example of the credal toleration of Japan, is as fallacious as that of the modern States of Europe. It may be that, in some Japanese families, from the point of view of creed, two brothers are Buddhists, a third one Christian, and a fourth one, a faithful observer of Shintoic rites (which implies no creed). That is to be said about the four men, as spiritual beings or as thinkers: two believe in the Buddha, in the Law, and in the Community; one, in Christ; and the other one may be an agnostic, or anything else. But, as social beings, they all live in the same way, think according to the same standards, share the same culture; as Japanese, they can all four be said followers of Shinto. Theirs is the smiling and heroic civilisation that Shinto thought and custom have brought forth. The sanctity of the Emperor is as great to the so-called Christian as to the faithful observer of the national rites. Moreover, the Christian himself will not hesitate to take part in a public function, performed according to Shinto rites, as a member of the nation. And, just as the rest of his compatriots, Shintoists, Buddhists, or whatever they may be, he bears a Japanese name — not a “Christian” one, which would be a foreign one, whether imported from Portugal or from America, or directly from the Bible, that is to say, from Palestine.

* * *

Variety of faiths is no hindrance to the formation of nationality, or to the solidity of national unity. And we repeat: in no civilised nations do all the citizens understand religion in the same way exactly, even if they profess the same creed, (religion meaning a path to spiritual knowledge).

But no nation can grow out of the patch-work binding together two or more civilisations. The very idea of common nationality, and the idea of pertaining to different cultures and civilisations, are contradictory. We cannot say: a French Catholic and a French Theosophist are both French, therefore why should a Hindu Indian and a Musulman Indian not be two Indians? This presumption of an analogy between the two cases, is as fallacious as the statements referred to above, about "Church and State." There is such a thing as French civilisation and culture, which is neither Theosophical, nor strictly Catholic. But there is no such thing as an Indian civilisation, which is neither Hindu nor Musulman. And just as France, just as Japan, just as any nation in the world, if India is to be a nation, she must have one civilisation, one culture, not half a dozen.

And the only civilisation for all India is Hindu civilisation. The only culture for all India is Hindu culture. Indian national consciousness is nothing else but Hindu national consciousness, strengthened, enlightened, broadened.

Why?

We have said that, in no country which is really a nation, two or more civilisations coexist. But it is undeniable that some (and even most) nations, have gone through two or more civilisations, one after the other. Christian Catholic Italy is not the Italy of the Caesars, however, she may be proud of all what Pagan Rome was. It is Italy still, to us, who have not known the former Italy directly. Nobody can tell what an ancient Roman would think of his country, if he came back. Nobody can tell what Hypatia would think of her Greeks, if she came back. In her days of struggle between the old Greek civilisation, with its Gods and its philosophies, and the new one, based upon Byzantine Christianity, the Pagans alone were honoured with the name of "Hellenes," that is to say: "Greeks," and of "Ethnikoi" that is to say: "nationals." The Christians were simply called Christians, without any distinction of race or country. Now, the inspired champion of Hellenic Paganism would find that “Hellen” and “Christianos” have become synonymous. Byzantine Christianity, (or, better say, Byzantine Christian civilisation, grown in the union of State and Church) has given Greece a new national consciousness.

But a new national consciousness, based upon a new civilisation, with a new mythology at its background, can only grow, in a nation, when the old one is dead. The old one must die first. Take the case of Greece: not until the last man bearing witness of the greatness of Greek Paganism had passed away, styled by his Christian countrymen as “Greek” and as “National,” could the Christian Greeks feel themselves Christians and Greeks, and boast of their Church as of a national Church, and forget that their religion had come from a foreign land.

In the same way, even if we admit, for sake of argument, that there can be a genuine Indian national consciousness with Islam at its background, we must remember that it is not until the last Hindu Indian comes to pass away, that such a consciousness can rise.

The least one can say is that this possibility is very remote.

* * *

It is one thing to read about one’s former national religion in a text-book, and it is quite a different thing to see it, living all around, with sounds and colours, in daily life.

Christian Italy and Christian Greece can easily have a national consciousness of themselves as “Christian” countries. Their people know about their beautiful ancestral Paganism through two things only: through books and through ruins. But no written description and no gorgeous remains whatsoever eloquent, can be as eloquent as living life.

Indian Mohammadans and Christians have the sight of the national Paganism which they have forsaken, daily before their eyes; not in books and works of art alone, but in the millions of Hindu brethren in the midst of whom they themselves move about. In vain their Indian ancestry and their Indian tongue remain important factors, which could, under other circumstances, create in them an Indian nationalism. What is India? And who is an Indian? Above the entrance of one of the great libraries of Athens, one can read these words: “Are Greeks, those who share our culture.” Are Indians also, first of all, those who share Indian culture and Indian civilisation. And, as long as there is a single Hindu family performing, to a certain extent, the ancient rites, living according to Hindu lines, and creating, wherever it is, a Hindu atmosphere, non-Hindu Indian nationalism is inconceivable. The Hindus, however few they may be, will keep on saying to the non-Hindus, by the fact of their very presence: “We represent India; not you. Therefore India is ours, not yours.”

And they will be right. India is theirs, because they alone are India.

The Indian Mohammadans themselves can realise, half-consciously, the fact of Hinduism being the only Indian civilisation and culture. That is perhaps why they like to imagine that their ancestors were all immigrants from Persia or Arabia. This claim is absurd. The Mohammadan population of only one district in Bengal (Mymensingh) is more than half the total population of Arabia. In fact, practically all the Musulmans of India are the descendants of converts from Hinduism. They are Indians by blood, no doubt. But to feel: "We are Indians" would mean, to admit that beautiful Hindu culture is theirs also. Then, perhaps, many would feel like coming back to the still numerous fold, and sharing the national life once more, with their Hindu brethren. But their religion, being a creedal one, is naturally intolerant. Non-Musulmans must be looked upon as "heathen," and everything "heathen" must be rejectable — everything, including Indian nationalism, that is to say, the consciousness of unity with "heathen" people, on the basis of a common "heathen" civilisation and culture. Moreover, the Hindu brethren will not take them back in their society. So it is better for them, to say, like the fox in the fable, that "the grapes are sour;" it is better to call themselves the descendants of Arabs and Persians, and to feel themselves one with the Mohammadan countries outside India. There is a lesser possibility for some of them to be tempted, sooner or later, to prefer India to Islam; and a lesser possibility also, for those who may be tempted already, if any, to fall into temptation, and meet with bitter disappointments in daily life.

* * *

Hinduism, taken not as any particular Hindu philosophy, neither as any particular spiritual path, but as Hindu culture and civilisation as a whole, is not merely India's national religion ("religion" meaning, here, both culture, civilisation and cult), but it is also the only religion which can remake India a strong glorious nation — a World power. It is the only religion which can become, more and more, the very expression of Indian nationalism.

First of all, Hinduism has developed in India. All its immense mythology (the most important part of it, for those who are not merely intellectuals; and how many are intellectuals wholesale?) is closely linked with the Indian soil. Its Gods and Goddesses are, no doubt, world-forces, philosophically, but practically, socially, they are Indians. Most Indians cannot realise yet what an advantage it is for them, as a nation, to be the compatriots of their Gods and Goddesses.

Every country is sacred to those who love it. But India is the field of worldly play, (lila kshetra.) of all those Gods, Goddesses, Rishis and Incarnations, whom the Hindu Scriptures speak about, of whom the Hindu children know the names and the marvellous stories; to whom incense is burnt, and flowers offered, in the Hindu temples, shrines, and homes. And this gives to India's sacredness a religious sanction. The love of an Indian for his soil (if that Indian be a Hindu), is not an ordinary patriotism, like that of an Englishman or a Frenchman. It is also reverence for the land of the Gods.

An Englishman may certainly love his England. But if he is a Christian, he must be feeling that Palestine, where his Lord was born, and preached, and died, is still more holy than England can ever be. If he would go on a religious pilgrimage, it would be to Jerusalem, outside England, not to any place in England. The same with a Frenchman, or any modern European. But just as an ancient Greek used to have his sacred places in Greece, a modern Hindu has still his sacred places within the boundaries of his motherland. Wherever he may go on a pilgrimage, may it be to Benares, to Mathura, to Gangotri or to Rameswaram, he will remain in India, in contact with his own soil. An Indian Mohammadan has to look abroad, to the most sacred spots on earth. So has an Indian Christian. A Hindu enjoys the privilege of regarding his own India, not only as the most beloved or as the most beautiful, but also as the most holy Land on earth.

* * *

Secondly, it is through Hinduism alone that one can realise India's unity, as a territory and as a civilisation.

So many different provinces, which are, each one, large enough and different enough from one another to be separate nations. So many different languages, each one with its own evolution, its literature and its pride. So many different sceneries, and different climates, including both equatorial and polar. But, broadly speaking, one type of society, one common civilisation; the same festivities, the same sacred language, the same places of pilgrimage within the limits of the same great India.

Several have said, nowadays, that it is the Europeans who have taught the Indians nationalism, indirectly; that India had never felt herself a nation, before the late struggle undertaken against British domination. This is difficult to believe, in the light of Hindu legend. Long centuries before any foreigner had settled in India, the unity of the country was materialised in symbols. What more suggestive story than that, for instance, of Sati, Siva's wife, whose body, divided, after her death, in fifty-one pieces, is lying still in fifty-one different places, therefore revered as "tirthasthans," throughout the Indian Peninsula? One lies near Peshawar, one in Kamakhya, not far from India's eastern boundaries; one in Benares, one in the very extreme South, others here and there. Fifty-one pieces, but one body; fifty-one "tirthasthans" in the name of the same Goddess, scattered over the same territory. Indeed, among the different interpretations that can be given of the legend of Sati, one can take it in this light: Sati is India herself, personified; India's soil, sacred from end to end, is, with all its variety, the actual body of one great Goddess.

The consciousness of Indian unity is nothing else but this feeling. And Indian nationalism means: devotion to this great Goddess.

That is why, besides the Hindus, no one can share it. Whoever really shares it is a Hindu.

* * *

For, last but not least, there is no other religion which can be used as a basis of Indian patriotism, like that of the Hindus; no other religion which can create and magnify nationalism in an Indian heart. And, as nothing is more necessary to India, today, than a strong national consciousness and national pride, we add: nothing is more necessary, today, than to revive, to exalt, to cultivate intelligent Hinduism, throughout the length and breadth of India.

No doubt, the Christian nations of Europe are full of patriotic pride. No doubt also, the spirit of war is not what is lacking in them. Yet, they are supposed to be Christian.

But they are not Christian, in spirit. Christianity is a creed for the uplift of individuals; not a civilisation upon which nations can be built. No nation built upon real Christian doctrine could live, in the midst of historical conditions. It is in collaboration with Christian Churches, that are organisations of this world, and not with Christianity, which is spiritual, that the so-called Christian nations have thrived. And their whole history is in flagrant contradiction with the spirit of Christianity.

Not merely Christianity, but any religion which is based upon a creed, supposed to be “truth” for all men, is in conflict with nationalism.

Greeks are Christians, and so are Bulgarians. They even belong to the same Church. And Christians are supposed to love one another. Yet, if war breaks out between Greece and Bulgaria, the Greek Christian priests will bless the arms which are to carry death among the Bulgarians, and the Bulgarian Christian priests will also bless the arms which are to kill the Greeks. French and Germans are also Christians. Yet, if war breaks out between them, each nation will pray to the same God — a God of love — for its victory over the other. Nothing is more inconsistent, because they are supposed to be Christian nations. Had they not been so, nothing would have been more natural. But Christianity itself is not natural. And the growth of Europe, with different Church-civilisations at its background, has taken place inspite of Christianity, not according to Christianity.

Any Christian who feels himself nearer to an Atheist of his own country than to a Christian from a foreign land, is not a real Christian. Nay, any follower of a creedal religion who is a nationalist at the same time, is utterly inconsistent. One cannot serve two masters. One cannot put God first, and also one's Nation first . . . unless the religion he professes is of such a type, that Nation and God can be taken as the same. This is not the case with Christianity and Islam. But this is the case with Hinduism. Therefore, it can be said that Hinduism is not only the religion which has developed in India, and which gives a living illustration of India's unity in variety. It is also the religion which, owing to its very outlook, to its very tenets, gives India the basis of a consistent nationalism, entirely in harmony with the spirit of its cult.

* * *

To a pantheistic minded Hindu, God (if He exists) not distinct from Nature, from what we call the visible world. The visible is only a relative expression of the Invisible. And therefore, every path leads finally to God. Through everything we love and worship, we, in fact, love and worship God. Nothing else can possibly be loved but God, through various forms, and names, and symbols.

There is a lovely story concerning Sri Ramkrishna Paramhansa. One day, a childless widow came to visit the great saint. She asked him what to do to actually see Lord Krishna, for whom she professed a great devotion. The saint asked her whom did she love the best in this world. And when she answered: “My brother’s young son,” he said unto her: “Keep on loving him, and love him still more. Keep his sight constantly before your eyes; serve him and love him. And soon, in that little child, you will actually see the One who used to play, years and years ago, in the fields of Vrindavan.” She did what she was told and saw Krishna, in the garb of her little nephew.

In the same way, among the Hindus, all fundamental natural feelings are magnified, exalted, sanctified through religion. Love and service to one’s husband is love and service to one’s God. A husband is God, visible and tangible. Love and service to one’s own mother is love and service to the Mother of the Universe. Every mother is Mother Kali, personified.

What is, then, more natural for a Hindu, than to consider his greater mother — Mother India — as another broader and more lasting expression of the Dark-blue Goddess? What is more natural than to feel that love and service to India, is love and service to that infinite Mother worshipped in temples? What is more natural than to erect temples, like that “Bharat-Mata ka Mandir” of Benares, where incense is burnt in front of a map of India?

On the Diwali day, the girls of the Arya Kanya Maha Vidyalaya of Jullundur (Punjab) draw a large map of India upon the ground of the school courtyard; they set lights in a row, all along its outlines, and then, standing around it, they sing “Vande Mataram,” and other patriotic songs. They are right, and perfectly consistent with the spirit of the national religion. And no cult, besides Hinduism, can promote in India that beautiful devotional nationalism, that revival, on an immense scale, of the spirit of “Ananda Math,” which is the thing, the only basic thing that present India needs to uplift herself as a nation, and become free, and great once more.

Chapter 2

The Human Value of Hinduism

Free Scientific Thought Applied To Religious Matters

We defend Hinduism, because it is India's very self-expression; and we love India, because it is India.

But, along with the fact that it is the soul of a great nation, and a nation-building force, Hinduism is to be examined in the light of its human value. India is great to the eyes of the intelligent world, because of what she stands for.

It is the custom, nowadays, to say that India stands for "spirituality," and to put an immense stress upon that word. It seems that, by doing so, one opposes India to "materialistic" Europe and America; and, as what is "material" is supposed to be inferior to what is "spiritual," the consciousness of this opposition is a great consolation to many Indians. They seem to think that down-trodden India becomes less down-trodden, if only she can be proved superior to her present rulers, in one thing at least.

We think this is a blunder.

Even if we admit that the Indians are all saints and that their present rulers are all devils, this does not change the condition of India. It only makes it still more shocking than it is, if more shocking can be, and therefore, is no consolation. But, in fact, the Indians as a whole, are not more “spiritual” than other people. There are giants of real spirituality, in present India, no doubt. But the average Hindu, when they boast of their “spirituality,” are not true to themselves. Nor are they doing justice to their country, and to their religion.

Hindu thought and culture (what is commonly called, Hindu religion), is, by no means, superior to other religions because of the famous spirituality that shines in the Hindu religious giants, saints and seers. Saints and seers, realised men, are to be found also among the followers of other religions. Are they greater or lesser in number? It is difficult to say. And it does not matter.

Hinduism is really superior to other religions, not for its spirituality, but for that still more precious thing it gives to its followers: a scientific outlook on religion and on life. Hindu spirituality is a consequence of that very outlook.

* * *

We consider it useless to oppose: India to the “West,” as “spiritualistic” opposed to “materialistic.” Hindu superiority lies elsewhere; not in the opposition of Hindu thought to European thought, but in the fact of its greater consistency than that of European thought, of its greater faithfulness to life, of greater harmony between life and it; in the universality of the Hindu’s scientific outlook, compared to that of the Europeans.

From those very days the Europeans abandoned their various non-creedal Aryan cults to take to Christianity, inconsistency in life, and restlessness of mind, among those who, in Europe, think freely, have two main sources:

(1) The opposition of Christian religion, in its essence, to out and out nationalism.

(2) The opposition of Christian religion to free scientific thinking in all matters.

On the ground of nationalism, Europe has tried to solve the problem by a compromise, and tried to settle the compromise upon the authority of the Gospel: "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God, the things which are God's." Church and State, religion and politics, must be separate.

Church and State can be separated, but religion and life cannot. And to many, at least, politics are nothing, if not an aspect of life. Nationalism is a concern of life, and one of the strongest ones. The Europeans may say that they are Christians as religious beings (as men, anxious about their salvation) and that, at the same time, nothing prevents them from being nationalists, as citizens of ephemeral countries of this world. It is easy to say; not so easy to live up to. For the Christians' kingdom is not of this world, and circumstances are sure to turn up, in which the full-hearted service to one's nation appears like the service of Mammon, opposed to that of God. It is written: one cannot serve both God and Mammon. A real Christian has to choose.

In fact, Europe has chosen Mammon, since long ago. But she continues professing a nominal allegiance to God, allegiance which, to a devout Christian, must seem the most shocking, wherever nationalism is the strongest.

We have shown how Hindu India, owing to the very nature of her religion, is forever free from such an inconsistency.

* * *

On the ground of science, the clash with Christianity seems at first easier to avoid; we are, here, in a realm of thought, not of action, are we not? And thought is very subtle.

After many a struggle during those dark days, where to express one's free thinking in all matters was to risk one's life, Europe has come to a compromise neither better nor worse than the one referred to above. Like politics and religion, science also, and religion, reason and faith, must be separate.

No need of them quarrelling; let them just keep quiet, each one in its corner, each one in its compartment. In all "religious matters," all what is concerned with one's salvation, there is the authority, if not always of the Christian Church and Scriptures, at least of the Christian Scriptures, of the holy Bible. Read the Bible, and believe like a little child. Let your reasoning power aside, when you open the sacred book. Interpretation is a dangerous game; it can lead to many errors. Therefore, do not interpret; do not discuss, but accept, believe, and you will be saved.

That is, “in religious matters.” But in every sphere of worldly knowledge, in every branch of science, believe nothing at all on the authority of anyone. Believe not, but suspend your judgement, doubt. Doubt, and dispassionate curiosity, are at the origin of all scientific knowledge. Accept not, but experiment, examine, criticise, find out for yourself. No miraculous grace can inspire you with the knowledge of what water is made of; analyse it. Scientific knowledge is not to be given and accepted. It wants to be conquered.

The result? Either a modern European is an out and out “free thinker,” who does not trouble about religious matters at all, or else, he is a man who has established a separation, in his thought and life, between the “things of the world” and the “things of faith,” that is to say, a man who, however intelligent he may be, uses his reason and his experience in certain matters only, while in others (which are supposed to be vital), is contented with the authority of a book.

Christians will say that there is an experience of the truth of the Bible, in Christian life. We do not deny it. But it is not an experience that can be taught and transmitted, like a scientific one. It is no “proof” of Bible truth. Moreover, its possibility does not shut out the possibility of other equally sound religious “experiences,” in non-Christian lives. The “jealousy” of the Christian God, that is to say, the exclusive attitude of a faithful Christian towards all what, as a religious teaching, is proposed to mankind besides Christianity, is the thing which cannot but bring inconsistency, wherever Christian faith and scientific thought are to be found together. The fact, often recalled, that many great scientists have been, at the same time, faithful Christians, does not lessen that inconsistency. Wherever arbitrary separations are set up, restlessness of mind sooner or later arises, with the growing consciousness of a “false position.” Life is one, in its complexity, and impossible to divide into compartments. The weakness of reasonable men who follow a creedal religion (whichever it may be; we took the case of Christianity merely as an instance), lies in the implicit denial of that fact. It is always possible to point out, either their want of true simple faith, either their wilful or unwilful absence of elementary criticism.

* * *

When we speak of the superiority of Hinduism as a “scientific” religion, we first put stress upon the absence, among the Hindus, of any sort of inconsistency due to the separation of the “things of this world” and the “things of the spirit.” No watertight compartments, here, one for “reason” and the other for “faith.” No “nature” and “super-nature,” to be dealt with in different ways. But one broad life, at different stages; one broad nature, with various aspects; one, and only one method of knowledge: experience.

The Hindus also say: believe nothing on mere authority, but experiment, realise; go through it “sadhana;” find out for yourself. Knowledge is not to be given to you by grace. It wants to be conquered.

But the difference is that this knowledge is not merely, the ordinarily called “scientific” knowledge, concerning the phenomena of matter; it is every knowledge, including the highest (or subtlest) knowledge of what is at the background of all phenomena, of all existence: the Absolute. In other words, every knowledge must be scientific, otherwise it is no knowledge at all.

As one can see, far from being opposed to so-called “materialistic” European thought, Hindu thought is exactly of the same nature. Thought, in fact, is neither European nor Indian, nor “materialistic” nor “spiritualistic;” it is thought, and no more, unless it is nothing. The superiority of the Hindus lies, not in the different nature of their thought, but in its consistent and universal application to all realms of life, including the realm of spiritual development, while European thought stops where begins, either blind religious faith, or else (more and more nowadays), systematical agnosticism.

A Hindu as well, can be an Agnostic (and many are, and always were, in all times). But his agnosticism is never systematical. He does not know, say, what is beyond the world revealed to him by his senses and by his intelligence. He has no experience of an “Absolute.” But he will not deny the possibility of having one. To the “sadhak,” who asserts “his” experience, he will not say: “It is nothing but imagination.” He possesses the real scientific mind, which is dogmatic about nothing, but open to everything.

* * *

That scientific character of Hinduism should be looked upon by the Hindus as their strength, not as a weakness, like some seem to believe. The man of one book and of one creed may be strong, for the time being; but in the long run, it is a strength (and the greatest of all strength) for a religion, to have no particular founder, no particular book, no particular creed, settled once forever; to be just a continuous flow of thought, in search of knowledge, on the basis of a continuously renewed experience.

While free thinking can (and does) injure the prestige of creedal religions, and will do so more and more; while different political and social creeds, whose international appeal is as great as that of any religion, nowadays, are daily detaching the faithful from their old Prophets and books, calling them to give allegiance to new ones, no force can ever break down such a religion as Hinduism. For Hinduism is, philosophically speaking, nothing else but infinitely various human thought itself, in continuous evolution. No end to the list of its prophets and seers, no end to the list of its books, until the end of mankind; but ever open possibilities to new experiences, and new expressions of truth.

No intelligent man would believe that all what can be said about such an apparently easily knowable thing as water, has been said once forever. Still, many people believe that all what is to be said about God, has been said, and that there is nothing to add to it. There are in Europe and America “scientists,” who accept this inconsistency. Scientists they may be; but their scientific attitude remains confined to a narrow sphere of knowledge. A true Hindu, whether he knows even how to read and write or not, keeps (or, at least is expected to keep) a scientific attitude in every sphere of life. He keeps, wherever he may be, that smiling spirit of relativity, which was the ornament of the refined ones, in ancient Greece. Give him self-consciousness and self-assertion, and he will be like one of them.

Chapter 3

The Human Value of Hinduism

Indian Paganism: The Last Living Expression of Aryan Beauty

Another, and perhaps a more expressive word for Hinduism would be: Indian Paganism.

The Christian missionaries call “Pagans” all those who are neither Christians, nor Mohammadans, nor Jews, that is to say, all those whose religious tradition has no connexion with the Bible and tradition of the Jews. We accept the word, because it is a convenient one. It points out some sort of similarity between all non-creedal religions of the past as well as of the present day.

Once, practically all the world was “Pagan.” Now that half its people have been converted either to Christianity or to Islam, the number of Pagans is less. That is no proof of the lesser value of different Paganisms, compared to the great creedal religions. It is surely an advantage, to be numerous; but it is no virtue. And therefore the number of its followers has nothing to do with the value of a cult.

* * *

We have remarked that among the so-called Christians, there are more and more people who are no total believers in the Bible at all, but “free thinkers.” And we have said that free thought in all matters, including religion, is a feature of Hinduism. This does not mean that we consider all the free thinkers of the World as Hindus.

Philosophically, Hinduism is an attitude of mind, and an outlook on life. But it is not only that. It is a number of cults, among which one may choose. And, whatever cult it may be, it is a cult, one of the immemorial Pagan cults, surviving in the midst of the modern world. The Hindus are one of the few modern civilised people who are openly Pagans.

The Japanese, with their official Shintoic ritual, are another of these people. And they being one of the leading nations of the modern world, their example is priceless. They show magnificently that, even if it be indispensable to adopt any new mechanical inventions, in order to compete with other nations, and live, yet it is not necessary to adopt the religion and the civilisation of the inventors, wholesale. Aeroplanes and war-tanks, and modern banking business on a broad scale, can perfectly go together with the existence of a Solar dynasty of king Gods, in whose Godhood everyone actually believes, as well as an Egyptian did, six thousand years ago. When India, freed from internal weakness and foreign yoke, will become again a world power, then she will, still better perhaps than Japan, stand as a witness of such sort of truth as this.

In the meantime, she remains the last great country of Aryan civilisation, and, to a great extent, of Aryan tongue and race, where a living and beautiful Paganism is the religion both of the masses and of the intelligentsia.

* * *

We like this word “Paganism,” applied to the Hindu cults. It is sweet to the ears of more than one of the fallen Aryans of Europe, accustomed to refer to “Pagan Greece,” and to “Pagan beauty” as the most perfect expressions of their own genius in the past. That is also why we use the word, preferably to any other.

* * *

India has perhaps never enjoyed yet, even in the days of her glory, the world-wide popular fame she enjoys nowadays. This world-wide fame is greatly due to the repeated assertion of Hindu “spirituality,” and to the philosophy of non-violence, preached by Mahatma Gandhi.

Very few people have grasped the spirit of Christ as well as Mahatma Gandhi, and several other prominent Hindus of the present day and of the last century. And among the few Europeans who have been sincerely attracted by Hinduism, practically all have sought, in it, if not a doctrine, at least a moral creed, or, better say a moral attitude of love and kindness — the very same thing they could have found in Christianity, if only they took the trouble of separating the simple and luminous personality of Christ from all theological and heretical entanglements. In other words it is, generally, the dream of a better Christianity that brings fair people from across the seas to “serve mankind” in the Ramakrishna Mission, or to express their pure devotional love as inmates of some Vaishnava Math.

The Hindus of the present day like such admirers. Many of them also like the idea that there is more true Christian spirit among outstanding Hindus, than among most Christians. There is nothing to say about these likings, if not that they are, to a great extent, a subtle expression of unfortunate India’s deep-rooted inferiority complex.

Pure spirituality (realisation of one’s soul), naturally transcends creed, as well as ceremonies. So a realised Hindu will look like a realised Christian. That is true. It is true also that, in such a complex set of teachings as those contained in the innumerable Hindu books (including Jain, Buddhist, Vaishnava etc., scriptures), there are many elements which are to be found also in Christianity. Others will say that there are a great deal of Hindu elements (or Buddhist elements) which have crept into Christianity, and there are theories to prove this influence of Indian thought. And one may safely assure that the failure of Christian preaching among the educated and fully conscious Hindus, is mainly due to the existence of these elements. A religion of love is not a new thing to India, as it must have been to the people of ancient Europe.

But all this does not lessen the fact that the Hindu religion, both as a set of philosophies and as a cult, has also the characteristics which Aryan Paganism had, before it was overcome by Christianity in the West. We find here, like in ancient Greece, contrary philosophical tendencies, with a very few main common ideas between them (such as the idea of transmigration of souls, for instance, and one or two others). And, what is more, we find in Hindu cult, in Hindu life, that essential thing, which is the only one worth living for: Beauty.

* * *

Visible beauty leads to the invisible, says Plato.

Nowadays, when people speak of India, they seem to speak too much of its invisible beauty, and to ignore the visible. "Spirituality, spirituality...." They all talk of it, those who know something about it, and those who know nothing. It is the fashion. One does not look like a friend of India, if one does not put stress on that point. Nor does one feel like a true Indian patriot.

But nobody puts stress upon the physical beauty of the Hindu people. Yet they are Hinduism, they are India, more than all the philosophies put together; and the first qualification, for a nation as well as for an individual, is the beauty of its body. No mean soul can reside in a really beautiful body. The body expresses, reflects the interior self. And a beautiful race is a noble race, with high possibilities. People speak of Hindu culture as of an abstract entity, as if it could have grown anywhere and everywhere. They forget to say that those who live it, as a nation, are amongst the most beautiful races of mankind. There is, no doubt, a mysterious identity between that culture and them.

To a great number of Hindus, the Hindu ritual has a great symbolical value. To the large majority of the Hindus, it is practically everything. Yet, nobody puts stress upon the visible beauty of the Hindu daily “puja,” of the Hindu festivities, of the Hindu ceremonies. Many educated Hindus seem to think it below their dignity to praise, in their religion, what appeals to one’s eyes and ears, what is “exterior.”

But it is not possible to deny the attraction of beauty.

We have mentioned the burning regret of the past, among some Western Aryans, who seem to have a retrospective consciousness of what their race was, and an idea of what perhaps it could have been still, had their ancestors been faithful to the old national cults of Europe. This nostalgia for the past is not a new thing in the Christian West and Near East. It begins sixteen hundred years ago, with the desperate attempt of the Emperor Julian to restore the religion and society of the “Ancient World” to their former splendour, and it increases, in the heart of the few, as the “Ancient World,” seen from a greater distance of time, seems more and more lovable.

This Ancient World had its shortcomings. It had its vices also, which brought its down-fall. But its wise men were the pride of human intelligence. And above all, it is lovable for what Europe and the Near East have never known since: the open cult of Visible Beauty.

This cult is to be found nowhere, nowadays, except in to last sunny home: Hindu India.

* * *

It is said that, one day, Julian tried to organise a procession through the streets of Constantinople, in honour of Dionysos, the God of impetuous Joy, and overflowing Life.

But it was already too late, and the attempt proved a failure. The procession was but a ridiculous show, and when returning, at evening, after it was finished, Julian was as sad as if his eyes had embraced the whole gloomy future of the Mediterranean World. It is said that he was sitting in the gardens of his palace, in front of old blocks of marble, half-hidden with ivy, when a faithful friend, guessing the cause of his sadness, asked him: "What else did you expect? These are the days of our death. What was your aim, in ordering this procession? What did you want?" The Emperor looked at him silently; then, pulling aside the ivy, he pointed out to him what was behind: a master-piece of some artist of the ancient days: a procession in honour of Dionysos, carved out in white marble; a smile of the World's youth; a thing of beauty: "This is what I wanted."

* * *

This was at the time when the great Samudra Gupta was ruling over India.

Oh! if only Julian could have seen what a display of beauty, in daily life and in festivities, and in processions in honour of Gods and Goddesses much akin to his, was going on, over there! If only he could have seen that Aryan Paganism would live and flourish forever, in that luxuriant land; that India would preserve the World's youth from age to age, through an endless future!

Then, certainly, he would have blessed the great country, with tears of joy.

Just go to Madura or to Rameswaram, nowadays, and see a real Hindu procession there, with elephants bearing immemorial signs of sandal and vermilion upon their foreheads, and draperies of silk and gold flowing over their backs, down to the ground; with flutes and drums, and torches reflecting their light upon the half-naked bronze bodies, as beautiful as living Greek statues; with chariots of flowers, slowly going around the sacred tank. Just see the pious crowd (hundreds and thousands of pilgrims, gathered from all parts of India), throwing flowers, as the chariots pass. And above all this, above the calm waters, the beautiful crowd, the mighty pillars, the huge pyramidal towers, shining in the moon-light . . . above. all this, behold the one, simple, phosphorescent sky.

Just watch an ordinary scene of Hindu life: a line of young women walking into a temple, on a festival day. Draped in bright coloured sarees, sparkling with jewels, one by one they come, the graceful daughters of India, with flowers in their hair, with flowers and offerings in their hands. In the background: thatched huts, among the high coconut trees and green rice-fields all around — the beauty of the Indian countryside.

One by one they come . . . like the Athenian maidens of old, whose image we see upon the prize of the Parthenon. The lover of Beauty, Julian, the Sunworshipper, if only he could have seen them, would have said, beholding the reality of his own dream: “This is what I wanted!”

* * *

But it is not through the forms and colours of popular Hindu cult alone that Hinduism is a religion of beauty. Its conception of God, creative and destructive, is the expression of a broad artistic outlook on life and on the universe.

In creedal religions, the centre of interest is man; the background, man’s short history, man’s misery, man’s craving for happiness; the scope, man’s salvation. God, man’s Father, has a particular, and somewhat partial tenderness towards this privileged creature of His.

In intelligent Hinduism, this anthropomorphic view has no place. The centre of interest is this eternal universe of Existence, in which man is only a detail. God is the inner Force, the deeper Self, the Essence of that Existence — the “Greatest Soul.” (Paramatma).

No personal likings and dislikings, in Him. No special favour to any of the creatures that appear and pass away, in the course of time. Nothing but an endless succession of infinite states, of infinite expressions of the unknown Thing, which is the reality of all things; a dancing succession of birth and death and rebirth, over and over again, which is never the same, and yet, is always the same; a play, (lila) which has no beginning nor end, nor purpose, but which is beautiful, whatever may be the temporary fate of any particular species, in its course.

The fate of all species, of all individuals, is to grow slowly more and more conscious of the beauty of the Play, and, at end, to experience their substantial identity with the Force which is playing-playing with its own Self. Nobody knows what this Force is, except those who have realised it in themselves. But we all adore It, and bow down to It. We do not bow down to It because we know It, and because It is God. It is because we bow down to It, that we call It God. And we bow down to It and worship It, in its millions and millions of expressions (those which destroy us, as well as those which seem to help us), because, in its millions and millions of expressions, It is beautiful.

* * *

Creation is only half the Play of Existence. Men thus generally worship only one side of God. But the Hindus praise Him all round, for the beauty of His Play. They praise Him in Destruction, as well as in Creation. They praise His Energy (Shakti) in Mother Kali, in Durga, in Jagaddatri, in Chinnamasta, continuously destroying and recreating Her own Self; in all the ten “Mahavidyas,” who are one and the same. They praise Him in the Dancing King (Nataraj), whose feet are over-treading life, and destroying it in a furious rhythm, . . . while His dispassionate face, expressing Knowledge, is as calm as the smiling sea.

Creation and destruction are one, to the eyes who can see beauty.

And the greatest praise to India is this: not only are her people beautiful; not only are her daily life and cult beautiful; but, in the midst of the utilitarian, humanitarian, dogmatic world of the present day, she keeps on proclaiming the outstanding value of Beauty for the sake of Beauty, through her very conception of Godhead, of religion and of life.

Chapter 4

The Defence of Hindudom

A Danger Signal

The last stronghold of living Aryan Paganism: India.

But how long is India going to last? That is to say: how long is Hindudom going to last in India?

To one who lives in the South, near one of those gorgeous temples that are India's pride, in the midst of the most intense Hindu life, such a question must seem strange. What is the danger? A few Untouchables who are every day becoming Christians, and who generally remain, in society, as Untouchable as before? They do not count. Mohammadans? They are three per cent, four per cent of the whole population. And they do not look as if they are increasing. They have no power, and create no trouble. Hindudom can last forever.

One who lives in Orissa, where Mohammadans are two per cent, can think the same: In Bihar, Mohammadans are ten per cent; they are thirteen per cent, in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh; less than five per cent in the Central Provinces, six per cent, in some parts of West Bengal (such as Midnapur district). There also, one can think the same.

But what about Punjab, the cradle of Aryan culture in India? And what about Bengal, the home of Indian culture in the present day, if we except its western districts? Punjab, at least, has got the Sikhs who, in case of trouble, will stand like one man and fight for Hindudom. Bengal has no equivalent of the Sikhs yet, and its condition is worse.

As far as a census report written in India can be correct, the latest figures, which are supposed to give a picture of Bengal in 1931, are impressive. In West Bengal, the Hindus are in majority; but in North and East Bengal they seem to be, according to the tragic words of a Bengali author, “a dying race.”

Just see their proportion, compared to the Mohammadan population, in a few districts:

District		Hindus	Muslims
Rangpur	(roughly)	746,000	1,836,300
Bogra	”	178,000	905,000
Pabna	”	332,000	1,112,000
Mymensingh	”	1,164,000	3,927,000
Dacca	”	1,100,000	2,200,000
Faridpur	”	847,000	1,507,000
Tipperah	”	750,000	2,356,000
Noakhali	”	366,000	1,339,000
Chittagong	”	392,000	1,326,000
Barisal	”	812,000	2,135,000
Nadia	”	574,000	944,000
Jessore	”	634,000	1,035,000

The whole Hindu population of Bengal is, roughly, 22 millions. The whole Mohammadan population, 28 millions. And if one adds to that the Mohammadans of the Bengali speaking border district of Assam (Sylhet district), one gets a figure approaching 30 millions, which is, practically, one half of the whole Mohammadan population of British India (not including the Indian States).

The Mohammadan population of Bengal alone is more than the double of that of present-day Turkey. And the Mohammadan population of just one of the districts of Bengal (Mymensingh district) is more than half that of whole Arabia.

But however impressive figures may be, the sight of the Bengali countryside is much more impressive.

There are regions where one can walk miles and miles without meeting a single Hindu. There is no racial difference between the boat-men on the rivers, the peasants in the fields, and the boat-men and peasants from other parts of Bengal. They speak Bengali; they are Bengalis. If not for their beard, and the coloured "lunggi" they wear, instead of a white "dhoti," you would never take them for anything else but Hindus. Yet, their collective consciousness is not that of the Hindus. Their diet differs. Their outlook differs. They are firm believers in an undiscussed so-called absolute "truth," in an international creed, fixed, once forever, in a book. And they are ready to believe that their ancestors have come from the country far away, where the Book was first given by God to mankind.

You reach a village — one of those lovely villages of East Bengal, made of huts of bamboo, scattered amidst a thick green jungle and a few tanks full of pink and white lotuses — and you inquire of its name. The name will be Krishnapur, Kalipur, Sitarampur, or some other Hindu name like that. But how many Hindus are there in the village? Not one. Or perhaps, yes, there may be a few: half a dozen fishermen, a barber, a washerman, who through ignorance, through need, and through the pressure of the environment, will be Musulmans, in a generation or two, or less than that.

The “zamindar” and the, money-lender were and are still generally Hindus. But their position in the village is growing more and more precarious.

* * *

An object of admiration for an outsider, in a Bengali village, are the learned Brahmans (the “Pandits”) and in general, the educated men, among the high caste Hindus. They may not know much more of the wide world outside, than the literate villagers of France or England do. But they are so much more refined, cultured, in the deep sense of the word. It is a pleasure to argue with pandits, for long hours, on some abstract subject, and hear them come out, every now and then, with a harmonious quotation, in Sanskrit, from the Holy Scriptures. (They seem to know the Scriptures by heart). They will entertain you in the open, under a bunch of high trees, or else, in a little room, with walls of bamboo, where there is nothing else but a mat to sit upon, and several old books. They have the sweet temper and amiable manners of people who have been aristocrats since the beginning of the world. They are poor, and spotlessly clean. And by coming in contact with them, one feels like discovering an untouched spot of ancient India.

When one has been walking for miles and miles, or sailing for hours and hours along the broad streams of Bengal, crossing places with Hindu names and ninety percent Mohammadan population, it is refreshing to stop in a village where there are, at least, one or two pandits, and have a talk with them. There is such an atmosphere of serene Hindu life all about them, that one takes to hoping once more. They may also tell you, in their beautiful language, with Sanskrit quotations from several "shastras", and commentaries upon the shastras, that Hinduism is eternal ("Sanatan Dharma").

You will learn, at the same time, that during the last month, a "namasudra" of the village, and two "malis," from a village five miles away, have become Mohammadans. But it seems that the loss of those low-caste people does not injure Hinduism's eternity.

* * *

In towns, the proportion of Hindus is undoubtedly greater than in villages. Yet, there are quarters in Dacca and in Chittagong, where the number of bearded men that you cross in the streets, wearing a red "tupi" upon their head, makes you feel as if you were in Cairo or in Bagdad, not in India.

The educated Hindus, who are numerous, keep Hindu tradition and Hindu culture alive in their homes. While sitting with them, you feel you are in India; in fact, you are in India still. But the masses are getting day by day more Mohammadanised.

And if you speak of this to the educated Hindus of Dacca or of Chittagong, they may also tell you, like the learned village Brahmans, that another name for Hinduism is "Sanatan Dharma." They are accustomed to see bearded men walking about the streets, with red "tupis" upon their heads. They have never seriously inquired to what extent the number of these men is increasing. Nor have they ever troubled to find out, by what mysterious mental process a Hindu (one of their own people), suddenly makes up his mind to grow his beard, and wear a "tupi," and call himself a Musulman; by what mysterious mental process he actually becomes a Musulman, with a full-grown Musulman consciousness, ready to stand against the Hindus, at the first call.

They will tell you that those Musulmans are nothing but low caste Hindus converted once upon a time to Islam; which is generally true. They will tell you that quality is to be sought more than quantity, which is always true; but which is not the only truth about the Hindu-Moslem problem in India, and specially in Bengal — far from it.

* * *

The old controversy of "quality" versus "quantity, and the idea of "eternal" Hinduism, are brought in owing to the same fallacy. In both cases there is, at the back of the mind, a confusion between two planes: one, concerning ideas as such (the plane of "truth," which is beyond time and space) and the other, concerning action and success, that is to say, our ordinary historical plane, in which time and space are everything.

Truth is eternal, no doubt. It does not depend upon the number of those who accept it. An increasing number of those who accept it, does not prove it to be more true. Nor does the display of their spirit of sacrifice or of any other qualities of character; it bears witness in their favour, as strong and faithful men, but adds nothing to, and alters by no means the "truth" (or untruth) of what they profess. A martyr never proves, by his death, that truth for which he dies; he only proves his own personal consistency, and that is all he can do.

Beauty, perfection, and all other abstract entities of the same sort, are equally eternal. So it is mere waste of time to defend them; they take care of themselves. "Eternal" Hinduism (that is to say, the truth expressed in the innumerable "shastras" and "sutras," etc., the wisdom of the Upanishads, the splendour of the Vedic hymns) will, in the same way, take care of itself. No need defending it. Would all India profess Islam, tomorrow; would it even disappear wholesale, in some formidable cataclysm, that would make no difference: the enlightened world would preserve the Hindu Scriptures, because they are worth preserving.

And even if it did not preserve them, it would slowly rediscover the truth contained in them. So, in anyway, it is no good troubling about the fate of the tenets of Hinduism. They are not in danger.

It is the Hindus, as a nation, who are in danger of extinction, at least in certain parts of India. It is Hindudom, not Hinduism, that we defend. For if Hinduism is “sanatan” (eternal), nothing proves that Hindudom is also. The numerical and political strength of Hindudom would not add anything to the value of Hinduism as such, no doubt. But reversely, the value of Hinduism will not save Hindudom, if Hindudom is not strong, numerically and politically.

The truth contained in Plato’s writings is still true. But it did not keep the ancient Greek society and civilisation from passing away. The beauty of Hypatia’s life did not save Pagandom in Alexandria.

* * *

When one goes about in the North and East of Bengal (not to speak of the other places in India where the Hindus are less than 25% of the total population), one realises, to a great extent, what a fully conscious Greek Pagan must have felt like, in his own country, during the early Middle Ages, when Christendom was growing to power day by day.

Because Christianity has finished by winning, people, nowadays, speak a lot of the persecutions against the first Christians, and do not speak so much about the oppression of the last Pagans by the Christians. Works of art destroyed, festivities stopped, schools of philosophy shut down, wise men exiled: all this marked the rising of Christianity to the dignity of a State religion, from the days of Constantine the 1st to the days of Justinian. But, however bitter it may seem to us, who look upon these facts from a distance of fifteen hundred years, all this must have been nothing, compared with the growing tyranny exercised by the Christians (day by day more numerous, and stronger, owing to government support as well as to their number), upon the decreasing minority of Pagans, in the towns and villages of Greece, Asia-Minor, Egypt, Italy, etc.

The fate of learned and virtuous Hypatia, barbarously put to death by fanaticised Christian monks, fills us with indignation. But Hypatia was not the only one, certainly. There must have been frequent Christian-Pagan riots, in those days, on the occasion of public teaching of Grecian philosophy, or of peaceful processions in honour of the Gods of old, until every free voice was finally made silent, and every public manifestation of Pagan life stopped forever.

To stop Pagan life was not an easy thing. To a certain extent, Pagan life and Pagan festivities continued in the garb of Christianity. (A look at the Christian Church will tell you that.) But apart from this, it is said that, in remote villages of Greece, and in Crete, there were still, in the eleventh century A.D, a few people who openly professed their ancient national religion; and “the last of the Neo-Platonicians,” Gemistos Plethon, was living in Greece in the fifteenth century A.D. (Distant Northern Europe, less conscious of the possibilities of its warrior-like Paganism, accepted the Gospel much quicker and more seriously than the Mediterranean World, though it came much later in contact with Christianity.)

It would be instructive, for the Hindus of the present day, to meditate upon the fate of the Western Aryan civilisations, in the early days of Christian power. The few learned “pandits,” who still keep on representing “eternal Hinduism,” in East Bengal villages where 90 percent of the people are Mohammadans, had their parallel in the West, eight or nine hundred years ago, in the shape of a few wise men who kept on, for a long time, representing “eternal Grecian thought,” alone in the midst of a hostile, or at least most contemptuous Christian majority.

* * *

“Grecian thought” is living still. Grecian Paganism, as a thing of beauty and of truth, is eternal. But Grecian Pagandom seems to have passed away forever.

In India, temples have been destroyed in many places; but Hindu life is there still.

Greece is covered with gorgeous ruins. Upon the steep promontories, there are still rows of white columns, looking over the blue sea, full of isles. There are blocks of sculptured marble, and old statues to be found even in the market place. But living life all around, runs on different lines. The national Gods have become objects of admiration in museums. Foreigners come from America to see them. But nobody worships them. There are no Panathenian processions, in pomp and glory, going up the Acropolis today.

The same thing can be said about Italy. For true Christianity's misfortune, a lot of Pagan show may have invaded the Church. But Paganism was not a mere show. There was also something else in it, which is gone, now, from Italy as well as from Greece; there was the national consciousness of Pagandom.

The same thing can be said about Egypt, the land that perhaps looked the most like India, once, long long ago; the land where the sacred Bull was worshipped, and where people used to regard the "Old Father Nile," whose life-giving waters flew down from Heaven, just as the Hindus look still upon holy Mother Ganges.

Nowadays, along the banks of the Nile, there are Pyramids, and temples, and huge statues of pink granite representing kings and Gods of old. But those who dwell in the very shadow of these ruins are Mohammadans; a few of them are Christians. There are some of them who work as guides, for there are many foreigners to visit Egypt. They take the Americans around, among the gigantic pillars and blocks of stone, and tell them: "This was the temple of Phtah. . . . This is the image of that God. . . . This is the image of Mout, his consort etc." They tell them which 'king built the temple. They ask them to notice the beauty of the images. They show them the glory of Egypt, conscientiously. But that glory of their ancestors is not their glory. They are the children of another nation, grown upon the ruins. The same land; but another nation. The same stones, but without their meaning. The same Nile, but without the Nile-cult.

* * *

We heard of a modern Pagan who visited Egypt only a few years back. The first thing he did was to walk down to the Nile, to throw a few flowers in its current, to stoop and drink a little of its water, and pour a handful of it over his head. "Old Father Nile, you are beautiful. And you give life to millions of creatures. Yet, since how many centuries has nobody bowed down to you; nobody offered you his worship? I bow down to you, I, all by myself."

And while he was saying this within his mind, a thought came to him: far away beyond the burning sands, far away beyond the sea, there is a Land where they have not forgotten; there is India, who still bows down to Mother Ganges, the last of the great sacred Rivers. Glory to India!

* * *

That is Hindudom seen in its strength, from a distance.

When one sees Hindudom in its weakness, yielding every day to hostile forces, losing bit by bit its numerical advantages, losing its political rights in India, losing its place as a nation, then one becomes more sceptical. One takes to thinking that the fate of Pagan Greece, of Pagan Italy, of Pagan Egypt, today, may be the fate of Pagan India tomorrow. Of course! Take Hindudom in Bengal, for example. In Bengal, the Hindus, not many years ago, were 55 per cent of the whole population. Now they are only 45 per cent. In two hundred years' time, who knows in what proportion they will be? And, in five hundred years' time (nobody knows), there may be no Hindus left at all. Then, one may see a Mohammadan guide (a Bengali, descendant of generations of Bengali Hindus), explaining the deserted temple of Dakshineswar to the American tourists: “This was the temple of Kali, a Goddess of the Hindus. . . .”

A swarm of mosques will be built here and there, in the place of the minor shrines. Mohammadan life and European life combined, will make unrecognisable India look much like modern Egypt. Cultured Indians will look upon their national Gods, as Christian Europeans look upon Greek “mythology.” And the Ganges will still be flowing. But there will be no ritual bathing in its waters, no pilgrims, going up and down its “ghats,” no garlands of flowers thrown into it as offerings. India, then, may be free and powerful; but she will no longer be “our” India.

Is it that, what the Hindus want?

* * *

Certainly not. But it is that which is coming, if there be no reaction, on the part of the Hindus, before it is too late.

We believe that quality is better than quantity. But quality itself cannot grow, where there is no proper atmosphere to develop it. And, with a decreasing number of Hindus, the Hindu “atmosphere” of India is in peril, in certain parts of India at least. Save it at once or else. . . . Hindu “quality” will become the priceless treasure of a few individuals, foreigners in their own country. It will no longer be the treasure of a living nation.

Hindudom has reached a stage where it has either to die out, or else, to react vigorously — and then, not merely to survive, but to rule. There is no third alternative.

If Hindudom were to die, India would no longer be India. But what if Hindudom were to react, and rule?

Most Hindus are not deeply interested in their vital today's problem: to live or to die, just because they cannot imagine vividly enough what it means to live. To live, for a nation, means: to rule. And, as the Hindu leaders repeat, the Hindus are a nation, not a community. They are a nation that is not conscious of its existence, but that still is a nation, just as a man is still himself, while asleep. Nobody can tell what would happen, if the Hindus were to awake.

First, future free India would be a reconquered Hindu India. But what beyond that?

Imagine a well-organised Hindu India, having in her hands all the power of a modern country of her size. Hindudom, once, used to extend over what is now Afghanistan, over Java, over Cambodia etc. The wife of Dhritarashtra was a princess from Gandahar, that is to say Afghanistan, and the remotest kings of Java, Cambodia etc. were Indian kings. Powerful Hindu India could reconquer these lands and give them back the pride of their Indian civilisation. She could make Greater India once more a cultural reality, and a political one too — why not?

And further still (who knows?), she could spread her name, assert her strength, establish her glory, wherever there are lands with a great culture that has been forsaken, lands waiting to be given back to themselves. She could teach the fallen Aryans of the West the meaning of their forgotten Paganism; she could rebuild the cults of Nature, the cults of Youth and Strength, wherever they have been destroyed; she could achieve on a world-scale what Emperor Julian tried to do, what the Sun-God himself, through his oracle of Delphi, had declared impossible. And the victorious Hindus could erect a statue to Julian, somewhere in conquered Europe, on the border of the sea; a statue, with an inscription, both in Sanskrit and in Greek:

“What thou hast dreamt,
We have achieved.”

* * *

This all may be nothing but imagination. Any how, imagination is necessary to accomplish great things. It helps you to look above temporary distress, and fight with joy.

Between the dark picture of an India who would no longer be herself, and the glorious vision of real Greater India, that is to say, Greater Hindudom, let the Hindus choose, today. We say: today, for there is a time when things that seem impossible are yet possible. When that time is gone, then it is too late. Tomorrow may be too late even to save Hindudom in North and East Bengal, not to speak of rebuilding the world, through the might and inspiration of Greater Hindudom.

Chapter 5

Social Reforms

As we have said, the beauty of Hinduism, its high philosophy, the art it has developed, the possibilities it contains, nothing of all this will save Hindudom, no more than the beauty of Grecian Paganism and its wonderful growth of free thought could save the civilisation and society of ancient Greece.

The greatest gift of Hinduism to mankind is perhaps the religious sanction of free scientific thought, based, in all matters, upon experience alone. But a man can be a free thinker, and even a “realised” man, without being a Hindu. The greatest gift of Hinduism to present-day India may be the possibility, for her, of expressing her reborn nationalism through a vast national cult. But nothing proves that a future Indian will not be a nationalist, unless he remains a Hindu. His India would not be our India; but he would love it all the same, perhaps more than his religion, one day. (Are there not modern Romans, who put their nation far above Christianity? The future men of a hypothetical Mohammadan India might also put India above Islam. Nobody can tell before hand).

Therefore, to point out Hinduism as the highest synthesis of religious thought, on one hand, and on the other, as the cult of India, is not sufficient. All this talk is well and good, when addressed to such Hindus who never even dreamt of leaving their fold. But in that case, it is useless; its only result can be to make these Hindus a little more proud of themselves.

When addressed to Hindus who have become Christians or Mohammadans, the argument presenting Hinduism as a scientific religion has no effect, for reason is seldom the motive that brings about a man's conversion. The call of Indian nationalism is also without response. To a Hindu who leaves his fold, there are things dearer than India.

Before trying to defend Hinduism by arguments, one must try to understand why do Hindus desert the Hindu fold.

* * *

If the Hindus who leave their fold, were leaving it for religious reasons, they would be fools, for whatever is contained in any other religion, is to be found in this vast and complex and apparently contradictory record of religious experience, which is Hinduism. A Hindu does not become a Mohammadan for the advantage of worshipping one God alone. That, he could do, while remaining a Hindu. Nor does he, for the advantage of considering God as formless; many Hindus consider God as formless, and worship without the help of images.

Nor does a Hindu become a Christian for the satisfaction of following a personal Saviour, for that he could do, while remaining a Hindu. Moreover, that very Saviour he is attracted to, Lord Jesus, he could worship and honour without leaving the Hindu fold.

In more than one Hindu home, Lord Jesus has found a place. His image is garlanded, and offered incense, among other images. Still no Hindu thinks of excluding his worshippers from the Hindu society, as long as they, themselves, do not express the desire of being excluded. One of the signs of Hindu generosity lies in this broad-mindedness. A Hindu who pays homage to Christ is still a Hindu, while a Christian who would pay homage to Lord Krishna, along with Christ, would no longer be a Christian. The God of the Christians remains the “jealous God” of the Jews, in spite of all the Greek metaphysics that have influenced Christian theology.

One may think that many ignorant Hindus leave the Hindu fold, persuaded that they are doing so for religious reasons.

It is true that ignorance is the source of all trouble, and that nothing would stop the flow of conversion of Hindus to other religions, as well as the intelligent teaching of what Hinduism really is, to all Hindus, including the most depressed ones, throughout the length and breadth of India. Ignorant Hindus, recently converted to Christianity, will tell you that Christ is the first one in the world to have taught love to mankind. They know nothing of the immense love of Lord Buddha, nor of Krishna; nothing of all what India had given the world, centuries before Christ.

That is true. But one must not believe that, in every case, or even in most cases, if they had known, then, they would not have left the Hindu fold. Even ignorant Hindus do not leave their fold for religious reasons. It is neither because human brotherhood was preached “for the first time” by the Prophet of Arabia, that they become Mohammadans, nor because love was preached “for the first time” by Jesus of Nazareth, that they become Christians. It is because, to become a Mohammadan means, to them, now, to enjoy the advantages of social brotherhood, in a society which actually practices it; and to become a Christian means, to them, now, to enjoy the advantages of some charitable missionary’s love. It is for social reasons, and, practically, for social reasons alone, that thousands of Hindus have abandoned the Hindu fold.

* * *

Three main things have been, during these last centuries, the cause of an enormous numerical loss for Hindudom:

(1) The denial of elementary social rights to the majority of the Hindus.

(2) The strictness of social rules, within the Hindu fold (resulting in the too easy outcasting of transgressors).

(3) The refusal of the Hindu fold to re-accept those who wish to come back to it, not to speak of those who may wish to join it, without themselves or their forefathers having belonged to it before.

Unless and until these three main causes of disintegration are removed, Hindudom will not be able to face the increasing dangers to which it is exposed. And, if it cannot remove these sources of weakness, Hindudom, in spite of its value, will ultimately be crushed. This is the bitter truth that must be spoken, and understood at once and now; tomorrow might be too late.

* * *

We have mentioned many times the similarity between the present state of Hindudom, wherever it is “a dying race,” and the state of Grecian and Roman Pagandom, during the days it was also dying. We may add that the causes of death were about the same.

May the Hindus of present India never forget that it is for social reasons, and practically, for social reasons alone, that Christianity was able to spread all over the Western Aryan World, and settle itself upon the ruins of some of the finest civilisations that mankind had produced.

During the days in which the first Christian missionary propaganda was going on, the “Ancient World” had the most remarkable personalities, and the finest schools of thought. None of the illiterate Apostles, who are said to be God-inspired, nor their learned Greek successors could compete with such men as Porphyros, Iamblikhos, or Plotinos, who were both profoundly learned and God-inspired, if there be any such thing as heavenly inspiration at all. And no Christian woman was purer than Hypatia, the embodiment of all Pagan virtues, wisdom and beauty, in a feminine shape.

Yet, the Galileans have won, not the Hellenes. Why?

(Think of this, and rebuild Hindudom in its glory.) The Galileans have won not because they were wise, not because they were virtuous, not because they brought with them a greater and higher inspiration than that of the last Hellene Pagans, but because they called all men (including Barbarians and slaves) to share their brotherhood, while the Hellenes did not.

* * *

The ancient Greek and Roman society was not a complicated caste-ridden society, like Hindudom. Yet there was, in it, a tremendous gap between the free man and the slave. There was also a tremendous gap between the Hellene (or the Roman) and the so-called Barbarian. With a very few later exceptions (perhaps due to the influence of growing Christianity), the born Barbarian had no place in the social life of the Hellenes. He was a foreigner, and it was admitted that a foreigner could not be assimilated on equal terms. To take part in the games of Olympia, for instance, Greek culture was not enough; one had also to prove his Hellenic descent. There might have been breaches to this rule during the later days; but the principle stood until the end. And the principle was enough to prevent the wholesale assimilation of outsiders.

In the same way, the son of a slave had no share in the glory of what was Hellenism. In Athens at least, he was not illtreated. He was allowed to thrive and multiply. This is so true that, in what is considered the golden age of the city (fifth century B.C.) there were about fifteen thousand free citizens, in Athens, and about one hundred and twenty thousand slaves.

As time passed, this numerical disproportion grew greater. The free citizens would cultivate eloquence and every art, first of all, the art of being beautiful, both in body and soul; they would talk with the wise men, honour the Gods, and rule the city; they would leave philosophical systems, marble temples, and the history of Greece, for the future generations to admire. But the slaves had all the hard, weary, and dirty work to do, without feeling that the glory of the city was also theirs. The Gods of the city were theirs; but the sublime teachings of the wise men were not addressed to them; and they knew nothing, either of the value of Hellenic philosophy, or of the qualities of the Gods. They knew that they were born for servile labour, while others were born for leisure and higher thought, and all the possibilities of a more beautiful life. Slowly came a time when they began to consider their fate as a burden, and their sub-conscious mind was then prepared for revolt.

Paul and the first Christian missionaries came over, at that time, from Palestine. And, from the Jewish quarters of the Grecian sea-ports, the new teaching spread to the crowd of the slaves, throughout the Roman Empire; to the Barbarians, north and south; to all those who were denied equality: "All men are one, in our Lord Jesus Christ, the one and only Saviour."

Nobody denies the existence of people of high education and noble birth, among the early Christian converts. But they were a small minority. The victory of Christianity appears mainly as the result of a widespread non-violent revolt of the slaves, as well as of the Barbarians, against the existing social order of the Roman Empire (including, naturally, Pagan Greece).

Had the social order been changed in time, and by the initiative of the privileged Pagans themselves, no doubt, then, history would have been quite different. Slaves and half-hellenised Barbarians, vividly conscious that the cultural and national treasures of Pagandom were theirs, would have stood like one man on the side of Pagandom. But if one had spoken of social reforms then, to the learned, refined and few, to the aristocracy of the Graeco-Roman World, it is probable that the few would have answered just the same as many Hindus of noble birth, in India, do today: “Are we to renounce our birth rights? Are we to allow our immemorial traditions to be spoiled by the contact of low-born people and of Barbarians? We rely upon our value, not upon numerical strength, to save ourselves and our culture.”

What is the result? They have passed away, and Western Aryan Paganism with them, wholesale. Is there anyone now, in Europe, who can truly trace his descent from a noble family of ancient Greece or Rome, through an unbroken thread of pure-blooded generations? Is there a single modern Roman, a single modern Greek, who can earnestly assure, now, that among his ancestors there are no slaves and no Barbarians? No. When the new society came into existence, then the birthrights that used to rule the old were forgotten, and all was but confusion, until new privileges and new birthrights crept in, inspite of Christianity itself.

So, what was the use of standing against the pressure of time and being crushed? To make place for a hypocritical Christian Europe, who would first destroy half the treasures of Pagan cult, art and thought, and then, preserve the other half in its museums? That was really not worth while.

* * *

The fate of the European Pagans, fifteen hundred years ago, is the fate awaiting the Hindus of the present day, sooner or later, in all parts of India where their number is less than at least seventy-five percent of the total population. In those parts where they are less than twenty or twenty-five percent, wholesale extinction (through willful or compulsory exile, through conversion to Islam, or otherwise) is not far away if, at once and now, the Hindus do not make a desperate effort.

(1) to unite into one firm, invincible bloc, trained in the art of self defence.

(2) to keep all Hindus, without distinction of caste or creed, within that bloc.

(3) to bring within that bloc all those who can be of some use to Hindudom, specially,

the Indian aborigines,

the Indians once converted to Islam or to Christianity, attracting them to Hinduism, as their own national cult.

* * *

We would like to make it clear that no Hindu is more sensitive than us to the value of that hereditary refinement that has been, for centuries, the privilege of the high caste Hindus, specially of the Brahmans. There are people even outside India to recognise, in the Indian Brahmans, not merely the oldest, but still the finest aristocracy of our earth. And personally, if we had to pick out a man all round beautiful in appearance, mind, and character, to be the embodiment of superior humanity, we would, without hesitation, pick out an Indian Brahman, and most probably a Bengali, who would add to the virtues of his caste, the enthusiasm and charm of the most lovable nation existing. If India be compared to a vast lotus-pond, the Brahmans as a whole, still today, are its most beautiful, its purest lotuses. The defence of Hindudom means their defence. That, we entirely maintain.

But, at the same time, we remember one of the many names of the lotus: "pankaj," that is to say: born in the mud. So mud and water are also necessary; without them, the beautiful lotuses would soon dry up. So the preservation of the spotless flowers means, first of all, the preservation of the pool where they are born and grow, that is to say of the fertile water and mud.

In the same way, Brahmanical beauty, Brahmanical culture, Brahmanical ideals, will mean nothing in the future Indian society, wherever that society will be cent percent Mohammadan. And that will be the case of North and East Bengal, in a few years' time, if the flow of conversion of Islam is not immediately stopped, and a contrary current of reconversion to Hinduism, not immediately started. And this is not possible without an enormous amount of sacrifice, on the part of the high caste Hindus; sacrifice, not in the name of “humanity,” not in the name of “justice” or of “democracy” (we do not believe in “democracy” at all) but, in the name of their own self-preservation. The alternative before the high caste Hindus — nay, before all Hindus, wherever they are, not an overwhelming numerical majority — is this: sacrifice caste prejudices at once and live, and, one day, rule India once more; or else, stick to caste prejudices, and, under the pressure of a formidable tide, growing every day, become Mohammadans in a generation or two.

Let the Hindus choose.

* * *

“To what extent must caste prejudices be sacrificed, to save Hindudom?” will many say. Does the sacrifice of caste prejudices mean merely to get rid of Untouchability, and open the temples to all Hindus? Does it mean that high caste Hindus should take water from every Hindu? Does it mean that they should also take rice? Does it mean that inter-caste marriages should be allowed? Where is the limit? (if there be any limit to such concessions).

There is no answer to these questions, in detail. Means of defence have to be in proportion with the danger to face; so everything depends upon the danger. It is certain that in Midnapur district (West Bengal) where Mohammadans are only six percent, the problem facing the Hindus is not so tragic as in Bogra district, for instance where the Mohammadans are more than ninety percent. The Midnapur Hindus can afford to wait, uninjured, another fifty years. The Bogra Hindus cannot; nor can those of Pabna, nor of Rangpur, nor of Dacca, nor of Noakhali, nor of Comilla, nor of Chittagong etc., in one word, all those of North and East Bengal, from Jalpaiguri, down to the Bay of Bengal, and to the frontiers of Burma and Assam; nor can the Hindus of Assam, where, along with Mohammadan propaganda, a well carried on and lavishly financed Christian missionary effort is continuing for the last few decades, throughout the hill tracts; nor can the Hindus of any part of India, where a strong, conscious, casteless society has grown or is growing to existence, by the side of caste-ridden Hindudom. Whether caste-ridden or sect-ridden, or compartmented in any other way, never and nowhere, in history, has a divided society stood competition with an undivided one.

To what extent must caste prejudices be sacrificed? That we cannot tell; it is a matter of every day's application in every Hindu household, to be decided by the Hindus themselves, who earnestly wish to live. We can only say this much: the forces that are cooperating to crush Hindudom (if possible) are of such a nature, and the danger is so imminent, that it is now too late for any kind of patch-work. From what castes, considered up to this day as contaminating the purity of the higher castes, through water, will all Hindus agree, henceforth, to accept water? Such a question has no meaning. The bitterness of the downtrodden castes of Hindudom has reached such a depth, and the unconditioned equality offered to them, outside Hindudom, is so increasingly attractive, that it is not by granting them a few scattered privileges, a few resented concessions, a few uncertain hopes, that it will ever be possible, now, to keep them for long within the Hindu fold.

The growing consciousness that it is the upper class Hindus who have unjustly deprived them of their rights, and outrageously exploited them, for so many years, is systematically being intensified, among them, by every democratical movement based upon common class-interest (such as labour movement, peasant movement, etc.) which has appeared in India recently.

The principles put forward in these different “movements,” were all imported through a few Indian idealists, belonging mostly to the upper castes of Hindudom. But the result of their preaching is, practically, the rapid formation of a united front of discontented lower caste Hindus and Mohammadans, set up, on the basis of common class-interest, to get rid of the privileged Hindus, wholesale. To the grievances of the half-starved peasant, of the tenant, of the labourer, of all the down-trodden ones, against the landlord, the moneylender, the “exploiter” in every form (who is generally known to be a Hindu) the religious fanaticism of the Mohamman masses, cleverly kindled by the Mawlvis, adds itself most naturally. Now, since class-consciousness has been cultivated among them, no less naturally, and no less easily do the feelings of the low caste Hindu peasants and labourers creep in, mingled with a bitter spirit of revolt. Kept out of contact with upper caste Hindu society for long centuries, they are now rapidly experiencing a social consciousness of their own, a social consciousness apart from what they consider as Hindudom. That consciousness has no cultural basis; but it has an economic one, which brings, day by day, the down-trodden lower caste Hindus nearer to the Mohammadans. Wherever the Mohammadans are a majority, and specially a majority of peasants and labourers, every democratical movement in India is, finally, a Mohammadan movement.

It is not the acceptance of water, or, occasionally, even of rice, from their hands, that will bring back the awakened Hindus of the low castes to their former submissive attitude. The time of obedience is gone. Everyday, the low caste Hindus are getting more conscious of their importance and of their strength.

The sacrifice of caste prejudices, on the part of the upper caste Hindus (in their own interest, and in the interest of Hindu culture that they represent) must be such that the lower castes, including the so-called Untouchables, will gladly use their strength to defend the whole of Hindudom, in case of danger.

* * *

Danger is not far away; in many places already, the Hindus have experienced it in violent riots, in which they have invariably been crushed, owing to their lack of solidarity and to their un-preparedness.

But riots worse than any of those India has seen in the past, may take place in an early future. India is preparing herself for political independence. And it is a fact that no country has passed from foreign domination to free self-government, without going through a period of confusion, in which the old government is no more, while the new one does not yet effectively exist. No legal protection; no police. Such a state of things may last a month; it may also last a year. We ask the Hindus just to try to imagine what would probably happen to them, in North Bengal, in East Bengal, and wherever they represent less than twenty-five, and sometimes, less than ten percent of the total population, if, for only three days, they were left entirely to the grace of God and to themselves, without the protection of any government or police. What would happen to them in the villages where there are five Hindu families, in the midst of five hundred Mohammadans? And what would be the attitude of the discontented lower caste Hindus then, under the combined effect of labour propaganda, indifference to the fate of Hindudom which they do not feel theirs, hunger, and the primitive impulse of destruction? Who can assure that they will not side with the Mohammadan comrades, who have the same grievances as themselves, and share the loot with them, before sharing, soon after, the brotherhood of Islam? Who can assure that, on the contrary, they will stand by Hindudom, lending their strength to their upper caste compatriots, for the preservation of real India?

But what is “real India” to them? What was real Greece and its culture, to the slaves of Greece? And what was real Rome and its glory, to the slaves of Rome?

* * *

The least one can say is that caste privileges and prejudices, and any social beliefs or social customs should be given up, to the extent that they are, at the present stage of Indian history, a hindrance to the growth of a united Hindu consciousness, as well as to the fighting capacity of the Hindus as a whole.

As long as all Hindus do not feel that within their fold, they are offered more dignity, more justice, and greater possibilities of personal development than without, they will not all love their fold; and an increasing number of them will leave it for good. The greater number of those who remain Hindus, will be indifferent to the fate of Hindudom not moving even their little finger to defend it or help it in case of need.

As long as all Hindus do not feel a certain amount of freedom and social toleration within their fold, there will be an increasing number of them who will willingly leave the fold to live as they like, or unwillingly be driven out of it, for having shown too much personal independence in social matters. Whoever they may be, good or bad, they are a force that Hindudom cannot afford to lose now. The Hindus should remember that, among the most dangerous Mohamadan leaders, there are descendants of Hindus driven out of Hindudom, for whatever good or bad reason it may be. It may have been, and probably was, once, a gain for Hindudom to purify itself by outcasting "undesirable" people. But now that Hindudom is not the only society in India; now that there are two rival societies by its side, eager to seize every opportunity of harming it directly or indirectly, strictness in social matters only brings loss. It is too easy for an outcasted Hindu, nowadays, to increase the number of the enemies of Hindudom.

As long as all Hindus do not feel that the glory of Hindudom is their glory, and its artistic, cultural and spiritual inheritance their own treasure, there will be no united Hindu consciousness, no common aim, no common interest, no common enthusiasm, no common love, no solidarity among the Hindus — and no hope for Hindudom. The upper caste Hindus feel that the Vedas, the Upanishads, the Epics, the Shastras, all are theirs. Let such a new atmosphere be created in Hindudom, that every Hindu fisherman may feel that Vyasa Deva's Mahabharata is also his, and be proud of it and of its author.

Then Hindudom will be one and strong.

* * *

As long as the hill-tribes of India (the so-called “animists” etc.) do not feel that their primitive forms of worship are one of the innumerable aspects of manifold Hinduism, and that they are a part and parcel of manifold Hindudom, their strength is lost to the cause of Hindudom. And it is a pity, for they are sturdy fighters. But they will never feel themselves Hindus unless the Hindus make them feel so, through their behaviour towards them; unless they are treated as Hindus.

In the same way, there will be no possibility of widespread reconversion to Hinduism of those who have left the Hindu fold, as long as it is not well established that, to the eyes of the born-Hindus of every caste, a reconverted Hindu is a Hindu, just as any of themselves. Until this is accepted, Hindudom will remain constantly losing its numerical strength without the possibility of ever regaining it. A tragic position, in front of Christendom and Islam!

* * *

The reconversion of Hindus who have left the Hindu fold, is not such an easy matter as it looks.

It presupposes the possibility of accepting any outsider into the Hindu society, if proved worthy. For, the Hindu who has become a Mohammadan, giving up his traditional diet and Hindu habits, is, from the orthodox Hindu point of view, no better, no “purer” than any foreigner. It is not even proved that no mixture of blood has ever taken place, in the family of an Indian whose ancestors were once Hindus. So, logically, if Hindudom, forsaking its orthodoxy, can take back such a man, it should be prepared to take in anyone who earnestly wishes to join it.

Other religions encourage proselytism because they are creedal ones, of which the communal unity is based upon the acceptance of the same “truth” by all their followers. But Hinduism, we have said, is no creed. The unity of Hindudom, if any, is the unity created by a common cultural inheritance, a common civilisation, a common national existence. The principle of conversion to Hinduism would be nothing more nor less than the principle of nationalisation, accepted in all modern countries. Applied here it means: “Whoever is worthy of India can become an Indian (that is to say a Hindu), if he likes.” So far, apparently, no difficulties.

Practical difficulties come in with the consideration of caste. A Hindu caste will not take back one of its members who has spent six months as a Mohammadan. But let us, for sake of argument, suppose it did. To what caste would then a reconverted Hindu belong, whose ancestors had become Mohammadans, say, ten generations back, and who does not know which was their former caste? To what caste would belong a foreigner by birth, who admires Hindu civilisation enough to wish to share it, and who chooses to become a Hindu and an Indian?

Unless this question is answered, any movement in favour of Hindu proselytism is useless.

To give the new-comer a place in Hindu society according to his personal fitness is not even possible, as long as the born-Hindus themselves cannot get a place according to their merit. A reconverted or newly converted Hindu cannot be made a Brahman, whatever may be his knowledge, his culture, his virtues, since such a man as Aurobindo Ghosh is not accepted as a Brahman, in the present state of Hindu society.

* * *

In one word, it is not such and such a detail, such and such a practice, that has to be forsaken, but the whole social atmosphere of Hindudom that has to be changed, if Hindudom wishes to live, flourish and rule.

Hindudom can neither be united, nor strengthened, nor expanded, without the whole-hearted collaboration of millions of people, feeling happy and proud to be Hindus, that is to say, without the suppression of all what prevents millions of Hindus from feeling happy and proud within their fold; without, also, the suppression of all what prevents, at present, millions of Indians from styling themselves as Hindus and standing by the Hindus.

We do not advocate the suppression of caste-system, but we advocate the suppression of social tyranny, whether it be enforced in the name of the sanctity of caste-system, or of anything else. And there is no doubt that caste must lose its rigidity, if social intolerance is to be got rid of, if the process of conversion of Hindus to other religions is to be stopped, and if conversion and reconversion to Hinduism is to be made possible, in the practical field.

Many Hindus are getting to appreciate the value of Hindu unity. They understand the causes of the weakness of Hindudom, and the immediate necessity of some sort of social changes. But they do not realise the meaning of social changes.

The basis of society is the householder's home — not the market-place, nor the tea-shop, nor the tennis ground, nor the public meeting, nor even the temple, but the home, the most sacred place on earth, where the Gods and Goddesses worshipped in the temple, were born as men and women. Hindu unity in public festivities, even within the compound of the temples, is no unity if it does not persist, among all Hindus, within each Hindu home. Whatever may be the social reforms necessary to check the disintegration of Hindudom, they must boldly take place at home, or remain of no use. And they should take place, as we have said, at once, and now, at least wherever the Hindus are a minority, like in North and East Bengal or a rapidly decreasing majority, like in Assam. Threatened on all sides, Hindudom cannot afford to wait.

Chapter 6

A Change of Mentality Among the Hindus

The Development of Nationalism

The reasons we have just given, to show how necessary immediate social reforms are, among the Hindus, were all drawn from the consideration of the mentality of the Hindus who leave their fold. To understand them, so as to keep them within Hindudom, or to bring them back to it, was the main question.

But there is another side of the Hindu problem, no less important than that one; and this concerns the mentality of the Hindus who remain Hindus. Unless they change their entire outlook, social reforms are impossible; nay, any effort to defend and strengthen Hindudom, amounting to a little more than the construction of temples, “maths” and “goshalas,” is impossible, for that effort depends entirely upon them.

We do not deny the usefulness of temples, “maths” and “goshalas,” but we are persuaded that they are not sufficient to unite all the Hindus in one strong body, and to make them invincible. Moreover, the pious purpose for which they are built cannot be better served than by the constant effort to bring back all Indians to Hindudom, and to make Hindudom a power in the world. More cows than any “goshala” can give shelter to, are saved, now and for generations to come, simply by the reconversion of one Mohammadan family to Hinduism. And cow-slaughter will not be suppressed, all over Hindusthan, unless and until the Hindus become strong enough to rule.

* * *

Political power (that is to say the power of law, with organised military force at the back of it) is everything in this world. It is speaking against the evidence of history to speak of religions competing on the ground of philosophy or of moral or spiritual merit. A religion gains followers when its followers get political power in hand. Philosophy, morality, and spirituality have no voice in the matter. Christianity began to be an invincible power when it became the religion of people who, for the time being, at least, were invincible: the Roman masses, the Roman State, and more and more, the romanised Barbarians. Why was it driven out of North Africa, nearly wholesale? Not because of the philosophical, moral or spiritual superiority of the Koran over the Gospel, but because of the fighting superiority of the warrior-like Arabs over the Christians. The three quarters of Spain were Mohammadan, at one time. Why are they not now?

Not because of the superiority, if any, of the Gospel over the Koran, but because of the greater military strength of the Catholic kings, makers of modern Spain, compared to that of the last Mohammadan rulers; because political power remained, finally, in the hands of the Catholics. When you possess political power, then you can make nations do what you like, think what you like, profess whatever sense or nonsense you like, nowadays and in the future, as well as you could in the past. It only requires a more powerful administration, backed by more powerful war-engines, as all techniques improve with time.

We would like the Hindus to remember this, and to strive to acquire political power at any cost. Social reforms are necessary, not because they will bring more “humanity” among the Hindus, as many think, but because they will bring unity, that is to say power. The Hindus have been living, up till now, with less “humanity.” Many unseen dramas, many crushed aspirations, many weary, wretched lives have been the consequence of Hindu orthodoxy, enforced in daily matters with all its rigidity. But we do not speak of them. We do not advocate in favour of the sufferers, in the name of “humanity.” If, with less “humanity” the Hindu nation was growing stronger as a nation, instead of growing weaker everyday; if, with less “humanity,” the Hindus could organise themselves, reconquer India for themselves, and make free India a ruling power in the world, then, we would never ask them to change the slightest of their habits, nor to get rid of the grossest of their superstitions, if any. If, without the collaboration of all Hindus, Hindudom was flourishing and able to flourish in the future, we would not even advocate the suppression of Untouchability. There is nothing so strong as deep-rooted customs. Humanitarian views have never uprooted them. But the pressure of a hard, undeniable necessity has, sometimes. The necessity that is pressing the Hindus, specially in the regions where they are a minority, is to live, first. To live, they must grow strong; they must get political power in their hands. We advocate social reforms, the abolition of Untouchability, liberalism in daily social matters, alliance with the sturdy Hillmen considered as Hindus (since necessary), and the recall of all Indians back to Hindudom, because we believe that these are the effective means, by which the Hindus will get political power, and, with it, the possibility of every kind of national glory, within India, and outside India, one day.

* * *

But the Hindus — those who remain in their fold, those who think that everything is well and good, and marvellously regulated by the seers of old, in Hindu society; those who perhaps will be, soon, (in places like North and East Bengal, at least) the last Indian Pagans — are not politically minded enough, or, better say, are not politically minded at all, as Hindus.

They may, sometimes, be religious-minded, and they are always philosophically minded. But that is not sufficient to make a conscious nation of them. That is not sufficient to shake off the greatest obstacle of all to Hindu enterprises: indifference, nay, inertia; the product of the combined influence of thousand years' slavery, and of India's burning climate.

It requires a tremendous dynamic uplift to remove such stagnancy as that of the Hindu society, for, as we have said, it must be removed at once and wholesale, at least in certain dangerously threatened regions, fear the Hindus may be swept away forever. Not slowly slowly but at once, and wholesale; for the hostile forces all around, strengthened by the very spirit of our time, by the different “democratic” propagandas which the Hindus themselves are responsible for, are rising day by day to crush the few who actually represent Hindu culture and civilisation. And history has never waited for anybody.

It is only by becoming politically minded, and that, in the right sense, that the Hindus can face the storm, win, and rule.

The Mohammadans, in Bengal, are strong, as Mohammadans at least, if not as Indians. They share with the Hindus the blessings of foreign domination, which are temporary, and those of a depressing climate which are permanent. Yet, they do not share their apathy. They rise like one man, whether to attack or to protest, whenever they think it necessary. They will never let anything tread upon what they call “their rights,” unless it be a material force more powerful than theirs.

The difference comes from their religion, which is strongly creedal while Hinduism is not. One must admit that a man who thinks himself in possession of such absolute truth which alone can save his soul, is strengthened by this belief. Moreover, that man and any men who share his firm acceptance of the same faith, his allegiance to the same living God and to the same true Prophet, are nearer to each other than any philosophers can be, who share the more or less rational acceptance of the same hypothesis, among many others; nearer to each other even than any religious minded people can be, who follow the same spiritual path knowing that it is one among many others. Certainly, the undiscussed belief in whatever is written in a particular book, looked upon as sacred, is most unscientific. But it makes one strong, practically. It also makes a nation strong. It promotes action, and can lead to great things. It shakes people's natural laziness, and does not allow them to remain indifferent.

The Hindus, with their manifold and apparently contradictory beliefs, with their experimental religion and their scientific out-look, can never hope to enjoy the advantages of religious fanaticism. Not that they are always faithful to their scientific attitude in every matter. It would be easy to prove that they are not. But they are not in such matters which, properly speaking, are not religious, but social; with the result that, while Mohammadan fanaticism makes the Mohammadans strong, Hindu fanaticism, if any, only makes the Hindus weak. Mohammadan fanaticism deepens the gap between the Mohammadan fold and the rest of the world, and, at the same time, it sets aside the differences, and strengthens the ties between any two Mohammadans within the fold. It separates the fold from all what is not it, and unites it, making it conscious of its existence and might, as a whole. The Hindus' position is quite different. While their total absence of religious fanaticism makes them feel themselves one with all the world, their orthodoxy, that is to say, their fanaticism in social matters, keeps them aloof from one another within the Hindu fold, not allowing them as a whole, nay as a nation, to be conscious of their own existence.

It is not possible (nor desirable) that the Hindus should any day become fanatical in the same way as the Mohammadans. But there is no denying that they need a wholesale change of mentality which will give them, as a nation, all the advantages that the Mohammadans draw from religious fanaticism; a change of mentality which will, on one hand, separate them from the rest of the world, give them self-consciousness and self-pride as a distinct body, and on the other, set aside all what makes one Hindu feel different from another Hindu, all what keeps them aloof from each other and indifferent to each other's interests, to each other's grievances, to each other's sufferings, within the Hindu fold; which will, in one word, unite them.

It is that change of mentality which is the important thing, because all resistance to hostile forces from outside, as well as all constructive work within Hindudom, depends upon it.

* * *

The way leading Hindudom to freedom, strength and greatness, can be pointed out in one word;

(1) Cultivation of predominant Hindu nationalism in each individual Hindu;

(2) Cultivation of strength, and of a spirit of organised resistance to aggression, throughout Hindudom.

Lack of nationalism is the great curse of India.

The Musulmans, who represent more than one fifth of the total population of India, feel themselves Musulmans and do not feel themselves Indians. At the most, some of them (a few) may feel themselves Indians to a certain extent. But they are Musulmans first. None are Indians first, and then Musulmans proved that Islam does not prevent their free selfassertion as Indians. None are Indians and Musulmans in the same way as a Frenchman, or an Italian, is French and Christian, or Italian and Christian, that is to say: French first, Italian first, and Christian as long as Christianity is no actual bar to the expression of his patriotism.

Among the Hindus, the immense majority have a deep-rooted caste-consciousness with a vague consciousness of Hindudom, and no Indian consciousness at all. An illiterate Hindu (a porter in the station, a peasant or a fisherman in the village) does not know what a map of India looks like. Nor has he any idea of an Indian nation whose glory he shares, whose tradition he continues, whose past, present and future are his for the sole reason that he is a Hindu. To be a Hindu, for him, means to observe certain social customs (to not interdine with certain people, etc.) and to take part in certain festivities on certain occasions (to gather, for instance, on such and such a fall-moon night, and beat drums together, in singing God's name). He knows that there are people living in remote provinces who worship the same Gods, hold sacred the same holy places and rivers, and observe the same festival days as himself. All those people are Hindus; they and he share the same civilisation. He feels that, but dimly. There are so many restrictions, so many barriers between him and them, that his idea of Hindudom is not even as clear as the idea of Christendom probably was to an ignorant European, during the Middle Ages; and it cannot be compared with any such thing as a national consciousness.

Of the Hindus who actually represent Hindu culture, a very few can be called Indian nationalists. Socially, they also are the members of different castes. Apart from that, they are either free thinking philosophers with a smiling universal outlook and no particular love for anything, or else, wholesale spiritual beings in love with God, or, at least, busy with the progress of their own soul towards self-knowledge, through some particular path.

And as for those Hindus who have reinvented Indian nationalism during these last decades, who have built up the Indian National Congress, who have suffered for India and put India above everything, they too often seem to forget that India, apart from Hindudom, is no India at all. They, too often, are nationalists inspite of being Hindus, not because they are Hindus; nationalists just as so many European Christians are inspite of being Christians.

But Christianity, we have said, as well as Islam, is essentially international. A Christian cannot be a true nationalist except inspite of his Christianity. While a Hindu can; while a Hindu should be an Indian nationalist because he is a Hindu; because Hindu art, culture, life, and every kind of Hindu glory are India's, and India's alone; and because the purest expression of Indian nationalism, the devotional cult of Bharat Mata (Mother India) can find place nowhere, can grow nowhere, can nowhere become prominent, except within Hindudom.

* * *

Musulmans are Musulmans first, and may sometimes be Indians afterwards, proves that India's interest does not come to a clash with that of Islam.

And the few conscious Hindus are either modern European-style Indian nationalists (who separate Church and State) or else, philosophers first, and Indians afterwards; spiritual beings first, and Indians afterwards; devotees of such and such a God, disciples of such and such a "guru," — sympathisers of such and such a religious movement . . . first, — and Indians afterwards.

Go and speak to many average educated Hindus about the social reforms needed for the defence of Hindudom. They will tell you that the important thing is to purify one's soul; all progress in social life comes afterwards, by itself. Take, for instance, the case of all those who follow the same course of spiritual training as the man who is speaking to you, of all those who are connected with the same "math" or the same "asram" as him, and who regularly pay their respects to the same "guru." There are no caste distinctions among them, will he tell you. Take the case of all those who frequent such and such a "sarvajanin" temple, built by so and so, for the good of all Hindus. They eat together the offerings set before the God. They form a happy brotherhood. If all Hindus follow their example, then, no doubt, Hindudom will flourish forever and ever, united and strong, and full of faith. Another will say: follow the example of the Vaishnavas, and let all the Hindus actually become one huge brotherhood praising the name of Hari, Love incarnate. Another will say something else. None seem to be perfectly consistent with the true scientific Hindu attitude in religious matters, and to consider religion as an affair of purely personal experience, left to personal choice. And if there be any who do, then they seldom believe in social reforms; they have higher things to think of.

* * *

The truth is that the unity of Hindudom, if ever it has to come, is not coming through reverence payed to the same “guru,” not through praise of the same divine name, nor through partaking of food from the offerings set before the same God, by all the Hindus. First, these doings would be the exterior signs of a sort of creedal unity, and creedal unity of such a religious system as Hinduism, whose very essence is free experimental research in religious matters, is the greatest impossibility one can think of. Never the Hindus will be, like the Christians or like the Musulmans, the believers in one and the same creed. Their spirit is much too free, and their culture too old. But, besides that, it is too late to dream of any sort of unity realised through religious gatherings; the experiment has been attempted long ago, and without sufficient success.

For centuries, the Hindus of all castes and all provinces partake the same sacred meals, in Jagannath's temple, at Puri. But as soon as they have crossed the temple gates, they are as caste-prejudiced, as provincial-minded, and as divided in every possible way as before. And what about the unifying effect of the holy name of Hari? Nowhere in India have these blessed syllables been more often and more devoutly pronounced than in Navadwipa; nowhere have the Hindus more fervently beaten drums together, repeating the name of God in mystical frenzy; nowhere Vaishnava faith and Vaishnava love have been more flourishing than in that birthplace of Vaishnavism. And yet, what is now the population of Nadia district, where Navadwipa stands? Five and a half lakhs of Hindus, and . . . nine and a half lakhs of Musulmans. As if, indeed, the name of Allah and of his Prophet had more power than the name of Hari!

We may assert that they have not, and that nothing else but the social bigotry of the Hindus has driven away from their fold these nine and a half lakhs of Bengalis who have accepted Islam. We may also assert that, had there been no "sang-kirtans," no "mahotsavas," no repetition of the name of Hari, no Vaishnava mysticism, then, possibly, not nine lakhs and a half only, but fourteen lakhs and a half, among the Hindus of Nadia district, would have become Mohammadans. This is conceivable, though nobody can tell what would have actually happened. We do not say that the name of Hari and "sang-kirtans" and "mahotsavas" are of no use for the unification and strengthening of Hindudom; we do not say that the experience of Hindu brotherhood, realised once in one's life, during a pilgrimage to Puri, or many times, during visits to "maths" and "asrams," is of no use. Nor do we deny the important part played, in the history of Hindu awakening in modern times, by such reformed Hindu bodies as the Brahma Samaj, the Arya Samaj, the Ramakrishna Mission, etc.

We only say that, however useful they may have been and may be still, all these things are not sufficient to save Hindudom now. Apart from the fact that it is contrary to the spirit of Hinduism to expect all Hindus to become Vaishnavas, or Brahmans, or Arya Samajists, or anything else of the kind, the beneficent influence of such movements, aiming at the unification of the Hindus on some purely religious basis, is too slow. Owing to their impulse, Hindu society is undergoing a serious evolution, no doubt. But the dangers of the present day are surrounding the Hindus with an excessive rapidity. They are at hand. And it is not a "serious" but slow evolution that can enable the Hindus to face them and overcome them. Remember history does not wait.

* * *

The evolution of Hindu society is too slow, and the strength acquired by the Hindus as a nation, insignificant, because the basis of all these movements which we have mentioned is purely religious.

What is purely religious (in the sense religion means: a spiritual path) is personal, and also of no concern with the trifles of this material world. Hinduism may be a wonderful selection of spiritual teachings, a complete and perfect science of spiritual life, and therefore a personal treasure for each Hindu who sincerely aspires to realise his higher self. But Hindudom belongs to this material world. Its existence does not depend upon religious or metaphysical “truth,” but upon strength in this world — political strength, military strength, national strength.

That is why it is difficult to help Hindudom by trying to unite the Hindus on a purely religious basis. As soon as such an effort takes place, the tragic social and political problems of modern Hindudom lose their proper significance. The social changes which could bring unity and strength if they took place on a broad scale, remain, at most, confined to a particular place (like the temple of Jagannath) or to a particular religious sect, to a brotherhood of disciples. Or else, they are totally forgotten in favour of quarrels about the Unknown and perhaps Unknowable, which seem of much greater interest to the metaphysical-minded Hindus.

More than a hundred years ago the Brahmo Samaj, when started, suggested to the Hindus a programme of social reforms, considered as a necessity. It was, no doubt, a necessity, to prevent the fashionable Bengalis of the last century from rushing to both Christianity and European life. But it seemed a greater necessity still, to many, to make it clear that God is formless, and that it is wrong to worship Him under a multitude of forms. They, therefore, put all the stress upon this point; with the result that the social programme, the practical contribution of the Brahmo Samaj to the evolution of Hindudom, was automatically pushed to the background. Once the controversy was risen to the metaphysical plane, it stayed there. And the main question was no longer “How to unite the Hindus? how to bring Indian Christians and Mohammadans back to Hindudom? how to keep the remaining Hindus from becoming Christians or, Mohammadans?” but: “How to persuade all Hindus that God is formless?” that is to say: “How to make all Hindus Brahma Samajists?”

We have spoken of the Brahma Samaj just as of an instance among many. In fact, any effort for the uplift of Hindudom, if based upon a particular religious or metaphysical conception of the Unknown instead of upon a practical conception of the realities of this world, leads, and is bound to lead, to the formation of sects, with, generally, the rising of one or two more saintly Hindu leaders to the exalted status of “avatars.” But India has more than enough sects; and India is swarming with “avatars,” old and new. That does not help her to become a nation. Nor does that prevent numbers of Hindus from becoming Mohammadans or Christians.

* * *

The great thing is to make the Hindus feel themselves not a juxtaposition of castes, nor a juxtaposition of sects, but a nation; to bring the idea that they are India and that India is them out of their subconscious mind into active consciousness; to create in them such a mentality that all what concerns the material, political, and cultural welfare of Hindudom, that is to say of India, will be the main concern, in each Hindu's daily thoughts and life. And when we say: the Hindus, we mean: all Hindus.

This new mentality cannot grow as long as purely metaphysical considerations on one hand, and purely spiritual considerations on the other, monopolise the best of so many Hindus' energy; as long as the qualities of the Unknown appear as important as they do, even to those Hindus who are not in a position to speak of them through their own experience (and real "sadhaks" do not discuss metaphysics); as long as the preoccupation of personal salvation is greater, among the Hindus, than that of the freedom of Hindudom, of the strength of Hindudom, of the prosperity and glory of Hindudom as a nation.

It is an actual transposition of values that is needed to awaken the Hindus to the desire of life and to the acceptance of struggle in this world; to prepare them to face the crisis that is before them and to rule and be great, in the future, if only they are able to stand firm in the present. This transposition of values has two aspects:

(1) to bring the average Hindu idealism down from heaven, back to India which is part of this earth;

(2) to draw the average so-called Indian ; nationalism away from the imported idea of separation of "Church and State," back to the real Hindu Indian conception according to which "Church and State," cult and politics, cannot be separated.

In other words, to make both those Hindus who are not nationalists and those Indian nationalists who do a not wish to call themselves Hindus, into Hindu nationalists.

* * *

For that, as we have said, one must, first, push at the background the idea of Hinduism considered in one of its sects, or even considered as a science of universal religious investigation. It is that, certainly. But it is not by bearing in mind, all the time, that “it is that,” that the Hindus, as a distinct nation of broad Asia, will get strengthened.

We have recalled, among the causes of the disintegration of Pagandom in the West, the social position of the slaves and of the Barbarians in the Graeco-Roman world. There was also another cause, not social, but intellectual, and this was the cosmopolitanism of the last generations of Pagan intelligentsia. While new-born anti-national Christianity was growing stronger and stronger, many were the learned and cultured Pagans who felt themselves “neither Greeks, nor Romans, but men; citizens of the Universe,” that is to say: philosophers without any sort of patriotism. The efforts to stop the spreading of Christianity were undertaken by the State, and in the name of the State. But what can the State do, when national consciousness has grown weak among the most enlightened citizens? The use of that political power which the State possesses depends upon the ideas of those who compose the State. When those who had influence in the Roman world did no longer identify their Nation with its national Gods and national culture, and no longer loved the Nation as the greatest of Gods, then the Roman State itself accepted Christianity. Then, the cultured “citizens of the World” who stuck to the old Gods because of their symbolical value, and to the old schools of thought because they were schools of human wisdom, were exiled or made to be silent.

Deep, sincere, passionate nationalism could have saved the “Ancient World” and its culture wholesale, had nationalism been able to thrive in Greece, in Egypt, in Asia Minor and other places, under Roman domination, and in Rome itself, when Rome had become the cosmopolitan center of a vast empire.

Nationalism does exist, in India, however few may be those who actually live up to its ideal. If only it spread on a broad scale it would save Hindudom, and make it powerful once more. But if the Hindus do not learn to identify India and Hindudom, and to look upon India as the embodiment of sacredness, the actually most beloved deity, the very image and expression of the greater Unknown (if any such Unknown be worshipped, and if any image of it be conceived) then, even a free “Indian” government would be incapable of saving Hindudom, wherever it is weak. For, wherever Hindudom is weak, if such a government came to existence it would not represent the Hindus.

* * *

When we speak of Hindu nationalism, we do not speak of an allegiance to India of the same nature as the allegiance of a Frenchman to France, for instance. India is not France. We neither forget that Hinduism means a cult, nor that there are treasures of love confining to mysticism, in the heart of nearly every Hindu.

We have said that no religion other than Hinduism can provide the basis of Pan-Indian nationalism. But what would be Pan-Indian nationalism risen upon that basis? It would be more than a mere civism, like that we find in Europe. It would be a ritualistic nationalism, comparable, to a certain extent, to that of Japan; an exterior cult of the traditional Gods and Goddesses of India, of the great natural Forces of which India is the playground (Lila kshetra) and of Mother India herself. It would also be a devotional nationalism; absolute, unconditioned love of each and every individual Hindu for that great Being, that Goddess India whose life and spirit are his, but whose existence extends far beyond his, through time and space; whose value transcends his and that of all what he can touch and see; whose glory draws him out of his personal insignificance, and magnifies him to his own eyes.

And just as the few really wise men worship God even in the humblest manifestations of life, in the same way, the millions of Hindus would see first of all a son of Mother India in one another, and treat each other likewise.

* * *

With the cultivation of sincere Hindu nationalism, many religious, social, and political superstitions, which are the greatest hindrance to Hindu unity, would disappear automatically.

Through the very fact that the Hindus, instead of subordinating nationalism to "religion" (or to moral principles, or philosophical ideologies, which comes to the same) would subordinate “religion,” morals, principles of any sort to nationalism, the condition of India would be modified. A change in action does not always, at once, bring a change of outlook. But a change of outlook is bound to bring, at once, a change in action.

So, to begin with, many of the old institutions of the Hindus that are supposed to be settled upon the authority of the “shastras” would lose their rigidity everywhere, and even disappear, wherever the interest of the Hindus, as a nation, is that, such institutions should disappear. Take the instance of caste. Nowadays, many Hindu realise that this institution should be, if not suppressed (a very few go so far) at least reformed. But it is a religious institution, for everything social, among the Hindus, is considered to have a religious basis. To alter it means to go against the authority of the Scriptures. Fortunately, the Hindu Scriptures are innumerable. So those who wish to reform the present caste system can always find some authority to justify their attempt. Some will tell you that, “in the Bhagavat Gita,” caste, established upon quality distinctions, means something quite different from what we see today. Another will say that, “in the Vedas,” there is no mention of caste. Another, that, “in the mind of the seers of old,” caste had a purely spiritual sense. But, no less earnestly than those who support caste system as we see it, they all implicitly admit that it is some authority “of old,” and not the interest of today’s Hindu society, which has to guide the Hindus of the present day. And that, because they are “religious-minded,” instead of being, first of all, nationalists. A

Hindu who would be first of all a lover of Hindu India would say: “It does not matter so much what is written in the Scriptures as it matters what means we have to use, today, to face the special conditions in which we are placed. If the written “shastras” are not able to meet our needs, then, we can write new shastras. But nobody will be able to build up a new Hindudom if we perish.”

To consider the interest of one’s nation first, means to adapt one’s institutions to the necessities of time wherever national defence is concerned. Social institutions are instruments in the hands of a nation, for its own welfare. They were invented for the nation, not the nation for them. Old things are, no doubt, venerable, while linked with a glorious past. That does not mean that they must never be renewed, when times change. Any true Indian will look upon the sword of Rana Pratap as sacred: some of the noblest episodes of India’s past are linked with it. But no sensible, man would ask India to use similar swords nowadays to fight against war-tanks and aeroplanes. A real Hindu nationalist will look upon social institutions in the same light, wherever the interest of Hindudom is at stake.

* * *

What we have just said about casteism can be said about excessive provincialism, this other drawback of Hindu society, resting also, to a great extent, upon the authority of custom, and enforced by caste restrictions themselves. If the future military unity of free India is to be prepared from today through a growing united Hindu consciousness, then, whatever prevents the formation of that consciousness is to be opposed.

We know that, though they are intermingled most of the time, provincial feelings and caste feelings are not exactly of the same nature. At the back of provincialism there is the idea of language, which corresponds to a reality. Many Indian “provinces” could be taken as nations by themselves. But nowadays, we are witnessing every day the fact that minor nations cannot live while keeping aloof from the strong ones whose culture and civilisation they share. What is true in present-day Europe and in the Far East, is also true in the Hindu East, that is to say, in present-day India (in waiting for the time when one shall speak of Greater India, based upon a still broader consciousness of Hindudom). Hindu nationalism has first to create an all-India Hindu consciousness. And the legitimately proud provinces (as well as the legitimately proud castes) will ultimately be benefited. Now, the Hindus of North and East Bengal, who are under the threat of destruction, are not even whole-heartedly backed by the Hindus of West Bengal, who cannot feel the danger as a personal concern of theirs. Imagine what an enormous strength they would gain, if only they felt themselves actually backed by the Hindus of Madras, by the Hindus of Maharashtra, by the Hindus of Malabar, of Punjab, of all India.

* * *

With a true nationalist mentality, the Hindus would no longer look down upon “number,” as opposed to, “value.” Everybody understands that nowadays perhaps more than at any stage of the past, number means: political power. We know that there are instances of strong modern countries, outside India, where the few are supposed to rule over the many. But the many, there, are conscious beings; how could the few, who rule over them, rule without their wholehearted consent? The truth is that always and everywhere, the many, if organised, are a strength. The Hindu “religious” mind, to which strength in this world does not seem to be an important thing, can ignore the many, and let them become enemies of Hindudom. But the Hindu nationalist mind, to which strength in this world, political power, is the first indispensable condition to build up a great Hindu India, cannot afford to act in the same way.

A nationalist Hindu will naturally call back to Hindudom all Indians, whoever they may be, who can help to make Hindu India (real India) strong; who can fight to defend that priceless culture of which the purely “religious” or philosophically minded Hindus merely talk, most of times.

And moreover, the best thing to do to bring back to Hindudom all Indians, is not to preach Hinduism as a fine selection of philosophies appealing to all men, but to teach all Indians to put India above everything else, and, at the same time, to show them (for it is a fact) that India does not exist apart from Hindudom.

We do not say that, in broad Indian culture, no foreign elements should be tolerated. There are foreign elements in all cultures, always. Nor do we say that every Indian must fanatically refuse his respect to all Gods and prophets of non-Indian origin. Such a narrow view would itself be anti-Indian. But we say that, as an Indian, he should first pay his respect and express his allegiance to all what, through millenniums of living legend and history, through sculpture, song and thought, has become the symbol of India herself.

Hindus have never asked anybody to renounce his personal faith, but only to renounce his exclusivism, his fanaticism in matters of personal faith or personal experience. If the Christians of India, today, following the example of the Christians of Europe, would only put India above Christianity; and if the Mohammadans of India, following the example of the modern Mohammadan leaders of Persia and of Turkey, would only put India — our common India — above Islam, then we would have no objection to their existence in India. They would be, then, Christians or Mohammadans as religious beings in search of their personal salvation; but, as Indians, they would be loyal Hindus. And they would be Indians first, religious beings afterwards. They would put the cultural as well as political interest of India above their personal salvation. They would be then an actual part of Hindudom, and it would be of no use “reconverting” them.

But this widespread national mentality is still a dream. And the aim of the movement in favour of reconversion to Hinduism is not the sporadic reconversion of half a dozen Indian Mohammadans and Christians, nor the grant of Hindu initiation to a few half-conscious hill-tribes, but the creation of a genuine Rational Indian consciousness, the same as that of Hindudom, in all the Indian Mohammadans, Christians and aborigines hillmen; not the personal acceptance of any particular religious teachings by a few people, but the reconversion of the whole nation to its own national culture, consciousness, and pride.

* * *

But how to make people feel and think in terms of nation and national values? It is not an easy thing. “Spiritual” values which should be the concern of individuals alone, “moral” values, which are the product of the influence of ageless rules of convenience for individuals living together, play a daily part in the formation of the Indian public opinion, while national values do not. “Principles,” a certain political philosophy, which is as “moral” as it is political, a certain innocent conception of international “right” and “wrong,” and a still more innocent hope that “right” will win, are the things that guide the judgement of an average Hindu, about national and international daily politics. The sole idea of India’s interest does not. The average Hindu, because of his inheritance of high “principles,” along with centuries of political annihilation, is in the habit of sympathising with all the down-trodden countries of the world without trying to know if they really are, or not, as “down-trodden” as they look, and specially without troubling to understand what Hindudom can gain (what India can gain) by their not being downtrodden. Since a year or two, to talk politics with Hindus means to exchange expressions of grief in favour of the “poor” Abyssinians, the “poor” Chinese, and above all, the “poor” Jews. (May be, also, recently, the “poor” Czechoslovakians, the “poor” Albanians, etc.) And God alone knows how many other “poor” countries will soon be added to the list.* But what about “poor” India?

Perhaps the rapid international changes taking place each day may turn to be a blessing for her, and perhaps they may not. But this is not the point. The point is that the Hindus do not care to examine this problem. Their first thought is: “right” and “wrong,” not: “Hindudom’s gain,” and “Hindudom’s loss.” When they get to feel that the first thing, for them, is to live, ruling over a free, strong Hindu India (including Greater India) and then only to invent as many definitions as they like of right and wrong, there will be some hope for the Hindus.

Political training is necessary for people to think in terms of national interest.

* * *

But political training is not enough. Or, better say, political training should begin (and actually does begin, wherever it exists) long before future citizens are able to discuss what is written in the newspapers. Like all genuine education, it begins at home, from very childhood, and depends immensely upon the mothers of a nation.

Every great nation is a nation where the women have a strong consciousness of their country’s greatness. Take the instance of Japan or of Germany, today. Take the instance of the Rajputs, in Indian history or of the Romans, in the days of Cornelia. Great personalities too, rise to greatness with their mother's inspiration. Example: Sivaji. Lack of political training and absence of nationalism in India is partly, and perhaps mostly due to the fact that Hindu women were, for so long, kept aloof from the preoccupation of national problems.

* The “poor” Poles still formed an independent nation when this book was written.

Hindu women embody some of the finest virtues of womanhood. They are devoted wives and tender mothers, and, inspite of many unseen sufferings, there is peace in their lives, peace from within. Still more than the essential of Hindu religious traditions, which they have been transmitting to their children, for endless generations, the silent, soothing, unconscious influence of their own personality has made the Hindus seekers of peace from within. Moreover, one can say that, if Hindudom is lasting still, this fact is greatly due to the conservative tenacity of the Hindu women.

But Hindudom is lasting, not living. For it to live as a nation, nowadays, conservative tenacity without consciousness is not what is needed. An interior peace, however precious, is not enough, for it is personal. For a new strong nationalist mentality to grow, among the Hindus, a new nationalist atmosphere is needed, in each Hindu home.

School and college education are now being considered as more and more necessary, by the upper caste Hindu ladies living in towns, at least in Bengal. And a spirit of so-called "imitation of the West" is consequently creeping into a section of Hindu society.

Yet, school and college education do not necessarily mean culture; and they surely do not mean nationalism, in a country where there is no national education at all. The so-called “imitation of the West” is but a bad copy of some petit aspects of a race of free men, by a batch of slaves whose mind has been made incapable of considering what essential virtues have made nations strong, in the West as well as in the East: national discipline, sense of national dignity in each individual man or woman, and, above all, sense of personal responsibility of each individual, man or woman, in every matter in which the nation’s welfare is concerned.

Women’s bookish education is useful, whenever it helps women to develop their national consciousness along with their character. When it does not, then it is but an ornament of the mind, and, half the time, an ornament out of place — an ornament of bad taste. What we want, in Hindu women, is strength of character (their submissive attitude is too often a result of weakness) and national consciousness, national pride.

* * *

In the West (we mean, in Europe) little children are taught to take interest in their nation’s greatness. Little French boys, little Germans, little Greeks, put their toy-soldiers in a row, and make them fight. One square-yard of a rotten carpet becomes a battlefield, where two nations are competing for supremacy. If the four-year-old child, the owner of the toy-soldiers, be a French boy, then the French batch always wins.

If he be a German, then the German batch is always the strongest. If he be a Greek, then he plays “Greeks and Turks,” and always gives the Greeks the advantage.

There were nations under foreign domination, in Europe: the Balkans, for instance, which were under the Turks for long centuries. During the days of Turkish rule, the children of the Balkans used to learn patriotism in their mother’s lap. The mothers were mostly illiterate (as millions of Indian women are nowadays) but they knew enough to tell their children that their country was in bondage and that it had to be made free. They used to teach them to feel slavery intolerable and to firmly and constantly keep in their hearts the will of freedom. They had the sense of “nation” and of national pride.

It is that which we would like to see also in Hindu women. We would like to see four-year-old little Indians playing “Indians and Mlechhas” with two batches of toy-soldiers (never mind if the game corresponds to a present possibility or not) and those who go to school showing each other, on- the map, what they would like Greater India to be, one day (never mind when). India’s freedom will not be far away when every Hindu actually feels slavery intolerable, that is to say, first, when every Hindu mother does. And India will grow to be a great world Power when, in every Hindu home, mothers and children discuss not merely how to be “good” according to current social standards, but how to be strong, how to rebecome a great nation. To rule, one day, it is not sufficient to be “good.”

We would like to see the Hindu women get into the habit of discussing among themselves, and within their family circle, with earnestness, any matter concerning the nation, when it comes to their knowledge; not necessarily politics, but social matters, social problems, in the light of individual cases, which are the tragic realities of every day.

For instance, in Hindu public meetings, the fact is often recalled of the number of Hindu girls and women driven away from their society by Mohammadans. There are rowdy protestations against these daily outrages. There are rowdy protestations against many sorts of “Mohammadan injustice,” Mohammadan tyranny,” etc. in Hindu public meetings, letting aside those, against every new legislative reform which favours the Mohammadans, in a province where the Mohammadans are in power. All these protestations are of no use. The new legislative bills are passed, inspite of what the Hindus may say, because what the Hindus may say is mere talk as long as they cannot do anything to back it; as long as they are weak. “Mohammadan tyranny” continues, unchecked; and so does the abduction of Hindu girls and women. For “Mohammadan tyranny” means: Hindus’ weakness. And insult to Hindu women means: Hindus’ weakness. There is no liberty, no justice, no honour, no religion for the weak.

We would like the Hindus to realise it, and to react.

We would like, first of all, the Hindu women at home to feel personally insulted, whenever they come to know of any action that is an insult, not merely to such, or such a person, or to such or such a family, but to the Hindus as a whole. They should feel ashamed; they should feel indignant; they should promote to action their husbands, their brothers, their sons; at least ask them: “What can be done?”; repeat to them that “something must be done.”

When they come to know that, in their own province, Hindudom is put to some new humiliation, then, we would like to see them express their grief in some tangible way (by fasting, for instance, a whole day, from sunrise to sunset). This would help them and all their family to feel that, to be a Hindu, does not mean merely to observe certain customs concerning diet and marriage, and to perform certain rites, but also to be one with a whole nation, to whom they belong. And that feeling of the women and children, if earnest and deep in every Hindu home (not in public meetings) would transform the Hindus out and out. Out of harmless sheep boasting of the inheritance of an old race of lions, it would remake them lions.

Last, but not least, we would like to see both ritualistic and devotional nationalism, of which we have spoken, flourishing from today among the women and children, in the Hindu home. We were told that in Maharashtra, the image of Sivaji, the national hero, is honoured and worshipped, along with those of the Gods, in the daily family “puja.” Sivaji is a God, since he represents Maharashtra, Hindudom — eternal India. We would like this cult of the heroes of Indian history to spread in every province, as well as in Maharashtra. We would like the Hindu women (specially those who enjoy the advantages of literacy) to become more and more interested in Indian history, as they are in remote Indian legend; to consider it as their own history; to gather their children, now and then, and tell them true stories out of it, as beautiful as any tales of Gods and Demons: the story of the great king Chandra Gupta or the story of Prithviraj, the gallant Hindu knight; of Pratapaditya, or Rana Pratap, of Sivaji; of queen Padmini, of queen Durgavati, or of Lakshmi Bai. We would like to see the map of India, and beyond it, the outlines of Greater India (the picture of Hindu might in the past, and the constant recall of Hindu hopes) set as an object of cult, along with the images of the national Gods and Heroes, in every Hindu home. We would like every Hindu little boy to revere some great Indian warrior as his personal model, and every Hindu little girl to say to her mother: "I want to be like Lakshmi Bai, when I grow up."

Then, Hindu India would be a strength, that is to say, a reality.

Chapter 7

A Change of Mentality Among the Hindus

Preparation For Resistance

It becomes more and more clear that what the Hindus need, specially in the regions where they are a numerical minority, is to recover, along with their national consciousness, their military virtues of old; to rebecome a military race.

It is useless to try to analyse how and why the Hindus have become the strengthless flock which they presently are. And it is not only useless, but harmful to put stress upon their present weakness without pointing out what should be done to regain vitality and power. Mere stress upon a nation's weakness only makes it weaker and weaker, through the consciousness of its desperate position.

What must be first got rid of is that idea (as common, it seems, in India, among the Hindus, as in the West, among those who know nothing about India) that Hinduism is a religion of the meek and mild, which exalts passive forbearance as the greatest of virtues.

The present-day Hindus, as a result of centuries of humiliation, have formed the idea that there is nothing else to do but to “grin and bear.” And longsuffering has become among them a wide-spread “virtue.” To put up with, to tolerate, to excuse, is considered as a sign of self-control (that is to say, of strength) and admired, while in reality it is, half the time, a sign of incapacity to face the cause of one’s sufferings, and check it — a sign of weakness. One puts up with everything, in Hindusthan: with the neighbours’ noise, with the dirt of the streets, and other such ordinary inconveniences, . . . and, ultimately, with “Mohammadan tyranny” and with foreign domination. Having learnt from generation to generation, that it is a “virtue” to tolerate others, one makes up his mind not to say a word, and the evil remains. At end, one does not even feel disturbed. Uncongenial material conditions of life, absence of elementary comforts, etc., should not be taken into consideration by “spiritual” people, whose “strength of mind” is enough to overcome any such unpleasant things. But the Hindus are, in fact, far from being as “spiritual” as they think themselves, and specially as interested foreigners cleverly incite them to think. So, material conditions have an effect upon their lives. The absence of comfort does depress them; and the absence of a suitable atmosphere in which they could develop themselves, physically and intellectually, does keep them backward as a race.

We have said that the finest human beings are to be found among the Hindus, and we believe it is true. The genuine aristocracy of India is the aristocracy of the world. But what about the rest of Hindudom? Compare the down-trodden Hindu masses, who have forgotten everything of the teachings of Hinduism except that long-suffering is a virtue, with the self-asserting, national-minded masses of other countries. Compare a Hindu coolie with an English or a French coolie. While these are free citizens, well knowing that the strength of their country is theirs, and always ready to claim, their place in the country, their right to live, their right to rise above their condition, individually, if worthy, the Hindu has the inborn fear and humbleness of a beaten dog. As a man, he may be better than a European. There may be endless possibilities in him. But these possibilities, if any, are denied, crushed, annihilated by the lie which he and nearly all Hindudom believe implicitly: "Put up with your condition; tolerate other people's injustice; suffer silently: it is a virtue."

* * *

Long suffering may be, in certain cases, a sign of "strength of mind" in an individual. But a race, a nation to which long-suffering is taught, can never be great. You may speak of long-suffering "in daily life," but it is all the same. There is no definite landmark between the things that concern daily life, and those that are of higher interest. To put up with wretched conditions in daily life leads one to put up with no less wretched conditions in national life. Everything is but a matter of habit, and the very doctrine of forbearance is a depressing one, a philosophy for slaves.

That is why, we suppose, Christian-like Hinduism is so popular among the so-called "friends" of India who come from Western countries. Whether British, American, or anything else, these people mostly belong to ruling races, unless they are Jews. They come out here, adopt a few easily adoptable Hindu manners, and go about praising Hinduism for its “cosmopolitan” outlook, for its “non-violent” ideal, for its “spirituality,” and for all the Christian virtues that Europe had to reject to become strong. But what is good for Europe is not necessarily good for India. Europe and India are so different! Europe was made to rule, to get rich, and to enjoy the world; India was made to be ruled over, to be robbed of her wealth, and to show the world that wealth and power have no value; to embody universal love and unlimited forbearance, offering the left cheek when slapped upon the right; to be, if not officially, at least yin spirit, the typical Christian nation. Is it not?

The Europeans are the last people to discourage the aptitudes of the Hindus for such a destiny. And those who are in love with Christian-like Hinduism are surely the most effective missionaries that “Christian power” has ever had in India. If they are willfully deceiving the Hindus for political purposes, then one must praise their cunningness, and the originality of their method of deceit. If they are sincere, they are still more dangerous; for then, it is not they who have come over, but the sub-conscious self-defence instinct of their race which has sent them over to India, so that the “white man” may keep on carrying his “burden” there, for a few years more at least, without being disturbed. If they are Jews, the origin of their slavish virtues is not difficult to trace, and their message of peace not difficult to understand.

Unfortunately, all these “friends” and admirers of a distorted Hinduism enjoy a great credit among the Hindus. And how could it be otherwise? The Hindus themselves have become Christianised, in practical matters, if not in their metaphysical outlook. They have become domesticated.

* * *

One will never preach enough, nowadays, that Hinduism is not a religion of the weak, nor of the sick, nor of the slaves. The national cult of India is a cult of strength and youth, the cult of the fair Aryan warriors, worshippers of Dawn, who settled in India ages ago.

One will never say enough, never do enough to revive in present-day India the love of bold adventures, along with the spirit of self-assertion; the will to live, not a weary scanty life, but a beautiful one; the will to enjoy all what is enjoyable on earth: wealth, pleasure, power; the will to create; and the will to resist, to overcome, and to crush mercilessly any force that opposes itself to Hindu self-assertion and creation.

When the Hindus recover their glory and actually get wealth and power as a nation, then, if some of them like, they can renounce these things, as the Pandavas did their reconquered throne. But not now. (The Pandavas did not renounce their throne before reconquering it.) Now, the whole nation’s preoccupation should be, not renunciation of the world and its vanity, but: “How to live and enjoy the world, as other great nations do?”; not: “How to go to heaven”? But: “How to make India, his motherland, actually ‘more exalted than heaven’, to every Hindu;” not: “How to bear silently?” How to tolerate? etc., but: “How to resist any force that keeps the Hindus from expressing themselves.”

It is astonishing that with such examples in their mind as that of the warriors in the Hindu Epics; with such Gods as the Krishna of Kurukshetra, or as Siva, the Victor of Death (Mrityunjaya), the Hindus have become a race of people so full of fear. Never has it become more necessary to popularise among the Hindu masses, as broadly as possible, some of the essential teachings of the Ramayana and Mahabharata, some of the most uplifting stories of the Gods and, as a rule, all what, in Hindu legend, history and religion, can awaken in man his instinctive warrior-like virtues.

But this is not to be achieved by mere preaching. Preaching alone has never achieved anything; if there be any latent feeling, it can only bring it to consciousness. National consciousness, and the will to resist are what we would like to see the Hindus cultivate.

Will to resist does not appear as long as people are sure that there is no danger. And the Hindus, nearly everywhere, enjoy such a feeling of false security. There is now an organised government (whether foreign or not, that is not the question) and a well-trained police to protect everybody. The streets are quiet. Riots do not occur every day in the same place; and riots that one reads about in the newspapers are not the same thing as riots around one's own house. More Hindus are, everyday, becoming Mohammadans or Christians. But they are inhabitants of remote villages, or people with whom one is out of touch, even while living in the same town. One does not hear of them. Everyday, there are new laws and regulations made to curtail the legitimate advantages that the Hindus were formerly enjoying, and, economically as well as politically, Mohamman competition is growing stronger and stronger. Everyday, the Hindus are put to some new trouble, with regard either to some religious performance of theirs (such as the immersion of a holy image) or to the percentage of jobs they will be allowed to get in public services, or to something else. But life goes on. If a Hindu cannot get any work, he will live upon his brother's income. If his brother's income is next to nothing, then, they will both live miserably, with their family. They will put up with it (long-suffering is a virtue) and they will feel in safety, as long as there be no violent disturbance within their immediate surroundings.

But when violent disturbance comes, it may be too late to think of what to do. In Bengal at least, in most riots, two hundred Hindus are scattered by twenty Mohammadans. Why? For the sole reason that they are unprepared. If you ask them, when the riot is over, how it is that they did not offer the slightest resistance, they will tell you, most earnestly: "We did not know there was going to be a riot. Here, there had never been any yet." Certainly not. But elsewhere there had been many; the Hindus should never consider a riot as impossible, in any place where they are not themselves an overwhelming numerical majority not merely in the town, but in the whole province.

And even then, . . . who can tell? There have been riots in Benares.

* * *

The thing is that, as long as they entertain the idea of an organised government, with police and military force at hand to protect their life and property in case of need, the Hindus, never mind how miserable may be their condition, will feel secure. That idea should be got rid of.

In fact, it is a false idea — an illusion. For if, in ordinary peaceful times, the government can give a certain amount of security to each citizen, there are circumstances where it cannot; there are troubled times where no protection is available. The Hindus should remember that their fate is not the main concern of the present government. If there be any trouble, it is to protect the Treasury, the Imperial Bank and other such public buildings, that armed force would be sent first; then, it would be sent to protect the life and property of the Europeans, specially of the officials. If there be time, and force to spare, then only, half a dozen policemen might be sent to protect the Hindus. But that would not be sufficient. That has never been sufficient, in any case of widespread rioting in the recent past, where the Hindus have always been the sufferers.

Moreover, we have said, if India becomes one day an independent country (as we all hope), it may not be without assing through a more or less long period of confusion in which there would be no government at all worth mentioning. Nobody knows when such a time may come. It does not depend upon India's will alone, but also upon international circumstances out of India's control. Whenever it comes, what will the Hindus do if they are not prepared from now to meet, with organised resistance, any threat whatsoever? If, from now, the consciousness of possible danger does not shake their inertia?

The widespread feeling of false security should give place, among the Hindus, to the preoccupation of self-defence. Even in untroubled times, the sense of self-defence is not to be done away with. The right of self-defence is a birth-right of man acknowledged by every government, for the reason that no government, however strong, can give full and entire guarantee of protection, to each and every citizen. If such guarantee were conferred, then government would give damages to people who have been robbed or injured. Therefore, to exercise one's right of self-defence, and, first of all, to be prepared in view of self-defence, is nothing illegal under any government. In India, a European, although in fact he is quite safe, seldom goes out alone, unarmed. But generally a Hindu, when he goes out, does not even think of taking a stick. In the places where the Hindus are only fifteen, ten, or even five percent of the total population; in the very places where riots have occurred, a Hindu walks about with nothing in his hand, except, perhaps a book, a newspaper or one end of his “dhoti.”

* * *

But consciousness of danger alone will not make the Hindus strong, unless there is something practical done to face the eventual danger. And this is the task of the young Hindus.

It is the task of every Hindu to contribute his best to the organisation of his fold. But the forces threatening them from every direction are so powerful that the Hindus, in all parts of India where they are a numerical minority, cannot survive unless they become, rapidly, a wholesale military race comparable to what the Sikhs were in Panjab, during the days of Guru Govind Singh. And it is the young men who first become soldiers, everywhere. The very ideas of danger and of resistance are welcomed by youth. To youth, these ideas are strength-giving.

That is why the first part of the constructive programme before the Hindus should be the organisation of the young men,* in pledge-bound military-like batches, with Hindu nationalism as their only ideal, with the cult of all what, in Hindu legend and history, can exalt strength, and with, as a rule of action, the determination to resist any attack, by all means and at any cost.

* All what, in these pages, concerns the organisation of Hindu youth, represents the views of Srimat Swami Satyananda, President of the Hindu Mission, Calcutta.

The pledge of each member of this Hindu militia is suggested by all what we have already said, concerning the defence of Hindudom. Among other things, each one would have to take an oath, saying:

(1) That he puts the welfare of Hindudom above his personal welfare; the interest of Hindudom above his personal interest; the salvation of Hindudom, and the freedom and greatness of India above his' personal salvation.

(2) That he will treat any Hindu just as he would a man of his own caste.

(3) That he considers himself, and himself alone, responsible for his own personal defence; that he also holds himself responsible for the defence of his family, for the defence of the Hindus of his village or of his town, for the defence of the Hindus of his province and of all over Hindusthan.

(4) That he will obey his leader without arguing, and do whatever he is told.

Wherever a few such volunteers can be gathered, whether it be within the compound of a temple, or in some grove, regarded as sacred, a unit of the Hindu militia should be started. We suggest the compound of a temple or a sacred grove as a gathering place, so that the very surroundings may constantly remind the members of the batch of the beloved culture for the defence of which they stand. Wherever there is a strong non-Hindu majority, naturally, the Students of Resistance will not take long to be suspected. It would be wise, for them, to keep among themselves, and, at the same time, to do nothing which can be, presently, judged "unlawful." In Assam, wherever similar batches of Hindu young men have been organised by the Hindu Mission, they have been started as branches of a “Physical Culture Association.” And the name is perfectly justified, as physical training (exercises to strengthen the muscles, games, etc. and exercises in the use of knives, daggers and ordinary sticks, for self-defence) is the main thing which the young men are given, in each batch.

The main thing which is given . . . apparently; for the young Hindus receive, in fact, much more. They are trained in a new mentality: in nationalism, and in the spirit of self-defence; they are made to think of resistance as the main necessity for them; they are prepared for resistance physically and mentally. Physical preparation is necessary, but not sufficient. Essays are given to little boys to write: “Suppose five or six dacoits attack your house at midnight. How would you defend yourselves? What would your father do? What would your mother do? What would your little sister do? What would you do?”; Or else: “Is your house, as it is built, easy to defend in case dacoits attack it any time? Try to imagine what possible transformations would make it more easily and more effectively defendable.” And by writing such essays, the boys get into the habit of thinking that danger, for the Hindus, is an everyday’s concern (which it is, in so many places) and that each one of them, individually, as a Hindu, must be always ready; that he must know, beforehand, what he has to do, in case of attack, to defend himself (for there is nobody, no government, no police, to defend him) and to defend his family members, his home, . . . the Hindus of his village, who are all looking to him for protection; that, if danger comes, he must do the duty for which he was trained. They get into the habit of feeling themselves personally responsible for the defence of the whole nation, thing which the Hindus have not felt for years, at least in Bengal.

* * *

The social reforms of which we have spoken do not require to be forced upon a batch of Hindu young men trained in the art of self-defence. The fingers of the hand, which ordinarily remain separate, suddenly unite, when the hand has to give a blow. In the same way, caste-consciousness of every sort will automatically be pushed at the background, and the now divided Hindus will become one bloc, when the idea of resistance will become predominant in each one of them.

Among the Hindus, from age to age, up till the present day, many reformers, many Incarnations appeared, who tried to do away with the evils originated from caste-prejudices. They tried, . . . but they could not. Ram Mohan Roy could not; Sri Gauranga could not; one of the two or three greatest of all men, Lord Buddha himself, could not. The result of their teachings has been the formation of different new religious sects, one after another, not the formation of a new lasting social order. But one of them could and did change, among his disciples, the very basis of Hindu society, for the sake of the defence of Hindudom in this world, and he is Guru Govind Singh, the one who saved the Hindus of Punjab from total extinction, two and a half centuries back. He was able to realise such a transformation because he organised his disciples as a military society, of which their descendants still retain the spirit.

The social outlook of a civil population is difficult to change, while a military population automatically changes its outlook, while modifying its habits to suit the necessities of war. “What will “people” think about me? What will be the reaction of my relatives?” such questions are the last ones to appear before the mind of a soldier. Military life creates a new society, with a new type of relationship, a new brotherhood: the brotherhood of those who share the same hardships and the same dangers, who obey the same orders, and fight on the same side. Wherever that sort of brotherhood comes to existence, the conventions and prejudices of civil life are forgotten. Any ideas, habits, customs, etc., which have no meaning in the life of an army in the field, which are of no use, are considered as superfluous; any such ideas, habits, customs, etc., which are not only useless but create inconvenience, which are a hindrance to the army’s common action, are considered as a nuisance and deliberately dropped. It may be regarded, for instance, by many Hindus, in civil life, as a mark of piety to not interline with people of an inferior caste. But if Hindus of ten different castes have, any day, for the purpose of their common self-defence, to come under the discipline of organised military life, then they certainly will not carry ten different utensils wherever they go, to cook each one’s rice separately. It would be so inconvenient that they will not even think of it. And the idea of “sin” now attached to the partaking of the same food by Hindus of different castes, will disappear by itself. New life will create a new mentality.

* * *

The aim of those who are trying, here and there, to organise batches of Hindu young men on military lines is, no doubt, to prepare a well-trained Hindu militia, ready to fight in case of need for defence. But it is still more to bring, through that undivided, national minded, self-relying, sturdy militia, a new life and a new mentality throughout Hindudom; to awaken the Hindus to resistance; to accustom them to disciplined action; to make them and to keep them, as a whole, always prepared to face any danger, always ready — like an army in the field.

It is natural that the military-trained Hindu boys will mark their influence, not merely upon the next generation of Hindus (that would be too late) but upon their elders of this generation and of the past one. After having learnt to march together, in a row; to eat together; to play together, to salute the flag of India together, and to obey command, they will go back to their homes. Not only will they help to organise, in every village, new units of the growing Hindu militia, but they will bring the, ideal, the principles and the virtues of the Hindu militia within the Hindu family circle. They will make their brothers, sisters, fathers and mothers understand that the defence of Hindu honour, life and property, beginning with the defence of the Hindu home, is the most important thing, the most urgent necessity; that, will of resistance is the greatest virtue, not will of forbearance. They will bring the members of each Hindu household to organise themselves in view to resist any attack, to prevent any insult, every one of them, from old man to child, being prepared before hand and always ready to do whatever he or she knows to be his or her duty in case of danger. They will inspire the sense of self-reliance and self-defence even to the shy Hindu girls and women, now afraid to go from one room to the other, alone, in the dark; make every Hindu house a little fort, and the Hindus of every village a battalion of camping soldiers. They will make the whole Hindu civil population a permanent militia. For unless that is achieved, there is no hope for the Hindus, wherever they are a minority. And, in such regions as North and East Bengal, that has to be achieved without delay; it is, for the Hindus, a question of life or death.

* * *

By such a transformation of their life and mentality, the Hindus would acquire the two sources of strength of which the absence has been, and is still, the cause of all their disasters: preparedness and unity. Preparedness depends upon the consciousness of what the actual danger is, along with a proper military training. Unity depends upon the capacity of the Hindus to do away with all what keeps them from feeling themselves one bloc, specially with the rigidity of caste rules, on one hand, and with excessive provincialism, on the other.

Just as, through daily contact with a widespread young Hindu militia, the whole Hindu population could not but be awakened to the sense of danger and to the necessity of being ready to face it, so it also could not but become more united. To become militarised means to become united. The parents, relatives, friends and acquaintances of each member of the Hindu militia, when they once let their lives be influenced by its spirit, would become new men and new women. When they get to think in terms of self-defence and of national defence (feeling the whole of Hindudom as one nation, and their non-Hindu brethren themselves as Hindus who have forgotten that they are Hindus) then their habits would change, without them even troubling to change them; their scale of values would be a different one. And, any social custom that is a hindrance to the organisation and defence of the Hindus, as well as to the acceptance, by them, as one of theirs, of any Indian who wishes to share once more, with them, the only real Indian culture and civilisation, would be rapidly looked upon as an inconvenience, and would die out by itself, as among the young Hindu pioneers.

Rapidly, we say, . . . if Hindu society can rapidly imbibe a military spirit, considering self-defence as its first necessity.

Most ordinary, insignificant customs, we know, are not easy to change, not to speak of those which are believed to be sanctioned by religion. But there are cases, in daily Indian life, in which even these are set aside with bewildering rapidity. Take, for instance, the case of a Hindu whose son has just received a scholarship to go and continue his studies in England. It is amazing how quickly the orthodox father can, then, set aside his orthodoxy, and send the boy off to Bombay. From the very moment the young man will take his place on board the boat, it will be impossible for him to stick to his rules of life. He will, no doubt, not touch beef; but who can tell how many times beef has been served in the plates and dishes that he will have to use, wherever he goes? Still, the orthodox Hindu father sends him, for he considers it a matter of great interest, a necessity.

The Hindus will do away with all what is bar to united disciplined action and a hindrance to their own national defence, when widespread military habits create among them a widespread military outlook; when national defence (beginning with self-defence) becomes, to their eyes, the highest of duties, and united action a necessity. Then (and not before) will Hindudom be in a position to live, and take in hand its own destiny as well as the destiny of India, even in the regions where it represents, now, a numerical minority.

* * *

Now, when riots occur, often half a dozen sturdy Mohammadans, armed with sticks and stones, disperse a procession of hundred Hindus. A numerical minority, if armed and prepared, can easily overcome an unarmed and unprepared crowd. The Hindus are unarmed because they are unprepared, unaware of eventual danger. Nobody prevents them from using, when attacked, the very same weapons as their opponents: sticks and stones. (At present, nobody can use machine-guns, in India, except the British forces. Hindus and non-Hindus are equal, in that respect.) It is not arms and ammunitions, but unity and preparedness, military spirit, which is lacking among the Hindus, wherever they come to a clash with such aggressors who also possess no arms worth speaking of. Number itself is a force, when readiness and unity go with it; not otherwise.

If only the Hindus, wherever a minority, would become a minority of soldiers, well-trained and always ready, then, not only could they defend themselves and survive, but, a time is coming when they would be the actual masters of the situation.

We have spoken of a period of confusion (possibly coming, sooner or later) during which no effective government may remain, in India, for a time, no one can tell.

The Hindus, then, even in North and East Bengal, and other such places where they are now a hopeless minority, would be the masters of India, if organised and ready. For then, while there may be no police, they would act as a police force: they would keep peace and order throughout the country; and the leaders of the Hindu militia would be, practically, the only government existing. What would happen afterwards, it is difficult to say, now. But one can hope, at least, that a whole nation who, in a short time, would have risen from the state of a helpless flock to the military virtues which we have tried to suggest, would not be easily subdued.

The vitality, the power, the pride acquired by the Hindus after such an experience, would be beyond conception. Not only the Indian Mohammadans and Christians, themselves protected by the Hindu militia during the unsettled transitory period, would probably rejoin the Hindu fold in numbers, as religious fanaticism would rapidly give place to real Indian nationalism, when one would see what Indian nationalism can do, but the world at large would respect the strong regenerated Hindu nation.

And there would be nothing astonishing if such Hindus, enjoying complete independence, become conquerors, and rebuild Greater India. There would be nothing astonishing even if, through them, one day (through their direct or indirect influence) the dream of the resurrection of Aryan Pagandom in the West also, which now seems impossible, becomes a reality.

Nobody knows what can happen, what might happen. And all hopes are natural to a young nation, if it be strong.

Through the organisation of Hindudom, first let us make real India strong again.

This e-book was brought to you by the efforts of the hard-working folks at the Savitri Devi Archive. It is free, of course, for anyone to download and read. However, if you want to put it on your own website, please make sure to credit us. Linking back to the Savitri Devi Archive would be highly appreciated as well.

The Savitri Devi Archive

Home	Life	Works	Texts	Gallery	Literature	Wish List
News	Letters	Bookshop	Donations	Links	Mailing List	Contact

Akhnaton's Eternal Message: A Scientific Religion 3300 Years Old

by Savitri Devi

Edited by R.G. Fowler

The pamphlet Akhnaton's Eternal Message is Savitri Devi's first publication on Akhnaton. It was published in 1940 by Savitri's husband "A.K. Mukerji" (note the spelling of his last name) at 8, Esplanade East, Calcutta, the location of his office, where at the time he also edited The Eastern Economist. It was printed by J.N. Dey at the Express Printers, 20A, Gour Laha St., Calcutta.

In preparing this text for online publication, I have corrected several minor spelling and punctuation errors, updated some spellings, fleshed out Savitri's citations, and added two editorial notes, which are clearly marked as such.

—R. G. Fowler

"Thy rays are on Thy bright Image, the Ruler of Truth, who proceeded from Eternity Thou givest Him Thy duration and Thy years

As long as Heaven is, He shall be.”

—From an inscription in a nobleman’s tomb at Tell-el-Amarna

ONE of the most interesting and probably the oldest effort ever attempted by one man alone to revivify the spirit of true religion in a society stiffened by formalism—an effort much discussed by a few specialised scholars during the past thirty years, but generally unknown to the public at large—is that undertaken in Egypt by King Akhnaton, during the first half of the XIVth century B. C.

Sketch of the Movement

When, in 1375 B. C., Akhnaton ascended the throne of the Pharaohs at the death of his father, Amenhotep III, the most brilliant of all the kings of Egypt, the Egyptian empire was at the topmost of its glory. It extended from the Fourth Cataract of the Nile, southwards, up to the Upper Euphrates and the eastern boundaries of Asia Minor, northwards, and Nut-Amon, (or Thebes) its capital, with its glittering palaces, its huge obelisks inscribed with records of victories, its crowds of captives from all the surrounding nations, and, above all, with the magnificent temples of its local god, Amon, who had become the main god of all Egypt, was one of the most gorgeous cities that the world had ever seen.

But a reaction had already begun against the overwhelming power of the priesthood of Amon, in the name of a very ancient solar god, Aton (the Disk), originally worshipped at On (or Heliopolis), the oldest center of solar cult in Egypt. Queen Tiy, Amenhotep III’s chief wife, and Akhnaton’s mother, seems to have been devoted to that god. And the whole of Akhnaton’s increasing effort throughout his reign—the dedication of a temple to Aton at Thebes, the use of a new religious symbol (the Disk of the Sun, with rays ending in hands) in the place of all the old ones, the change of his own name, Amenhotep, “Amon’s delight,” to Akhnaton, “Aton’s delight,” the transfer of the Court to a newly founded capital, Akhetaton (the City of the Horizon of Aton, the famous Tell-el-Amarna of the modern archeologists), the erasure of the name of Amon and, later on, of the plural word “gods” from every inscription—the whole of that effort, we repeat, appears as an attempt to replace Amon, and finally all the other gods of Egypt and of the empire, by the one solar god Aton, raised to the status of a universal God.

Outwardly at least, the attempt proved a failure. A few years after Akhnaton’s death in 1358 B.C., everything seemed as before, except that Egypt’s Syrian dominion, sacrificed to the king’s conscientious objection to war, had become a thing of the past, and that a new sense of the relation of man to God is discernible in the subsequent Egyptian religious literature. But for this, the movement, apparently too far in advance of its time, as we will see, left no trace. Akhnaton’s name, anathematised, was erased from the inscriptions throughout the land and even from the ribbons of gold foil encircling his mummy,¹ so that he might be annihilated in the world of the dead as well as in that of the living. He was, for a time, referred to merely as “that heretic,” “that criminal,” etc., and then forgotten.

The Religious Conception of Aton

Now, what was the Aton faith—or perhaps more exactly the Aton philosophy—as it appears through the inscriptions (especially the two Hymns Composed by Akhnaton and copied, with a few variations, in the tombs of several of his nobles); through the relics of that “art of Tell-el-Arnarna” which flourished under his inspiration, and through the finest of all testimonies to its value: Akhnaton’s life itself?

Aton, as we have said, is one the most ancient solar aspects of Godhead in Egypt, raised to the status of a universal God. Had he been nothing but that, still his idea would remain remarkable as a bold logical generalisation, much in progress on the conception of the purely local gods which had prevailed up to that date. But he was not nothing but that. From the Hymns, as well as from the inscriptions which refer to him, one or two important conclusions can be drawn:

(1) Whatever may have been the original god of Heliopolis and the etymology of the word “Aton,” the universal God worshipped by Akhnaton was obviously not the material sun, nor any god with a mythology at the back of him, like the gods of Egypt. His full name, which appears already on a stele, jointly with the name of Amon, before Akhnaton’s accession, suggests a compound of several aspects of the Sun with a special stress upon solar “energy”: “Ra-Horakhti-of-the-Two-Horizons, rejoicing in his Horizon, in his name ‘Shu’ (heat, or energy)-which-is-in-the-Aton” (Disk).

That something more subtle and more essential than the visible sun, say, the Soul of the Sun, was worshipped under the name of Aton, is made clear by the very fact of Akhnaton’s life-long struggle against the supremacy of Amon, a god who was also identified with the Sun. It would have been meaningless to consider the whole universe as the realm of the originally local god of Heliopolis, and to try to suppress the cult of Amon for his sake, at the cost of many troubles, instead of simply proclaiming the universality of the more popular Amon, had Amon and Aton embodied more or less the same thing.

The fact that, except the symbolic Sun-Disk with rays ending in human hands holding the “ankh” (sign of life), no image of Aton whatsoever was permitted, stands also in favour of the idea that Aton was an invisible, intangible God; while in Akhnaton’s Hymns—the most conclusive instance—a remarkable insistence is displayed upon the world-wide beneficent activity and the omnipresence of the Sunrays, pointing to Radiant Energy, the principle of all life, the very essence of all being, as the actual object of worship. “No one seems to have realised until the present century,” writes Sir Flinders Petrie, “the truth that was the basis of Akhnaton’s worship: that the rays of the sun are the means of the sun’s action, the source of all life and power in the universe. This abstraction of regarding the radiant energy as all- important was quite disregarded until the recent views of conservation of force, of heat as a mode of motion, and of the identity of heat, light and electricity have made us familiar with the conception that was the characteristic feature of Akhnaton’s new cult”²

(2) As the Soul of the Sun is the Soul of the world, the energetic principle of life itself, so the cult of Aton is the cult of Life. And in it, Life is inseparable from love and beauty.

Aton is called, in the Hymns, the “beginning of life,” the One who “maketh all hearts to live,” the “creator of the germ in woman, maker of the seed in man, giving life to the son in the body of his mother,” the “Lord of Life,” the God who, while alone and self-existing, has within Him “millions of vitalities,” who “vivifieth hearts with His beauties, which are life.” He is the God, also, of whom Akhnaton says: “Thou fillest every land with thy beauty, Thou bindest them by Thy love,” “breath of life is to them to see Thy beams,” “creatures live through Thee, while their eyes are upon Thy beauty.” . . . And nothing is more striking than the picture of the world palpitating with life and joy under the daily touch of the Life-giver, the living Sun: men of every land, far and near, holding up their hands, birds lifting their wings, “in adoration of His ‘Ka’ (soul, essence) beasts skipping with joy in the fields, fish leaping up before Him from the depth of the waters as He rises, and the tender lilies opening themselves to His morning kiss.” “Buds burst into flower, and the plants which grow in the waste lands send up shoots at Thy rising; they drink themselves drunk of Thy radiance before Thy face.” This vision of the world is the inspired vision of an artist, which certainly, more than anything else, Akhnaton was.

We have already mentioned the scientific accuracy of the insight which led Akhnaton to make the mysterious Power within the beautiful Sun-beams, the “effulgence of several colours” which comes from the Disk, the object of his cult, a thing which Sir Flinders Petrie, Breasted and others have marvelled at. But as most if not all ideas of genius, this one appears as a direct intuition. And what the Hymns tell us of Akhnaton’s extreme sensitiveness to beauty makes us think of the fundamental connection between scientific enlightenment and artistic inspiration—a point put forward nowadays by eminent creative scientists.³

(3) It seems hardly necessary to point out, after what has been said, that philosophically, the “One and only God, Aton” is not a transcendent God, similar to the “only” God of later religions known as monotheistic, but an immanent one, in consistence with a religious attitude different from theirs. He is a God from within the Universe, not from without; a God who created all existing things out of “the millions of vitalities which are in Him,” not out of nothingness.

(4) It is difficult to say if, and to what extent, the number of foreign and specially Indo-Aryan (Mitannian) women at the Court of his father may have influenced Akhnaton in his childhood and contributed unconsciously to his conception of a universal God manifest in a visible symbol which reminds us of one of the Sanskrit names of the Sun: "angshumalli." Without systematically denying the possibility of such early influences, it seems to us that one should not overestimate them. Parallels are easy, and any two solar symbols, if not too far-fetched, are bound to have something in common. The point is that, whatever may have been the conception of Godhead of those whom he respected, nay even of his mother, Queen Tiy, herself a worshipper of Aton, the idea of Aton as the Principle of Radiant Energy, source of all life, seems to have struck Akhnaton's intuition as a direct knowledge, revealed to him from within, by Aton Himself; as an inexpressible truth which he alone understood because he felt it. In one of the Hymns he says to Aton: "Thou art in my heart, and there is no other that knoweth Thee, save Thy Son, Akhnaton; Thou hast made him wise to understand Thy plans and Thy power . . .” Elsewhere, he calls himself: “Thy Son, Nefer-kheperu-Ra Ua-en-Ra (beautiful Essence of the Sun, only One of the Sun), who came forth from Thy limbs,” and “Son of the living Aton, like unto Him without ceasing . . .” And these words, while spoken by one who cared as little for conventions as Akhnaton did, appear to express the inmost certitude of a self-realised soul who can say of God: “I am He,” rather than the ordinary utterance of a king of Egypt about his solar descent.

(5) The struggle to establish the cult of Aton in the place of that of Amon was not the struggle of a “jealous” deity against other deities, but that of real religion against priesthood.

Akhnaton has not only been harshly treated by his actual opponents during his lifetime and immediately after his death, but also charged with “fanaticism,” “intolerance,” etc., and criticised by some men of the XXth century A.D. with as much bitter hatred as if these gentlemen looked upon him as their personal foe. Sir Wallis Budge goes to the extent of hinting that he must have been capable of any of the crimes of later religious persecutors, on the only—and somewhat astonishing—ground that he was “an Oriental”!⁴ In reality the erasure of the name of Amon from the inscriptions throughout Egypt, the prohibition of Amon’s public cult and, later on, the suppression of the plural word “gods,” wherever found, did not imply any persecution of the worshippers either of Amon or of the other gods. Budge admits himself that there are no records to back his assumption. We add that, had there been the slightest instance of tyranny on Akhnaton’s part, the restorers of the Amon cult would have been too glad to tell us so in their records. Moreover, in spite of the utter revolutionary character of the steps taken against the cult of Amon—the supreme god of Egypt at that time—there is no record of any rising to oppose their execution, throughout Akhnaton’s reign.

What appears from all that one knows of the king’s character, and from the very conception of his universal God—not “a” god, but the essence of all gods, of any cult—is that it was the dead formalism of the Amon worship and the increasing arrogance of its enormously wealthy priesthood that Akhnaton intended to strike at. What he wanted was not to force onto his people “a” new religion of his own liking in the place of the old one, but to infuse into their hearts the genuine spirit of religion; to awaken them, from the routine of formulas, of symbols, of endless ceremonies, of which the original inspiration had long ago disappeared and the hidden meaning been forgotten, to the feeling of the Supreme Reality, through the rational worship of the living Sun.

To infuse the truth of life into the cult of Amon seemed—and probably was—impossible. The worship of the Theban god had become, says A. Weigall, “as intellectually low and primitive as its status was high and pompous.” Only a new God—or a very old one, from the days the world was young and more intuitive to godly things—could accomplish the miracle of regiving inspiration to priest-ridden Egypt, and nothing but a cult both scientific and simple could ever aspire to become the cult of the world. And that was the intention of Akhnaton’s life-long effort: to give—or to regive—the world, embarrassed with a host of conflicting gods and goddesses, with mythologies, rituals, elaborated mysteries, entangled metaphysics, the pure scientific essence of real religion, without any metaphysics, any mysteries, any mythology; the worship of the eternal Principle, Cause and Ordainer of life—Radiant Energy—through the visible Sun, its universal manifestation.

The Ethics of the Aton Teaching, Akhnaton's Example

Some modern writers (with the striking exception of Sir Flinders Petrie), insist upon the fact that there is no trace of ethics in the religion preached by Akhnaton. But besides that there is probably much information about the Aton worship still lying undiscovered among the ruins of the City of the Horizon, so that any sweeping judgment would be premature (as A. Weigall and Breasted admit), it seems that the identification of Godhead with love and life, not to speak of Akhnaton's definite stress upon "truth," stand sufficiently to prove the ethical value of his teaching.

We find in the tomb of Ay, one of his nobles, the inscribed words: "He" (the king) "put truth into me, and my abomination is to lie." Similar assertions, on the part of other nobles, are common. No less eloquent is the title constantly associated with the name of Akhnaton in every record: "Ankh-em-Maat,"—"Living in Truth." But more eloquent than anything else is Akhnaton's own life, the best illustration of what "truth," "love," "religion" meant to him.

The main feature of Akhnaton's character is uncompromising truthfulness, perfect sincerity, allied to the rare courage to stick to what he considered right, even at the cost of the highest of interests. It has been said that, to his eyes, "what is, was right," and nothing could be better said, provided we realise the full meaning of the sentence. "What is," here, means what is real, in the religious sense what does not depend upon men's whims or men's interests what is in consistence with the eternal order of the Universe, with the laws of life which are the laws of God. And the law of God, according to Akhnaton's teaching, is love.

From what we know of it through the beautiful relics of the Tell-el-Amarna art, and through the inscriptions, Akhnaton's private life, even judged from the standpoint of the purest morality, was spotless. It was not the life of an ascetic, conscious of the power of sin in the midst of his renunciation of it, but that of a man who, by nature, seems to have had no tendency to either excess or perversion, and, at the same time, no prejudice against the innocent pleasures of life. The artists of his Court—whom he himself taught to discard the conventionally "noble" attitudes and represent their models as they saw them—have pictured him in scenes of daily life: eating, enjoying a cup of wine, listening to music, resting, or smelling a bunch of flowers held by Nefertiti, his queen, before his nose. Nefertiti is practically always represented by his side (even on state occasions), and sometimes in attitudes of touching familiarity. Often their children—six little princesses—are present in the picture. There is a statuette of Akhnaton fondling one of them in his arms. In the inscriptions, the queen's name is generally mentioned, and a common form of the royal oath is: "As my heart is happy in the Queen and her children." Moreover, there is no mention of "secondary wives" in Akhnaton's life,⁵ and though the absence of a male heir must have caused him some anxiety (for he knew that his opponents were powerful), it seems, as A. Weigall believes, that he could never bring himself to follow the time-honoured custom of polygamy, however natural it was to the eyes of all the ancient world, and put his interest before his feelings.⁶ Any action, great or small, which did not correspond to a genuine feeling, was to him a living lie, and the picture of his family life, in the beautiful and peaceful surroundings which he had created at Akhetaton, is only one illustration of his fundamental moral features: his truthfulness, his sensitiveness to beauty, both visible and invisible, and capacity to seize it in the simplest things; his natural tenderness.

No less conclusive would be to recall Akhnaton's attitude towards men in general. Several of his courtiers mention in their tomb inscriptions the kindness with which he used to treat them and the generous presents they used to receive from him. We know now how very few were the actually faithful ones at Akhetaton, and how, as soon as the king passed away, most of those whom he had taught, and loved and rewarded, made haste to join the reaction against his whole life's work, while not one of them had the courage to walk in his footsteps, against the tide. But, no doubt, as long as he lived, they did not spare trouble to show themselves his disciples, and Akhnaton, in the genuineness of his heart, did not for a long time—if he did at all, in the end, suspect any of them of deceiving him. He gave them all, as he gave all those whom he came in touch with, the very best of himself.

Akhnaton's loving confidence in human nature can be seen even in his indignant letter to Aziru, his treacherous Syrian vassal, after it had been confirmed that Aziru had handed over Ribaddi, the loyal prince of Byblos, to his enemies, the Amorite princes. "Dost thou not write to the king, thy lord: 'I am thy servant . . .?' Yet hast thou committed this crime?" "Didst thou not know the hatred of these men" (the Amorite princes) "for him" (Ribaddi)—writes Akhnaton—and he continues: "If thou art indeed a servant of the king, why hast thou not arranged for his sending to the king, thy lord?" To send Ribaddi to Egypt, so that his accusing voice might be heard there, was the last thing which the traitor could have been expected to do. But Akhnaton was too good even to suspect such an amount of deceit, meanness and cruelty as that of his unworthy vassal, specially after all Aziru's protestations of loyalty—and his letter reveals to us his painful amazement in front of the darkest side of humanity, suddenly thrust before him by hard facts.

But the most striking example of uncompromising faithfulness to his principles is perhaps to be found in Akhnaton's determined opposition to war. What this perfect man has been the most bitterly criticised for, by modern authors, is his steady refusal to fight, or even to allow his generals to do so, exactly at the most critical juncture of Egyptian history, when the slightest military help, sent in time to his loyal vassals, would have saved an empire built up by two centuries of efforts, and apparently changed the whole course of subsequent history. From a strictly political point of view, the critics may be right—though, taking a very broad and very long view of the question, one can never say to what extent they may also be wrong. But in the light of all those who put above worldly interests that which they look upon as right, there can be no words too strong to praise Akhnaton for the example which he has left.

We do not intend to give here the history of the overthrow of Egyptian domination in Syria and in Palestine during the last part of Akhnaton's reign. We have already mentioned the name of Aziru, the foremost intriguer against Egyptian interests, and that of Ribaddi, the faithful prince of Byblos. Akhnaton had other faithful vassals—for instance Abdakhipa, governor of Jerusalem, the author of many of the "Amarna letters"—and there was a time when, apparently, the smallest encouragement given to them would have “saved the situation.” (In one of his early letters, Ribaddi merely asks for “three hundred soldiers,” to hold his city, and in another, “forty chariots” only.) As no aid was sent, the messages from Syria became more and more frequent and more and more pathetic, not to say desperate. One cannot think of that period of history without remembering the letter addressed to Akhnaton by the citizens of Tunip: “Tunip, thy city, weeps.” It is one of the most moving official documents of all times.

But even such appeals were not able to make Akhnaton give up his conscientious objection to war, and to the bitter end he refused to use armed force against those who were undermining his authority in Syria and Palestine, with the result that he lost his Asiatic dominions wholesale. On the other hand, his letter to Aziru shows that he was fully conscious of his power, and might well have used it, had he chosen to do so. Nor was he ignorant of, the advantages that the possession of Syria gave him. Together with his new Egyptian capital, Akhetaton, he had built in Syria a second sacred City, and a third one in Nubia, hoping that from these centers of unmixed Aton worship, the name of his universal God and his simple doctrine of love would spread throughout his dominions and beyond their boundaries. Nor was such a man as he indifferent to the plight of his loyal subjects. Their distressed messages were no doubt a torture to his heart; and if we may suppose that, as a man, he has sometimes experienced the temptation to compromise with his conscience, this must have been when such pathetic cries as those of Ribaddi or of the citizens of distant Tunip reached him in his peaceful City. But he stood firm till the end, and did not compromise. The very idea of war was in contradiction with the truth which he preached, and whatever his new cult might have gained, outwardly, had he kept by force of arms the territories conquered by his fathers and lived long enough to establish a dozen other religious centers there as well as in Egypt, there is no doubt that to his eyes, any compromise would have been the denial of the spirit of Aton worship, and therefore the end of it all.

Akhnaton lived long enough to hear the last messenger tell him the fall of his last fortress, and probably also to foresee the coming reaction which in a few years was going to reinstall the former priesthods of Egypt, along with the hosts of national gods—Amon at the head of them—and sweep away forever all trace of what he had done. He died at the early age of twenty-nine, after a reign of seventeen years, but probably not more than thirteen or fourteen years of personal government. As we have already said, his enemies persecuted him even beyond death, and of those who once professed to love him and follow his teaching, not one cared—or dared—to stand against the tide and defend his memory. But there are few things in history as beautiful as his short life. And whatever be the lack of written evidence, it seems impossible to say that a doctrine which puts the truth of love before every other concern—a doctrine which found its expression in such a life—is “devoid of the sense of righteousness.”

It would be better to say that, no less in its ethics than in its other aspects, the Aton worship is inseparable from the personality of its promoter. Every religious teaching is so; but later “world-religions” have had the chance to live as organised bodies for a long time; the need of adaptation to various material conditions has introduced into their tradition novelties which the founders never imagined and compromises of which they would not always have approved. While the Aton cult, on account of its mere twelve or fifteen years of existence as a public worship, remains exclusively the work of one man, whose stamp it keeps through time.

An Undying Teaching

Sir Flinders Petrie puts great stress upon the scientific accuracy of Akhnaton's view of the universe: "If this," he writes, "were a new religion invented to satisfy our modern scientific conceptions, we could not find a flaw in the correctness of his view of the energy of the solar system" . . . "he" (Akhnaton) "had certainly bounded forward in his views and symbolism to a position which we cannot logically improve upon at the present day. Not a rag of superstition or of falsity can be found clinging to this new worship evolved out of the old Aton of Heliopolis, the sole Lord of the Universe"⁷

And when we sit to think that this 3300 year old worship suitable for our own times—and still in advance on the religious views of ninety-nine per cent of our contemporary fellow men—was evolved by a youth within his teens, we cannot but recognise in that youth one of the few human beings who have the right to be regarded as incarnations of the Divine Soul.

But no less amazing, no less admirable, and perhaps still more in advance both on his time and on ours, is Akhnaton's bold stand against the law of violence which had ruled the world from the beginning and is ruling it still. No ruler of an empire at the height of its strength has ever sacrificed as much as he did to the cause of peace; nor has a religion of love, before him, ever directed decisions of vital political importance. Eleven hundred years after him, India's Asoka stands as the first instance of an "ahimshavadi" emperor, and India is probably still the only land where Akhnaton's attitude towards war would be fully understood and admired to the present day, if only it were known. But for this illustrious exception, there is not a nation, ancient or modern, which ever seriously tried to bring forth the real "new world order" that was Akhnaton's dearest dream. And could the youthful founder of the Aton cult come back to-day, among us who should have grown wiser but who did not, he would, it seems, remain as alone as he was in his far-gone days of strife—too good for this earth.

In 1942, exactly 3300 years will have elapsed since he passed away. If, tired of war, men be ready, then, to express their aspiration towards a higher ideal, no better suggestion, it seems, could be given, than that of celebrating all over the world the "thirty-third Centenary" of the oldest Prince of Peace, and teaching the future generations to love his memory "forever and ever."

Calcutta
December, 1940

¹ Savitri, probably influenced by Arthur Weigall's compelling arguments, believed that Akhnaton's mummy had been found in Valley of the Kings Tomb 55 by Theodore Davis in 1907. Later forensic examinations of the remains have, however, suggested that the individual was between 20 and 25/26 at the time of death, which is too young for Akhnaton but is consistent with what we know of Akhnaton's ephemeral co-regent and successor Smenkhara. In spite of this, some scholars, who find dubious the techniques used to estimate the individual's age of death, still maintain that the mummy is Akhnaton's.—Ed.

² Sir Flinders Petrie, A History of Egypt, Vol. II (London: Methuen & Co. Ltd., 1924), p. 214.

³ See Henri Poincaré's La Science et l'Hypothese (Paris: Flammarion, 1923).

⁴ See Wallis Budge's Tutankhamen: Amenism, Atenism and Egyptian Monotheism

(London: Martin Hopkinson and Co., Ltd., 1923), pp. 107 and 108.

⁵ After Savitri wrote this essay, evidence emerged that Akhnaton had had at least one other wife, known as Kiya, who may have been the mother of Tutankhamen. The coffin and canopic jars found in Tomb 55 may have been manufactured for Kiya and then adapted for Akhnaton's burial.—Ed.

⁶ See Arthur Weigall's The Life and Times of Akhnaton, Pharaoh of Egypt (London: Thornton Butterworth Ltd., 1923).

⁷ Sir Flinders Petrie, A History of Egypt, Vol. II p. 214.

AND TIME ROLLS ON
Savitri Devi

AND TIME ROLLS ON THE SAVITRI DEVI INTERVIEWS

The Savitri Devi Archive
The Centennial Edition of Savitri Devi's Works
R.G. Fowler, General Editor

(Each volume will be released in a limited cloth edition of 100 or 200 numbered copies.)

Volume One:

AND TIME ROLLS ON THE SAVITRI DEVI INTERVIEWS

Volume Two:

GOLD IN THE FURNACE
EXPERIENCES IN POST-WAR GERMANY

Future Volumes:

THE LIGHTNING AND THE SUN
(complete and unabridged)

MEMORIES AND REFLECTIONS OF AN ARYAN WOMAN

DEFIANCE

PILGRIMAGE

THE LOTUS POND
IMPRESSIONS OF INDIA

LONG-WHISKERS AND THE TWO-LEGGED GODDESS OR, THE TRUE STORY OF A "MOST OBJECTIONABLE NAZI" AND . . .
HALF-A-DOZEN CATS

IMPEACHMENT OF MAN

A SON OF GOD
THE LIFE AND PHILOSOPHY OF AKHNATON, KING OF EGYPT
(complete and unabridged)

AKHNATON'S ETERNAL MESSAGE
(and other writings on Akhnaton)

A WARNING TO THE HINDUS
(and THE NON-HINDU INDIANS AND INDIAN UNITY)

NOT FOR NOTHING: LETTERS OF SAVITRI DEVI, VOLUME 1

SAINT SAVITRI: LETTERS OF SAVITRI DEVI, VOLUME 2

SAVITRI DEVI

AND TIME ROLLS ON THE SAVITRI DEVI INTERVIEWS

EDITED BY R.G. FOWLER

Black Sun Publications
Atlanta, Georgia

Savitri Devi Mukherji
(née Maximine Portaz, a.k.a. Maximiani Portas), 1905-1982
And Time Rolls On: The Savitri Devi Interviews
Edited with a Preface by R.G. Fowler
Includes index

Original Sound Recordings
Copyright © 1978 Ernst Zündel

Edited Transcription, Preface, and Notes
Copyright © 2005 R.G. Fowler

This Edition
Copyright © 2005 The Savitri Devi Archive

All rights reserved

Printed on acid free paper.
No animal products were used in the creation of this book.
Dust-jacket/cover by R.G. Fowler and Michael J. Polignano Manufactured in the United States of America.

ISBN 0-9746264-2-2 (cloth)
ISBN 0-9746264-3-0 (paper)

First Edition

Savitri Devi Mukherji

Savitri Devi, New Delhi, 9 November 1977

To Georg and Magdlen Schrader, Savitri's Good Friends

CONTENTS

EDITOR'S PREFACE	iii
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS	xi
Chapter 1: AUTOBIOGRAPHY	1
§1. Early Recollections	1
§2. Greek Nationalism	5
§3. Four Wars	7
§4. Education	9
§5. The Discovery of National Socialism, 1923-32	11
§6. India, 1932-39	18
§7. Asit Krishna Mukherji	25
§8. World War II, 1939-45	31
§9. Return to Europe, 1945-46	39
§10. Iceland, 1946-47	44
§11. Propaganda Missions in Germany, 1948-49	47
§12. Arrest and Interrogation, 1949	52
§13. Werl and Hertha Ehlert, 1949	61
§14. Trial and Imprisonment, 1949	64
§15. Return to India, 1957-60	69
§16. Back to Europe, 1960-71	73
§17. Last Years in India, 1971-78	75
Chapter 2: COMRADES	78
§1. German Comrades	78
§2. The Cotswolds Camp, 1962	85
§3. George Lincoln Rockwell	86
§4. The End of the Cotswolds Camp	88
§5. Colin Jordan, John Tyndall, and Françoise Dior	90
§6. Immigration and Miscegenation	95
§7. Matt Koehl	96
Chapter 3: RELIGION	101
On Christianity
§1. Greek Orthodox Christianity	101
§2. Christianity and Nationalism	102
§3. International Religions and Race-Mixing	104

§4. Robert Ambelain on Christianity	107
§5. Christianity as Man-Centered	111
§6. Christianity and Intolerance	112
On Hinduism
§7. Hinduism and National Socialism	117
§8. Reincarnation	121
§9. Yoga	123
Human and Animal Sacrifice
§10. Human Sacrifice	127
§11. The Immolation of Cats	130
The Jews
§12. The Jews as Instruments of the Dark Age	131
§13. Alexandrian Judaism	133
Chapter 4: LIFE IN THE KALI YUGA	136
§1. The Nature of History	136
§2. The Significance of Adolf Hitler	142
§3. Knowing the Future	144
§4. The Example of the Führer	147
§5. Baby Seals	151
§6. Sex, Marriage, and Family Life	153
§7. Detachment	156
§8. Aryan Solidarity	158
§9. Anthropos and Misanthropy	160
§10. Propaganda	161
§11. “The” Holocaust	162
§12. The Idealistic versus the Appetitive	165
§13. Multi-Racialism and Colonialism	167
Chapter 5: “1953”	170
APPENDIX: “1953” IN GERMAN	173
BIBLIOGRAPHY	177
INDEX	183
ABOUT THE AUTHORESS	190

EDITOR'S PREFACE

In November of 1978, Ernst Zündel, a leading publisher of National Socialist and revisionist literature, dispatched a young German associate to New Delhi to interview Savitri Devi on tape.¹ Zündel discovered Savitri through Adrien Archand, a leading figure of the pre-World War II French Canadian Right. Savitri and Zündel began to correspond in 1961 and continued to do so until her death in 1982.²

Of Savitri's books, Zündel was most impressed with The Lightning and the Sun (1958), claiming that its influence on his life and thought was second only to Hitler's Mein Kampf. Her other National Socialist books, such as Defiance (1951), Gold in the Furnace (1952), and Pilgrimage (1958), struck him as merely "devotional" works. But he regards The Lightning and the Sun as, quite literally, a revelation. Zündel believes that Savitri Devi, like Edgar Cayce and Adolf Hitler himself, was a prophet, an oracle, a "channel" through whom revelations from a higher order of reality entered our world.

Savitri's goal was certainly that of a prophet. She wished to found a new religion for the White West. This religion was to be both a revival and a transformation of classical Aryan paganism. Its purpose was to replace Christianity and serve as a vehicle for the triumph of Savitri's National Socialist ideals. But there was some confusion as to what, precisely, this religion was supposed to be.

In her book A Son of God, written in 1943-45 and later re-titled Son of the Sun, Savitri makes a case for reviving the monotheistic solar religion of the Egyptian pharaoh Akhnaton.³ In Impeachment of Man, her pioneering animal rights book written in 1945-46, Savitri praises Akhnaton's philosophy in Nietzschean terms as optimistic and life-

¹ "Savitri Devi" is a nom de plume meaning "Sun Goddess." ("Savitri" = sun; "Devi" = goddess.) It may seem like undue familiarity to refer to her, for the sake of verbal economy, as "Savitri" rather than as "Devi," but "Devi" is not a surname, but a title analogous to "Saint," and just as one refers to Saint Paul as Paul for short, rather than as Saint, one refers to Savitri Devi as Savitri, not Devi. Savitri's surname, after her marriage, was Mukherji, Mukherji being a contraction of Mukhopadhyaya.

² All information relating to Ernst Zündel is drawn from an interview with the editor taped on 29 October 2001.

³ Savitri Devi, A Son of God: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt (London: Philosophical Publishing House, 1946). Second Edition: Son of the Sun: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt (San Jose, California: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1956).

affirming.⁴ However, in her book Defiance, written in 1950, Savitri admits that her praise of Akhnaton was not entirely in earnest. It was an attempt to package elements of Aryan paganism for a war-weary and suspicious world.⁵ Furthermore, in The Lightning and the Sun, written between 1948 and 1956, Savitri offers a critique of the apolitical and pacifistic elements of Akhnaton's vision.⁶ In Defiance and Pilgrimage (written in 1953-54), we find Savitri communing with the old Nordic gods. In Defiance, she recounts worshipping the Midnight Sun and praying at the Godafoss (Waterfall of the Gods) during her year in Iceland (1946-1947).⁷ In Pilgrimage, she tells of her 1953 pilgrimage to National Socialist sites in Germany and Austria, which culminated in her visit to the Externsteine, where she spent a night in the initiation grave and greeted the rising sun in the Chamber of the Sun.⁸ In Pilgrimage, she also addresses prayers to the Germanic "Almighty Father of Light" (Lichtvater allwaltender).⁹ However, in Gold in the Furnace, written in 1948-49, she flatly denies that it is possible to revive the cult of Wotan—or any dead religion, for that matter, which would include Akhnaton's.¹⁰ In her 1939 book A Warning to the Hindus, Savitri praised Hinduism as the last living remnant of Aryan paganism.¹¹ But in Impeachment of Man, she offers a Nietzschean critique of Hinduism and Buddhism as pessimistic and life-denying.¹² Yet in Gold in the Furnace, Defiance, and Pilgrimage, we find her meditating on the teachings of the Bhagavad-Gita and praying to the Hindu deities Shiva and Kali.¹³

⁴ Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1959), ch. 3, "Joyous Wisdom."

⁵ Savitri Devi, Defiance (Calcutta: A.K. Mukherji, 1950), 345-46.

⁶ Savitri Devi, The Lightning and the Sun (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), ch. 11, "Too Late and Too Early."

⁷ On the visit to the Godafoss see Defiance, 495-97; on the worship of the Midnight Sun, see Defiance, 86.

⁸ Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), ch. 9, "The Rocks of the Sun," esp. 348-54.

⁹ Pilgrimage, 33, 52. Cf. Savitri's account of her return to India in 1957 in Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess, or the true story of a "most objectionable Nazi" and . . . half-a-dozen cats (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, n.d.), 135.

¹⁰ Savitri Devi, Gold in the Furnace (Calcutta: A.K. Mukherji, 1952), 312.

¹¹ Savitri Devi, A Warning to the Hindus (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939), ch. 3, "The Human Value of Hinduism: Indian Paganism, the Last Living Expression of Aryan Beauty."

¹² Impeachment of Man, ch. 2, "Pessimistic Pantheism."

¹³ For Savitri's meditations on the Bhagavad-Gita see Defiance, ch. 12, "The Way of Absolute Detachment"; Pilgrimage, 189, 199; for her prayers to Kali, see Gold in the

Savitri also speaks of a universal or international religion in several of her books. In Pilgrimage, Savitri addresses prayers to an unnamed supreme deity, “the One,” the “Lord of the Invisible Forces.”¹⁴ In Gold in the Furnace, she claims that the only rational international religion is the “Religion of Life,” i.e., “the spontaneous worship of warmth and light—of the life-energy,” the “supreme worship of the Godhead in Life.” She claims, furthermore, that, “nowhere can divinity be collectively experienced better than in the consciousness of race and soil.”¹⁵

Finally, Savitri speaks of National Socialism as a religion. In Gold in the Furnace, Savitri describes National Socialism as the form that “the everlasting religion of Life” takes on in the present Dark Age.¹⁶ She also claims that Adolf Hitler is a divine being and expresses the hope that someday he will be worshipped as such.¹⁷ In The Lightning and the Sun, Savitri uses the framework of Hinduism to cast National Socialism as a new religion. She plays Saint Paul to Hitler’s Jesus. Like Paul, who transformed Jesus from a prophet and/or failed political revolutionary into an incarnation of God himself, Savitri proclaims Hitler to be the ninth avatar of the god Vishnu, who entered into time in the present Dark Age (Kali Yuga) to combat decadence and usher in a new Golden Age (Satya Yuga, or Age of Truth). Hitler failed because he came too soon. He was, moreover, conscious that he would fail. But he fought anyway, in the spirit of the Bhagavad-Gita, because it was his duty. Although Hitler was not the chosen one, he blazed the way for the last avatar, Kalki, who will not fail.

Savitri’s religious vision may be completely consistent, but she nowhere offers a synoptic overview, so its consistency is hard to grasp. Therefore, Zündel sent an agent with a tape recorder to get the oracle to clarify herself. Ten hours of interviews were recorded.¹⁸

Zündel was, however, deeply disappointed with the results, which he described as “stream-of-consciousness” ramblings. He suggested that Savitri, unlike Cayce and Hitler, could not control her ability to channel. He also speculated that Savitri’s occasional repetitions and Furnace, 110, 252, 258; Defiance, 390; Pilgrimage, 197; for her prayers to Shiva, see Defiance, 457-9 and Pilgrimage, 197.

¹⁴ Pilgrimage, 74, 93, 196-97.

¹⁵ Gold in the Furnace, 312-13.

¹⁶ Gold in the Furnace, 414.

¹⁷ Gold in the Furnace, 321, 340.

¹⁸ The completed tapes narrowly escaped oblivion. Zündel repeatedly impressed upon the interviewer that he was to keep the finished tapes on his person at all times.

constant digressions were signs of the onset of senility. But in spite of his disappointment, Zündel recognized that the interviews had documentary value and marketed them as a set of five two-hour tapes.

Zündel's reaction makes perfect sense given his aims for the interviews. But in fairness to Savitri, she may have thought that she had given adequate account of her religious beliefs in her books, and she evidently had other aims in mind. Savitri was, furthermore, a brilliant and tireless talker, and the interviewer was obviously intimidated by her. He lost control of the proceedings almost from the beginning.

I am assuming that the five tapes present the interviews in chronological order. The interviewer asks no questions after the first tape and his voice is seldom heard. The first tape is the most rambling and disjointed of the five, covering such topics as Hinduism, Christianity, cruelty to animals, some virtues of the Aztecs, human and animal sacrifices, the cosmic significance of Adolf Hitler, the evil of Mother Teresa, and various events in Savitri's life. When the interviewer does not ask questions, Savitri simply moves from topic to topic by free association. Although religion is mentioned frequently, nothing Savitri or the interviewer says indicates that she was asked to give an overview of her religious thinking.

The subsequent tapes have a very different tone. Savitri seems to have decided that, since the interviewer was not guiding her according to his (or Zündel's) agenda, she would impose her own. Savitri evidently decided to use the interviews as an opportunity to tell the story of her life, probably to provide material for future biographers. All of tape two is devoted to a narrative of her life from her birth on 30 September 1905 until her arrest in Cologne on 20 February 1949 for distributing Nazi propaganda. Tape three continues the narrative until her trial and conviction in Düsseldorf on 5 April 1949. The rest of the tape is devoted to her memories of George Lincoln Rockwell, Colin Jordan, John Tyndall, Françoise Dior, Matt Koehl, and the Cotswolds Camp of 4-7 August 1962, where the World Union of National Socialists was formed. Savitri allows herself a number of digressions but never loses the thread of her narrative. Tape four begins with more recollections of National Socialist comrades, but the bulk is devoted to lengthy discourses on Christianity and Hinduism and a brief discussion of Judaism. The first side of tape five is somewhat disorganized, but deals mostly with the philosophy of history and life in the present Dark Age. Side two underscores Savitri's biographical aims. She retells the story of her life up to 1978, filling in some, but alas not all, of the gaps in her earlier narrative. She then concludes with a reading of her poem

“1953,” the opening words of which are “And Time Rolls On.”¹⁹

When I first heard these interviews, I recognized immediately that they should be published as a book. Savitri's autobiographical narrative is far from perfect. She spends a good deal of time retelling stories she already told at great length in Defiance and Gold in the Furnace, while long stretches of her life remain undocumented. Nevertheless, these interviews not only contain much that is unavailable in Savitri's other writings, they constitute an ideal introduction to her life and thought.

There are radical differences between written and spoken discourse. A transcript of a perfectly adequate, even eloquent, interview seldom reads well on the printed page. Thus the spoken word always requires editing to become the written word. What is remarkable about the Savitri Devi interviews, however, is how little editing they required. Savitri was a remarkably eloquent speaker. She could speak at length on complex and difficult topics without reference to notes. She could digress at length from the main line of her argument, then pick up where she left off. She had a prodigious memory from which she could pull obscure names and dates and remarkably accurate quotes with ease. Yes, she occasionally repeats herself, but she repeats herself in her books as well. Yes, she sometimes loses the thread of her argument. Yes, she occasionally gets a name or date wrong. But in ten hours of extemporaneous speaking, it is not remarkable how many mistakes she makes, but how few.

By far the greatest labor was the transcription of the original tapes. Savitri is sometimes very hard to understand: she speaks rapidly and with the odd accent one would expect of a woman fluent in eight languages²⁰ and familiar with some twenty others. She is usually too far from or too close to the microphone. She is frequently drowned out by the street din of New Delhi. Sometimes it is possible to transcribe particular words only because English is my native tongue and I can recognize them even in garbled form. Unfortunately, Savitri uses many unfamiliar names picked up in her world travels and her reading of world history. She also throws in phrases in French, German, Greek, Sanskrit, and Bengali. The French and German phrases were usually recognizable, but the other languages caused great difficulty.

Thus I had to check, and frequently correct, my conjectural transcriptions using a number of sources. In some cases, I could check my transcriptions against Savitri's published writings and her unpublished correspondence. I also made use of internet search engines. Sometimes I used contextual information furnished by Savitri to find the word or phrase in question. Other times I simply resorted to typing in different possible transcriptions until I stumbled upon the correct one. When the internet was exhausted, I resorted to contacting specialist scholars. And as my last resort, I browsed through the indexes of books in several college libraries. Where my transcription remains conjectural, I have indicated this with a footnote. I found it impossible to transcribe three phrases in Greek, one in Bengali, one in an unknown Indian tongue, and one in French. Fortunately, Savitri provided English translations for all of them, so I did not need to include the foreign phrases. Perhaps sharper ears can fill these lacunae for future printings.

¹⁹ The poem is the last of sixteen in an unpublished volume entitled For-Ever and Ever, written in 1952-53.

²⁰ English, French, Greek, Italian, German, Icelandic, Hindi, and Bengali.

Once I was satisfied with the accuracy of the transcripts, I had to transform them into the book before you. To this end, I made the following editorial interventions, in order of increasing invasiveness. First, I corrected all errors of grammar and diction. Second, when Savitri edits or corrects her own speech, I follow her lead and present only the corrected statement. Third, out of considerations of clarity, I completed some sentence fragments where the missing words are clear from the context. Other fragments I left standing to preserve the occasionally telegraphic style of Savitri's speech. Fourth, I occasionally divided an impossibly tangled sentence into two or three more readable sentences. Fifth, occasionally words are cut off at the beginnings and the ends of the tapes. Where it is possible to infer the gist of the missing words, I inserted them in square brackets to preserve continuity. Sixth, I removed all the words of the interviewer, but to preserve continuity I inserted in two places the gist of his questions in square brackets. Seventh, I deleted needless repetitions. Eighth, Savitri sometimes offers two or three accounts of the same events. Since these repetitions often contain some new information, they cannot simply be deleted. Therefore, I have combined the various accounts of the same events into single accounts. Ninth, I have repositioned texts to form four thematically unified chapters. Where I could not integrate a point into the flow of the text, I placed it in a footnote. I always indicate when the words in the footnotes are Savitri's. My basic editorial principle throughout was to make only the minimum changes necessary for clarity and readability. I did not edit to improve Savitri's style.

In the case of the poem "1953," I transcribed it exactly as recited, then consulted a number of manuscript and typescript versions to determine the line and stanza breaks, punctuation, capitalization, and emphasis. Unfortunately, the manuscripts and typescripts were not entirely consistent in these matters, so I chose to follow the versions that sounded best to me. When reciting the poem, Savitri made several small word changes that I decided to preserve in the final edited version, simply because these changes may have been deliberate on her part, not mere slips of the tongue.

Having reviewed my labors one last time, I am satisfied that nothing extraneous has been added and nothing essential has been deleted.

In my use of punctuation, I have tried throughout to preserve the quality of Savitri's speech: her pauses, her emphases, the little dialogues she narrates. I wish I could have captured other qualities of Savitri's voice: wonder as she recounts her night on the flanks of an erupting volcano; aesthetic pleasure tinged with eroticism when she describes Hindu and Buddhist ceremonies; boiling indignation when she speaks of injustice and cruelty, especially to animals; love and longing when she speaks of her cats; respect and affection when she tells of her husband A.K. Mukherji; similar warmth and respect when she speaks of Sven Hedin, Hertha Ehlert, Marianne Meinecke, Gerda Strasdat, Muriel Gantry, and George Lincoln Rockwell; mischievous glee when she recounts her childhood insolence and naughtiness; girlish naïveté when she shifts suddenly from discussing Hitler's grand strategy to describing the sari she bought to wear to the victory celebrations; hushed, choked tones when she recounts how that sari and many others were later stolen in a Paris train station; and finally the drollness of some of her stories, such as her account of the one time she was slightly drunk or her reflections on whether she would like to be reincarnated as a German ("Suppose my father was an anti-Nazi. It can happen in Germany, you know."). All these nuances remain on the tapes.

When Savitri quotes from a book, I have used quotation marks, but it must be borne in mind that she is quoting from memory, not from the printed page.

With one exception, which is noted, I use a last initial followed by dashes to conceal the names of people who may be alive and who might not wish to be mentioned in these pages.

My editorial notes perform six functions. First, as indicated above, when I found it impossible to smoothly integrate some of Savitri's words into the text, I placed them in notes. Second, where Savitri is obscure, I try to provide clarification. Third, where appropriate, I furnish additional information from or citations to Savitri's other books and unpublished correspondence. Fourth, where Savitri refers to or quotes from books, I try to provide citations. Fifth, where she refers to historical figures, I provide their names, dates, and other relevant information. I deemed some figures in no need of introduction: Hitler and other leading National Socialists, Lenin, Stalin, Churchill, Roosevelt, Gandhi, Oliver Cromwell, Louis XIV, Henry VIII, Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, etc. Even though most people would be hard pressed to provide their dates, it would seem pedantic for me to provide them. Finally, I note gaps and conjectures in my transcription.

I chose the title And Time Rolls On because I wanted the title to be Savitri's creation, not my own, and it was the best candidate in the interview tapes. It is, however, a perfect title, given the centrality of the Indo-European cyclical view of history to Savitri's thought.²¹

Those who wish are welcome to check my labors against the original tapes. The raw, unedited interviews can be purchased as a set of five two-hour tapes for $100 US from Ingrid Rimland, Ed.D., 3152 Parkway, Suite 13, P.M.B. 109, Pigeon Forge, TN 37863, USA. I would be grateful to be informed, in care of the Savitri Devi Archive (www.savitridevi.org), of any errors so that they can be corrected in future printings.

R.G. Fowler
22 October 2002
(The 20th anniversary of Savitri Devi's death)

After nearly three years of delays in publication it gives me great pleasure finally to see this book through the press in time to commemorate Savitri Devi's centennial year.

R.G. Fowler
30 September 2005
(The 100th anniversary of Savitri Devi's birth)

²¹ See The Lightning and the Sun, ch. 1, "The Cyclic View of History."

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I wish to thank all the people who made this book possible: chief among them are Ernst Zündel, for providing a copy of the interview tapes and giving his permission to publish these edited transcripts, and Ryan Schuster, for paying to have them transcribed; Ingrid Rimland for her support and assistance; Joe Pryce, for the arduous but invaluable labor of checking the original transcripts against the tapes; Beryl Cheetham for providing the photograph that appears on the front jacket flap, for pointing out errors in the edited transcripts, and for giving me her correspondence with Savitri and with Muriel Gantry, which proved a treasure trove of useful information; D.A.R. Sokoll and John Morgan for their eagle-eyed editing; M.H. for providing information for the notes and bibliography and pointing out errors in the edited transcripts; M.L. for giving me Savitri's correspondence with O.L. and for pointing out errors in the transcripts; Georg and Magdlen Schrader for providing their correspondence with Savitri, their recollections of her stay with them, and the German translation of "1953"; Colin Jordan for the gift of a copy of Gold in the Furnace that Savitri originally gave to Françoise Dior; William Pierce for supplying materials for the bibliography and notes; Kevin Alfred Strom for Savitri's correspondence with Revilo P. Oliver and information for the bibliography; Christian Bouchet and Alexander Baron for information for the bibliography; Matt Koehl for copies of Savitri's correspondence with him and with George Lincoln Rockwell, another treasure trove of information; Miguel Serrano, Martin Kerr, and S.G.D. for copies of their correspondence with Savitri, which proved extremely useful for identifying a number of proper names; and Terry Cooper, Diana Hughes, Nefertiti Saleh, Mark Weber, and others who wish to remain anonymous for providing information for the notes.

Georg and Magdlen Schrader took Savitri into their home for six weeks in 1982. It was one of her happiest times during her last, sad, nomadic year. In an undated letter to Beryl Cheetham from July or August 1982, Savitri writes, "I have been very happy—in spite of my declining eyesight and stiffening body—among these extraordinarily kind, understanding, and extremely well-informed friends. Many a time I have felt ashamed of my own poor knowledge—especially concerning German medieval and later history—when compared to theirs. Frau Schrader is all the more praiseworthy that during her school days, there was in Germany no teaching of history at all for children or adolescents. She learnt the lot by herself, in well-chosen books (far better than the amount of falsehood that one learns nowadays in schools not only in Germany but everywhere in Europe!). As for Herr Schrader, he is a real scholar, whose talk is for me a delectation." Because of their help to Savitri, and to me, I dedicate this book to them.

R.G. Fowler

Chapter 1

AUTOBIOGRAPHY

1. EARLY RECOLLECTIONS

I was born in France on the 30th of September, 1905. Not of French parents, completely. I was a French citizen automatically because all children born in France are automatically French citizens. But my mother was English. My father was, I would say, a Mediterranean man. His mother was from Lombardy. Now he is Greek by his father, but his father had taken French nationality long ago. So: Greek, Italian, and English.¹

And I was born of already aged parents. My mother was forty, my father forty-five or forty-six.² And I don't know if this detail is interesting or not, but it seems I weighed nine hundred grams, not even a kilo, at birth. As a young person, I was always an admirer of ancient Sparta in Greece, and my mother used to tell me, "If you had been born in Sparta you would've been thrown in the chasm at birth." The chasm is a cleft between two mountains, and babies who were not fit to be either warriors or mothers of warriors were just dropped into that at birth, at the order of the Spartan magistrate.³ In antiquity they brought up only the fit ones. And of course I would've been considered as good for nothing. I was nine hundred grams, not even a kilo: into the chasm. But I was born in France, in democratic France, so I was allowed to grow up.

I was the only child, and very early I liked the conversation of grown-up people. I never really liked to play with other children. I found their games silly. I liked discussions. I liked asking questions, queer questions like this one, for instance: "What is fire made of?" or things like that.

I can remember very far back. I can remember my perambulator.

¹ Savitri Devi's given name was Maximiani Julia Portas, also spelled Maximine Portaz. Portas/Portaz is short for Portassi. Savitri's mother was born Julia Nash. Her father's name was Maxim Portassi/Portas/Portaz.

² According to Savitri's letter to H.J. of 1 October 1980, her father was born on 14 February 1861, thus he was forty-four when she was born.

³ The chasm of Apothetae is on the slopes of Mount Taygetos. See Plutarch's Lycurgus in his Lives.

My mother told me that she sold it when I was two. I remember it very well, very well. I remember being sick of peaches. Sick in my perambulator. I remember the bed cloth, white and blue with tassels. I used to pull the tassels and say, "You come, you come, you come," and throw them away. And I remember once we were in the park, and I put my hand outside my perambulator, and it was all wet. I said, "Mummy, what's that?" I only spoke English because my mother was English. She was Cornish. So I put my hand out, and I said, "What's that?" She said, "That's the dew." Well, that was a new word! Until we came home, I repeated it: "dew, dew, dew, dew." I remember that as though it was yesterday. I was about one and a half. I have a good memory for things. And things that impress me, I remember them always. Always.

Well, for instance, I remember snails. In my neighborhood, you put live snails in vinegar to force them out, to eat them. I said, "The poor snails." I always loved animals. I was always indignant at any kind of action of humans against them. I refused to eat meat. My mother and father didn't eat meat very often. They ate meat on festival days. Sometimes Sundays, and Christmas, Easter, days like that. But I didn't want to even on those days. And for Christmas I had peas in butter, boiled peas in butter. That was my Christmas dinner. And a slice of plum pudding made with butter. She didn't make it with suet, because she knew I wouldn't have eaten it otherwise. I had very strong ideas. And nothing could've made me change.

And one thing that upset me from my childhood when I was five is experiments on animals, circuses, the fur industry, all things where animals are the victims. Experiments on animals, never! I said, "As long as that exists, I'm not going to say a word against things that happen to human beings." And to this day when I hear of things that go on in Africa, in Uganda—Idi Amin Dada is supposed to be a monster, a tyrant, whatever you like—I couldn't care less. As long as they put up with experiments on animals in their laboratories, I'm not going to criticize Idi Amin Dada. He's a Negro. Let him do what he likes. After all, his victims are also Negroes. I couldn't care less. Negroes among Negroes. Let them do it.

They used to give missionary literature to me. The little girl brought up in cannibal surroundings. The mission school comes to the village. And she's indignant at the idea of eating people, people of the enemy tribes. And she ends up by becoming a Christian. I used to tell people openly, "If you call that superior, and if you must admire this little girl, why don't you admire me? I have standards." I didn't say it in those words, of course. I meant, "My standards of behavior are higher than yours. You don't respect animals. I do. So why don't you admire me if I have to admire this little girl?" That was insolent. I was as insolent as possible. I never was afraid of being insolent unless I was severely punished, like in school.

Another thing that I remember that was in 1912 is my first film. My mother wanted to see Quo Vadis. It was playing at the cinema in Lyons. And she wanted to put me in somebody else's house. She wanted to go alone. Nobody wanted me because I was too naughty. So she had to take me with her, and she took me. And I saw Quo Vadis. Of course I didn't understand the intrigues of the film. But I saw marble staircases, Roman ladies draped in pleated material, going up and down with their Roman hairdress, everything beautiful and harmonious. Of course there were the lions in the arena and the blessed Christians. But I admired the lions. I loved them. Great big cats. I didn't find any objection to them eating people. They're great big cats. I thought that if I had been in the arena I would have caressed them. And when I came out I told my mother, "When I grow up I want to be a Roman." She said, "Why do you want to be a Roman?" "Because they are beautiful. You see, mummy, they are beautiful. I like their dress." And now, after so many decades, when I see myself draped in a sari, I find it something like the dream of a child of six realized.

Another thing that struck me in this film was the newsreel. The newsreel was about the sinking of the Titanic. The Titanic sunk I think on the 12th of April, 1912, and I saw the sinking in the newsreel. And somebody told us, the speaker, that there was an English lady who was not allowed to get into the lifeboat because she had a dog, a little dog. They said, "You can come in but not your dog." She said, "I would rather go and be drowned with my dog than come in without it." And I remembered that. And when I came home I said to my mother, "Now look how illogical, look how stupid! The lady might weigh fifty kilos, say the dog, ten kilos. They refused the lady with the dog, sixty kilos. And if a human being comes along weighing ninety-five kilos, they'll take him. Look at the illogical thing! If they want to save many, many people, they should save only the children and let the grown-ups die in the sea. That's their logic. They are against their own logic. I don't like that, mummy. I don't like that." That was one of the things I said when I was six.

I went to school for the first time, on the 1st of October, 1911. I was exactly six. I knew reading and writing already and could multiply, add, subtract, and divide by one figure. My mother taught me that. In the Catholic school I knew that I had to keep my mouth shut according to good Christianity. And in the council school where I went afterwards, I had to keep my mouth shut about the French Revolution, which I hated. I never liked the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the idea of equality. I didn't like it. I found that something beautiful is not the equal of the same kind of thing ugly. I thought that the strong cannot be the equal of the weak, etc. There were some natural values above all.

They had the Déclaration des droits de l'homme on a panel in the corridor, and one day I asked permission to go to the WC (excuse me).⁴ And they said, "All right, you go." I didn't go. I went to the corridor, stood in front of the panel, and did this awful gesture.⁵ It's very rude to do that in French. I did that at it. And the headmistress caught me and said, "Why are you doing that?" I said, "Because that's all lies." "Who told you that, your father?" I said, "No, no, my father is for it. He likes that stuff, but I don't." "Why don't you like it? Why do you think it's lies?" "Well, because equality is a lie." "How do you think equality is a lie?" I said, "Because a beautiful girl is not equal to an ugly girl. An ugly girl is inferior." And I named two girls in my class. I said, "So-and-so, I like so-and-so. She's a good girl, of course, but she's inferior to this one. This one's a beauty." A blonde, blue-eyed, beautiful girl named Aimée Villon. And the headmistress could say nothing. She said, "Well, you'll be punished." I said, "Punish me if you like. I don't mind. I'm not for the French Revolution." "You'd rather be a serf under the kings?" I said, "As a serf under the kings, I'd have something to love. The majesty of the king is something that can dazzle me. But there's no majesty in a republic, in an aggregate of so many hundreds of men who give out decisions. What is there to love in them? What is there to love in them? They are not a person. I can love a person. I can't love an assembly." I said that. They didn't say anything else to me. But I was quite young.

Just before the First World War, I began my weekly visits to the Musée Guimet. It was an Asiatic museum. Or rather, it was the Lyons branch of the big Asiatic museum of Paris. I was playing, making mud pies, in the public garden not far from there. It started raining. "Mother," I said, "it's raining now. We have no umbrellas. Where must we go?" My mother told me, "We must go and take shelter somewhere. We can take shelter in the museum." So we went into the museum, took shelter from the rain.

⁴ WC = water closet, i.e., toilet.

⁵ In Defiance (Calcutta: A.K. Mukherji, 1951), Savitri states that she also stuck out her tongue at a bust representing the French Republic (Defiance, 493).

And my mother asked me, “Would you like to see antiquity or animals?” I said, “I’d rather see antiquity because the animals are stuffed. I don’t like to see stuffed animals. I like to see live ones.” “All right.” The first hall was Assyrian sculptures. There was a mummy there. We saw Egyptian antiquities, Assyrian antiquities, and then we went upstairs. It smelt of sandalwood and incense. And I inhaled it deeply. I liked it. And there were Tibetan pictures, and there were Siamese pictures. I liked the style too. It was a very good place. I was in the Orient at once. Straight into the Orient. I liked it. I saw the Indian room, and I saw the Chinese room, and I saw the Japanese room and everything. And I was very interested.

And I asked, “Mummy, can I come here every Sunday?” And my mother said, “Yes, every Sunday from 2:00 to 5:00 it’s open. You can come here. We’ll be quiet.” Because I used to make enough noise for ten at home. And I went there every Sunday for ten years or nearly. And that was my Asiatic formation. I learnt the history of Asia, the little I knew of it in those days, from the museum. I had a book, The Musée Guimet, covering all the history, mythology, and popular religions of Japan and China—old China, before Mao, of course.⁶ I was very interested. I liked it. Asia never felt foreign to me. I don’t feel foreign here. Any more than I do in Europe.

2. GREEK NATIONALISM

Of course I was brought up in the Christian religion. I was christened. My parents were married in the Anglican Church. I was christened there and went over to the Greek Church in Lyons. I wouldn’t say I was re-christened because there is no re-christening, but I was given the option of joining the Greek Church. Anyhow, I grew up between the English friends of my mother and the increasing Greek community of Lyons, mostly Greeks from Asia Minor, especially from ⁶ I find no record of a book with this title, but Joseph Hackin wrote a number of books associated with the Musée Guimet, including Guide-catalogue du Musées Guimet. Les collections bouddhiques. Inde centrale et Gandhâra, Turkestan, Chine septentrionale, Tibet (Paris: Librairie Nationale d’art et d’histoire, 1923); La sculpture indienne et tibétaine au Musée Guimet (Paris: Librairie Ernest Leroux, 1931); and with Thchang Yi-Tchou, La peinture chinoise et l’art bouddhique Tibetan au Musée Guimet (Paris: Geuthner, 1910). The volume that best fits Savitri’s description is Joseph Hackin, et al., Mythologie asiatique illustrée (Paris: Librairie de France, 1928). In English: Asiatic Mythology, a Detailed Description and Explanation of the Mythologies of All the Great Nations of Asia (New York: Crescent, 1963).

1922 onwards.

I was much more inclined to think myself Greek than anything else. Even England didn't attract me as much as Greece. I didn't like my mother's English friends very much. I found them dull. Their conversation was dull. They always spoke of people who were sick. "So-and-so had an operation, so-and-so is 'poorly.'" It was boring. And then the church, the church: "What did the Cardinal say in his speech?" It was boring.

But I had the Greek colony, and those Greeks were mostly Greeks of Asia Minor. And they had an idea, all the Greeks had that idea. They called it the Megali Idea, the Great Idea. The dream of all Greeks in one state. Those of Greece, of course, those of Thrace, those of the coast of Asia Minor on the Black Sea, those of the coast of Asia Minor on the Aegean Sea. Capitol: Constantinople. The reconstruction of the Byzantine Empire, to the profit of the modern Greeks. That was the dream of everybody. Even when they had a marriage festival or some ceremony, the last toast embodied that idea: "And let us go to Constantinople, children." I grew up with that.

I loved Greece not because of ancient Greece, and I would put stress on that. Of course, I loved ancient Greece. I loved Sparta, especially. But it is not so much ancient Greece as modern Greece of my times and modern Greece of the Independence War, 1821-1830, that attracted me. What I liked in contemporary Greece was this. They replied to those who told them that they should join the First World War on the Allied side to become big, to become great in territory, "We are small, but honorable." "Greece, small and honorable." I liked that expression very much.

And then I liked some episodes of recent Greek history like the Suli episode of 1799. These Greek women of the village of Suli were fighting the Turks. And when they saw the Turks had surrounded the rock on top of which they were, and the men fighting below were practically all killed, their alternative was the Turkish harem or death. They started a dance. They took each other's hands, and they went and danced around on top of the rock. They also sang a song that is popular in Greece today. I could sing it. And each time one neared the cliff, she threw herself below—with her child if she had a child, or with her children if she had more than one. And all two hundred and fifty of them died like that. I found that piece of modern Greek history quite uplifting. And I liked it. I liked to feel myself the compatriot of these women.

3. FOUR WARS

Now I have remembrances of four wars. The Balkan War, 1912-1913: I remember the news we had of it, I remember the part I took in it, how glad I was when the Greeks took Salonika on the 26th of October 1912. It was the name day of Saint Dimitri, who was the patron of the town. And I remember all the kind of things like that, all the facts of the Balkan War. I resented my mother wearing a ribbon on a hat, Bulgarian colors. They were the fashion in France. I said, "Why do you wear Bulgarian colors? Bulgarians are our enemies." And they were in the Balkan War. Anyhow, then the First World War, 1914. And then the one that influenced me the most, the Greco-Turkish War in 1920-22. And then the Second World War.

The First World War, I remember it. I remember the school. I went to a Catholic school. I was sent to a Catholic school. And they would tell us, "Now you must put money into the box in front of the Holy Virgin Mary for her to bless the Allies." I didn't like that. Why should she bless the Allies? She wasn't French. She wasn't English. What had she to do with this war? I told my mother, "Mother, she was from Palestine. Why should she bless the Allies and make them win the war?" I said, "Don't put any money in." "Of course, that's nonsense." "Don't put any money in the box." "All right."

And then I had many answers that didn't quite satisfy me in any way. I was always questioning and always wanting to think for myself. Something happened in 1914. They told us, "The Germans, you see, are real barbarians. They went through Belgium, never asking permission of the Belgian government." I said, "All right, if you don't ask permission and you go through a country without it, then you are a barbarian. Quite right."

But in 1915, the French landed in Salonika in Greece without the permission of the Greek government. And they started not only doing that, but they started deepening the cleft between the Prime Minister Venizelos and the king of Greece, Constantine I, who was the brother-in-law of the German Kaiser.⁷ I said, "Why did they do that? They are barbarians if they did that. If the Germans are barbarians for marching through Belgium, the French must be barbarians for landing in Greece.

⁷ Eleutherios Venizelos (1864-1936), several times elected Prime Minister of Greece, was the chief foe of the Greek Monarchy during his political career. In her letter to H.J. of 1 October 1980, Savitri claimed that Venizelos was a Freemason, a fact that she regarded as quite significant. Constantine I, King of the Hellenes (1868-1923), ruled Greece twice, from 1913-17 and again from 1920-22. His wife, Queen Sophia, lived from 1870-1932.

And the English must be barbarians for blockading the coast of Greece in 1916 for ten months and not allowing anything in. If you don't allow goods to come into Greece, Greece will starve. It only produces olive oil, raisins, tobacco, and that's about all. You can't live on that. So what is this hypocrisy?"

And when the brawl started in early December 1916 between Greeks and French sailors that had landed there, and there was a big row in France—fifty-four of the sailors were killed in the brawl with the Greeks—I was indignant. And then the French and English bombarded Athens in December '16. They call that the "November days" in Greece, because the calendar is thirteen days different.

That put me absolutely against the Allies in the First World War. I took some chalk from the school, and in the evening when nobody could see me, I went behind the newly-built railway station and wrote on the wall, "A bas les Alliés! Vive l'Allemagne!"—"Down with the Allies! Long live Germany!"⁸ I didn't know what Germany was in those days. Germany was just a patch of color on the map. But still I thought Germany would never be so hypocritical as to tell tales to me that some people are barbarians for doing a thing, and the people who do the same thing on the other side are not barbarians. They are fighting for liberty, and they are fighting for all the highest values.

Anyhow, time passed. The First World War came to an end. I was on the German side because of the hypocrisy of the Allies, because of what they told me: "These were barbarians, and these were not. These were fighting for themselves, and these were fighting for democracy." I said, "I don't like that kind of deux poids, deux mesures—two weights and two measures." The war came to an end, and I remember something awful, the screams of the crowd in the streets: "L'Allemagne paiera! L'Allemagne paiera!" "Germany will pay! Germany must pay!" Poor Germany, she was crushed completely, Austria too, and still they were screaming against her, "She must pay! She must pay! She must pay!" I hated that kind of insistence on the enemy's defeat. It was not chivalrous. It hurt my feeling of chivalrousness.

Another thing that shocked me very much after the First World War was the fact that they sent to Germany all the dark troops of Senegal. The occupiers of Germany were not French. They were Senegalese. And I knew there was a resistance, and I was admiring the resistance. I didn't know much about it. But I knew what was told in the papers.

⁸ According to Savitri's letter to H.J. of 1 October 1980, the station was the Gare des Brotteaux and the slogan was written in meter-high letters.

And always this idea of humiliating the country that had been defeated. Well, it should just have been finished. Do like the Ancients did. I used to compare the Allies and the Germans to the heroes of the Trojan War. I knew of the Trojan War, of course. I felt as though it was a contemporary war although it was 3,200 years before our times. After the battles, the heroes would mix together. They did not have any grudge against each other. I would've liked the Allies to show that kind of spirit. But they were anything but chivalrous.

4. EDUCATION

Now I passed my first examination in my life in 1917 and the second and third ones in 1921. In 1922 and '23 I had more examinations. I landed in Greece for the first time on the 9th of August 1923 and left Greece on the 5th of December 1923. I entered the university in Lyons, where my parents were living, in January of 1924. I passed my first examination, in psychology, on the 25th of June, 1924. On the 2nd of March, 1925, I passed my second examination in logics,⁹ with Mr. Goblot as a master.¹⁰ I passed my third examination, in ethics and sociology, on June the 25th, 1925. In that examination I questioned the idea of progress and answered just as I would answer today. It was a brilliant examination. I had eighteen out of twenty. Nobody ever gets an eighteen in the university for the arts. You get it in science, of course. In mathematics it's all right. But in arts you never get it. My other exams I passed with fourteen, fifteen but never eighteen. That was a very good one. I had another examination, in 1928, my last examination in the university to get the M.A. There are four exams for the M.A., license ès lettres.

Then I began work on my doctorate. To have a doctorate—what they call a state doctorate, a doctorate that, if you are a French subject, gives you the right to teach in a French university—you have to write two books, and quite thick ones. In 1928, I went to Greece to prepare my thèse complémentaire, my complimentary thesis. That is to say, I began with the second one, which was the easiest. Well, I wouldn't say the easiest. But the shortest.

I wrote an essay on Theophilos Kaïris¹¹ of three hundred or so ⁹ The French sometimes use the plural "logics" to refer to the whole range of subjects in philosophy.

¹⁰ Edmond Goblot (1858-1935) is still known for his work in logic (in the narrow sense of the term).

¹¹ Maximine Portaz, Essai-critique sur Théophile Kaïris (Lyons: Maximine Portaz, 1935).

pages. Theophilos Kaïris was a Greek who was born in 1784 and died in prison in 1853 for not being in accordance with the Orthodox Church. The real object of my thesis was not the person of Kaïris so much as the mentality of the modern Greek. The modern Greeks condemned Kaïris for repudiating the Orthodox Church, which was the national church. The ancient Greeks condemned Socrates because he did not believe in those gods in which the city believed. "He's an Athenian. He should believe in the gods of Athens. He doesn't? Well, out with him. He must drink poison, hemlock." I said, "It's the same mentality." And to show the similarity of that mentality of modern Greeks and ancient Greeks, making religion purely a national affair, I wrote that thesis.

I traveled extensively in Greece. I went all around Peloponnesus on foot and on horseback, alone. And I came back in November '29, having already finished my second thesis. But it was not printed yet. I had to have the first one. The subject of the first one was: What is simplicity in mathematics? Or in science in general. I started writing on simplicity in science in general, and I thought that in order to write something like that, I had to get a smattering of scientific training, otherwise I couldn't do anything. That subject had been given to me by the university teacher, Mr. Goblot, Edmond Goblot, one of the greatest teachers in France, greatest logicians anyhow. So I came back to France in '29 and went to the science university. And there I took an examination in physics-chemistry in July '30; general chemistry, in November '30; mineralogy, in July '31; and biological chemistry, in July '31. If you like, it is a whole L.Sc., license ès sciences, in physics-chemistry. I got that in '30-'31. And then I sat down to write my greater thesis.

But in the meantime, Mr. Goblot died. Mr. Étienne Souriau¹² was now teaching at the Sorbonne. And he said, "Don't write on simplicité des sciences, simplicity in sciences. It will be much too long. Confine yourself to simplicité mathématique, mathematical simplicity, what is the essence of it, analyze that." And that took me five hundred pages or more. And he told me that I should write part of my thesis on the mathematical theories of Mr. Brunschvicg.¹³ I didn't intend to write about Mr. Brunschvicg at all, but my teacher insisted on it, so I had to do it. It was about mathematics anyhow. It was not about anything else.

¹² Étienne Souriau (1892-1979) was known primarily for his work in aesthetics.

¹³ Léon Brunschvicg (1869-1944) was a Jewish philosopher noted for his scholarly works on Descartes and Pascal. Savitri evidently did not relish discussing his theories, probably because he was a Jew.

My principal thesis was finished in 1934 and printed, along with the other thesis, at my parents' expense.¹⁴ In the meantime I went to India in 1932. The theses were printed in my absence and the proofs sent to me. And then I came back just for the soutenance de thèse.¹⁵ That is to say, to have a discussion about the subject with six professors. There was one professor of mathematics, one professor of Greek, and four professors of logics, different subjects in philosophy, and the soutenance de thèse took place in Lyons on the 1st of April 1935.

5. THE DISCOVERY OF NATIONAL SOCIALISM, 1923-32

And then slowly the Hitler movement took place. I didn't know much about it in those days. I was fourteen in 1920. On the 24th of February, 1920, the party was founded in Munich. All right. Slowly, slowly I started finding out that there was a German patriot fighting for his country, fighting against the Versailles Treaty. That is to say, he was the opponent of these frenzied people whom I had seen in the streets saying, "L'Allemagne paiera! L'Allemagne paiera!"—"Germany must pay! Germany will pay!" I liked him. I liked him as a foreign leader, but that was about all. And then I heard of his aim. His aim was all Germans in one state. I liked that. I liked that for the very reason that found it was my own idea transposed on the German plane.

I had been brought up and had lived with the idea they call in Greek the Megali Idea, the Great Idea of all Greeks, those of Greece who have already been freed, those of the Greeks in Thrace, those of the Greeks on the coast of Asia Minor, on the Aegean coast, the coast of the Black Sea, Constantinople. Well, in those days Constantinople had more than half a million Greeks. It was a Greek town practically. All those would be in one state. The reconstruction of the Byzantine Empire with Constantinople as the capital. I wanted that. And I said to myself, "Well, if there's a German who wants the same for his country, good luck to him. I'm all for it." And especially I didn't like the Allies. I never liked them. I never liked the victors of the First World War. So, so much the better.

And I used to follow whatever I heard of him, and the first great thing I heard of him was the Putsch of the 9th of November, 1923. I was in Athens at that time. I spent the afternoon of the 9th of November on the Acropolis. I remember that. And the next day it was in the papers. The next day I heard of it. And my reaction was: "Pity he didn't succeed. That would've been a fine lesson for these swine." (Excuse me.) And the lady in whose house I said that, a Swiss lady called Mademoiselle Mauron, said to me, "And who, if you please, do you call 'these swine'?" I said, "The Allies, Madame. I don't like them. I wish he had won. Really I wish he had won." Anyhow that passed. Mademoiselle Mauron didn't like me, of course. But I couldn't care less.¹⁶

¹⁴ Maximine Portaz, La simplicité mathématique (Lyons: Maximine Portaz, 1935).

¹⁵ Thesis defense.

Before this had been the Greek-Turkish War, '20-'22, and I knew that those former Allies of the First World War had helped the Turks, or more or less showed indifference, and they had told the Greeks to go on and on and on and conquer Asia Minor. But they never helped them, not even the British. As far as the French were concerned, Mr. Franklin-Bouillon signed a treaty of alliance with the Turks in March 1921 during one of the Greek offensives in Asia Minor.¹⁷ And I said to myself, "They tore up our Treaty of Sèvres, that was just, that gave back at least some Greek territory to Greece. They tore it to pieces, and they started saying, in 1920 already, after the return of King Constantine to Greece, after the Greek elections against Venizelos, they started saying, 'All right, we'll tear the Treaty of Sèvres into pieces.' Why shouldn't that Treaty of Versailles and why shouldn't that Treaty of Saint Germain be torn into pieces to do business also? If they don't respect our Treaty of Sèvres, why should I respect their Treaty of Versailles? Good for Hitler."

I was all on his side because he was against the Treaty of Versailles. I considered the Treaty of Versailles an infamy, especially compared to the Treaty of Sèvres that was not anything bad. It was quite just. The Treaty of Versailles separated people who shouldn't be separated. It put together people who were not to be put together. Czechoslovakia is the Pakistan of Europe. They put together Czechs and Slovaks who hate each other. And some Ruthenians and some Ukrainians and three and a half million Germans who didn't want to be there, who wanted that to be Germany. I can understand that. And I thought, "If he wants all Germans in one state, well I want all Greeks in one state. Good for him." But I did not yet call him my Führer. He was the Führer of the Germans. And I liked the Germans. Although I had never met any.

I met one. The first German I met, I will speak of him. He was one ¹⁶ Cf. Pilgrimage (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958), 105-6.

¹⁷ Henry Franklin-Bouillon (1870-1939) signed his agreement in Ankara with Atatürk on 20 October 1921.

Geißler. I wonder if he's alive still. That was just after the First World War, 1918. For months and months, in 1918, 1919, there were German prisoners in France. And a man called Mr. Lagrillon was the head of the camp near Lyons. They were building the foundations of the hospital. It still exists. It is called the grange blanche.¹⁸ And this Mr. Lagrillon invited my father and my mother and myself to visit the camp one day on Sunday. And when we were in the camp, he said to my father, "Your wife is English, isn't she? And your daughter speaks English? Well, we have a German prisoner who speaks English too. Would you like to meet him?" My mother said, "Yes, of course, I'd like to meet him."

So in came one of the prisoners, a tall man, red hair, red-blond with a very aristocratic bearing and gold-rimmed spectacles, and he presented himself. I don't know if it was Geißler or Geßler or something like that. And my mother spoke to him, and she was a pacifist, my mother. She said, "I am so sorry that our two countries fought for so many years. We should never fight again. There should be peace on earth and blah, blah, blah; blah, blah, blah"—a lot of peace talk.

My father didn't understand English at all. And then my father said to me, "Now would you like to say something? You speak English too." I said, "Yes, why not?" And I said, "I am glad you are the first German I met. Well, do you know, during the First World War I was on your side, not on the side of the Allies, not for any other reason but because they are hypocrites. They say one thing and they do another thing. I don't like that. And I really like you. And I wish, one day, that you'll be the first nation, that you conquer the whole of Europe and be the dominant people in Europe. I wish that. That would give a lesson to these people. The Allies, I don't like them." I repeated it two or three times. And he smiled, and he didn't say a word.

I wonder whether during the Kampfzeit, during the struggle for power of Hitler, he thought of me sometimes, that thirteen-year-old girl who told him, "I wish your country to be the leader of Europe." Anyhow, whether he did or whether he didn't, I don't know. But I would like to know whether he is alive still. He would be now—of course I was thirteen, he might have been twenty, twenty-two—he must be more than eighty now if he's alive, because I'm in my seventy-fourth year.

And I followed the movement of Hitler with great sympathy, as the movement of a foreign leader, working for his country, nothing more. But at the same time, under the influence of the Musée Guimet, I was in touch with all the religions of Asia, and I liked to study them, and I liked them. I liked many of them. I liked Shinto, the national religion of Japan. I liked the idea of hierarchy that you find in the Hindu religion: the idea of all the races in the world represented in India with the Aryan at the top. It's the only religion in the world that tells you that the Aryan is to be at the top of all other races.

¹⁸ White barn.

And that, combined with Bible study, put me against the Jews. My mother sent me to a sort of Sunday school, and I learnt a lot. I had an aunt also, a very pious aunt, an admirer of the Jews as God's own people.¹⁹ And she told me I must read in front of her every Sunday afternoon a chapter of the Old and a chapter of the New Testament. And I did so. And the reading of the Bible just put me against the Jews. I did not learn opposition to the Jews in Mein Kampf. I didn't read it till it was published. It was not published in those days. I learnt opposition to the Jews in the Bible. Nowhere else. In the Old Testament, especially. I told my aunt, "Why should I admire these people who say they are God's chosen? What bad taste to choose these people. I would've had better taste than that. I would have chosen the Greeks or the British or the Germans or something else, or the Indians perhaps, but not these." "Why?" "Well, they have ways of living that I don't like."

For instance, there's a woman named Jael. She's in the fifth chapter of Judges, I think. In the Song of Deborah in Judges, she is called "blessed woman, blessed among all women who live in tents."²⁰ And she's the only one in the Bible called blessed among all women except the Blessed Virgin Mary, mother of Christ. Why is she called blessed among all women? Because after the battle of Mount Tabor, when the Amalekites were fleeing in front of the Jews and the head of the Amalekites, the general Sisera went to her tent in the desert, the tent of Jael, wife of Heber the Canaanite, and told her, "I'm thirsty; give me water." (I know what it means now to be thirsty in the desert. I've crossed the desert. In those days, of course, I didn't know it, but still I knew what it was to be thirsty.) And she said, "All right, come in my tent, and I'll give you water, not only water, I'll give you milk, and you can sleep here." And in he came. She gave him milk. She put him to sleep on something, on a cot, let's say, and while he was asleep—it says in the Bible, I didn't invent it—she took one of those nails by which you fix the tent and hammered it through his head, and then she went out and called the Jews and said, "Come along, come along. I killed your enemy Sisera. Come and see him." And for that act of cowardice, she's called blessed among all women. I didn't like that. I said, "If that's Jewish courage, well thank you very much."

¹⁹ Nora Nash.

²⁰ The story of Jael is in Judges 4, the Song of Deborah in Judges 5.

And I also didn't like the episode of Agag, king of the Amalekites, handed over to Samuel the so-called prophet and cut up alive into pieces on an altar of stone.²¹ Why? Because Samuel, on the part of God, had told Saul the king of the Jews to spare no prisoners. Kill them all, and the women and the babies and the cattle. Kill every one of the Amalekites. And he didn't do it. He kept them as slaves. He kept the animals in order to eat them later on. And he kept Agag. And Samuel said, "Because you didn't listen to the command of God you are no longer king of Israel from this minute. And where is Agag?" "Here he is." "All right." And he cut him to pieces all alive. I found that very nasty for a prophet.

And I didn't like also the episode of David, the very good king, in 2 Samuel 12, verses 30 and following, in which it is said after the conquest of Rabbah, the capital of the Ammonites, he just put a sword into some of the prisoners, had them sawed in two, and others were put alive in brick kilns, thank you very much. And, moreover, these Ammonites were people of the same race as the Jews, more or less. They were the children of Ben Ami, the son of one of Lot's daughters who married her own father, just like the Moabites, the sons of Moab, the son of another daughter of Lot with her own father.²² But they were Semites, and they were very close to the Jews, but they did not worship the Jewish God. That was the only difference. The Ammonites worshipped Milcom, and Moabites worshipped Chemosh. What's the difference? Why should people quarrel over their gods? I didn't understand that at all, and I didn't like the "chosen people." I said, "Why should they be chosen?"

And why should Christianity, that comes from that, be the international religion? We had religions before. We had our own national religions. We were Hellenes. We had the religion of the Romans. We had our Nordic religions in Germany, in Russia, in France with the Celts, the Druids, and all that. I liked those old religions, and I wanted to go back to them.

²¹ 1 Samuel 15.

²² Genesis 19:37-38.

But I said, “To be honest, I like something of the Byzantine church. I like the chanting, and I like the ceremonies. I don’t like the Christian values, but I do like the Orthodox Church. I must see the cradle of Christianity before I do anything.” I had the old Aryan Great Idea. I said, “Why did we change our gods, really? But I’m going to see what Palestine looks like. What does the cradle of this foreign religion look like?” And I went there.

So in Greece in April ’29 I joined a Greek pilgrimage to Palestine third class. It was cheap, and we were to stay forty days in Palestine. We stayed till the end of May. Visited the place thoroughly. I was shocked. I saw these old ladies and some young ones, flat on their bellies, kissing the Holy Land whenever they saw some relic of the days of Christ. And they are all faked, mind you. You know the cloth with Christ’s figure on it?²³ There are thirty-nine of them in the whole world, not one. And I don’t know how many foreskins. There’s one foreskin of little Jesus at the Vatican. I think there are about nineteen or twenty dispersed in all the world. He didn’t have nineteen foreskins. He had one, naturally. Everybody has one, all males. The contortions, the signs of exaltation in front of the slightest thing, and behaving really in what I call a servile manner because it was the Holy Land.

I was also shocked by the foreign atmosphere of the land. I felt myself in quite different surroundings from those of Greece. Of Europe, of course, but even of Greece, which is an Oriental country. In Greece we say, “I’m going to Europe” when we go to Italy. Europe is considered as something different. Whatever was under western Roman domination is Europe. What was influenced by the Byzantine Empire—that is to say, Greece, the Balkans, Russia—that’s not Europe. That’s something else. Well, in fact, if not geographically, at least ideologically, they are right. Greece is not Europe. Nor is Russia. Nor are the Balkans. Whatever was under the Byzantine Empire is not Europe to this day in the Greek speech.

So I looked at that, and I said, “Well, Holy Land? What is the Holy Land? Holy Land for the Greek is Greece. Holy Land for a German is Germany. Why should Palestine be the Holy Land of the Greeks? Why should we call, in Greek schools, the history of the Jews ‘holy history’? What is holy about it?” And it dawned on me that the whole of Europe has been for centuries under the grip, the spiritual grip, of foreign people. We go to the cathedrals, these beautiful cathedrals, and we see the Jewish prophets—Moses and all the others—along with the saints, ²³ Probably the Shroud of Turin.

and the saints are Jews, most of them. Some, of course, are not. But most of them are. All the first ones are. The apostles are. Well, Jesus is supposed to have been one. And why should we bow down to these? Why don't we bow down to our own people? We have philosophers. We don't need the fathers of the church. Well, in fact the fathers of the church put a lot of Aryan philosophy into their Jewish tradition. That's another question. I said, "Goodness me, what an influence of Jewry, what a great grip of Jewry on our race. Why should we be under that grip? Who is going to free us of that grip? Who is going to give us our own self again?"

And it suddenly dawned on me, sometime in April 1929—I don't know if it was the 20th; I hope it was the 20th—and in Palestine of all places, that this foreign German leader who wanted all Germans in one state and wanted the abolition of the treaties of Versailles and Saint Germain, really wanted more than that, much more. And much more meaning: the freedom of Europe, the freedom of the Aryan race, from any kind of Jewish spiritual overlordship. He's the one who's going to free us from that. Well, if he's that, then he's not only the Germans' leader, he's my leader too. Mein Führer. And from that day, I felt, not that I was becoming a National Socialist—I never became one—but that I had always been one, without knowing it. That's what I felt. And I started thinking of going to Germany and joining the movement. It was the movement of liberation.

But then something else came into consideration. I had just taken Greek nationality officially when I was twenty-one. I didn't believe that I should keep French nationality when I was more attached to Greece than I was to France. At the Greek Home Ministry, the Ministry of the Interior as they call it, they said, "Miss Portassi, why are you doing that? You will have no advantage at all in taking Greek nationality because your diplomas are French. You did all your education in France. In France you would have a career. In Greece you'd have none." I said, "I don't care. I shall not be the compatriot of Mr. Franklin-Bouillon who signed the secret—well, more or less secret—treaty with the Turks in 1921, nor with General Sarrail who landed in Salonika without permission of the Greek government in 1915.²⁴ And that's all I want." "What will you live on?" "I'll give lessons." "But anybody does that without diplomas. You have diplomas." I said, "I don't care. I don't care." He said, "When you are old and with no pension, no work, you will regret it.” Well, I am old now, and I’m sorry to say to those who told me the contrary, I do not regret it. I do not regret any act of sincerity.

²⁴ General Maurice Sarrail (1865-1929), commanding French troops from Gallipoli, landed in Salonika on 5 October 1915.

People told me all sorts of things: “You will regret not knowing this. You will regret not knowing that, not trying this or trying that.” I said, “There are so many things I can’t try.” “To be in love, to never fall in love. You’ll regret it one day.” I don’t regret it at all. I regret I couldn’t see Peru. Yes, that I regret. And I regret I never went to Germany during the great days. I couldn’t go.

Anyhow, I thought in those days, “Now if I go to Germany they will say, ‘This woman was a French national at birth. She took Greek nationality when she was twenty-one. What does she want now in Germany? Is she a kind of spy or something like that?’” There would be mistrust. So I thought to myself, “No, I will start working in Greece itself for the old ideology, the old pagan ideology.²⁵ And if I cannot there, I must go somewhere else. But I must only go to Germany when I have something to show, some achievement that I have had elsewhere. I’ll not go to Germany before. Especially not now, during the struggle.” So I kept out of it.

In Greece I met with the opposition of the people who loved the church: “You are going against the religion of our fathers.” I told them, “Dear me, what do you mean by the religion of your fathers? If nobody in your family had ever gone against the religion of his fathers—that is to say, the Olympian gods—you wouldn’t be now a Christian. So why do you blame me?” Anyhow, I found after a year or two that I could do nothing. I went back to France. I took my L.Sc. in chemistry, physics-chemistry. And then I began my doctoral thesis, my first thesis, La simplicité mathématique, what is mathematical simplicity?

6. INDIA, 1932-39

And then, while writing my thesis, I felt I should go somewhere and start something else: a collaboration of something of today with the eternal spirit that Germany represented. And I thought of India. I said, “India, it’s a country of many races. But it’s the only country in the world whose religion proclaims the Aryan race as the most excellent of all and would give the leadership to Aryans only, according to tradition.” I don’t mean to say that in India today the leadership is in the hands of Aryans. Anything but. India was in those days under the ²⁵ In Defiance, Savitri describes her pagan missionary work in Greece (Defiance, 432-3).

British.²⁶

And then I heard that there was an outlook in India, not man-centered, but life-centered. Man was not everything. Animals were respected. I thought so. When I came here, I heard that there were experiments done upon them. I said, "That would be the British rule. When the British went away, it would stop." But it didn't stop. On the contrary, it went on and on. The British infected the minds of Indians with democratic ideas and humanitarian ideas, and now it's not Aryan.

I didn't know a single Indian, but one fine day, after the death of my father in February 1932, I had a part of his inheritance, although a small part, just a quarter.²⁷ My father was not really rich. It was in reality the money of my mother that belonged to my father because she was married, what they call in French, without a contract, that is to say without a money arrangement. The money was mine anyhow.

I went to the British Consulate. I got a permit for India and sailed off to India. I would sail to Colombo²⁸ without knowing where I was going and what I would do there. I just had the money. The British Consul told me, "It will last three months." "Why?" "Because you have to travel first class. You are a European." I said, "All right, those who want to keep up Europe's prestige by traveling first class, they can do so. I shall travel cheap to make my money last," and I went all the way to India fourth class. There were four classes then. I didn't care. No ventilation, smelly. I didn't care as long as I could see the country and see the temples.

In Ceylon was my first experience with Buddhism. I went to a Buddhist temple in Kandi and put an offering in front of the Buddha along with other women. I felt the beating of drums in my body. It was an exotic experience. It was something new. And some of these women were quite fair. "After all," I said, "Buddhism is really an Aryan religion. Originally it was founded by an Aryan. It's something better than Christianity anyhow." And from there, after several days in Ceylon, about a fortnight, I went to Talaimannar and Dhanushkodi, India. Talaimannar is the Ceylon station. Dhanushkodi is the Indian station.

And there I went to the Rameshwaram temple. I went there on a ²⁶ Savitri is not saying that the British were not Aryans, but that they prevented the Aryan castes in India from exercising leadership.

²⁷ According to Savitri's letter to H.J. (1 October 1980), her father died of a stroke on 24 February 1932.

²⁸ In Ceylon/Sri Lanka.

festive day, and I saw in the Rameshwaram temple the festival of Vaishakha Purnima, in the month of May.²⁹ This series of seven elephants, one behind the other, with purple draperies. Beautiful dark young men, like bronze statues, holding them in the darkness. With this queer music—very, very peculiar music I had never heard. And then suddenly the procession all around the sacred tank, following the chariot of Rama and Sita, Rama and Sita being the king and queen of Ayodhya years and millennia ago. They were both Aryans, Rama and Sita. They were Kshatriya Aryans. And they conquered the South. They conquered the South, says the Indian legend, with the help of the monkeys. In reality it means they conquered Dravidian strongholds, Dravidian power. The Dravidians were much more advanced than the Aryans technically speaking. The Aryans conquered them with the help of the aborigines. The aborigines are pictured as monkeys. The king of the monkeys, Hanuman, gave his alliance to Rama. They conquered the South. And they took back Sita. Sita had been taken away by the king of the South, that is to say, Ravana.³⁰

And I saw this crowd all around the sacred tank, under the full moon, with one palm tree in the background, a violet sky, beautiful. And this crowd throwing flowers of jasmine and other flowers on the chariot of Rama and Sita. The crowd of dark people, Dravidians. Dark people honoring the Aryan conqueror, represented white, as well as his wife, in the chariot. Honoring him with praise, with flowers, with a whole ceremony, thousands of years after the conquest.

And I stood against the pillar, and I thought of the song the Germans sung in those days, "Deutschland gehört uns heute, und morgen, die ganze Welt"—"Germany belongs to us today and tomorrow the whole world."³¹ And I thought, "Today the whole world."

²⁹ In Defiance Savitri gives the date of the festival as 17 May 1935 (Defiance, 100). Cf. Savitri's description in A Warning to the Hindus (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939), ch. 3; paperback edition (New Delhi: Promilla Paperbacks, 1993), 59.

³⁰ The story of Rama and Sita is told in the Ramayana.

³¹ The song is "Es zittern die morschen Knochen" ("The Rotten Bones Tremble") a.k.a. "Wir werden weiter marschieren" by Hans Baumann. In addition to a harmless change of word order, Savitri substitutes "gehört" (belongs to) in place of "hört" ("hears"), which gives the song an imperialistic tone:

Wir werden weiter marschieren,
 Wenn alles in Scherben fällt,
 Denn heute da hört uns Deutschland
 Und morgen die ganze Welt.

Here you are: non-Aryans in crowds come and worship as a god an Aryan king of old. That's lovely. I was proud of my race, proud of myself, proud of being a National Socialist. And I said to myself, "One day I'd preach National Socialism to these people. To the élite of them, at least, to the Aryans, and see what happens. They might be our allies." At least their religion is our ally. It is the only religion in the world that is perfectly compatible with National Socialism. I mean to say, of the living religions. I'm not speaking of ancient pagan ones. Of the living religions, it's compatible with our Weltanschauung absolutely.

And I went further north, from temple to temple. I visited quite a lot of Indians. I remained in Pondicherry for one time or two. I gave a lecture in Pondicherry. I don't know how much it was appreciated.

Now in the South I had an experience. In Trichinopoli, I was looking at the town, looking from a distance at the magnificent temple nearby, the temple of Sri Rangam, bursting out of the tropical vegetation. And there was a boy chanting in Sanskrit on the platform. It was the platform of the hill. The temple is on a hill. It's called the golden temple because it's covered in gold.

And I looked the other way, and I saw a kind of box, an enormous building full of windows. Ugly as anything can be. So I asked the people who were there, "What's that thing?" "Oh, that's the Jesuit hospital." I said, "Good, they came to destroy this Sri Rangam temple. It's such a beautiful thing. And to build that. If I can possibly fight this importation of Christianity in India, I shall do it."³²

And I went all over South India with a magnifying glass, figuratively of course, trying to find an organization standing up for the Hindu, that is to say, Aryan tradition. Against all philosophies of equality and all religions of equality. I found none. Anyhow, I went up North, and I reached Bengal, and I stayed in Bengal some time.

And I went back to Europe, but just for a very, very short time, in 1935. Why? Just to do my soutenance de thèse, that is to say, to take

We will march on,
Though everything falls to pieces,
For Germany hears us today,
And tomorrow the whole world.

This alteration of the song appears quite frequently in literature on National Socialism. It would be interesting to determine whether the song was first altered by National Socialists themselves or by anti-Nazi propagandists.

³² Cf. Pilgrimage, 127-28.

my doctoral degree. And a job was waiting for me on my return after I would learn Hindi. The job was in Jallundhar College, not very far from Delhi, to teach the history of England and the history of India. But that was to be in '36.³³ Before that, I had to learn Hindi thoroughly. So I came back from Europe, and I went to Shantiniketan, the open-air university near Bolpur in Bengal, to learn Hindi and to perfect my Bengali.³⁴ I used to speak Bengali and write Bengali already. I started learning Bengali in France. I didn't know a single Bengali or a single Indian, but I had read in French translation a novel of Saratchandra Chatterji, Srikanta,³⁵ and I liked it very much, and I said, "If I have to begin with one Indian language, I'll begin with this one." All right. So I wanted to perfect my Bengali and to learn Hindi. I went to Shantiniketan.

So in Shantiniketan what happened? I knew the great poet Rabindranath Tagore.³⁶ I didn't know that he was surrounded by all sorts of people, some of them former missionaries and some of them Jews. I didn't know that his teacher of German was called Margaret Spiegel, a Berlin Jewess with thirteen languages. Not stupid at all. She had been two years at Gandhi's ashram, telling Gandhi, of course, that there is nothing more opposed to his non-violence than National Socialism, trying to drive him away from all these kinds of things. And the secretary of Rabindranath Tagore, Amiya Chakravarty,³⁷ a Bengali

³³ In the fifth tape, Savitri confuses the chronology a bit by adding, after mentioning the Jallundhar position, "Oh, I went to Mathura. I worked in Mathura for one year, 1936. '37 I went into Jallundhar, and I left. '36 I came to Calcutta. End of '36. I can't remember exactly when it was. I get mixed up in all this."

³⁴ Savitri records her impressions of Shantiniketan in her L'Etang aux lotus [The Lotus Pond] (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1940), ch. 9, "Demeures de paix" ("Abodes of Peace").

³⁵ Saratchandra Chatterji, Srikanta, trans. J.-G. Delamain (Paris: Stock "Le Cabinet Cosmopolite" No. 39, 1930). The novel is available in English translation under the author's full surname (Chatterji is a contraction): Saratchandra Chattopadhyaya, Srikanta, trans. Aruna Chakravarti (New York: Penguin, 1993). Chatterji/Chattopadhyaya lived from 1876-1938. He was a fervent Indian nationalist and poured these sentiments into his novels. Srikanta, however, deals more with sexual politics and is an attack on hypocritical social norms, including the caste system.

³⁶ Rabindranath Tagore (1861-1941) was born in Calcutta to a wealthy and powerful Brahmin family. The author of some fifty volumes of poetry, plus novels, short stories, essays, dramas, travelogues, and two autobiographies, he was awarded the 1913 Nobel Prize in Literature. Tagore founded Shantiniketan in 1901.

³⁷ Amiya Chakravarty (1901-1986) was a well-known poet, critic, and translator. He was secretary to Rabindranath Tagore from 1924-1933. He later held Brahmin, thought it good to introduce me to Margaret Spiegel. He thought to himself, “Now this one is a white woman, mem-saheb, and this one too”—he didn’t see any difference between the Jewess and me; she didn’t look Jewish, in fact—“I’m going to bring them together, the two mem-sahebs.” I was introduced.

You can imagine what I was in 1935. I was twenty-nine years old. And I was arrogant. I felt that whatever happens to me in one part of the world, I always have Germany to go to. I have a place to go to. I couldn’t care less. So I talked very frankly. So she at once found out who I was, and I didn’t mind telling her. And she said to me, “I left Germany of my own free will—I wasn’t turned out—because I didn’t want to see the shadow of a Nazi anymore, not the shadow of one. And I come here, in a place of Indian culture, and I meet you, and you are worse than the whole pack rolled in one.”

I said, “Why am I worse than the whole pack rolled in one? That’s a great honor.” She said, “Well, over there they goosestep along the streets and they sing, ‘Deutschland gehört uns heute, und morgen die ganze Welt.’ But they don’t think of the ganze Welt at all. They think only of their blessed Germany.” I said, “That’s natural.” “But you,” she said, “you think of the world. You are not a Nazi because Hitler saved Germany. On the contrary, you like Germany, because it’s Hitler’s country.” I said, “Yes, exactly, exactly.”

So I said, “What do you think I came to do?” “You came to make the élite of India your allies.” I said, “Exactly.” She said, “There you are. You’re worse than the whole pack rolled in one. They never thought of that.” I said, “If I had spoken to the Führer, we would’ve done something like that.” I think it was the best thing to do. Well, in fact, the German Counsel-General of Calcutta in those days, and long before those days, did that.³⁸ She said, “You want to conquer India.” I said, “I want to conquer Aryan India.” There are Indians who are professorships at Boston University’s Smith College and the State University of New York at New Paltz.

³⁸ In Souvenirs et réflexions, Savitri mentions that during his term of service, Dr. Eduard von Selzam (1897-1980), German Counsel-General in Calcutta since 1931, collaborated closely with Savitri’s future husband, A.K. Mukherji in the publication of his periodical The New Mercury (Souvenirs et réflexions, 275). For more on A.K. Mukherji, see §7 below. Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke also names two other German Counsels, Baron Wernher von Ow-Wachendorf and his successor Count von Podewils-Durniz, who may also have collaborated with Mukherji. (See Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, Hitler’s Priestess: Savitri Devi, the Hindu-Aryan Myth, and Neo-Nazism [New York: New York University Press, 1998], 67.)

perfectly White and Aryan, and there are some a little bit darker. They're still Aryan. They're not any darker than southern Europeans and lighter than some southern Europeans.

And then I joined the Hindu Mission. The Hindu Mission in Calcutta was an organization headed by Satyananda Swami in order to bring back to Hinduism Indians who had severed themselves from it and to make the greatest number of Indians possible call themselves Hindus whether they were or not. Because according to Hindu tradition, the aborigines are not considered Hindus nor are the untouchables, but the British had introduced democracy into India. One man, one vote. And they were all voting.

And they introduced the Communal Award, voting by religion. Bengal having 55% Mohammedans, the Bengal assembly had to have 55% representative Mohammedans. So you could only change that by making a few Mohammedans convert to Hinduism. And that's what the Hindu Mission did, in spite of the tradition that doesn't want any form of Hindu converted to Islam or Christianity or anything else to come back into his caste. Even today, I think, in the South you cannot come back to it. The Hindu Mission took them back into their castes. Only for that.

I worked for the Hindu Mission for years and had to travel all over Bengal, Bihar, and Assam, lecturing in Bengali mostly in Bengal and Assam, lecturing in Hindi in Bihar.³⁹ I was allowed to sprinkle my lectures with other things, especially with quotations from Mein Kampf, as much as I liked. And when I had met the head of the Hindu Mission, the founder, Satyananda Swami, I told him, "Look here, I'm a European pagan. I'm a disciple of Hitler. Can I talk my own talk in my lectures?" He wanted to employ me as a lecturer. He said, "You can say whatever you like. I consider your Hitler as an incarnation of the gods, at least of the god Vishnu, who is the god that keeps the world in place against destruction, against decadence. I honor him. You can talk about him as much as you like. Only you must talk about him from the Indian point of view. You must interest the Indians in him." I said, "All right." And I did that.

In my speeches in the name of the Hindu Mission, I used to quote Mein Kampf. I used to quote The Myth of the Twentieth Century by Alfred Rosenberg. I used to quote quite a number of things. And I used to tell them that there was a movement in Europe in favor of the original Aryan values, just as there are in India people who stick up for the Aryan values. And I was quite pleased. I remained in the service of the Hindu Mission all these years. Of course staying in Calcutta now and then and mostly traveling in Bengal, Bihar and Assam. I learnt a lot of knowledge through these travels, a lot about the people of India and the different castes.⁴⁰

³⁹ In Defiance Savitri describes her lectures as "violent, eloquent speeches" (Defiance, 433).

7. ASIT KRISHNA MUKHERJI⁴¹

In those days I didn't know Mr. Mukherji yet. I was far from suspecting his existence. But I knew a paper called The New Mercury. It was published in Calcutta by A.K. Mukherji. And that paper was the only Hitler paper in India. It was a cultural and somewhat political magazine, but more cultural than anything else. There were articles in it like the history of the swastika, like an article from the Führer himself, recopied, "Nation and Architecture." More of the articles showing the homeland of the Aryans, and this and that. I used to read it with delight.

And the ordinary newspapers were more and more anti-German. That is to say, from the landing of Jews in India in 1933, the money that they gave to the papers made the press, slowly, slowly turn. And from 1937 onwards, it was completely on the other side. There were stories of Nazi atrocities or oppression, tyranny and what not, and the "poor Jews." And people talked of it. And I used to say, "Well, the poor Jews did so many things in the Old Testament that I have no time for them. Their atrocities in the Old Testament are much worse." "Oh that was a thousand years ago, thousands of years ago!" "It doesn't matter to me. It's all the same. Time doesn't count for me."

Anyhow, I used to read this paper with delight. And one day I asked some Greeks whom I knew, "Could I not meet that gentleman who edits this paper?" They said, "Yes, well, he was a neighbor of ours once. We can introduce you." And I was introduced to Mr. Mukherji, on the 9th of January 1938. And when I told him I was in Shantiniketan once, he said, "Oh, you are the person whom I refused to meet in 1935." I said, "You refused to meet me?" He said, "Yes. I didn't know you. Somebody just told me that there was a Greek woman in Shantiniketan who had more or less my ideas. And I said, 'She cannot be. She cannot have my ideas, and in that case, why did she come to that Jewish nest ⁴⁰ For an account of Savitri's travels in India up to the end of 1936, see The Lotus Pond.

⁴¹ Asit Krishna Mukherji (Mukherji is a contraction of Mukhopadhyaya), was born on 13 April 1904 and died in New Delhi on 21 March 1977.

Shantiniketan? Why didn't she go somewhere else? She must really be a Jewess out of the ghetto of Salonika." I said, "Of course I wasn't that." He said, "I know it now. I can see it now. But why did you go to that place, Shantiniketan?" I said, "Because it was cheap. One pound and a half and you were living there with all expenses for six months. And I had not much money. I went there to learn Hindi." "All right, I know it now. I'm very sorry I couldn't get to meet you then." Like that. That was Mukherji.

Anyhow, we had a talk. We had a long talk. One of his first questions was, "What do you think of Dietrich Eckart?"⁴² I was amazed to see an Indian talking of Dietrich Eckart. I said, "Well, I know he died on the 23rd of December, 1923, just after the Putsch. He was a poet. 'Deutschland, erwache,'⁴³ I remember his poem. 'Sturm, Sturm, Sturm. Deutschland, erwache!'" He didn't say anything. In fact, Eckart was much more than that. He was initiated into the Thule-Gesellschaft,⁴⁴ the secret initiatic society that was behind National Socialism. Probably Mukherji knew that. And I didn't know it in those days.

And then we talked of all sorts of things. We talked of history. I was amazed at the quantity of Byzantine history he knew. I said, "Where did you ever come to learn Byzantine history?" He said, "You see, my thesis was on imperial Russia, the connection between imperial Russia and Britain in the nineteenth century, their dealings especially in connection with India and Afghanistan." It was the thesis of his doctorate at the University of London.⁴⁵ "And imperial Russia is the continuation of Byzantium. You cannot understand the history of Russia and the mentality of the Czarist people unless you have a knowledge of Byzantine history. So I learnt about Byzantine history." I said, "Congratulations, you do things thoroughly. I like that." And we became friends. I saw in him a person who really had our ideas, not because he was directly Hitlerian, but he was Hitlerian because he was an orthodox Brahmin. And he saw in our Weltanschauung the Western edition, if you like, of his own philosophy, his philosophy putting the Aryan race above others and the idea of hierarchy of all races under the ⁴² Dietrich Eckart (1868-1923) was a poet, playwright, and journalist as well as an early member of the NSDAP. Hitler dedicated Mein Kampf (1925) to him.

⁴³ "Germany, Awake!"

⁴⁴ On the Thule Society, see Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism: Secret Aryan Cults and their Influence on Nazi Ideology (New York: New York University Press, 1992), 135-52.

⁴⁵ A.K. Mukherji's dissertation was entitled, "A Study of British Diplomacy in Central Asia."

Aryan.

He had just given up The New Mercury. That is to say, The New Mercury was confiscated. He had no copies of it. It was forbidden by the British, according to the change of their policy of 1937. And I said, "What are you doing now?" He said, "Now The New Mercury is suppressed, and I am doing something else. I'm connected with the Japanese." He was, in fact, the right hand of the Japanese Consul-General.⁴⁶ He said, "I'm giving out a new paper, The Eastern Economist, for Japanese interests. Would you like to write in it?"

So I wrote an article on Shinto in it. I wrote an article on the 14th of August, 1281, in it.⁴⁷ It was the day in which the fleet of Kublai Khan attacked Japan—or wanted to attack Japan. It was dispersed by the storm. Like the invincible Armada of 1588 in England. And the Japanese emperor, Meiji, wrote a poem about it: "Up to the end of your capacity, do whatever you can, and then when that is done, and you can do no more, kneel down and thank the Divine Wind of Ise for dispersing the Tartar fleet."

The Divine Wind of Ise is the most sacred temple of Japan. It's at Ise that the government of Japan sends a delegation if they want to do something important. In 1940 or '41, they sent a delegation asking the gods, "Shall we attack the United States?" The gods said, "Yes." So they attacked the United States. In '45, after the Hiroshima bomb, they said, "Are we to surrender and save the country, or are we to die, all of us?" The gods said, "No, don't die. Japan must live." It was a good time to surrender, and they surrendered.

They gave great politeness to the Americans, and when the Americans said, "Democracy is the best thing." They said, "Oh yes, yes, yes." "Your emperor is no god." "All right, he's a man." "And you mustn't teach such nonsense as the Kojiki in the schools." The Kojiki is the history of the gods. "You mustn't teach that in the schools. That's nonsense." "All right, we won't teach it." And this and that, and smiles up to here, and salutations. Until the Americans gave a good peace treaty and went away. And when they were away, the next day they taught the Kojiki in the schools. They said, "Now you're off. We can do what we like now." I wish the Germans had the same attitude. I wish ⁴⁶ According to Goodrick-Clarke, K. Yonezawa and his successor T. Yoshida (Hitler's Priestess, 72).

⁴⁷ See Savitri's essay, "Shinto: La via degli dei," ("Shinto: The Way of the Gods"), Arya 4 (1980). This is an Italian translation by Vittorio de Cecco from the English original, the fate of which is unknown. This essay probably contains the substance of Savitri's essays for The Eastern Economist.

the Germans had the same attitude.

And not only that, but the thing they did—and it's the first thing I'd see if I ever went to Japan—they erected a temple to Tojo, to the prime minister of Japan in the great days, the ally of Adolf Hitler, and to his co-war criminals who were hanged by the Americans the same time as him. They have a temple. And where is the temple? A few footsteps away from Hiroshima, at Gamagore. The children of the schools go to see Hiroshima. They kept a part of it as the Americans left it, and they told the children, "This is American handiwork. This is the destruction of the atom bomb. Now we are going to pay our respects to the great minister Tojo. Now we are going to Tojo's temple. We are going to burn a stick of incense in front of Tojo's picture and the picture of other so-called war criminals," and that's that.

Why doesn't Germany do that? Imagine German school children going to see the ruins of Dresden or the ruins of some other place, left as they were, and told what destruction the Allies had wrought on Germany and then going to a temple, a place where pictures of Adolf Hitler, pictures of Göring, pictures of Himmler and other people would be honored, and getting a speech there and getting some uplifting talk. Imagine that. That will come one day. Not tomorrow.

[Before founding The New Mercury, Mr. Mukherji traveled in Soviet Russia for two years.] Without knowing who he was, and thinking he was just an Indian student, they wanted to make him into an Indian propagandist of Communism. So they caressed him. They were nice to him. He traveled first class, that is to say, soft instead of hard, all through Russia. But he knew Russian. He had learnt Russian from the White Russians in London, and he spoke Russian, and he wrote Russian, and he was a very good Russian scholar.

And he looked at everything. They took him to the Pavlov place, where Pavlov had tortured these poor dogs. He was disgusted. He hated it. They took him to factories. He was not interested. They said, "What would you like to see?" "I'd like to see old churches." Anyhow, they took him to see old churches. They took him to see whatever he liked. And in the end they said, "Would you like to be a Communist agent for us in India?" He said, "Not exactly. You see, I'd rather stay with my family. I don't want to put my nose in politics," and this and that.

He wanted to come back through Central Asia. That the British didn't allow. He had to come back through London. He came back. Landed in India. The Indian Communists opened their arms to him: "Mukherji, you were two years in the Soviet paradise, how lovely!

You're going to write for us now." He said, "Not a bit." "Not a bit?" "I like the Russian people. They are people, some good, some bad, like everybody, but I don't like the régime." "You don't like the régime? Funny." "I don't like it. That's all. I'm not going to write for you."

And then the anti-Communists, Western-style, also took him into their confidence: "Well, Mukherji, that's wonderful. You were two years in Russia and you don't like the Communist people. You don't like Communism. You write for us. We are anti-Communists." He said, "You are not anti-Communists. I put you in the same bag as the Communists. I'm not going to write for you either. You're just the same thing. What is the difference? Personal capitalism, struggle for money, and there is state capitalism. What's the difference? You are not what I want."

And after a month or two out he comes with the only Nazi paper in India, The New Mercury. The Communists took the first edition and came to him: "Mukherji, A.K. Mukherji, is that you? It can't be you, because you spent two years in Russia. You can't write this kind of stuff." He said, "Well, you see, I leave it to you. A.K. Mukherji can be many people. A.K. is a common initial." Anyhow, they found out it was him. They were absolutely against him after that. In fact, he has a sister whose eldest son was a Communist. He never spoke to his sister or to his nephew. To this day he did not want me to go to her house for an interview. The second son is also a Communist.⁴⁸ Anyhow, quite a number of Communists are among the high caste Indians. I don't know why. It's like that.

[Mr. Mukherji] was sent to Europe by his brother. His brother was the head of the family because his father was dead when he was five years old. It was a large family, eight children. Two sisters married. They are both living still. Older than he. There were six brothers in all, six brothers and two sisters. And they belonged to a very old Brahmin family. His brother, Ashoka—I don't know if he's living still; if he is living he must be over eighty—is perfectly, well, you would take him for a European if you see him. And Mr. Mukherji himself—if you see Sophia W—, who is Greek, that is to say, European—he was fairer than her in complexion.⁴⁹ He had dark eyes, and he was a Mediterranean type, but he was fairer than Sophia who was a European. And one brother is a little darker than he. His sister is darker than he. He was one of the fairest. And he felt Aryan.

⁴⁸ The two Communist nephews are the well-known writers Subrata Banerjee and Sumanta Banerjee. According to Subrata Banerjee, Savitri informed him of A.K. Mukherji's death and Banerjee's "younger brother" (whom I am assuming is Sumanta Banerjee) performed the funeral rites at the request, or at least with the acquiescence, of Savitri Devi (Subrata Banerjee, "Note on Ashit Krishna Mukherjee," unpublished ms.).

You know the Brahmins of Bengal are not really Bengalis. Bengal, in the early Middle Ages up to the beginning of the twelfth century, was a Buddhist country. Buddhists have no caste. That is to say, there was a mixture. There was a mixture of aborigines, Dravidians, all sorts of people, but no Brahmins. Then came a dynasty after the Palas called the Sena dynasty. And the second king of that dynasty, Vallaala Sena, wanted to introduce the caste system into Bengal. So he had to import Brahmins. There were none! He imported them from North India.

He imported several families, and those families married only among themselves, because there are very strict rules for marriage in India. You have to marry within your sreni. A sreni is a subdivision of a caste. And outside your gotra. A gotra is a subdivision of a sreni. For instance, a Mukherji is what they call in Bengal a Rari Brahmin. He should marry the daughter of a Rari Brahmin. But not a Mukherji. Somebody outside his gotra. All the Mukherjis are one gotra. He has to marry a Banerjee or a Chatterji or a Gongody. But not one of a different sreni. Not a Laieri, not a Maitra, not what they call the Barendra Brahmins. He has to marry within the Rari Brahmins.

Now how did he marry me? Well, he married me for me not to be interned at the beginning of the war. If he had not married me, I would've been in a concentration camp. All people who were known to be against the British, known to have subversive ideas, were put into camps immediately after the war began. So we married at the outbreak of the war on the 29th of September 1939.⁵⁰ We had a religious ceremony according to Hindu rites as well as a civil ceremony because I had embraced Hinduism long before I met him. The religious ceremony was made by the Brahmin of the Hindu Mission, the priest Girija Kanta Goswami who knew me very well, and he married us in front of the sacred fire as was done in the old Aryan days. It's a beautiful ceremony. We were taking as the witnesses the stars, moon, and sun. Although it was, of course, 10:00 at night. Marriages are done at night in Bengal. I wore a bright purple sari and he was in white with garlands of flowers around our necks.⁵¹

⁴⁹ Sophia W— was one of Savitri's friends in New Delhi.

⁵⁰ This is the date of the civil marriage ceremony.

⁵¹ The date of the religious ceremony was 9 June 1940 (Defiance, 497).

And we married, and we went, he to his house and I to my house. In the end, after several months, we took a flat: four rooms, two for me and two for him. And we had no kind of marital life at all. We were ideological co-fighters, friends, and that's all. We used to meet now and then to discuss things, to read books together, and that was all.

The rules of orthodox Hinduism are very strict concerning marriage. According to the Aryan tradition in India, a Hindu Brahmin is not allowed to marry even a Brahmin of his province if that Brahmin is not of the same sub-caste, sreni, as himself. He is to marry outside his gotra and inside his sreni. If the Rari Brahmin is not allowed to marry even a Barendra Brahmin of Bengal, how can he be allowed to marry someone else outside? He's not allowed to marry a Kashmiri Brahmin. He's not allowed to marry a Madras Brahmin. Even if the Kashmiri Brahmin is perfectly White. And if he marries somebody else, he should not have any children. He should not found a family like that. You don't found a family in India. You enter a family that is already existing, existing for centuries. You continue a family, and you cannot continue a family if you are not of the proper caste.

So we decided not to have any family at all, and not to have any family at all means no intimacy at all. If you don't want a family, you have no business having anything else but Platonic relations with your fellow beings. Ceasing Platonic relations is only when you want a family. We kept up to it. We kept up to it to the very end. Because we believe in that. We believe that the forces that God has given us for the sacred purpose of continuing our families, for giving children of our race to the world, are not meant for a pastime. They are not an entertainment. They are not, as you say, superfluous forces that should be wasted. Either they should be used for the divine purpose or not used at all. So we became friends. We became friends, and we remained friends. It was perfectly all right. I was quite happy, most happy. We had the Führer. Our link between us was the Führer.

8. WORLD WAR II, 1939-45

One of the first things Mr. Mukherji told me was, "You go back to Europe. There will soon be war, and you'll be much more useful over there than you are here. Go back to him who is in reality life and resurrection, the only one there is today, and he is the one man in the world who will appreciate you and understand you." What a damn fool I was. I thought myself useful in India. I was working for the Hindu Mission fighting Christian missionaries, fighting Islamic missionaries, fighting Communism, fighting anything that was against Hindu tradition, Aryan tradition. And I thought I was useful. I was a damn fool. I thought, “Who is going to make quotations out of Mein Kampf if I go away?” As if this was important, making quotations of Mein Kampf in Bengali or in Hindi, in Bihar, in Bengal, in Assam. I had the three provinces under my jurisdiction. I used to travel among these three provinces. Who is going to do that if I go away? I thought that important. I was—I repeat for the third time—I was a damn fool. And I didn’t go to Germany. I said I’d go later on, and I’d show the Führer the few things I’m trying to do in India. I wanted to tell the Führer, “I’m bringing you an alliance of the élite of India.” I wanted to tell him that. If the war had turned out differently, perhaps I could’ve been able to tell him that. I don’t know.

Anyhow, I didn’t go, and the war came, the declaration of war. And one day Mr. Mukherji came to me with a poster: War, W.A.R. He said, “What are you going to do now?” I said, “I would so much like to go to Europe now.” He said, “I’ll try to arrange with the Italian Consul”—he was his best friend—“to send you to Europe—send you first to Italy and then to Germany.”⁵² And we’ll arrange for you to speak in Bengali. We have somebody for Hindi, but you know Bengali even better than Hindi. In Bengali and in modern Greek, you’ll speak on the German radio war propaganda.” I said, “I’d be delighted. Under Goebbels. I’d be delighted. And Goebbels would probably introduce me to the Führer one day or another.” I was delighted.

Of course I’d have to renew my passport. My passport was exhausted. And, for convenience of course, it would be better if I had an Indian passport. And not only for this convenience, but they were interning in those days all the people who were against the British war effort. And Mr. Mukherji told me, “Everybody knows in the secret places”—he was in touch with the secret police himself through some Bengalis who were working for it—“Everybody knows that you are against the British war effort. You are for Hitler. You will be interned automatically. They are interning so many people. The only way not to be interned is to take an Indian name and an Indian nationality. If you like, I’ll give you my name.” And that’s how we married.⁵³

Now we had to do something during the war. We couldn’t really ⁵² The Italian Consul is probably Camillo Giuriati. See Pilgrimage, 11.

⁵³ As explained in §12 below, Savitri’s new passport came too late, and she was unable to return to Europe. It was impossible for her to go to Italy after it entered the war on the German side on 10 June 1940, and it was impossible for her to go to France unless she was a supporter of de Gaulle.

stay like that. We wanted to help Germany. We wanted to help Hitler. It was very difficult to help Adolf Hitler during the war. It was far away. All the Germans were gone. But there were some who were there. And there were the allies of Adolf Hitler, the Japanese, who were on the spot.⁵⁴ And Mr. Mukherji was the right hand of the Japanese Consul in Calcutta. He was very, very friendly with them. He was, in fact, the only foreign advisor, the only non-Japanese, that they ever met in whom the Japanese had full confidence.

They didn't have any confidence in me. Oh, no. I was a White woman. I was nothing. I happened to be his wife, all right, all right. We have no objection to that. Women aren't much in Japan. But at least a woman like me, not a Japanese woman. There are some very celebrated Japanese women in Japanese history. But they had no confidence in me, till 1945. In fact, till 1949, till I proved that I was on their side and on Hitler's side.

For the time being, they just were friendly with him, and he knew that they were going to attack Burma. They were going to come nearer to India, and our dream was they would enter India, go east, and the Germans after the attack on Russia would enter it from the northwest, and then meet in Delhi, and in the Red Fort the Führer would be proclaimed Weltführer.⁵⁵ That was my dream. That was his dream too.

The war rolled on. Burma was the first target. The Japanese were in Burma from 1941. In 1942 they conquered Burma. The Americans and British fought against them.

Now, during the whole war, we brought Americans to our house. We got in touch with Americans. I used to bring them from some club for them and for the British. The club had a name: [The East and West Club].⁵⁶ Its purpose was to help them to] understand Indian ways. To eat with their fingers, curry and other Indian dishes. To know something about astrology, something about yoga, something like that. So I used to go to the club with a nice sari and my big swastika earrings. The swastika is also an Indian symbol. It's an Aryan symbol, in fact a neolithic symbol, for all Aryans of that time period. And the Americans would look at me queerly and say, "Why are you wearing that?" "But that's an Indian religious symbol. My husband's an Indian." "Why doesn't he come to the club?" I said, "Because, you see, he's very orthodox. He won't eat things that are cooked differently from what he's accustomed to eat. He won't eat cakes that have eggs in them and this and that. He doesn't come." "Can we see him?" I said, "Well, what do you want to see him for?" "He must be an interesting man." I said, "Yes, a very interesting man. He does yoga, and he's a very good astrologer." "Oh! A good astrologer! Let's go to see him." Every week I had a jeep or two jeeps full of Americans to our house.

⁵⁴ On the fifth tape, Savitri relates an interesting fact: "He could not go with me to Japan. We were supposed to go to Japan in '42. We couldn't go."

⁵⁵ World leader.

⁵⁶ Defiance, 52.

Now my brother-in-law Ashoka gave us whiskey. I never touched it, of course. I never touched alcohol in my life. I don't like it. I don't like the smell of it. Mr. Mukherji would distribute whiskey to them and talk. I was never present at the talks. At most I would tell them, "You can see my cats." I had a number of cats in my room. I loved all felines, cats and leopards and tigers and lions, whatever you like. They would say, "Oh, so many cats, good, good, good. And are you interested in anything? What are you interested in? Are you interested in the war?" I said, "Not at all. I am interested in antiquity and cats," and in fact I was writing a book on Akhnaton of Egypt in those days—antiquity.⁵⁷

So he talked with them. I was never once present at the talks. But I know the Americans were delighted with his talk. They thought he was the best democrat in the world. They presumed without asking—they never asked him—that he must be anti-Nazi, and they started talking. And when they had eaten and drank, they talked a lot, some of them. The most talkative—funny enough—some of the best ones for giving information, were top-ranked Jewish officers in the American army. I remember one who gave us very good information.

And the information would go to four Indians who used to cross the Burmese frontier every fortnight or so and go straight to Yamagata's headquarters the next morning and give the information to Yamagata, the head of the Japanese in Burma.⁵⁸ And like that quite a number of things happened in Burma that were unexpected. At least three top-secret ⁵⁷ Savitri completed her book Joy of the Sun: The Beautiful Life of Akhnaton, King of Egypt Told to Young People (Calcutta: Thacker, Spink & Co., 1942) on 14 February 1942. In May of 1942 she began writing her major book on Akhnaton, A Son of God: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt (London: Philosophical Publishing House, 1946) (later retitled Son of the Sun). Savitri also published two other works on Akhnaton while in India, a pamphlet entitled Akhnaton's Eternal Message: A Scientific Religion 3,300 Years Old (Calcutta: A.K. Mukherji, 1940), which was completed in Calcutta in December, 1940, and another work, A Perfect Man: Akhnaton, King of Egypt, now apparently lost, which was published after Akhnaton's Eternal Message and before Joy of the Sun.

⁵⁸ Probably Vice-Admiral Yamagata Seigo, d. 1945.

aerodromes were blown to pieces. Some units of the Allies were encircled and had to surrender. Anyhow, Burma was conquered. And the Japanese entered India in Imphal, and when they were in Imphal we thought, “Now they are going up to Delhi.” They didn’t go as far as Delhi.

Anyhow, I’ll always remember Mr. Mukherji coming one day to my room at midnight and telling me, “So and so, American Jew, has just told me that such and such aerodrome was exploded the other day. It was bombed, bombed to pieces.” I said, “Very good.” He said, “Yes, and you told me that I was wrong in calling Göring that ‘Fettsack,’ ‘fat bag’ in front of that Jew. If I had not showed him that kind of disposition, he never would have told me anything about the aerodrome. So I suppose Göring wouldn’t mind to be called, in a joking manner, to an American Jew, ‘fat bag,’ if that’s the result. What do you think?” I said, “I think you are a diplomat.” I said, “And you must be a diplomat. If you cannot use force of arms, you must use force of diplomacy. What can you do in the wartime? We can’t support the Führer directly. We must support him through his allies.” And so that’s what we did.⁵⁹

Anyhow, the war turned out badly. We expected it to turn out well. It turned out badly. We expected Stalingrad to fall, and while the battle of Stalingrad was on, I remember Mr. Mukherji sipping Greek coffee that I had prepared for him in our house, sitting near next to me and telling me, “Look here, you have seen the Khyber pass, the way of conquerors, these great blood red rocks and ochre rocks and white rocks, all sorts of rocks. There’s not a blade of grass. It goes from Afghanistan to India.” “Yes, in 1936 I went through the Khyber pass myself. It’s a beautiful place, a wild place.”⁶⁰ “Imagine then, now, the German army coming right through there. Imagine the echoing of the tanks, and imagine the song:

Wir werden weiter marschieren,
Wenn alles in Scherben fällt,
Denn heute gehört uns Deutschland
Und morgen die ganze Welt.

⁵⁹ In Defiance, Savitri reveals that by 1949 at least, the British were aware of Mukherji’s espionage activities. They asked Savitri specifically if she had ever taken part in Mukherji’s conversations with the Americans. See Defiance, 149-50.

⁶⁰ For Savitri’s experiences in Afghanistan, see The Lotus Pond, ch. 8, “La terre sans maître” (“Land without a Master”).

“That song in the Khyber pass. We are the third wave,” he told me. “The first wave: the first Aryans who came to India—although there were several waves, they were not one—they came from the northwest. And second: the troops of Alexander. And third, this is the third wave.” I said, “Yes, wonderful, wonderful. And they’ll meet with the Japanese, with our allies. They’ll meet in Delhi, and in Delhi there will be a big ceremony at the Red Fort, and our Führer will be their Führer. I’m going to buy a sari to wear on that day.”⁶¹

And I went and bought a beautiful silk sari with a border of silhouette swastikas as big as that, ten centimeters, all around the bottom, and I didn’t wear it yet. I was going to wear it at the Red Fort only for the Führer. But I showed it to my mother-in-law. And my mother-in-law, an orthodox Hindu, knowing more than I do about the right spirit of things, said, “You are not ashamed of yourself, you a disciple of Adolf Hitler, to buy such a thing?” I said, “Why?” She said, “But a sari will drag on your feet. The border will touch your feet. Isn’t it a shame the holy sign, the swastika, will touch your feet? That shouldn’t be done. It’s an insult to the holy sign.” And she was right from the Hindu point of view. You should never have a holy sign on a sari border because the sari border touches one’s feet. It’s not right. So I said, “All right I won’t wear it. I’ll buy something else.” She said, “Buy something else with a different pattern. The swastika, the holy swastika must not touch your feet.” Anyhow, that sari I took back to Europe. It was stolen from me on the 16th of August 1946, with many other saris, in my suitcase, in the Saint-Lazare station in Paris.

In the meantime, things went on. The war went worse and worse, worse and worse. Whatever we did was useless. We felt it was useless. So in October ’44, I had enough of it. I didn’t want to know when the capitulation would come. So I left my cats in the charge of Mr. Mukherji and of the servant we had, a very reliable good servant, and I took the train for the South.⁶² I left Calcutta, and I traveled all through the sacred places and temples and places where I had no risk of meeting anybody. I didn't want to know when the capitulation would come. I saw on my way an awful thing. At this point I was in a train, between I don't remember what place and Tiruchchendur in the South. There was a gentleman in the same compartment, and he was holding a newspaper in English. And I read upside down the headline of the paper, "Berlin is an Inferno." I felt cold. And anyhow, I went to small towns, and I kept to temples, and I kept to the Hindus not concerned with politics. I avoided newspapers, and I didn't know when the capitulation came.

⁶¹ In another telling of this story in the interviews, Savitri mentions that the Red Fort is, “the ancient stronghold of the Moguls in Delhi. The treasures are lost. They are all in Persia. They were taken in 1739 by the Persian king Nadir Shah who looted India, looted Delhi, and took them off; and they are in the Museum of Teheran now. Still the Red Fort is there, and it is beautiful.”

⁶² Savitri did not spend all of her time in the South. She took the manuscript of A Son of God (a.k.a. Son of the Sun) on her journey, and recorded that the book was finished in New Delhi (in the North of India) on 24 January 1945. See Savitri Devi, Son of the Sun: The Life and Philosophy of Akhnaton, King of Egypt, 2nd ed. (San Jose, California: Supreme Grand Lodge of AMORC, 1956), 303.

I knew it three weeks later. I was in a place called Sringeri, on the western coast, or rather on the ghats overlooking the western coast. It's a very celebrated place. It's the birthplace of one of the greatest Indians of all time, Shankara Acharya⁶³ of the eighth century, the one who wiped out Buddhism from India and restored the old Aryan values of Hinduism. Buddhism was casteless, you see. Hinduism is not. And I went in a café there to have a cup of coffee. I was staying at a place for tourists. And in the café there were two men from Hyderabad, two Mohammedans. Mohammedans or not, I don't know. Anyhow, they were speaking Urdu. I don't know Talibu, the language of Sringeri, or any of the languages of the South, in fact, any of the Dravidian languages. But I can understand Urdu, and they were saying, "It's three weeks already since in Europe the fighting is finished." So I knew it was finished, and I felt very cold. I didn't even finish my coffee. I felt very depressed.

And on my way back, in one of the stations of South India, there was no place at any place for tourists. There were no rooms. I was tired. I went and slept in the grass outside the station. And a policeman came. He said, "Old mother, you get up." He gave me a kick to get me up, and I got up, but I was angry. I looked at his number, and I went and reported him. "This man has mishandled me. He gave me a kick and won't allow me to sleep in the grass. I didn't know where to sleep. There was of course a kind of place for women. But with women and children and babies crying and the radio playing on. I couldn't sleep there. I told him."

His chief came and said to me, in front of him, "Is it this man?" I said, "Yes, it is this man." "Shall I dismiss him? He has eight children." I said, "No. Don't dismiss him, not because he has eight children. I couldn't care less how many children he has. But because I cannot be responsible for this catastrophe. Why should I? Why should I bear a grudge? He's just a small man. He's not responsible for anything except for kicking me. Let him kick me. It doesn't matter. I deserve it. I deserve it because I'm on the defeated side. We shouldn't be defeated. And please don't dismiss him at all. There is one I would like to dismiss, Roosevelt." He was dead already. "Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin—these people. I can do nothing against them. Why should I do anything against this poor man?" That's how I answered, and the man was so grateful to me. He said, "I'm so grateful to you. I have a big family depending on me." I said, "All right, all right, all right. You are just one man among millions."

⁶³ Shankara Acharya (late eighth to early ninth century AD) was born at Kalady in Kerala, but he did establish a number of maths or monasteries, the chief of which is at Sringeri.

And I went back to Calcutta in July '45. All the end of '44, all the beginning of '45, till July I was traveling in different parts of India, all alone, trying not to know what was coming, what was happening. So I entered the house, and knocked. Mr. Mukherji opened the door, and the first thing I said in Bengali was, "What is the news?" And he said, "What is the news? Four. Four zones. That's all. Germany cut in four." And we both felt very depressed.

He said to me, "Don't feel so depressed, because it has to go on. Things have to turn. This is the Dark Age. This is the Kali Yuga, the Dark Age, what they call the worst age in the succession of four ages. You can't expect anything better. But after the Kali Yuga, Kalki the redeemer, the one who is to put an end to this succession of ages, Kalki, he must come. He couldn't come until his forerunner came. His forerunner is Adolf Hitler. He couldn't win the war because he was nothing but the forerunner. He wasn't the one. He said so himself." Actually he did. He told that to Hans Grimm, "I'm not the one who is to come. I'm only his forerunner. I'm preparing the most urgent work, that's all. He's still to come."⁶⁴ Mr. Mukherji said, "And you live and see." I said, "I wish I had been in Europe, and I would've died." He said, "Probably you were destined to live. Everybody mustn't die. If everybody in the movement dies, there's no more movement." "All right. All right."

Then what happened? July, August, September, October came. There was the yearly festival, the Durga festival and the Kali festival. Kali is the dark goddess, the dark blue goddess. We call her "Usu Shyama," the dark blue one. She's supposed to represent the strength behind the Shiva entity, that is to say, the destroyer. Destroyer and creator. He's destroyer and creator. But all the gods have a shakti, a female entity next to them, we call the consort of the god. And she is the energetic side. So Kali, dark blue with four arms, two arms holding a sword and a cut-off head, and the two other arms bless them. She is the author of earthquakes, the author of volcanoes—the author of all that's destructive. And at the same time she makes the corn grow. She is the universal mother. There's a great festival for her in October, first the Durga festival, then her festival. I went to both festivals. And she's the avenger.

⁶⁴ Hans Grimm, Warum? Woher? aber Wohin? [Why? Whence? and Whither?] (Lippoldsberg: Klosterhaus Verlag, 1954), 14. For the complete quote, see ch. 4, §2, below.

And I remember myself. I took part in the festival like a frantic person. The women smeared their hands and faces with red and purple on that occasion. I smeared myself too. I did what they did, and I can see myself still in the Kali temple in Calcutta in front of the statue with the drums beating and resounding in me. The Nuremberg trial was on at that time. It must've been in November. It had just begun or it was going to begin.⁶⁵ “Mother, dark blue mother, avenge them, avenge them, avenge them, the martyrs of Nuremberg.” I knew they were going to be killed. “Avenge all those they are going to nullify. A terrible time is coming, but help us to come out of it.” And that idea of the dark blue mother followed me all through my years in Europe. I'll explain that just now.

9. RETURN TO EUROPE, 1945-46

Anyhow, end of '45 I went back to Europe. I gave my cats in the charge of some friend I knew, a very good man who was living at a barracks.⁶⁶ He told me, “I'll distribute them in the kitchens of the barracks. They'll have more than enough to eat and drink.” Two of them, out of the twenty or thirty I had, Mr. Mukherji kept. And I left. Why did I leave? It was heartbreaking for me to leave my cats, and to leave Mr. Mukherji also. But I wanted to see Europe again, and I wanted to take part in whatever resistance there could be. I wanted to show my defiance against the victors at any cost. I'd scribble on the walls. I'd distribute papers. I'd do what I can. But I must go. But I couldn't go to Germany. I could've gone to Germany if I had been one of the followers of de Gaulle, for instance, or something like that. I could've worked with the Allies. But being what I am, I couldn't go.

⁶⁵ The Nuremberg Tribunal began on 20 November 1945. The Kali Puja is celebrated in October or November, on the night of the new moon in the Bengali month of Kartik.

⁶⁶ The name of the barracks is unintelligible.

Directly anyhow. I said, "All right, I'll go to England, and from England I'll go. Or I'll go to France, and from there I'll go. I'll manage."

So I went to England. The first episode after my landing in England I told in my cat book, Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess. It's a story. It's a true story. It's fifteen years of my life in connection with cats. It's called The True Story of a "Most Objectionable Nazi" . . . and Half-a-Dozen Cats. Anyhow, that episode I related in that book.⁶⁷ So I'll let it alone now. The second episode: I saw a streamer across Oxford Street: "Nazi Atrocities, 1½ shillings Entrance." They were showing photographs, so-called photographs, propaganda. I didn't go in, naturally. I wasn't going to spend 1½ shillings for nothing, to see nonsense. And even if it were true, I couldn't care less.

I lived in England. Wherever I went, the radio. I didn't listen to the radio. I never listened to it. I never had a radio or a television set. I don't want one. But when I went to people's houses I had to listen to the radio. I had to hear it, the same old stuff all the time, all the time. And on my way back, on my way home, on the ship already, the "de-Nazification, the re-education of Germany, the re-integration of the German people into the community of Christian nations," and all that. I hated it. If I had not felt that perhaps one day the victors would be in even a worse plight than I saw my comrades in, I would've thrown myself into the sea from the top deck. I couldn't do it. Because I thought to myself, "One day you might see better. You might see the revenge."⁶⁸ And ever since the end of the war, wherever I went, my two main occupations were feeding stray animals, especially cats, and gloating over any nasty thing that happened to any of the victors of 1945.

So I landed in England. And I got disgusted, and after a very short time, in February '46, I said, "I must go to Europe, to France, at least to see my mother again." I didn't know anything about her, just a card, a word now and then. I went to France, only to learn my mother had been in the French resistance.⁶⁹ And that separated us. I loved her deeply, until then. But that separated us forever. That separated us completely. Although, I said to myself, “She has given me my Viking blood. She is a descendant of the Vikings of Jutland, North Denmark.” The first of our family came to England in the tenth century, according to her. They were not even Christians when they first came over. They were worshippers of Odin and Thor. And I have their blood. Why did she go into that nasty organization, the French resistance? Why did she allow herself to take pity on the poor Jews? And that put me against them even more.

⁶⁷ Savitri Devi, Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess: The True Story of a "Most Objectionable Nazi" . . . and Half-a-Dozen Cats (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, n.d.), ch. 7, "The Cat's Teaching." The episode in question is the encounter on a London street with a ginger-colored cat named Sandy. This encounter was very important to Savitri, for she apparently thought Sandy was the reincarnation of her cat Long-Whiskers, and she imagined their encounter was pivotal in the life of Sandy as well. See ch. 8, "Dreary Years" and ch. 9, "Sandy's Choice." It is very difficult to separate fact from fiction in Long-Whiskers, which is surely Savitri's strangest book, but also her best-written one.

⁶⁸ See Long-Whiskers, ch. 6, "Heliadora's Homeward Journey."

It was always the same thing: “The poor Jews.” I said, “I couldn’t care less for the poor Jews.” She said, “Yes, but I do. They are human beings. They are living creatures.” I said, “I don’t care for all living creatures. I only care for the four-legged ones, the four-legged ones and the élite of the two-legged ones. The other two-legged ones, I don’t care for. They are not the élite.” In the works of a great painter, I will take the masterpieces. I don’t care for the small stuff, you see. When you make an anthology of poems or works of art, you take the best and leave the rest. And if God is a great artist, I’ll take the best of what he did. And I’d rather have a small picture, without any pretension, just a little aquarelle, a watercolor picture, done perfectly, than a big fresco with mistakes in it, that is to say, worth nothing. An animal is a small picture, God’s masterpiece on a smaller scale.

I’d rather have that. I’d rather have a perfect police dog—say, an Alsatian—than a man who’s not worth it. It’s much nearer the spirit of selection, of perfection. It’s perfect as a dog. A tiger is perfect as a feline. The best of the Aryans, say, Rudolf Hess.⁷⁰ Rudolf Hess is the ⁶⁹ Savitri’s mother was seventy-five in 1940, so it is unlikely that her role in the resistance went beyond complaining, in private, about the German occupation. According to Terry Cooper, who knew Savitri from 1966 to 1971, Savitri told him that her mother’s resistance activity consisted of a weekly tea party (Terry Cooper interview, 12 April 2002). According to Savitri’s nephew Sumanta Banerjee, “She [Savitri] once told me about her mother, who lived in France, and who, when in her eighties [sic] during the Nazi occupation of France, joined the Resistance movement. By then she had disowned her daughter. I asked Savitri-maami how she would have received her mother. Without batting an eyelid, she said: ‘I would have shot her dead’” (Sumanta Banerjee, “Memories of My Nazi Maami [aunt],” Times of India, 19 April 1999).

⁷⁰ On the first tape, Savitri is asked why the Allies continue to hold Rudolf Hess in solitary confinement: “He must know things that if he came out he would say. They couldn’t keep him from saying them. He must know things. And another thing is the top of the Aryans, to me. Top, absolutely. You have to look at his face, especially when he was young, and you see his career, to see him saying at Nuremberg, “I would follow him, as the greatest son of my country, even if there was a stake awaiting me at the end of the road.” He said that. And Otto Ohlendorf.⁷¹ To somebody I wanted to show my theory, I took the picture of Otto Ohlendorf and a picture of a tiger and said, “Look at this: the top of the feline race, the top of our Aryan race.”

Anyhow, I didn’t stay long, until August ’46. I went back to England. All my luggage was stolen in Paris, on the 16th of August ’46, in the Gare Saint-Lazare. I came back to England thinking the manuscript of my book Impeachment of Man was lost. I had another manuscript of it. It was printed in India fourteen years later because I couldn’t afford to print it before that.⁷² I printed five or six hundred.

In October ’46, I was staying at 104 Grosvenor Road, in a very quiet room. It was a building for nurses, a kind of hostel for nurses. They used to sleep in the daytime. At night they were on duty. So it was perfectly quiet in the daytime and at night. And that’s what I wanted. I liked physical peace. So I was there on the night of the 15th to 16th of October ’46. And I never read the papers. I didn’t want to read them. I didn’t want to see the evolution of the trial at Nuremberg. I hated it. But I couldn’t sleep. I couldn’t. I couldn’t detach my mind from the fact that I knew, without reading the papers—everybody knew it—that the eleven were to be killed on that night.

I was thinking about it. I was thinking about it. And then suddenly, I was not asleep, but I felt exactly as I used to feel after my exercises at Hatha yoga ten years before.⁷³ I was no longer in that room. I don’t know how I went through the walls. I was in Göring’s cell. And I saw rancune, the resentment of the Russians. If he had succeeded, there would be no Communism today. Russia would’ve been finished. Suppose he had succeeded: England and Germany together against Russia. America wouldn’t have had time to come in. It would’ve been finished. The Russians cannot put up with that: the idea that, if that man had succeeded, they would have been finished, and well-deserved.”

⁷¹ Otto Ohlendorf (1907-1951) held a Ph.D. in sociology and was a professor at the University of Berlin. He rose to the rank of SS-Standartenführer and was the commander of Einsatzgruppe D. He was executed as a war criminal. For more on Ohlendorf, see ch. 3, §9 and ch. 4, §7 below and Pilgrimage, 251-58.

⁷² Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1959). Impeachment was begun in Calcutta in July, 1945, shortly after Savitri’s return from her travels around India to avoid news of the Axis defeat. It was finished in Lyons on 29 March, 1946. The Preface was written in Calcutta on 22 June 1959.

⁷³ See ch. 3, §9 below.

Göring just as I see you. He was seated with his hands like this.⁷⁴ And suddenly he did like that. As though he saw me and was rather astonished. I had something in my right hand, a tiny little piece of I don't know what, something I held. And I said to him, "No fear"— "keine Angst." "No fear. I'm not an enemy. I'm one of your people. I wish I could save you all from this ignominy, but unfortunately the heavenly powers gave me permission to save one, and one only, up to my choice, and I chose you because of your kindness to creatures. Because of your solicitude to animals."

Göring had been a hunter in his youth. He had given it up. And he liked animals, that's true. But some hunters do at the same time they're hunters. He had a leopard for a pet. The leopard used to lie at his feet and purr, like a big cat. I knew that. What I knew also was that he contributed with the Führer to the setting up of the Reichsjagdgesetz,⁷⁵ a book thick like that. It is much more than a regulation of hunting. It's a protection of nature. Traps are forbidden. One man hunting by himself is forbidden. It must be two. If an animal is wounded the other one will shoot it. Mustn't kill females. Mustn't, mustn't, mustn't, mustn't. The Führer could not forbid hunting altogether. He did what he could to lessen the effect, and Göring had a part of that.

That I knew before I got into this kind of queer state. I said to him, "Take this," and gave him what I had in my right hand. I said, "Take this, and don't allow these people to kill you as a criminal. You are not one. Anything but. Now I must go. Good-bye. Heil Hitler!" And I vanished. And I didn't see anything of the kind. I fell completely unconscious after that. I saw Göring, and I was unconscious. I gave him whatever I had to give him. I was unconscious.

I woke up. It was 10:00 in the morning. I never wake up at 10:00. I wake up at 6:00. I never sleep like that. I opened my eyes. I said, "What a queer experience I had. Where did I go last night?" Anyhow, I bathed quickly, and I went downstairs. It was a rainy day, drizzly. I never bought a paper as I told you. I wasn't going to buy the paper on the 16th of October, anything but. But I couldn't help seeing the headlines on the papers. There was a newspaper kiosk just opposite. Headlines like that. Eight centimeters high. "Göring found dead in his cell, half past two in the morning. Nobody knows who gave him the ⁷⁴ According to Sven Hedin (1865-1952), diary entry of 6 June 1948, Savitri told him that, "Han satt med huvudet i händerna" ("He [Göring] sat with his head in his hands") (The papers of Sven Hedin, box 41, National Archives of Sweden).

⁷⁵ Reich Hunting Law.

poison. Potassium cyanide.”

I’ll never forget it. And I felt cold all over my body. It seemed to me that I saw the Nataraja, the dancing Shiva, as he is presented in Hindu temples, dancing in the clouds. And I said, “If this has been done through me, use me in greater things still. If it’s me, that’s the best thing I did in my life.” I don’t know what really happened, to this day. I know what experience I had. I know what I felt. I know what I saw. I don’t know anything more. Is it a genuine experience? What is it? I just don’t know. I don’t pretend to know, and I don’t like to speak of what I don’t know.

Less than two years later, on June 6th, 1948, I met Sven Hedin, who is a scholar of Tibetology and has roamed all over Central Asia and seen things in Ladakh and Tibet. I asked him, “What would people in Ladakh or Tibet think of this?” He said, “My dear, they would find that the most natural thing in the world. That is no problem for a Tibetan or for a Ladakhi, for a Buddhist Lama. No problem at all. You went into the astral plane. You gave Göring some astral potassium cyanide, and it materialized in his hand. He took it and died, instead of being hanged.” I said, “I wish I could’ve done it for the eleven.” “Well, you could for one. Be thankful that you could for one.” That’s what Sven Hedin told me. I don’t know any more than that. I never had a psychic experience in my life. That’s the only one.

10. ICELAND, 1946-47

I thought that in going to a place that had been neutral during the war, I would get rid of all this atmosphere. It was an atmosphere of suspicion. It was an atmosphere of hatred for anything that was National Socialism. I thought to myself, “I’ll go to Iceland. Iceland is a far away place. I won’t hear anything of Nazis there.” And on the 8th of November ’46, I sailed to Iceland from Hull. I had no money except twenty-five pounds. The boat cost twenty pounds. I landed in Reykjavik with five pounds after a very, very stormy journey.⁷⁶ The room at the hotel cost five pounds. I could stay one night even without the breakfast.

So I went to the Salvation Army. Where should I go? And I told the Salvation Army that I came to learn Icelandic. “I’m interested in the language, and I’d like to get a job.” And they said, “We have no job, unfortunately for you, not with your doctorate and your L.Sc. and M.A.

⁷⁶ In Gold in the Furnace (Calcutta: A.K. Mukherji, 1952), Savitri describes being on a ship in a storm on the North Sea and makes it clear that she found the experience thrillingly sublime (Gold in the Furnace, 258).

degrees. The only job we have is the job of a maidservant in a farm some miles from Reykjavik, to wash the plates." I said, "Give me that job." They said, "You'll have your afternoons free. You can learn Icelandic in the afternoons." So I worked. So I washed plates for a month on an Icelandic farm. I picked up a little Icelandic, not much of course, and I continued picking it up. I continued learning the grammar and improving it as much as I could. I admired the Nordic type of Iceland. Beautiful people. Beautiful people. And to think that so many of them were on the other side. Against all I stand for. That put me out. But they were beautiful.

And one day I had a call. The Icelandic farmer had a telephone. Iceland is an extremely modern land—very modern. And the phone call came from an Icelander of Reykjavik telling me he had an Austrian wife. He would like me to live in a room he would give me for nothing. The only condition was that I would speak French with his Austrian wife. I said, "All right." I came to his home. The dog of the farm followed me for ten miles all through the snow. I caressed the dog, and he even came to the home of this Icelander. And he had something to eat and went back. I stayed there. I stayed there nearly a year.

I saw the eruption of Mt. Hekla. On the 29th of March '47 it started, and it lasted practically the whole year. I went to see it on the 4th of April, and I spent the night of the 5th of April on the slopes of the erupting volcano. I wanted to spend the first night there, but the people who were with me took my cloak, and I had to go down again too. I couldn't stay the whole night—snowy night too—with no cloak, no overcoat.

The second night I went up by myself, 11:00 at night, after work. I went up to one kilometer from the big crater. There were five small craters and two big ones. And I admired it. Imagine a snowy landscape, a landscape of silver. The full moon over that in a violet sky, and in front of the full moon a pennant of volcanic ash, volcanic smoke, black, as black as can be. And hanging in the sky, beautiful Northern Lights—green and purple, greenish-yellow, moving like that, and purple fringe. It was beautiful.

I was in front of the lava stream. The lava of Mt. Hekla is an acid lava. It contains 60-65% silica. It is thick. It doesn't run like water, like the Vesuvius lava or like the Stromboli lava. It takes time to walk, walks a few meters per day. And the top of it is with a crust as thick as five centimeters, or perhaps more. And when that breaks under the pressure of boulders from inside it makes a queer noise like broken crockery. I was there going up and down, up and down along the stream for the whole night.

And I wanted to go around the stream and go nearer to the crater. But some scientists who were there told me, “Don’t do that, because the two lava streams might merge into one and you’ll be in an island surrounded with lava, and you won’t be able to come out.” So I couldn’t do that.

Suddenly flames came out—two, three places, new tiny little craters. I fled, of course. But all the time what impressed me was the roaring of the volcano, like the original sound in the Hindu tradition. The original sound of creation is “Aum.”⁷⁷ The volcano says every two or three seconds, “AUM! AUM! AUM!” And the earth is trembling under your feet all the time.

Anyhow, I waited. I saw the sunrise over that. It was a beautiful landscape. And I tried to come down. Instead of coming down I got myself lost. And I had in my hand a big slice of lava. I had some small ones too, but I had a big one as well, ten or fifteen kilos. There was a boulder there, that flung itself out of the lava stream in front of me, and it came rushing in front of my face. It was fifteen or ten centimeters in front of my face. If that had hit me I wouldn’t be here to speak. And then it went cold, and when it became cold I took a slice. I took a big piece and carried it about. I thought I would give that to some friends when I got back. But it was heavy, and I was getting exhausted, and at one time I couldn’t find my way back. I absolutely couldn’t find my way back. I started weeping out of desperation. I said, “I crossed the river to come here. Where’s the river?”

Then I found the river. I went down, and I left the big boulder alone. I couldn’t carry it any longer, and then I saw somebody on the bank of the river. I saw two children. I called them. They ran away at my sight. And I saw a man, and I asked him. I said, “The so-and-so farm, the farm from which I had started, where is it?” “It is right here. It’s around the corner. You go down. You turn left. It’s around the corner.”

I got back to the farm, and I looked at myself in the looking glass. When I saw myself in the looking glass, I understood why the children fled. My face was black with volcanic ash and smoke, absolutely black, and my eyes were red with volcanic ash in them, and they were aching, and there were white tears in the black. I looked awful. I quite understood. Anyhow I washed my face, and I sat down and had a nice cup of coffee and had a piece of bread and butter, and the day passed on, and I went back to the place where I was staying a few miles away from the volcano. But that was a unique experience.⁷⁸

⁷⁷ On “Aum,” see the 12 verses of the Mandukya Upanishad.

I love volcanoes. I would like, if I had money and opportunity, to see all the volcanoes of the earth. I'd like to hear Chimborazo and Cotopaxi on the equator.⁷⁹ I'd like to hear their roaring, see their lava streams. I love them. I remember an expression that was familiar to us in school about the Pacific Ocean, "la ceinture de fleur de Pacific"—"the flower belt of the Pacific"—Japan, Alaska, South America, all around, all around. I'd love to see them. But I only saw three in my life.⁸⁰ I don't know if I will live long enough to see another one.

Anyhow, in the summer of that year, I had a few pupils. I lived in Iceland. I got to learn Icelandic. I used to speak fluently. It's a language very akin to German, and when I knew Icelandic and could hear the radio and could hear people speak, I thought it was no better than England. Only the landscape was different. But the mentality of the people was just the same. The same stupid anti-Nazi mentality. Fed on propaganda and fed on reaction to anything that hurts human beings.⁸¹

11. PROPAGANDA MISSIONS IN GERMANY, 1948-49

And then I came back to England from Iceland at the end of '47, and there I had to struggle a long time too. Until it was possible for Mr. Mukherji to send me a little money. He was himself in difficulty at the time. He had no job after the war. His past injured him a lot from the point of view of jobs. In fact, he couldn't send me anything until '48. But I already had a job. I got a job in the dancing company of Ram Gopal as a dresser.⁸² I had to take care of the costumes of the girls and ⁷⁸ Cf. Defiance, 72-73, 203, and 456-57; cf. Gold in the Furnace, 258.

⁷⁹ Chimborazo and Cotopaxi are located in Ecuador. At 20,700 feet (6,310 meters), Chimborazo is the tallest mountain in Ecuador. The peak has the distinction of being the point on the Earth's surface furthest from its center. Chimborazo has not erupted during human history. At 19,374 feet (5,897 meters) Cotopaxi is the second tallest mountain in Ecuador and the tallest active volcano in the world.

⁸⁰ Presumably the aforementioned Vesuvius and Stromboli, which implies that Savitri's travels also included the Bay of Naples and Sicily. Savitri visited Italy at least four times, in 1923, 1926, 1950, and 1953. Although she did not consider herself fluent in Italian, she knew the language well enough to read it and give lectures in it.

⁸¹ Savitri finished her Akhmaton: A Play (London: The Philosophical Publishing House, 1948) in Reykjavik on 16 April 1947. For accounts of her worship of the Midnight Sun and her visit to the Godafoss (Waterfall of the Gods) during her journey to Iceland, see Defiance, 186 and 495-97.

⁸² Ram Gopal (1912-2003) was one of the leaders of the revival of classical Indian dance and one of the most celebrated and widely traveled dancers of the twentieth century. See his Rhythm in the Heavens: The Autobiography of Ram Gopal (London: Secker and Warburg, 1957).

all that. It was not badly paid: five pounds a week in England, ten pounds a week abroad. I was taken to France. I was taken to Norway. I was taken to Sweden. We stayed two and a half months in Sweden, and that took me to June '48.

Of course, I didn't like the surroundings very much, and I don't mean the surroundings in Sweden. I mean the surroundings in the company. The stage manager, Mr. Ben Topf, was a Jew. A Jew who said in the train he would like to see the larders full and the arsenals empty in Germany, naturally. And I hated him for it. And then the impresario was another Jew, Mr. Braunschweig. A fat little man, with tiny little legs, very small bones. He looked like two threads and a fat body on that. He was very ugly. Anyhow, even if he had not been ugly, he was a damned Jew.

In Sweden on the 6th of June, 1948 I met somebody extraordinary. I met Sven Hedin.⁸³ I wanted to meet him. I knew he was one of our people. But they told me, "Sven Hedin meets nobody after '45. He doesn't want to meet anybody. You can try." So I wrote a letter to him, and he said, "Yes, you can come on Sunday. You can come at 2:00." I came there at 2:00, and I told him, "You see, we are going to Germany on the 14th." I had been spending two or three nights, up all night, writing papers.⁸⁴ I had intended to spend all my salary in Sweden buying chocolate, sardines, butter, cigarettes, putting a paper in each box and throwing them from the windows of the Nord Express. We were going to pass through Germany. "And I'd like to know, can we have any hope?"

He said, "Why do you say, 'Can we have any hope?' Do you have no hope?" I said, "Well, I'm doing this just as an act of defiance, but what to do? Those of Nuremberg, they have killed them." Sven Hedin said, "Don't fear. Germany has more such men." I said, "Yes, but when will they appear?" "They'll appear in time." And I said to him, "What about the Führer? Is he dead or alive?" He said, "Whether he's dead or alive, he's eternal. What does it matter to you?" I said, "I'll never see him if he's really not alive." "Well, even if you do see him, what difference would it make? The war is lost anyhow. And his ideas are true anyhow, even with a lost war." I said, "You are right. You are right."

⁸³ On Hedin and Savitri's first propaganda trip through occupied Germany, see Gold in the Furnace, ch. 4, "The Unforgettable Night."

⁸⁴ Savitri supplies a translation of the flyer in Gold in the Furnace: "In the midst of untold hardships and suffering, hold fast to our glorious National Socialist faith, and resist! Defy our persecutors! Defy the people, defy the forces that are working to 'de-Nazify' the German nation and the world at large! Nothing can destroy that which is built in truth. We are the pure gold put to test in the furnace. Let the furnace blaze and roar! Nothing can destroy us. One day we shall rise and triumph again. Hope and wait! Heil Hitler!" (Gold in the Furnace, 49).

And with this sort of talk and with the encouragement he gave me, he said, "You can distribute your papers if you like, all through Germany. If you get into trouble . . ." I said, "I don't care. I don't care if I spend my life in an Allied concentration camp." "In that case, carry on." I felt my wings, my old wings were growing again. He wanted to give me supper, if you please. I never expected it. "It is 7:00 now, you can have supper with me." I said, "At 7:00 I must be at the theater. It's a night show. I have to be there. It's my job." He said, "All right." So I went.

The first person I met in the theater was Ben Topf. He looked at me and said, "Mrs. Mukherji, what happened to you?" I said, "Nothing happened to me." "You look twenty years younger." I said, "Do I?" I said, "I met a great man." "What kind of great man?" I said, "Sven Hedin, the great explorer of Central Asia. The one who found out the real way that Lop Nor and other Central Asian lakes go around and round and round. They follow the same route." He said, "For that you are so pleased to meet that man?" And I said, "Yes I am. I am interested in archeology and explorations. What can you expect?" He didn't believe me, of course. He found it queer. He wouldn't have found it queer for long.

We went through Germany on the night of the 15th. We were in Flensburg, and on the 15th at night we left Flensburg. We had gone, of course, through Denmark. I saw the Baltic Sea in the sunshine in the morning. I said, "It's probably the last time I'll see anything beautiful like this if they put me in a camp. Well, it doesn't matter, doesn't matter a bit." And at Flensburg I started doing what I wanted to do, what I describe, or tried to describe, in Gold in the Furnace.

I stood at the window, in the corridor of the Nord Express. I refused to eat anything. I refused to drink anything as long as we would be on German territory. I knew Germans in those days were starving. I said, "I'd do like them: neither sleep nor eat nor drink." I was standing there, with my leaflets in packets, packets of cigars, packets of cigarettes, packets of this, packets of that. The whole way, along the railway, I could distribute as many as I liked. I saw a young couple pick up a packet of cigarettes. "Cigarettes," they said, "Zigaretten." All right. They picked it up. I thought to myself, "They're going to open it and find my leaflets inside. Good." And it went on like that. All night. All night.

In the night, the middle of the night, at Duisburg—I'll never forget this—I had no more packets to distribute, except one packet of butter I was keeping for Aachen. I put leaflets, as many as I could, in my Icelandic cloak and threw that cloak on the platform. Some railway employee took it. Two railway employees, in fact. They came into the compartment. It was pitch dark. Everybody was sleeping. I was alone in the corridor.

They asked me, "Do you speak German?" I said, "Yes." "You sent us that cloak?" I said, "Yes. It's a good cloak; it's an Icelandic cloak." "Yes," they said, "But there are dangerous papers in there. Do you know about these papers?" I said, "Yes, of course I know. I wrote them." "So you know what you are doing?" I said, "Yes, I know what I'm doing." "And why do you do it in that case?" I said, "I'm doing it because for the last twenty years at least I've been revering Adolf Hitler and loving his people because they are his people."

And I expected them to say, "All right, you're under arrest. Come along." That was my expectation. Instead of that, one of them with tears in his eyes put out his hand to me and said, "Wir danken Ihnen im Namen ganz Deutschlands."⁸⁵ And I felt so moved. It's one of the greatest days or the greatest nights in my life, along with the night on Hekla. It was equal to the night on Hekla. I was so pleased. He said, "But next time don't throw your cloak out where there are many people. Throw it out in the station where nobody's waiting and the train is going on." I did that.

We reached Aachen. There I gave out my last packet, some butter. A man took it and went away on a bicycle. In the distance I saw a house that was no longer a house, nothing but a cellar. In front of the cellar entrance there were two plates and two cats, each one eating from a plate. I said, "Good for you, German people. You are yourselves starving, and still you think about the poor cats." I blessed them.

And then I thought of something else. I thought, "Dear me, five hundred people from Flensburg to Aachen have taken leaflets of mine. They could've had a good salary or some money. They could've had milk for their children for eight days if they had gone to the police and said, 'These things are falling from the windows of the Nord Express.' And I would be arrested. And not one of them did it. Not one of them did it. "Heil dir, meines Führers Volk! I'll come back."

And then we reached England again on the 16th of June. And I managed to come back. But how to come back? How to come back? I had no military permit, and it took six months to have one, and they wouldn't give one to me. England wouldn't give one to me. I tried to get a military permit. I never got one.

⁸⁵ We thank you in the name of all Germany.

So one day I prepared some leaflets, had them printed in England by an Eastern European who was on our side, more or less.⁸⁶ And I came to Paris. And in Paris I telephoned Georgette Soustelle, the wife of Mr. Soustelle,⁸⁷ the right hand of de Gaulle. She had been in school with me.

She was quite astonished, "You are in Europe? I thought you were in India." I said, "Yes, I was in India. I'm in Europe now." "And what do you want?" I said, "I'd like to go to Germany." "What do you want to go to Germany for?" "Just to write a book, a sort of reportage. I'm tired of writing about antiquity. I want to write something else. Can your husband give me a permit? I can't get one from England." She said, "All right. We'll get you a permit, all right. What's wrong with that? What were you doing, by the way, during the war?"

I said, "During the war I was feeding cats in Calcutta. I always did love cats." "All right," she said, "You always were a lover of cats. I know that. So you were feeding cats in Calcutta." I said, "Yes." I said, "What else do you expect me to do? I couldn't do anything. I couldn't do any resistance like you, because first of all I was far away." "Oh, I see, good, good, good." So in two days I had my permit.

The next day, the 11th of September 1948, I was on the train: Saarbrücken and then Germany. And I re-entered Germany via Saarbrücken with this time eleven thousand leaflets and posters to post up. I passed with great luck through the customs in Saarbrücken, but they were hidden in books or hidden in fashion magazines, and I continued this job. I had no money, except my jewelry. I would sell some jewelry, get some money, and continue sleeping preferably in ⁸⁶ This Eastern European sympathizer is Count Geoffrey Potocki de Montalk (1903-1997), poet, printer, and pretender to the throne of Poland. According to Diana Hughes (interviewed 10 and 17 November 2001) and Terry Cooper (interviewed 12 April 2002), Savitri met Potocki in London in late 1945 or in 1946. On Potocki, see Stephanie de Montalk, Unquiet World: The Life of Count Geoffrey Potocki de Montalk (Wellington, New Zealand: Victoria University Press, 2001).

⁸⁷ Jacques Émile Soustelle (1912-1990) was before the Second World War a widely published academic specialist in Mexican and Central American anthropology and history. During the war he worked for de Gaulle, and after the war he had a long and prominent political career. He later became director of the École pratique des hautes Études. Throughout his career, he continued to publish in anthropology. Soustelle's wife Georgette was also an anthropologist.

waiting rooms in the stations in order not to have the expense of hotels.

12. ARREST AND INTERROGATION, 1949⁸⁸

I distributed in all eleven thousand five hundred leaflets or posters.⁸⁹ I put them on the wall. I would've been quite left alone. Nobody would've interfered because I used to do it cleverly, until I met a collaborator. This was in the station of Köln, Cologne, on the 13th of February 1949. I saw a young man, very tall, a former SS man. He just came out of prison. He was a prisoner of war of the French. And he told me his story.

They sent him to the Congo under Negro supervision, after telling the Negroes that they, the whole lot of them, eighteen thousand SS, were all enemies of their race and what not, and they could do what they liked to them. There was not a single Frenchman in the camp, he told me. The head of the camp was a Negro. A French citizen of course, but that's all. And they had a very hard time. It was a lead mine. They had water up to their waist and hardly anything to eat. And forty-eight hundred out of the eighteen thousand saw the coast of Europe again. The others all died. That's what he told me. And that impressed me, of course.

I was writing Gold in the Furnace in those days. I had written three chapters. I gave him the three chapters and translated them to him. I translated part anyhow, and he liked it. And he said, "Where are you going?" I said, "Taking the train to Hamburg. I want to see some people in Hamburg, and then I'm coming back, in a week." All right. He said, "I'll take you to the train."

So he came to the train with me. I gave him a leaflet on the way. I said, "You go to the WC and read that in the WC where nobody can see you, and tell me what you think of it." He read the leaflet, came out again. It was 2:00 in the morning and very cold. He came out and put his two hands on my shoulders and said, "Who wrote that?" I said, "I." "You wrote that? But you are not a German." I said, "No, but I'm an Aryan still. Without being German I'm still an Aryan, and I owe allegiance to Germany as the country that tried to save the race from decay and all the consequences of Judeo-democratic domination." He said, "Give me as many of these leaflets as you like, as many as you can. I'll stick them up for you." They were posters not leaflets, with a great big swastika like that, ten centimeters long, ten centimeters wide. I gave him a good hundred, and out he went.

⁸⁸ Defiance is a much fuller telling of the story recounted here in §§12-14.

⁸⁹ Presumably the five hundred leaflets of the first journey plus the eleven thousand leaflets and posters of the second.

And my train went, and I came back after eight days, as I said. I came back, and he had told me, "When you come back, you go to the Catholic Mission"—there was a Catholic Mission and a Protestant Mission in every station in Germany in those days—"and you ask for the address of Gerhard Waßner. That's my name. I've found a room until then. I'm staying in Köln. So they'll tell you where I live, and you can see me." That's exactly what I did, eight days later. On the 20th of February, the night between the 20th and the 21st. It was about midnight. I went to the Catholic Mission. I said, "Could you give me please the address of Gerhard Waßner?" As soon as I said that, a policeman who was nearby said to me, "May I see your passport?" I said, "Of course." I showed him my passport. He said, "Come along. Leave your things here. Come along. We have something to talk about." I didn't like that idea. I followed him, left my things there. I followed him.

And he told me, "What's the business of the Flugblätter, Plakate und Flugblätter?"—that is to say, posters and flyers, leaflets. So I made myself as innocent looking as I could. And I said, "What are posters and what are leaflets? I don't know what . . ." He said, "They are papers with propaganda." I said, "I don't know anything about this. What is it you mean?" I did not know that Waßner was under arrest already. That I couldn't guess. So he said, "Look here, we are going to show you." And he put one of my posters on the table. He said, "Do you know about that? Has Waßner given you those?" And then I understood him. Then only I understood that Waßner was under arrest. How did they find the poster?

I said, "Yes. But you're making a mistake. Waßner didn't give me any of those. I gave about a hundred to Waßner." I said, "Waßner is completely innocent in this affair. He probably didn't know what he was doing. He took them and put them in his pocket, and I doubt whether he read them or not. I don't know. But I gave him about one hundred." He said, "What did you intend to do?" I said, "I intended him to stick them up. And of course I have no money to pay him, but I have a few pieces of jewelry. I could've given him some of my jewelry." And they said to me, "Who pays you?" I was indignant. I said, "What do you mean who pays me? Nobody pays me. I do this because I love the National Socialist idea."

"You'll find nine boxes that were once full of jewelry, and they're now empty. That jewelry I sold bit by bit in order to pay for my journey into Germany from Saarland six or seven times, in order to stay in Germany, and in order to finance also the printing of my leaflets.” He said, “They were printed in Germany?” I said, “No, they were printed abroad.” “Who printed them and where?” I said, “I can’t tell you that.” He said, “We have methods to make people like you speak.”

And I really thought, when they said that, I really thought they had the authorization to do what they liked with me. And as I had heard many horror stories of how my comrades fared in the hands of the German police after the war, I thought my turn had come. And I really was afraid. I really was afraid. I looked at my hands, and I said, “If they pull out my nails, what will I do?” Anyhow, I prayed. I prayed to the heavenly powers to give me strength, and I felt really that I was getting less afraid, and I had the courage to tell them, “Well, you can do what you like to me, but there’s one thing you cannot do, and that is to kill the idea which I represent. So you can have me. You can do what you like with me.”

I didn’t tell them, “I won’t speak.” I was not at all sure that I wouldn’t say anything under torture. And I thought that was what was awaiting me. But as I said these words—“You can do what you like, but you cannot kill the idea that I represent”—as I was saying these words, something in me told me I had been telling this to different people, under different forms, for the last several thousands of years. And I felt that I, my real I, was above my body. My body was something different from my self. I felt that. It was a queer experience. Anyhow that passed away, and they said to me, “You are under arrest, Madam.” It was half past two in the morning. I said, “I’m so glad to be under arrest. This puts me not quite so far away from my comrades. I’m nearer to them now. I’m very happy.”

And then a man came. I don’t know what he was. But he looked like a Jew. He said, “Now come along. We’ll take you to your cell.” And they took me to a cell, down the stairs, down the stairs. It must’ve been twenty or thirty yards or meters underground. He opened the dark cell and pushed me in. The inside was full of mud. It was black, black, black on my feet. And there was one bed. I couldn’t see what was on the bed. I just banged against it. That’s how I knew it was a bed. I couldn’t see a thing. And they shut the door. And I banged at the door. I said, “This is full of mud. Couldn’t you give me at least something to sit on? I can’t lie down in this, but I can sit at least and not have my legs, my feet all muddy.” He said, “You can take that.” And he gave me a stinking piece of . . . I don’t know what, bedclothes or something. A stinking piece of cloth. I said, “You can keep it for yourself. It stinks.

I don't want it. I'd rather have the mud."

And then a voice came from the darkness and said, "A new one." I said, "Yes, a new one." "Oh, dear, where did they get you?" I said, "At the station." "What have you been doing? Stealing something?" I said, "No, I've been distributing leaflets and putting up posters against the occupation." "Oh," she said, "That is something good. That is something honorable. You won't get out of it very easily. I'll get out of it. I've been stealing the ration card of somebody for my children. I have six children. They'll let me off, but they won't let you off." I said, "It doesn't matter if they don't. I'm here for that. I'm here to testify to my idea, to our idea—I don't know if it is yours also or not." Anyhow she said, "We were all right under Hitler, but I can tell you, now these swine came, and everything is wrong. We have rationing, rationing. We have hardly anything to eat. We have twenty-five grams of fat every month. I mean to say, you are quite right to fight them." I said, "I'm glad to hear it, from you, a German." She said, "Would you like to sleep on my bed?" I said, "No, the bed is too small, and I'm not sleepy at all."

I said, "May I sing? If you're not going to sleep, may I sing?" She said, "You can sing as much as you'd like. I'm not sleepy. I've slept all day." I said, "All right." I started singing every one of the National Socialist songs I knew. With all my enthusiasm. I was very happy in this place. And in the morning, as it dawned—it dawned late of course; it was in February—I saw four feet at the very, very high window as though two people were listening. They listened to a message from underground. I was actually in the physical sense underground as well as in the moral sense. And then they came in. They opened the door. They took out this woman, who was called Hildegard, I don't remember what. And they left me in.

And time was passing, and time was passing. I had had nothing to eat all day and all night. That doesn't matter. When are they going to come? Are they going to leave me here the rest of my life? I was feeling anxious. And about 5:00 in the afternoon—it must've been that late; it was dark, anyhow—they took me in a black car, what they call in English, I think, the Black Mariah, and off we went to some place. And there interrogation started.

One Mr. Hatch asked me questions, and there were Germans. There was an Oberinspektor and some other Germans. They were police. And I wanted to speak German because the Germans were there. He said, "No, no, no. Your trial will be in English. You will be tried by a military tribunal under the laws of occupation, the statute of occupation, and you are to speak English only.” I said, “All right. Ask me questions about my name, career, my life history, and what not.”

And he said to me, “Queer, you have a [British] passport [from India. And you have a French military permit with] a stamp that you are French. And we find in your things a certificate of nationality from the Greek Consulate of Lyons, dated 1928, stating that you are Greek. How is it?” I said, “It’s just nothing. It’s just that I forgot to tell the people that gave me the French military permit that I was of Greek nationality. The French military permit was given to me, and they were kind enough to give me a recommendation to the French authorities, the French and Allied authorities. The recommendation was of Mr. Soustelle himself, the right hand man of Mr. de Gaulle. I forgot to tell him I was of Greek nationality.” I said that in an ironical manner, and they couldn’t help smiling.

The recommendation that the French people gave me was not a French passport. I had a British passport from India, given out in India in 1940. I never could use it because they gave it to me too late. I had to renew my passport anyhow, and I wanted to come to Europe. I wanted to come to Germany in 1940 and give out war propaganda in Greek and in Bengali. But for that I had to renew my passport. I was now Mrs. Mukherji, so I went to the Indian authorities, that is to say, the British authorities, and asked them for a passport for France. Not for Germany, of course, for France. I would’ve gone to Germany very easily from France.

And they said, “All right, we’ll give you one.” And the passport was dated the 30th of April, but they never gave it to me in April. They gave it to me at the end of June when there were no communications left, and one could not leave India unless, of course, one was known as an Allied friend and one was going to join the resistance of Mr. de Gaulle or something like that. Then you had every plane facilities. But everybody knew what I was. Nobody gave me any plane facilities. You understand. And when I went to France, when I got the military permit from Soustelle they put a stamp on my passport, “French born.” I was French born if you like, since every child born in France is French.

Then they asked me a few questions, and one of the questions was, “You certainly have letters.” By the way, while I was in that police room before they told me that I was under arrest, I had a few addresses. I took them out of my bag very slowly on my lap and tore them in bits, and taking them in my hand, as though I was coughing behind a pocket handkerchief, I swallowed them. When they asked me if I had any addresses, I said, “No, I have no addresses.” “You don’t know any National Socialists in Germany? Do you mean to say that you know nobody?"

I said, "I know nobody. In fact I know only two National Socialists in the world." They said, "Two?" I said, "Yes, two." "And who are these? Can you tell us their names?" I said, "Very gladly. One is the Führer, and one is myself. I don't know any others because, you see, when they tell you that they are very good democrats, you have no means of knowing whether they tell the truth or are telling lies. And if they tell me, 'I'm a good National Socialist,' how do I know if it's true or not? But of these two I'm perfectly sure. That's all I can say."

And they said, "You say in your leaflets that he's alive, your Führer. Do you believe it?" Well, in those days I really did. I said, "Yes, I do." And he said, "How did you know it? Did any one of his disciples tell you?" I said, "No, an Indian astrologer told me. And I believe in astrology, because I'm a Mediterranean person, or one half Mediterranean at least, and we are all superstitious on the Mediterranean shore." And that was that.

And then Hatch told me, "You are going to pass the night in my house." I said, "Why? If I were a German you would put me in that dark cell. Why don't you put me in that dark cell as I am? I don't want any special treatment." "Well, you are a British subject. An Indian passport, you are a British subject." I said, "Well, no longer now." But still they said, "You have a British passport dated 1940. The passport is good until 1950. We are in 1949. Therefore, you have to come."⁹⁰

And I went there. I saw a beautiful house, well-furnished, spacious, and a lovely Scotch woman with red hair and two lovely children, and that was Hatch's family. And I said, "Some poor German family has been expelled to make place for them. A German family as beautiful as these people. Some German woman looking exactly like Mrs. Hatch and some German children looking exactly like the little Hatches." I said, "Isn't it a shame that people of the same race looking exactly like each other have such a fight, such a war, and then expel each other from their homes?" I said that to Mrs. Hatch. And she said, "What do you wish? This is war. What can you expect? We can't do otherwise."

Anyhow, she said, "Would you like to have something to eat?" It was about 7:00 at night. I said, "Yes, as long as it's vegetarian." She said, "You are vegetarian for health reasons? Or for other reasons?" I said, "I always was from my childhood. I always had a revulsion at the sight of quarters of meat hanging in front of the butcher's shops. I never took any meat, in fact. I love animals, and I don't approve of killing them for food. We can eat other things." And she said, "You love animals, but you don't mind the thousands of people that your comrades killed?" I said, "Why should I mind? They weren't animals. Animals aren't anti-Nazis." And she was shocked. But I was perfectly sincere. And I would say it again.

⁹⁰ The possession of an unexpired British passport was the legal pretext upon which the British established their jurisdiction to try and hang William Joyce, a.k.a. Lord Haw-Haw (1906-1946) for treason. Savitri's British passport, plus the fact that the British were aware of her husband's espionage activities during the war, could have led her to a similar fate.

You see, in those days, I used to believe in all these atrocity tales. But they didn't shock me. And they didn't shock me—I repeat it—for this very reason: that I thought to myself that as long as people tolerated all these atrocities on animals, there's no reason why any country should not commit atrocities on its own enemies. Enemies are not as lovable as animals. They are not lovable at all, in fact, and animals are. And that was that. And the woman was shocked. Anyhow, she said to me, "What would you like to eat? I have an omelet." I said, "You can give me an omelet if you like, an omelet with perhaps something in it, onions or whatever you have to put in it, but absolutely no meat." All right, she gave me an omelet. I enjoyed it.

And then the interrogation started. Hatch was present again. He brought a typewriter and a typist and the same old interrogation, the same old questions, the same old questions: "What prompted you to be a National Socialist? What made you a National Socialist?" I said, "I always was one. I became conscious of it once long ago, 1929, but I always was one in fact." And he said, "What do you like in it?" I said, "The idea of perfection. The idea that man should be perfect. There is a perfect type of each race. Every race should strive to its own perfect type."

In fact, National Socialism is an Aryan racialism, but you could transpose it. I can very well imagine a non-Aryan, say a Japanese, having the same ideas as ours. In fact, I said, "In 1940 I met a Japanese in India, one of the members of the Japanese Consulate, and he told me, 'Your National Socialism, we Japanese consider it a Western brand of Shinto. It's the same spirit as our Shinto religion, that is to say, the cult of the sun, the cult of heroes, and the cult of ancestry. It's nothing else.' I said, 'Yes, you are right.'" And recently, that is to say 1978, I had a letter from a Japanese teacher in Nara, and he told me point blank, "We Japanese are all National Socialists in our own way. We are not Aryan racialists because we are not Aryans, of course. But we believe in blood and soil. What's more, this can be said of any race in the world, any conscious race." And that's why if to be a religion, the basic principles of the doctrine have to be universal, I can say National Socialism is a religion.⁹¹

In fact, higher animals are racist and lower animals too. They won't mate with anyone except creatures of their own race. Certain spiders will go miles and miles to get to the female spider of the same kind as himself. They have that instinct. The highest of the beings on Earth have that instinct and the lowest. And the intermediate ones haven't got it. An average dog, especially what they call in India a pariah dog, will mate with any bitch. Spiders don't. Insects don't. Plants don't. Minerals don't. There are strict laws of combinations between minerals in chemistry. And higher human beings don't. The intermediate human being is just like the dog: mates with anybody. We want to be the highest. National Socialism is for teaching the Aryans to become real Aryans, that is to say, the top of the race and to be able to guide others, to bring the whole race up. We don't want any kind of people in our Aryan race who behave like dogs, like pariah dogs. That's what we want.

He said, "All right. And have you any examples of this in the world? This is not the voice of the majority." I said, "Not now. Not now, since Christianity and since some other international religions have brainwashed the world, but it was so in antiquity." I said it was so in antiquity. He said, "It was so among the Jews." I said, "Not so much among the Jews as among other people. The Jews were racists, provided the people of their own race had the same religion as themselves. They were of the same race as the Moabites and as the Ammonites, but these two didn't worship Yahweh. The Moabites worshipped Chemosh, and the Ammonites worshipped Milcom. They were other gods. Therefore the Jews hated them.

⁹¹ In the last sentence of this paragraph, Savitri actually says that National Socialism is "universal," not that it is "a religion." But this is a slip of the tongue. Savitri is offering an argument, and the claim that National Socialism is universal is one of the premises (established by the Japanese teacher), not the conclusion. The conclusion is that National Socialism is a religion. Thus the argument runs as follows: If National Socialism is universal, then it is a religion. National Socialism is universal. Therefore, National Socialism is a religion. The first premise of this argument appears false, for although universality may be a necessary condition for being a religion, it is not a sufficient condition. Other conditions must also be satisfied before National Socialism can be considered a religion. It seems certain, however, that Savitri knew there were other conditions for being a religion and believed that National Socialism met all of them as well.

But among the races of the world in general religion didn't count. Religion was a matter of personal affairs. They used to worship each other's gods. The Jews themselves were always worshipping the gods of the Canaanites. The Bible is full of their infidelities to Yahweh. They didn't think twice about it. They didn't think twice about sacrificing to other gods. It was the fashion. Nobody cared for this religious fanaticism. And Adolf Hitler says that himself on page 507 of his Mein Kampf, edition of 1935: 'In the world of antiquity it was much freer than ours. There was no such thing as religious intolerance. Religious intolerance, religious terror entered the world with Christianity,' and he's perfectly right. Perfectly right." So that's what I said to him.

And they said, "Well, what is your model state in antiquity?" I said "Sparta." They said, "We like Sparta too, but we don't like National Socialism." I said, "What you are saying now is really a contradiction. You can't really like Sparta and the Spartan way if you are against National Socialism. It was nothing else. It was nothing else." They said, "But it was awful. You see, what they did in Sparta was awful. Babies who were not either fit to be warriors or mothers of warriors, who were badly formed or didn't weigh enough, they used to just kill them on the spot, throw them into the depths, the chasm."

I said, "Yes. My mother always told me I would've been in the chasm myself because I only weighed nine hundred grams at birth. But it wouldn't make any difference to the world, of course. But why do you criticize the Spartans for doing that under command of the state when in all Greece they did worse, just for the whims of the fathers? The fathers didn't want another girl, it would mean another dowry to give at the time of marriage, and they said, 'Well, if the next baby is a girl, you just expose her,' and they put her in an earthen pot on the street corner, and she was left there either to be taken by the first kind-hearted person who wanted her, or left to die. It was done all over the ancient world. Why do you criticize Sparta only?"

And there was a discussion like that between Mr. Hatch and another gentleman who came, and myself. It was very interesting. I was delighted to talk of antiquity. It was one of my subjects. And in the end it was after 2:00 or 3:00 in the morning, and then was told I could go to sleep.

The next day I was taken from Köln to Düsseldorf, and all along the way, along the Autobahn, I couldn't help saying, "You see these beautiful Autobahnen? This is the work of Adolf Hitler. You will use them. You can't help admitting that these are things that he did." And the occupation people answered me, “Yes, all right. And Germany was easier to invade with these Autobahnen.” I said, “I’m sorry for that anyhow.” I think I had another interrogation. I’m not quite sure.

13. WERL AND HERTHA EHLERT, 1949

Anyhow, I landed in Werl. The very same day I was taken to Werl. And I told them, “I’m very glad to be in Werl where there are people of my own faith, quite a number of them.” There were, in fact, twenty-six women in the women’s department in the D wing, and about eight hundred or a thousand men in the men’s department. There had been eleven thousand men in 1945, especially SS men. I was taken to the women’s department and put in a cell—on remand. You see, I was not condemned yet. My trial lasted six weeks. I was only condemned on the 5th of April ’49, not before. Before, I enjoyed certain privileges that people on remand have. I wasn’t forced to work, for one, and I had quite a number of visits.

On the next day, the 23rd of February—which happens to be the anniversary of Horst Wessel’s murder; he was murdered on the 23rd of February 1930, exactly nineteen years after his murder—my cell opened in the morning and in came the head of the infirmary and a beautiful-looking woman, a blonde of about my age. In fact, just six months older than I. And I was introduced, “This is Hertha Ehlert, Hertha Ehlert of the Belsen camp.”⁹² She was a wardress in the Belsen camp. And she had been in several other camps before.” All right. And she said, “You see, I’m a war criminal.” And when she said that I put my arms around her and kissed her face and told her, “In my eyes there are no war criminals. There are only victims of democracy, and you are one.” And she said, “I’m glad to hear that. Tell me, you who are a foreigner, they tell us all day long that we were monsters because we did this and that and the rest to the Jews. We persecuted the Jews, and it was wrong.”

I said, “Those who tell you that, just ask them whether they belong to the Indian sect of the Jains or not.” She said, “What is that?” I said, “There is a sect in India called the Jains. They don’t kill anything. Not bugs, not fleas, not lice, nothing. It is their custom, and it is their religion. If a Jain tells me we were wrong to get rid of our enemies, people who were threatening the existence of the Aryan race, especially the existence of Germany, I would say, ‘If you are Jains, all right.’ But the people who are trying to brainwash you are not Jains. They kill bugs, and they kill fleas, and they kill flies, and they kill I don't know what else. So they have no right to tell us that we shouldn't kill enemies of our country and our race. A fly cannot do half the harm that an intelligent Jew can do. Certainly not. So if you can kill the fly, or if you can kill the bug, or if you can kill a louse, why can't you get rid of the intelligent Jew who is harming you? Or who threatens to harm you? Even the potential enemy. You kill a bug. The bug has perhaps not bitten you, but he might bite you. On that principle you go take his life. Well, if we did things like that to the Jews, we did it on the same principle. And the principle is admitted by everybody except the Jains."⁹³

⁹² Hertha Ehlert was born 26 March 1905.

She was quite taken aback. She was delighted. She said, "I'm going to tell that to all the D wing." I said, "You can tell it to whomever you like. I'll tell it to the authorities if they come around and ask me tomorrow. I don't mind. It's logic. I am all for logic. I don't believe in things that are half one way and half the other. I have no time for the enemies of the Reich. None at all. Because the Reich represents to me the force that was doing its best to stem decay in the whole world, and therefore I feel myself personally responsible for whatever has been done in the name of the Third Reich or whatever shall be done in the future if ever we get power again."

I told my mother that so many times. My mother was on the other side. I told her so many times, and I wrote it in letters. Well, in parentheses, the answer my mother had to that was the burning of my doctoral theses. I had left five hundred copies of my doctoral theses in her keep, and she burnt them all, all except twelve, six of each thesis. And in 1946 when I saw her again and she told me they were burnt, she said, "Well, I could've burnt my own things. Of course I had heaps of ordinary books. I had heaps of papers. I had heaps of things. But as you feel responsible for all that was done in the name of the Third Reich, I burnt your things. Because of your Third Reich I was cold in 1942, so I burnt your things." I said, "That's logic." I didn't blame her for that. I'd much rather have her attitude than the attitude of these stupid people who would tell me, "Oh, you say so but you don't really believe it. You can't really believe it. You wouldn't really do it." Those fools I don't like. I prefer the one who takes steps against me on logical grounds.

Hertha was condemned to fifteen years. She sat for nine years in a cell. They had condemned her to death. She was on the death list, to be hanged, when one of her keeps in Belsen, a Jewess who had become the mistress of a Britisher, told her lover, just like that, occasionally, on having a cup of coffee or tea, "Oh it's a pity for Hertha Ehlert. She was a good one. She used to give me even good coffee when I was sick in the camp. She made good coffee for me and gave it to me in spite of the restrictions." So for that, for that Jewess telling that to her English lover, she got fifteen years instead of death. What are the reasons that make our destiny? It's a small thing. If that woman had not met that man, and if Hertha had not given her, once or twice, some good coffee, she would be dead now.

⁹³ Cf. The Lightning and the Sun, 386.

If you could see her, I will give you a word for her: She's a really beautiful Nordic. I don't know what she looks like now, but even when I met her she was over forty. I used to look at her like that. I told her, "As a two-legged mammal, you are much my superior. As a living creature, you're far my superior." She is the lady to whom I dedicated my Defiance.

Anyhow, she worked in the infirmary at Werl, and she used to come to my cell every day. I asked her, "What are you getting to eat?" And she said, "Oh, something that's just fit to eat for pigs." I said, "You know, I have British food because I have a British passport. Already this morning I had twelve slices of bread. I don't need twelve slices of bread. I take one in the morning, one at mid-day and one in the evening, and that's all. You can have the rest." I said, "You can have my coffee too. I take one cup, and I have a liter. Now, I have no meat because I told them I was vegetarian already, and they give me boiled vegetables at mid-day. I have boiled vegetables and nothing else, not even butter. But in the evening I get something nice. I get some macaroni or something nice, and I can eat that. There's generally very little of it, just enough for myself. But whatever I have in the morning, you come every morning and you take it for the D wing people, for the comrades." She was very pleased, and every morning she came, all the time I was in Werl. She had ten slices of bread. She had all my coffee except a cup for myself. And on Sundays I had a little bit of chocolate. I had some marmalade, and some butter. She had my chocolate, she had my marmalade, and she had my butter. I was very glad to give it to the comrades.

But that in course of time brought me into trouble. That is to say, there's a loophole on every cell. Now the women condemned to hard labor, who used to scrub the floor, could see through that loophole. And they could see me write after the time that was allotted to our work, and they wouldn't have reported that I wrote. I was not allowed to write. I was allowed only to do some sewing work for the prison.

The director, Colonel Vickers, told me that I am not to write. But the Oberwachtmeisterin, the woman in charge of the work, told me I could write, provided I don't say that I'm doing it. I used to write after the time of work. That was after my condemnation, after the 5th of April, after I was no longer on remand. And that brought down on me the jealousy of these women who saw me in the morning because they suspected me of giving my white bread to the D wing women in the morning.

By the way, I had entreated the director of the prison to put me in the D wing, and he said, "No, you are to stay in the B wing," that is to say, with the women who are condemned for abortion, for murder, for theft, for breaking into houses, robberies, things like that. Mostly they were condemned for abortions. So I said, "Why don't you put me in the D wing? I'm a political prisoner. I'm not a prisoner. I have not done anything." He said, "Yes, we put you in the D wing, and the next day the whole D wing will be singing the Horst Wessel Song. You are a firebrand. We don't want to put you in the D wing. You'll have to stay here." I didn't like it, not at all. I never forgave the authorities of Werl for keeping me purposely among the abortionists and the thieves and these people. I said to myself, "Thank goodness I was not forced to work in the workshop with the others." I was all alone. I blessed them for being alone. Rather alone than with these people. But I resented not being in the D wing and having to go around the courtyard for a quarter of an hour every day with these people. I met all sorts of types among these people. But their talk was boring. Their talk was men and food, nothing else. And their experiences in prison. Most of them had been in German concentration camps before the war. For the same offenses: for theft, for breaking in houses, things like that. The same offenses. One had been in different camps eighteen times and was condemned for it by the Allies for the nineteenth time. These kinds of people. Putting me with these kinds of people. I'll never forget that.

14. TRIAL AND IMPRISONMENT, 1949

Anyhow, to come back to my trial, it took place on the 5th of April, '49. It was an ordinary military tribunal trial, occupation trial. The people judging me were military occupation. And there was an attorney general who spoke, and he said that I was twice as guilty as anybody else because of my diplomas, my doctorate, my M.A., my L.Sc., my what not. And because I knew what I was doing. And he showed the ruins of Düsseldorf. We were in Düsseldorf in Mühlenstraße. And he said, "These ruins were brought about by National Socialists." I said,

“No they weren’t. They were brought about by Allied bombers against National Socialism.” He said, “You keep quiet. You talk when you are told to talk.”

And then they gave me a lawyer. I didn’t want one. I said, “I can defend myself. I don’t want a lawyer.” They gave me one all the same. It was the rule. And the lawyer got a letter from Mr. Mukherji trying to make out that I was not a political person at all. I was much too simple to be a political person. That I liked National Socialism as a philosophy and a religion perhaps, but that really has no political meaning. And the lawyer said, “I’ll use that letter, and by using that letter I can get you off several months.” I said, “I don’t want you to use that letter. Please don’t use it, because it’s not quite accurate. It tries to defend me, and I don’t want to be defended. Whatever I have to say, I will say when they give me the right to speak. But I don’t want my actions to be made smaller, less important on any account.” He said, “All right.”

The room was packed, and there two Jews in the first row. And they were grinning, and they were laughing. They were looking quite pleased. At the end, they told me that I could speak for a quarter of an hour or half an hour. So I spoke. And they asked me, “Why did you do this? Why did you stick up these posters?” I said, “I didn’t stick up these posters and distribute these leaflets with the hope that by doing so I would resurrect National Socialism and make it the ruling force in Germany and in this world. Certainly not. That job is much too great for a single individual. It’s the job of the gods. They’ll do it in time, if it’s their sweet pleasure.

“Personally I did it for three reasons. First, I obeyed my conscience. Didn’t you tell the world in Nuremberg that a man has to follow his conscience? Of course, you said the ‘world’ conscience. My conscience is not the world conscience. It’s a private conscience. But I follow that. I don’t know what the ‘world’ conscience is. According to me it doesn’t exist. So I followed my conscience. It told me to do this, and I did it.

“Second, I wanted to show the German people at the time of humiliation and martyrdom that at least there were some individuals on the surface of the Earth who were still for them.

“And third, I wanted to defy not only you, the occupation powers, but all those who were against us. I wanted to show them that drowning a whole continent in fire and phosphorus, killing millions of people—five million civilians were killed in Germany alone—was an easy task, and they did it. It was so easy. With ample Jewish money and technique put in service of a cause, that will work. But the difficult task, they couldn't do and cannot do, this difficult task being to de-Nazify, as they say, one person. Not many, one. And not a man at that. Nothing but a woman. And not a German woman at that. But a woman from the other end of the Earth. They cannot do that. They could kill me if they like. They didn't do it. That's their affair. But they could. They can't de-Nazify me. That's what I want to show. They can neither de-Nazify me nor can they de-Nazify the natural force. The principles of National Socialism, based on cosmic laws, will still be true wherever we are in the universe, on this planet or on other planets, whatever they do."

And that's what I wanted to say, that's all. And I started quoting something from Mein Kampf, and the judge stopped me. The quotation was, "The only thing that should prompt our action is neither the approval nor the reprobation of the people around us, but only our allegiance to the truth in which we believe."⁹⁴ I didn't say it in whole. I said it partly. And the judge interrupted me and said, "I don't want to know what your Führer wrote." I said, "I'm sorry. It's because he wrote things like that that I'm here. I acted according to his writings."

Anyhow, when the trial was over he said, "three years rigorous imprisonment." I thought to myself, "These people don't really love their blessed democracy." Because if I had been caught in the Russian zone it would not be three years rigorous imprisonment, it would have been thirty years in a Siberian camp, and I would be dead by now, long ago. But the Communists have a faith. A false one, but a faith. And they can understand people who have a different faith, and they know that any person who has a faith is dangerous, potentially at least, to all those who hate that faith.

These people don't feel the same. Their first concern is their bread and butter and their enjoyment. Democracy gives them that, all right. Long live democracy. If we came to power tomorrow and gave them the same thing, they'd say, "Heil Hitler!" So many did in Germany before the catastrophe. So many did, of that description. And they say the contrary now. Those are the democrats. Those are the Western anti-Communists, and they will be crushed by the Communists, because the Communists have a faith, and they have none. Unless we crush the Communists. We are the only ones. We have seen that in Vietnam.

⁹⁴ "But our views and our conduct will not be determined by the approbation or disapprobation of our contemporaries, but only by our duty to follow a truth which we have acknowledged."—Mein Kampf, vol. 2, ch. 2, "The State," trans. Murphy, 222.

Anyhow, that was long after these happenings.

I went out. I had taken with me my swastika earrings bought in India, great big silhouette earrings in gold. As soon as the sentence was given, and I feared no more—I mean to say, a next trial because of my earrings—I put them on. I stood up. I did the Hitler salute, looking at the people, and I walked off. Some people of the press wanted to interview me, but the authorities didn't allow it.

One thing I can say: the two Jews who were at the front were not laughing any longer. I don't suppose that I frightened them. I was not such a powerful person. But they felt the spirit. They felt that this can always begin again. As long as there are people who really are given to it, it can begin again. That's what they seemed to think. They didn't tell me so. I don't know what they thought. I can't read people's thoughts. But that's what seemed to me.

I walked off, and I was taken to Werl after that. That was my trial in Düsseldorf, Mühlenstraße, on the 5th of April 1949. Exactly two years after I watched the fire on the flanks of the burning Mt. Hekla in Iceland, exactly two years.

On the 30th of May 1949, my cell was searched and my manuscript of Gold in the Furnace was taken. And I thought it was taken forever because Colonel Vickers, the head of the prison, told me, "If your book is subversive, it shall be destroyed." He told me that on the 10th of June 1949 when I came to ask if my book could be saved. He said, "You are not to ask anything. You are the most objectionable Nazi type I've ever met"—and he had been in Germany since 1945—"and I am not going to give any favors to you." Still, after I had prayed and prayed—not to him, but to the gods, repeating a certain Sanskrit mantra twenty-one times and that for twenty-one days (I didn't do it [for twenty-one days] on purpose)—the directress of the women's section in prison came in and told me "Muky"—they always used to call me Muky, the diminutive of Mukherji—"Your things have all come back, and Colonel Vickers is to give them to you. You go to his office. They are given back to you. Your book is given back to you."

I couldn't believe my ears. I didn't thank Colonel Vickers in my heart of hearts. I thanked the gods only. Colonel Vickers was an instrument, nothing more. Just as I am an instrument, nothing more. Anyhow, I got back my manuscript. It was put in a safe place until my release from Werl. At my release it was given back to me. Of course I kept it until I got it sent to India, and it was printed in India in '52. It was printed in India along with Defiance. Mr. Mukherji paid for the printing. And the proofs were sent to me. That's why there were so many mistakes in it. It was printed in India in my absence.

They had given me three years, but they kept me only a few months due to the intervention of the Indian government that Mr. Mukherji had set in motion.⁹⁵ I asked him, "Why did you do that?" He said, "Because you are more useful outside than inside. That's why I did it." I said, "Good." I said to my friend Hertha Ehlert, "I don't want to go out." She said, "Don't be a fool. You are of more use out than in. You can continue doing something. When you're in prison you can do nothing. Especially since they won't allow you to write any longer."

Some people had wanted my mother to intervene. My mother had been in the French resistance. She was not going to help a National Socialist and quite right. I admire her for that. I'm very grateful to her that she did not intervene. I didn't want to be freed by anybody, especially not the former French resistance. She wrote to me a letter, at least, that I liked very much. She said to me, "Now you are in prison. Think of the eagles that are in prison in the zoo, in your native town, in enormous cages. They are in cages still. An eagle doesn't want to be in a cage. They have done no Nazi propaganda, and still they are in prison for life. Think of them, and don't complain."⁹⁶ I was not in the mood to complain at all. I was very glad to be in prison for my ideas.

And then I was forbidden to go back to Germany for five years, but I went back all the same in '53. I stayed in the meantime in France,⁹⁷ and I gave lessons to live. Mr. Mukherji used to send me some money now and then, but not much. I went to Greece in '53, in January or February '53. And then I went back to Germany via Rome. I took a plane to Italy, and in Rome I took a train via the Brenner Pass to Germany.⁹⁸ And I came back to Germany with a Greek passport in my maiden name, and nobody understood anything about it. I was ⁹⁵ In Defiance, Savitri mentions that Mukherji went so far as to send a telegram to Jawaharlal Nehru (1899-1964), India's first Prime Minister, to intervene on her behalf (Defiance, 561).

⁹⁶ Cf. Pilgrimage, 313.

⁹⁷ During her stay in France, Savitri lived in Lyons and completed Defiance. The Preface is dated Lyons, 29 August 1950. She also finished Gold in the Furnace. The Preface of Gold is dated Lyons, 21 August 1952.

⁹⁸ According to Pilgrimage, Savitri flew from Phaleron to Campini, then traveled to Rome, where she met Camillo Giuriati, former Italian Consul in Calcutta (Pilgrimage, 11).

condemned under an Indian passport, as Mrs. Mukherji. I came back with a Greek passport as Miss Maximiani Portas. And I was allowed to stay in Germany. Mr. Mukherji sent me money. He could then. He sent me nineteen marks a month. I lived on my nineteen marks a month. And I started teaching. And I wrote Pilgrimage.⁹⁹ And after writing Pilgrimage, I started working again on The Lightning and the Sun. I had already started writing it in '48, but I had not finished it. I had written only one or two chapters. The three first chapters, I think.¹⁰⁰ I continued, and then I took it to India in '57. I had a few episodes that I described in Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess. I had a cat.¹⁰¹

15. RETURN TO INDIA, 1957-60

And when I had to leave Germany in '57, I went back to India. I went back to India in May, '57.¹⁰² Why did I go back to India? I went back to India for one sole reason. I could not publish Pilgrimage. Mr. Mukherji had insufficient money. So I went back to India to publish that and to publish also The Lightning and the Sun. And I stayed there three years. I worked three years to finance these books. I financed them, and then I came back.

I went to Egypt first and was the guest of Johann von Leers.¹⁰³ Johann von Leers couldn't put me up directly so he gave me the address of Mr. Mahmoud Saleh,¹⁰⁴ a very enthusiastic admirer of the Führer, a Palestinian Arab, and his wife. And I lived with their family. They had two little girls. They gave ancient names to their children, Nefertiti and Tiy, instead of giving them Mohammedan names. When I left, the one thing, the one favor, Mahmoud Saleh wanted me to give him was a ⁹⁹ Pilgrimage was finished on 6 February 1954 in Emsdetten in Westphalia.

¹⁰⁰ Savitri wrote ch. 1 of The Lightning and the Sun on 9 April 1948 in Edinburgh. She completed chapter 3 on 6 December 1948 in the Karlsruhe railway station in Germany. She completed the book on 21 March 1956 (the Spring Equinox) in Hanover.

¹⁰¹ See Long-Whiskers, ch. 10, "Black Velvet" and ch. 11, "The House in the Woods." Black Velvet (Schwarzer Samt) was the name of Savitri's cat.

¹⁰² Savitri relates episodes from this journey in Long-Whiskers, chs. 13-15.

¹⁰³ Johann von Leers (1902-1963) was a National Socialist university professor and a member of the SS who worked in Goebbels's Ministry of Propaganda. In 1954, he began working for the Nasser régime in Egypt as a specialist in anti-Zionist propaganda.

¹⁰⁴ Mahmoud Saleh (1903-1970) was actually Egyptian, although his wife was Palestinian. He was interned for five-and-a-half years by the British during World War II.

portrait of the Führer.¹⁰⁵ I gave him that, and he was very, very happy. Very proud of it. He had been in a Jewish concentration camp as an Arab for our cause in Palestine and suffered a lot but came out of it. And he was then the president of the anti-Zionist movement in Cairo.

From Cairo I went to Tell-el-Amarna, to the ruins of ancient Akhetaton, not far from Melawi in middle Egypt. I saw the ruins of Tell-el-Amarna. I came back to Maadhi, where I was living—Maadhi near Cairo.¹⁰⁶ Then I went to Alexandria. From Alexandria I sailed on a Greek ship to Beirut. In Beirut I was supposed to meet a National Socialist, and one in Baghdad also. Unfortunately it was June or July and they were both out. They were not living in these very hot places then, so I could not see any of them. So from Beirut I went to Damascus by car and from Damascus to Baghdad by the ordinary trans-desert bus. It was the second time I did this trip. I had done it already in '36. I forgot to say that in '37 I did a trip to the Near East by train and by ship. I visited Baghdad, I visited Syria, and I came back to India via the Persian Gulf in '37.¹⁰⁷ I forgot to tell that.

So this time I didn't come back through the Persian Gulf. I came back by bus, via Teheran. Stayed three weeks in Teheran to see the place, went to Pahlevi on the Caspian Sea, to see the Caspian Sea, and from Pahlevi back to Teheran, from there on to Mashid and from Mashid to Zahedan on the frontier between Pakistan and Persia. The train goes once a week to Lahore. I arrived on the day the train had left. Had to stay a week in Zahedan. I stayed in the Greek hotel. There are Greek hotels all over the world, and I was quite happy.

And then I took the train crossing Baluchistan. Baluchistan is one of the hottest places on earth, a desert of gravel crossed by the army of Alexander the Great, when he was coming back to Greece, or supposed to come back to Greece. He died on the way. Four fifths of his army died of thirst in Baluchistan. Of course, I wasn't loaded with helmet and armor as they were. I was in a train in a third class compartment. There were third classes still in India in those days. There were in Pakistan at least. In the compartment were women, Mohammedan women, quite indifferent to me, and I thought to myself, as the train ¹⁰⁵ According to Muriel Gantry, Savitri painted her own portrait of Hitler ("Curriculum Vitae of Muriel Gantry," unpublished ms., p. 22). It may be this portrait that she gave to Saleh.

¹⁰⁶ Savitri wrote her pamphlet Paul de Tarse, ou Christianisme et juiverie [Paul of Tarsus, or Christianity and Jewry] (Calcutta: Savitri Devi Mukherji, 1958) in Maadhi on 18 June 1957.

¹⁰⁷ Savitri also visited Egypt before WW II, perhaps at the same time (Defiance, 144).

entered the desert of Baluchistan, "Now Europe is far away. Now I can do what I like. Now nobody's going to say a word to me if I sing the Horst Wessel Song," and I stretched my arm from the window, and I sang the Horst Wessel Song with all my enthusiasm over the burning desert. It was a sort of victory. The women didn't care a bit. They said, "You want to sing, well sing." I said, "All right." They even liked the song, some of them. And I reached Lahore. From Lahore I came to Delhi. I got on the train to Delhi on the 30th of July 1957, having come overland all the way from Europe and Egypt.

In the train I was assaulted. I was in the ladies' compartment, but five women who were with me all got off at Mathura, and the train was empty. A man came in and assaulted me, wanting money. I had a terrible experience. He nearly strangled me, and then I spoke gently to him. I gave him whatever I had. I had hardly any money, but I gave him what I had, and he got down. He jumped out of the train at the next station. I called the police but there was no way of finding out where he went.

I reached Calcutta two days later and went home, went to Mr. Mukherji's flat, and he received me very well. And I stayed there. I stayed there till August '57, and then I got a job in Joda near Barajamda in the province of Orissa.

There was an advertisement. Three German engineers from the East wanted someone, a German person or a person who knew German, to be a field interpreter between them and the Hindi-speaking or Oriya-speaking people. Well, I don't speak Oriya, but I understand some of it. It's very close to Bengali, and I speak and write Hindi. So I offered my services. Mr. Mukherji told me, "If you like to, you can apply. But you be very careful. They wouldn't be sent to India unless they were thorough Communists. They must be experienced Communists, you see. The government must rely on them for them to be sent out." I said, "All right." So I went.

The eldest one was called Müller. The second one was called Schuster. And third one was called Schmidt. Müller was sixty. Schuster was about forty-five, and the other one was thirty-six. And the job was to organize the labor for a Seilbahn, a *funiculaire*¹⁰⁸ to carry iron ore from the top of a mountain down to the railway, with pylons and all that. They were building them. So I went there. I used to share the house with them. I had a room of my own, and there was a courtyard, and they had their own rooms. And they had their own food. I used to take Indian food from the shop. Cheapest. And I also started feeding the dogs in the place that were thin and very, very badly off. So that went on all right.

¹⁰⁸ Cable car system.

The first time I came out with them on Sunday there was Müller and Schmidt. Schmidt did not say a single word, nor did I. Müller spoke. He said, "I was once a disciple of Thälmann the Communist, but since I have seen Communism in the East zone, I'm no longer a Communist. I am a man of Adenauer." I wanted to say, "It's no better," but I didn't say a word. "I think the régime of Adenauer is all right, and see plenty and freedom." Anyhow, I said nothing. He was against the Führer, very much against him, anti-Nazi.

Then Schuster came and we had coffee together. On the first day, Sunday, I spoke only of India. They asked me questions, good questions. This was the first time they came to India. I gave them my experiences of India. I gave them a few words on Indian tradition. They didn't say anything. The next day, in the morning, Schuster knocked at my door, and he said, "I've spotted you out. You are a National Socialist." I said, "How did you spot that out? I never spoke of National Socialism." He said, "No, you didn't speak of National Socialism, of course. You spoke of India. But nobody except a National Socialist could speak of India as you did." He said, "You know, I'm not against you for that. I was at the Nuremberg rallies. I saw Rudolf Hess two meters away from me, like that. I held the flag in front of him once. I used to go to all the rallies. But of course now I'm a good Communist. Now that I must be a good Communist, I am a good Communist." And he told me about his experiences in the great days. He did this, and he did that, and he did the other thing. "But now I'm a good Communist." He said it so often that I found that it was not true. It sounded false.

And I went up to the works with Schmidt, and we sat near a place they were filling with cement for the pylons. The women used to do that. They had baskets made of iron that were already heavy. I could barely lift one, and when they were full of semi-liquid cement they were even heavier. And they used to go up the hill, slanting like that, six hundred women. We watched them work. Schmidt said, "You know I'm from Danzig." I said, "Danzig always was a German town. I learnt Danzig was a German town when I was a kid in school." He said, "Yes, it was 99% German." And he told me in glowing words of the entrance of the German army in Danzig in 1939. He said, "I was there. I cheered them too. And it was wonderful. The Hitler idea was wonderful." I was very reticent because I thought, "Is he provoking me or what? I don't know.”

Anyhow, that’s all right. Days passed. And one day I thought the three were out, and I went to the courtyard in the morning. It was a Sunday morning, and I bathed in the courtyard instead of bathing in my room. It was so small, my room. It was inconvenient to bathe. I went and bathed under the tap. And just when I was going away, in came Schmidt. I’d just put on my brassiere. I always wear this around my neck.¹⁰⁹ He saw it probably. And I didn’t say a word. I went home. In the evening, he knocked on my door. He said, “Mrs. Mukherji, can I just for five minutes have your Parteiabzeichen and hold it in my hand? Just for five minutes and give it back to you.” I said, “What do you want it for?” He said, “Just to feel the touch of it after all these years.” I took it off and gave it to him. He said, “I’ve known, I’ve known you for a long time. Don’t say a word to Müller. Schuster is reliable, but it’s better not to talk too much. You can talk to me if you want to talk.”

And of the three, when they left the works after a year, Schmidt was the only one who came to Calcutta and had a cup of coffee with us. And Mr. Mukherji spoke to him and said, “You want the reunification of your country naturally.” He said, “Of course I do.” “And with what frontiers?” And Schmidt answered, “Those of 1940.” Those are the Germans of the East zone.

I came back to Calcutta in ’58 when the job was finished. And then I joined the French school¹¹⁰ in Calcutta and had a job at the French school.

16. BACK TO EUROPE, 1960-71

I left Calcutta in ’60. My mother died in ’60. She died on the 25th of March ’60. I sailed back to Europe in August or September of ’60, couldn’t tell you exactly, via South India and Ceylon. I took a passage on a Greek ship, third class, and landed in Marseilles.

And then I went to Spain. I was there six weeks, a guest of Otto Skorzeny, and I enjoyed it immensely.¹¹¹ I met a very great man in him. He’s dead now, may his soul be in peace. He was one of the finest people I have ever met. And I was much honored to have stayed in his house. He invited me after I had sent—which book was it, Gold in the ¹⁰⁹ A NSDAP party badge.

¹¹⁰ The Alliance Française.

¹¹¹ SS-Sturmbannführer Otto Skorzeny (1908-1975) is celebrated for his daring commando operations during WW II, in particular the raid of 12 September 1943 to liberate Mussolini from the mountaintop hotel in the Gran Sasso where he was held prisoner after being deposed.

Furnace, or no—The Lightning and the Sun, I think. I sent him one of those books via Hans-Ulrich Rudel.¹¹² I was in touch with Hans-Ulrich Rudel. I met him in Hanover also. I went to him several times. Very fine man also. Now, of course, I think he's half paralyzed. One leg is cut off, I know that, but on the top of that he had some sort of attack, some stroke since then.

Anyhow, from Spain I came back to France, and I got a job as a stop-gap teacher.

And with the money of that job, I started preparing to publish other books. I financed my Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess.¹¹³ First I worked in Montbrison. That was from January '61 to November '63. In November '63 I was sent to Saint Étienne. I stayed there till '64. I had trouble, very big trouble, in Saint Étienne, and nearly lost my job because I had said in class that, "I would rather have died in any German concentration camp, than under the bombardments of the Allies. Rather than at Dresden, for instance, drowned in burning tar in some cellar, the streets having become molten under the heat of the bombardment." I said something like that, and I also put in doubt the things that were told about what the Nazis did. I didn't know that the father of one my pupils was the head of the local section of the L.I.C.A., International League against Anti-Semitism. And I got into trouble. I nearly was kicked out.

But I was not kicked out. I was just sent to another place, to Firminy, and I stayed in Firminy '65, '66, '67, living in Montbrison, of course. I kept my little room in Montbrison because in Montbrison I used to feed a number of cats. I didn't want to abandon the cats until I found someone to feed them in my place. And I stayed in Montbrison till '69 after I no longer had a job in Firminy. I used to correct copies for a correspondence course. I used to stay there and continue feeding my cats.

And then I found a job in Ireland, and I was going to sail for Ireland in '69. But at the port, I was told to go back. The Irish authorities thought I was going back to England, and I had been kept out of ¹¹² Colonel Hans-Ulrich Rudel (1916-1982) was the greatest flying ace of WW II, perhaps of all time.

¹¹³ Savitri worked on Long-Whiskers from 1957-1961. It was begun in September 1957 in Joda near Barajamda, India and finished on 10 July 1961 in Hanover, Germany. It was published in 1965 in England. From 1961-63, Savitri worked on a German-language book, Hart wie Kruppstahl [Hard as Krupp Steel]. The title is from Hitler's description in Mein Kampf of the ideal German youth. The book was never published and the fate of the manuscript is unknown (Souvenirs et réflexions, 12, n1).

England on account of my taking part in the Cotswolds camp in '62.¹¹⁴ Well, I was not allowed into Ireland either. I had to go back.

And I went to Greece. I didn't know where to go. In Greece I had a very small job and a few private lessons. I stayed there a year. And in '70 I came back to France and in October '70, I was the guest of Françoise Dior¹¹⁵ in Ducey, Normandy, and from there I worked on my French book.¹¹⁶ I started writing it in '68, '69, '70.

17. LAST YEARS IN INDIA, 1971-78

And then I came to India, landed by plane in Bombay and went from Bombay to Poona on the 23rd of June '71. And from there I continued my manuscript, of course, all the time. And then I went to Delhi. I came to Delhi on the 11th of August '71 and stayed at the Hindu Mahasabha¹¹⁷ office in one of the guest rooms. I finished my book there. My book was ended in Delhi sometime in August or September, I don't remember exactly, '71.¹¹⁸

And then I found a job at the French school in Delhi.¹¹⁹ I was teaching at the French school in Delhi until August '77. And then they did not give me another job on account of my age only. And now I'm living on private lessons when I get any, and on a tiny little pension that I get, national security for having taught nine years, but nine years only, in France.

I've been staying in this flat since '73. Before '73 I was staying in Delhi's South Extension Part 1, and I used to feed a number of cats over there, naturally. And now I go every evening in a scooter to see these cats that are still coming to their feeding place, not knowing that I have shifted to Part 2. And I give them milk and bread and pet food and whatever I have to give them.

And of course, I continue writing. I'm thinking now of writing another book. I don't know if it will be in French or in English. If it's in French it will be called, probably, Ironies et paradoxes, about the ¹¹⁴ On the Cotswolds camp, see the next chapter, §§2-4.

¹¹⁵ Marie Françoise Suzanne Dior (1932-1993). For more on Françoise Dior, see the next chapter, §§2 and 5.

¹¹⁶ Souvenirs et réflexions.

¹¹⁷ Hindu Mission.

¹¹⁸ Souvenirs et réflexions was finished in New Delhi on 12 September 1971 (Souvenirs et réflexions, 327). It took nearly five years to raise money for the printing. The Preface was written in New Delhi on 28 July 1976.

¹¹⁹ The Alliance Française.

ironical and paradoxical in certain events of history or in certain lives of people and things like that.¹²⁰

For instance, one paradox is the birth of Goebbels. His father was absolutely against us, a staunch Catholic of Rheydt, Rheinland, and in Goebbels' diaries, you get this phrase, "Krach mit Vater"¹²¹ every two lines when he's young. He didn't like him at all. And then Goebbels met Adolf Hitler, and his father liked him even less. Anyhow, his father is one of the greatest benefactors of the Hitler movement without meaning to. And I want to show that so many people do things without meaning to. And sometimes against what they should do.

For instance, Nebuchadnezzar,¹²² who stormed Jerusalem in 586 BC and took the Jews all in captivity in Babylon. Of course Cyrus¹²³ let them go back, those who wanted to go back, in 538 BC. But they didn't all go back. Some stayed in Babylon. Now Nebuchadnezzar, of course, who took them there, thought he was doing a great harm to them. He was destroying the Jewish nation.

In reality, he was doing a great favor to them because they were an agricultural people and a war-like people in those days. They were not great bankers or anything of the kind. The banking of antiquity was in the hands of the Babylonians. We have records of Babylonian banks of nine hundred years. Babylon was under the Kassite dynasty, an Aryan dynasty, that lasted until 1,080 BC. And I must say that the Jews who stayed in Babylon received favor there. They finished by no longer being prisoners. They could go about. They learnt their banking there. That's where they learnt their capacity in banking that they used for centuries later on. Nebuchadnezzar was one of their benefactors. One of the greatest ones.

Another one was Titus.¹²⁴ He destroyed Jerusalem completely in the ¹²⁰ According to Savitri's correspondence with O.L. (15 November 1979), the full title of this book was to be Ironies et paradoxes de l'histoire et de la légende.

¹²¹ Quarrel with father. Goebbels' father Fritz lived from 1867- 1929.

¹²² Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 630-562 BC, reigned c. 605-562 BC).

¹²³ Cyrus the Great (580-529 BC) was the founder of the Persian Empire. After his conquest of the Babylonian Empire in 539 BC, he allowed the Jews exiled in Babylon to return to Jerusalem (2 Chronicles 36:22-23).

¹²⁴ Titus (Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus) lived from 40-81 and was Emperor from 79-81. His father Vespasian (also named Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus) lived from 9-79 and was Emperor from 69-79. Both Vespasian and Titus were occupied with quashing the Jewish rebellion of 67 when Vespasian was declared Emperor by his legions in 69 and departed to claim his throne. In 70, Titus captured Jerusalem and razed the great temple begun in 19/20 BC by Herod the Great (73-4 BC, reigned 37-4 BC), and completed only in 63 AD.

year 70. And Hadrian destroyed what was left of it in 135, after two risings.¹²⁵ Well, they had so many risings under the Romans—we normally read of two—but there were a good one hundred fifty risings or more. Instead of keeping the Jews in Palestine where they were, these two anti-Jewish Roman emperors made slaves of some of them and sent them all over the Roman Empire, in the slave markets. They took others and dispersed them. They forbade any Jew to remain in Jerusalem. There were a few in Palestine. They persecuted them too. The result was that the Jews were strewn all over the world instead of being in one stronghold in Palestine.

And what would've happened if they had been in Palestine was this: in the seventh century the wave of Islam would have taken them over. There would be no Jews left in the world. They would all be Mohammedans. Except perhaps a few, one little sect, but the wave of Islam was so powerful, it took over the whole of Christian North Africa. North Africa was Christian. It became Mohammedan overnight, except for the tiny sect of the Copts that are still alive. The Jews would've been the same. There would be no Jewish question at all in the world.

But they were not in Palestine. That's the trouble. Thanks to their enemies, Titus and Hadrian, they were all over the place in Europe. They were in Italy. They were in Germany. They were I don't know where. They had followed the Roman legions, as contractors, of course. They were the best contractors of the Roman legions in Germany and elsewhere. And that is the service these two typically anti-Jewish emperors rendered to them. To those Roman emperors we owe the fact that we have the Jews everywhere.

This is the kind of book I want to write. I think it will be interesting if I manage to write it. It's getting ripe in me, slowly, slowly, slowly. It might take two or three years more.¹²⁶ That's all I have to say.¹²⁷

¹²⁵ Hadrian (Publius Aelius Hadrianus, 76-138, reigned 117-138) successfully crushed the Bar Kochba revolt of 132-135. Hadrian then leveled what remained of Jerusalem and built a new city, Aelia Capitolina, on the site. He erected a temple to Jupiter on the site of Herod's temple. Jews were forbidden to enter the city.

¹²⁶ According to Savitri's correspondence with O.L., by 15 November 1979, one and a half chapters of Ironies et paradoxes had been written, but Savitri's ever-worsening eyesight was interfering with her writing. It is unlikely that the book was ever finished, and the fate of the manuscript is unknown.

¹²⁷ Savitri remained in India until 4 October 1981, when she returned to Europe. She died on 22 October 1982 in Sible Hedingham, Essex, England, at Moira Cottage, the home of her old friend Muriel Gantry. She was seventy-seven. For an account of her last year and her death, see Goodrick-Clarke, Hitler's Priestess, 222-25.

Chapter 2

COMRADES

1. GERMAN COMRADES

I would like to speak of one or two comrades who are alive or dead now. I will not speak of Heinrich Blume, one of the closest collaborators of the Führer, born in 1887, that is to say, two years before him, on the very day Frederick the Great was born, that is to say, the 24th of January. I spoke of him in Pilgrimage.¹ He was a wonderful man. He was what you call *Oberregierungs- und Schulrat*² under the Third Reich. But I will speak of people whom I met myself in Germany.

One is Gerda Strasdat. I met Gerda Strasdat in the Annastift-Hospital in '56. Frau Marianne Meinecke, a friend of mine, told me about her. Frau Meinecke herself was a wonderful person, a real National Socialist. She must be dead now. She would be I don't know how old. She was much older than I. And she gave me this address. She said, "This girl suffered for us, suffered for the cause." And she did. I met her in her room. She had one arm completely cut off, one leg completely cut off, and half the other leg too. She had, in fact, one arm, the right one, fortunately. And she told me she was reading Gold in the Furnace. She knew English. She was thirty-one at that time, and she looked twenty-one or twenty-two. She looked much younger than her age. In spite of all that. Pretty face, very nice. And she liked my book. And I said, "Dear me, Gerda. You speak of Gold in the Furnace. I only wrote it. It's the title of a book of mine. But you are the gold in the furnace."

This is how she happened to get into that state. She was caught by the British, by the British police, after the war. She had been the secretary of a very top National Socialist. And she was asked to tell the names and the hiding places of that man and of several others. She knew where they were. She refused to speak. They kicked her and knocked her about. They beat her. They knocked out all her teeth, and they put her in such a state, without her speaking, that even the men who did it could not help admiring her. Then she went to a camp, naturally, a concentration camp of the Allies. It was early '47. After that treatment, her limbs were gangrenous, from the beatings, and they had to cut off one arm and then a leg and then half of the other leg. She was in the state of an unfortunate insect that had been pulled to pieces by naughty children. And still she was smiling.

¹ Savitri Devi, Pilgrimage, 258-70. Savitri met Blume in Hanover on 10 and 11 May 1953.

² Senior government official and educational authority.

I admired that woman so much. I saw her later on once at her brother's. She had been discharged from this hospital where she stayed for days and days and months, and she was living with her brother and her sister-in-law. In Seilerstraße, I think, in Hanover. Anyhow, this is one among thousands. There must be thousands like her.

Another one is Olga von Barényi who lived in Bohemia during the war. She's married to a German of what they call Czechoslovakia. It's still Bohemia. She calls herself von Barényi because it's her maiden name. Her father is from Hungary and her mother German, or the reverse, I don't know. She was a writer. She is still a writer. If she is alive. She was very, very ill lately. I don't know. I haven't written to her yet. I'm going to write to her for the Winter Solstice, and I'll have news. She wrote, among others, three very impressive books, Prager Totentanz, The Death Dance of Prague, Der tote Briefkasten, and Das tote Geleise.³ They are three books: one about the happenings in Prague, 1945, one about the happenings in Prague later on, and one about happenings in München in our very days. How Communist propaganda goes on in München, and how things happen that people know and why and what. Very interesting books.

The first one, of course, is shocking. It tells you about Czech youth, Communist youth, sworn to do as much harm as possible to the Germans after the war, and what they did. Things that Olga saw with her own eyes. Things that she put up with with her own body. She was caught by the Communists and tortured. She showed me her back. Her back is one wound. A red-hot iron was applied to it to make her speak.

³ Olga von Barényi, Prager Totentanz: Ein Roman aus den Tagen der Prager Revolution 1945 [Death Dance of Prague: A Novel from the Days of the Prague Revolution of 1945] (Munich: Schild, 1958); Der tote Briefkasten: Gegenwartsroman aus der gefährlichen Wirklichkeit der Roten Tschechischen Nachrichtendienste [The Dead Mailbox: Contemporary Novel on the Dangerous Truth about the Red Czech News Service] (Munich: Schild, 1960); Das tote Geleise [The Dead End] (Munich: Kismet, 1961).

And she did not speak. And she told me, “It’s awful the first two or three minutes. And then, of course, one doesn’t get accustomed to a red-hot iron, but one gets a kind of defiant spirit. Some force comes into one,” she said, “and one feels, ‘I’ve stood it until now. I’ll stand it till the end’”—a sort of a strange force that comes from elsewhere. But she said—and I can understand this very well— “If they had tried this on my dog in front of me instead of trying it on me, I don’t know what I would’ve done.” I can understand that.

And she told me that these kinds of things were very ordinary happenings in Prague in those days. She told me about children, German children, a hundred and thirty-one of them, taken from a hospital and walled in. They put them in a room, shut the door, walled it up. They died of suffocation, of course. After so many hours, after what torture, nobody knows. Babies and little children, little girls two or three years old, holding their dolls in their arms. She told me—and she put it in her Prager Totentanz also—the awful story of people burned alive, hung from the lampposts with a fire under them. A young soldier, an old woman, only because they were Germans. She told me that a young SS man, seventeen, eighteen, quite young, was tied to a table in a cinema of Prague with all the people around him, Czechs. And next to him were a pair of scissors and a knife and a container full of vinegar. And every one of the people had to go there, cut a slice off him, and pour vinegar into the wound. Cut it off with a pair of scissors or with a knife and pour vinegar in the wound. Until he died.

Things like that make you ashamed of being White, not Aryan. Czechs may be Aryan. They are Slavs. Whatever they are, they are a White race. We speak of the horrors of the Chinese tortures and things like that. You can imagine that going on in ancient China, at the most in ancient China, not even in today’s China. Or in ancient Korea, where it was a feat in the nineteenth century, a great betterment, that prisoners no longer had their knees crushed to pieces. It was a torture they had before. They suppressed it in the nineteenth century. It was supposed to be a great betterment. But when you hear this happening in 1945, it makes you ashamed of having two legs and being a human being. That’s how it makes me feel. Animals would not do things like that.

Another thing that I also find awful in Prager Totentanz is the treatment of the animals because they belonged to Germans. For instance, young boys and girls, Czechs, poking out the eyes of poor German horses because they were Wehrmacht horses. One Czech with a kind heart who couldn’t bear that on animals tried to stop it. They did it to him. They killed him. And the girl who killed him—it was a girl—she had one hundred eighty written in front of her breasts, and she took off the zero and put one hundred eighty-one. It meant that she had killed one hundred eighty-one Germans herself. They would take a dog, bring that dog to a heap of corpses. "Now you look for your master." The poor dog would look for his master, whimpering, and he would finish by pulling out the corpse of an SS man killed by the Czechs. "Oh, you are the dog of an SS man! Pour boiling water over him." Things like that. Cut off the paws of poor cats because they belonged to Germans.

I feel so much for this that I feel that Prague should be wiped out. Completely wiped out. By the Russians, by the Chinese, by the Americans, by whoever you like. By extraterrestrials. I don't care by whom. But a place where such things happened—a hundred and fifty thousand Germans and so many animals, tortured to death in 1945—this place doesn't deserve to live. And when I heard of the Russians behaving as they did in the '60's, I said, "Well, it doesn't matter." They were their glorious Allies. The Russians had not entered Prague yet. They feasted them when they came. They were their glorious Allies. I couldn't care less if they squashed them under their tanks. What had they done? What had they done?

I tell you, this makes me sometimes sick of being, not a White person, but a human being. Why don't I have four legs and a tail and stripes all over my body and beautiful fur? Why am I not a tigress? Tigresses are much better than that. More beautiful first of all, and then they don't do such things. They are people! People with eyes and noses and mouths, people looking like me and looking like you, that did these things. And I say it's no wonder they did these things, because if they can do what they do to the seals in Canada, to the seals who are nothing to them, who never had an ideology, who cannot have one, who can neither be for nor against any ideology, all the more they can do it to Germans, or to Communists, or to Fascists, or to anything "-ist," anything that has an ideology or that is supposed to have one. I mean to say, the German children had no ideology. Certainly not. But the Czechs would think, "Oh, they are Germans. Their parents had one. They will have one when they grow up. They will be our enemies." It's a different thing. It's a different degree of cowardice to do an awful thing to an animal that cannot be for or against anything and to do it, even to a child, who can be for or against something, against anything, when it grows up. That's a degree of cowardice. They are both awful things. Both cowardly actions.

And I believe that cowardice is the ugliest vice on earth. You cannot be cruel unless you are a coward. Fighting is not bad, fighting honestly. But fighting in a sneaking way, and fighting and doing cruelties, that's cowardice. Cowardice is the worst thing. It's the most despicable vice I can imagine. I'd much rather have some other vices. Laziness. Laziness is not good, but it's better than that. All the other vices are better than that. That's the father of vices. Lying is a mark of cowardice. If you tell lies, it means you don't want to face the consequences of what you have done or what you believe. So you'd rather lie. You are not a liar if you are not a coward. You have to be a coward to have all the vices. You have to be a coward.

I could talk of Frau Meinecke. She died in her bed as far as I know. But she was such a good National Socialist, really. And so kind to all the others. Any National Socialist could go to her house in Hanover and get shelter there, stay there as long as he liked. She would give introductions to him. She would help him to get a job. She would do everything. She had secret meetings in her house, up to a hundred, a hundred and fifty people. I went to some in the years '50, '51, '52, up to '60.⁴ The last time I saw her was in '71.

Now I'll speak not of great martyrs of National Socialism or great people, but very ordinary people.

There was a girl called Brigitte W— in Germany. She was about eighteen in '71 and she was introduced to me by another very great National Socialist, Hans E—. Hans E— is a wonderful man. He introduced me to her. It was a birthday, in fact, for her brother, who was a young boy. He was a young boy then. He must be a great young man now. We all went to the birthday party. After the birthday party, Brigitte called me to her room, and in her room I saw a beautiful portrait of herself. Life size. Head and breast. I said, "Brigitte, you are as beautiful in your picture as you are in reality." She was engaged to a young National Socialist of Flanders. She must be married now and probably a mother. But she said, "That's not what I wanted to show you." She pulled that picture out, and behind that picture there was a beautiful picture of the Führer. I said, "That's wonderful. And you have this in your room." She said, "Yes. In the daytime I put my picture in front because the charwoman comes, this one comes, that one comes, my schoolmates come. (She was going to college.) They can't see it because it would put my parents into trouble. But otherwise, we all understand each other, and to you I can show it."

⁴ Savitri did not enter Germany from her release in Werl in 1949 until her pilgrimage in 1953. She left Germany in May of 1957. She stayed in India until the fall of 1960. The soonest she could have returned to Germany was late in the fall of 1960. The Foreword to Long-Whiskers was written in Hanover on 10 July 1961.

The youngest National Socialist I met in Germany in '71 was five years old, not even quite five. I can see him still. "Heil Hitler, Tante," putting out his arm. And there are several families in which this salutation is still pronounced. Not to everybody, of course. To those in whom they can have confidence. The German people have learnt as far as I know to be as silent as Japanese, to hold their tongues. That's the great lesson they learnt from '45, to hold their tongues.

In '48, I was staying with a family, and I was talking to the father of the family who had three children. Well, one was the child of his wife, a widow who had lost her husband in Russia. He fell on the field of honor in Russia. And he married her and gave her two other children. There were therefore three. The little boy was about six, and he used to go to school. And I was deploring the fact that the school was only one hour a day in those days. And the father told me, "Well, it is one hour a day because they have dismissed every National Socialist who was a teacher, and they put teachers in who are not National Socialists, and that means that one teacher has four thousand, five thousand pupils, and they can only take them one hour a day, and that with difficulty."

As he said that, the little boy interrupted and said, "Aber Herr Brücker ist genauso Nazi wie wir." Herr Brücker was his teacher. "Herr Brücker is just as much a National Socialist as we are." And he got such a slap from his stepfather. And I felt sorry for him. I said to his stepfather, "Why do you beat him like that, poor child? He didn't mean anything bad." And the stepfather said, "Yes, but he must learn his lesson. He tells you that Herr Brücker is a National Socialist, which is probably true, and it doesn't matter, if you are one too. But he will tell somebody else tomorrow. He'll tell Tom, Dick, and Harry, and we'll all get into trouble, and Herr Brücker will get into trouble. So he has to keep quiet. He has to learn to keep quiet." And then he turned to the boy. The boy had not cried. He took it without saying a word. A brave little boy, worthy of his father fallen in Russia. And he said, "Well, Gerhard, do you understand this now? Do you understand it? Do you understand that I gave you a slap because you deserved it?" And Gerhard said, "Yes, I do."

That's the spirit. That's the spirit. You have that spirit in Germany. And I can say one thing: I admire Germany in the person of the few National Socialists I met there—and how many is one to meet?—more than I did in 1935. In '35 I heard of all this enthusiasm. I was in India. And I used to say, well, "One day I'd go back to Europe. One day I'll perhaps be able to tell the Führer that I'd be bringing him the alliance of the élite of India." That was all right. There was an atmosphere. But in '48, among the ruins—and I saw something of those ruins. Hamburg was worse ruined than Babylon. I've seen the ruins of Babylon, and I can tell you, they are less ruined than Hamburg was in '48. It was charred walls, nothing but charred walls, and nobody in the streets, black streets. One platform in the station instead of twenty-eight. And in '53 there were twenty-eight again, and there was a town. Wonderful people! I was more happy to see the resurrected Hamburg than I was of anything else. I said, "Where did they get that courage? Where did they get that stamina? They are invincible!"

And then not only Hamburg, Nuremberg. Nuremberg has been reconstructed practically as it was. Thanks to boys and girls who, under the bombs, would go to the tops of the buildings and take the measurements in order to reconstruct them after the war. They did it during the war. And now you get Nuremberg growing out. Well, it doesn't look like the old Nuremberg, of course, because it is not centuries ago since it has been built. But in centuries to come, it will look the same, or more or less. At least they did what they could.

In the Prinzipalmarkt of Münster, in 1536—I'm sorry to say, but this is something that is very disturbing to me—Jan van Leiden, Bernt Knipperdolling, and Heinz Krechting,⁵ the three heads of the Wiedertäufer, the Anabaptists, were tortured to death in front of ten thousand people. I detest these foreign creeds that set Germans against Germans and Aryans against Aryans for some quibble, something to do with some ideology that is not even European. I hate that. Anyway, under this Prinzipalmarkt, under the footpath, there are ten thousand people now, descendants of those who watched that, buried under there due to the bombardments. And the Prinzipalmarkt has been reconstructed. The houses with these slanting roofs and gables and all that. It's all there, just as it was. Just as it was. And so many other towns. They have done their best. It's wonderful to see Germany since '48. I couldn't come back until '53. There were only five years between the two, and in five years, I saw such wonders. And the spirit, growing.

⁵ Jan van Leiden (b. 1509) ruled Münster in 1534-1535. He was a charismatic religious visionary who proclaimed himself king and instituted Old Testament law, including polygamy. After a brief reign of terror, he was deposed and executed, along with his henchmen Bernt Knipperdolling and Heinz Krechting, on 22 January 1536.

2. THE COTSWOLDS CAMP, 1962

Well, I already knew Mr. Colin Jordan and Mr. John Tyndall and the other members of the National Socialist Movement.⁶ The NSM existed since 1962. I think it might have existed even before. I was in England in '61 for Easter holidays, and it was not yet the NSM, but some other organization headed by Mr. Andrew Fountaine.⁷ And Jordan, I don't know whether he was in it or not. Anyhow, Jordan came to prominence after his great speech in Trafalgar Square in July '61. That was followed by the foundation of NSM and the growth of it. And then I met Françoise Dior in '62. Jordan was in correspondence with me, and he gave me her address and asked me to meet her.

And then in '62 I came over to England again, this was in July, as far as I remember. I put up in London at my friend Miss Gantry's, a perfectly apolitical woman, very pleasant and very understandable. She never spoke a word against us. She's perfectly apolitical. In sympathy, I would say. And I put up with her. And she told me, "Look here, you came to go to the Cotswolds camp. I know you have an international Hitler camp, and you want to go. If I were you, I would not go because look what's in the papers." She showed me a newspaper, and the paper said that any foreigner that goes to this camp will not set foot in England again. She said, "Isn't it a pity? You have so many friends here. You want to see them again. You want to be in touch with them. Look at the risk you are taking." With my natural spirit of defiance, I answered, "It doesn't matter. I'll take the risk. I'm always ready to take the risk—for these kinds of things." And I went.

We had a meeting at the NSM in Holland Park, and we went to the station in separate groups. We were to meet somewhere else. We were to meet at Cheltenham, and from Cheltenham a car was to take us to the camp. All right, we traveled all night and went to Cheltenham. I don't remember if we went at night. We were in Cheltenham part of the day, and that night again we went to a place. I didn't know where we were going. I couldn't have found the camp again. We arrived in the camp. There were tents, and we each occupied a tent, or sometimes two or three in a tent. I was sharing my tent with a Belgian lady whose son was in the movement. Her son was with somebody else. And I remember awakening the next morning. It was Tyndall's voice coming from a tent, and they were speaking to I don't remember who. He said, "What? They are in bed still? Kick them out. Fancy staying in bed all this time until 8:00 like bloody democrats." When I heard that, I thought to myself, "But I'm in bed still. I must get up—quick, quick, quick." So I got up.

⁶ Colin Campbell Jordan was born in 1923. John Tyndall lived from 1934-2005.

⁷ In May 1961, Savitri attended a British National Party camp on the estate of its president Andrew Fountaine (1919-1997) in Narford, Norfolk.

And I went to the river. As soon as I possibly could, I went to the river. It was practically deserted—nobody there—and I started bathing in the river. It was freezing cold water. I didn't want to be called a bloody democrat or acting like one. They came and offered me hot water, tepid water. I said, "No, thank you. I'll bathe in cold." So I bathed in the freezing cold water. It was summer of course. I don't know if I would have done it in winter. But in summer it was quite all right. And I came out, and I went up and had breakfast. We had tea. I don't like tea myself, but I took tea all the same. There was nothing else. There was no coffee.

And the camp started. Contact with different people. There were Swedes. There were Germans, of course, a good majority of Germans. There were one or two Italians, one or two Frenchmen, some Belgians, and one or two Americans. One or two Americans, one named Harry May. This Harry May had a swastika brassard on his right arm. He was the only one to wear one. And he showed himself extremely sympathetic and ran up to me and wanted to talk to me. There were others too. He really wanted to talk with me. I thought he was all right. I thought he was. I didn't know.

3. GEORGE LINCOLN ROCKWELL⁸

Anyhow, it went first day, second day, third day, and one day there was a surprise committee for us. They told us there was a surprise. They said, "Be ready. Sit on the benches, and you are going to have a surprise." Of course I was surprised before that to see that Tyndall had vanished. And Jordan, Jordan was not there. So I was wondering why. And they said to us, "They'll come later." Actually on that day—it was the 4th of August or the 3rd, I don't remember; it was very shortly after the beginning of the camp—there was the Horst-Wessel-Lied played. There were lights all over the place. It was in a forest. And suddenly, coming up from the river, I saw Rockwell—Tyndall one side of him, Jordan the other side of him. And we all stood up. We stretched out our arms, and the Horst-Wessel-Lied was played. And we were so pleased to see Rockwell.

⁸ George Lincoln Rockwell (1918-1967).

It was written in all the papers, "This man shall not come to England." He was absolutely unwanted by the government, by the system. And the next thing we saw in the papers, "This man is in England," and he was here. He gave us a speech on that very night. A speech that lasted practically all night. Well, not all night, but with the questions it practically lasted all night. It was the first time I saw Rockwell. I was really thrilled.

He was a great personality, but from what he told us on that very night, I felt, "Poor Rockwell, I wouldn't like to be in his place." Why? Because he became conscious of the value and truth of National Socialism after the war. And after he had fought the war so well on the American side as to get decorations and what not. He was a very good soldier. And I wouldn't have liked to be in his place. To have fought National Socialism all these years and then when the war is finished, when the other side has won, to find out that it was the truth. To find out that he had fought against the truth. Really I wouldn't like to be in his place. I'd rather be a little nobody, which I am.

But I liked him for his sincerity and for his courage. It takes courage to say, "I was wrong," especially when one had such a great reputation as he had, decorations and what not. He could've kept quiet. He did not keep quiet, because he knew that the truth was the truth, and one has to stick up for it. And he told us all this, his own history. It was after the way he had seen the reaction of the average American to MacArthur and to his policy that he had made an inquiry and found that National Socialism was right. And then he founded and organized this American Nazi Party that is called today the National Socialist White People's Party, NSWPP. It's not the only movement in America. But it is one of the movements, the main movement. There are two or three other little small groups.

At the time, I had been in touch with several of the members of the National Socialist Party of America. Among others, one Dan Burros.⁹ I had been in correspondence with him from India. He used to write me enthusiastic letters. And suddenly he stopped. So I asked Rockwell, "What happened to Dan Burros?" And the answer of Rockwell struck me and made me admire Rockwell all the more. He said, "I kicked him out, that one." I said, "Why did you kick him out? What has he done?" "Well, I caught him half strangling a poor dog, and I don't want cowards in the National Socialist movement. To hurt an animal is to be a coward, especially a faithful, trusting dog. So I kicked him out."

⁹ Dan Burros (1937-1965).

That, I thought to myself, is something that the Führer himself could've done. I don't know whether he ever did it, whether he had the opportunity of doing it. But he could've done that. And it was the first time that I ever heard of a political party leader, a man who depends on public opinion to have a following, kick a man out of his party because that man had shown cruelty to an animal. I found that very good. I said, "Bravo, Rockwell, you did the right thing. In fact you did the right thing."

And I was to find out more about the famous Dan Burros a few years later in Montbrison where I was working in France as a stop-gap teacher. There was a newspaper on the table one morning. I saw it when I came down to get my morning coffee. And in that paper there were a few lines. A man called Dan Burros had been found dead in New York in his room. He killed himself. And it is presumed that he committed suicide after an article had been printed in the New York papers saying that he, although a member of the National Socialist party, was in reality a Jew. So I was fixed on Dan Burros. That's all.

So now more about Rockwell. I read his book, This Time the World, his autobiography.¹⁰ There were passages in it that I liked very much. And there were passages I didn't like so much. The passages I didn't like so much were those about his wives, his children. He could've mentioned the whole lot in a few lines. I didn't see the necessity of talking so long about his private attachment to his first wife and then why he separated from her, and then the second one was a beautiful Icelandic girl, all right. In fact the beautiful Icelandic girl left him when she made him choose between the movement and herself. And he chose the movement. Good for him. But why? Why not stick to him all the same, in spite of all the inconveniences? I find that not very good for a Nordic woman, to leave him for that. She's left him, and the children are with her in Iceland. Anyhow, that's the only thing I would say that was not absolutely well within my expectations of his book. The book is very fine. In fact it's quite all right. A very good book.

4. THE END OF THE COTSWOLDS CAMP

I saw the birth of the World Union of National Socialists, WUNS, founded by Rockwell—Rockwell was the first head of it—and by Tyndall and by Jordan and by all these heads of the parties that were there. Of course I joined it. And then I went to London, sent by the others, to pick up some American comrades, an American comrade and his wife. And I found them at the airport, and they went to their hotel, and it was said that we would go next morning to the camp. I knew how to go to the camp by now. But next morning, they showed me the papers: "The camp has been broken up." I said, "Really, the camp's been broken up, so what to do?" He said, "There's no use going. Don't go yourself. You'll only be getting yourself into trouble." I said, "But I left my things there. I left my suitcase and all of my things. I must collect that."

¹⁰ George Lincoln Rockwell, This Time the World (Glendale, California: Parliament House, 1962).

So I went. In spite of all, I went back to the camp. The camp was in a turmoil, but my things were there. I said, "All right, I'm going to collect them." But to my astonishment, the police were there also. And the police took the passports of everyone, and I asked Jordan, "Should I give my passport?" "Well, I can't tell you to not give it, because you have a foreign passport." Of course I had a Greek passport, not an Indian one any longer, because India didn't want to renew it. But I had to have a passport, so I took my old Greek one back again. The police saw it and put some stamp on it that I was not to come back to England again.

And from that day I tried four times to land in England again, and I was repelled every time. I was sent back. I tried by plane. I tried by boat. I tried every way. I was sent back. And it was all the more vexing because I was publishing a book in England at that time, Long-Whiskers and the Two-Legged Goddess, a book about cats, but not only about cats. The sub-title of it is, The True Story of a "Most Objectionable Nazi" . . . and Half-a-Dozen Cats. It has nine pictures, nine beautiful cat pictures in it. It exists, but of course, I would've liked to have fifteen hundred copies. I was never given more than two hundred seventy copies. I distributed a few. I had approximately a hundred and fifty in France with my other books. When I left for India in 1971, I had to leave them somewhere. I couldn't take all that by plane. And the friend in whose house I left them died. Her husband died also. And her two daughters just burnt the lot. Not only those books but other books of mine and the last of my doctoral theses. And some books that I valued very much because the people who had given them to me are now dead. One of these books was a present to me by Frau Himmler, Himmler's widow, and other books. They only gave me one or two books, A Universal History and Asiatic Mythology,¹¹ one or two books that a friend of mine collected and sent over to me. And he was told, "We burnt the lot. They were either non-interesting or even horrible books." Horrible books?

¹¹ Probably Leopold von Ranke, Universal History: The Oldest Historical Group of Nations and the Greeks, ed. by G.W. Prothero (New York: Harper and Brothers, 1885)

Now let's talk of something else. Let's talk of Harry May. Harry May disappeared. He disappeared. Nobody knew where he was. He stayed one day or two. And I went and asked Rockwell, "What's happened to this man, Harry May?" "What's his name?" "Harry May." "Oh," he said, "Dear me, Harry May, that Communist." I said, "How did he come here?" I said, "Why did he come here? Why did he wear a swastika on his arm?" He said, "Well, he came to see." And he vanished. I heard of him again. He wrote to me a letter from the USA at my address. I had given him my address in all confidence. I never wrote again, naturally. And I was told that he had been very glad to see me, but that, of course, his ideas were not the same. Well, I could understand that his ideas were different since Rockwell himself told me he was on the other side. And I regretted very much that I gave him The Lightning and the Sun. And I saw the copy I had given him. He had underlined so many things. He had taken notes and this and that. So thoroughly, I could hardly understand why, as my book is not so important as to underline all these things. Apparently, he considered it worth underlining. And he sent to me a nasty book of Wilhelm Reich, a dirty Jew who writes about sex. I am not and I never was interested in sex. It's a chapter that has no place in my life at all. Why did you send me that dirty book? I don't know. Of course, I threw away the dirty book. I didn't even take the trouble of wasting my eyesight to read it. And that was that. Why did he send it to me? That made me even more suspicious. Well, there was one good thing in the fact of him sending me that book. It meant that he lacked any knowledge of psychology, because I'm the last person to send such a book to. Therefore he did not have any knowledge of what I am, and that's a good thing. A Communist without any knowledge of psychology is not such a dangerous Communist as one with a knowledge of psychology, naturally.

5. COLIN JORDAN, JOHN TYNDALL, AND FRANÇOISE DIOR

Now let us talk about Jordan and Tyndall. I liked them very much. Both of them. And my great regret is that they are not together still. I and Joseph Hackin, et al., Mythologie asiatique illustrée (Paris: Librairie de France, 1928). In English: Asiatic Mythology, a Detailed Description and Explanation of the Mythologies of All the Great Nations of Asia (New York: Crescent, 1963).

liked them very much. And Jordan introduced me to Françoise Dior, former countess of Caumont La Force. Her first husband was a member of one of the oldest French families, noble families, and she had by him a daughter who must be now twenty.¹² She was born on the 4th of November, I think twenty years ago [1958].¹³ Now Françoise Dior was born in 1932 on the 7th of April. And she grew up under the German occupation. And she had some very nice memories from that. She must've been beautiful as a child. She is a beautiful woman today. But she must've been very beautiful also as a child. And one of her sweetest remembrances she told me was the caress on her blonde hair of an SS man's hand, saying, "What a beautiful little Aryan girl." She was about eight or ten. She remembers that.

Of course, that didn't impress her. That did not impress her. She didn't link this with any ideology at the time. And her great love was French nobility, old France, France before the Revolution of 1789. And I quite understand her, for personally I always was against the French Revolution of 1789. I too was a royalist when I was eight years old, nine years old. A different kind of royalist, a royalist in favor of the King of Greece. But it was the same thing. I was a royalist to begin with. And so was she. And her dream was to marry into the French nobility because it was nobility. She believed in nobility.

Until she had great disappointments with it. She married a man who was not, well, what we would call a model. His private life was anything but the model of an Aryan, and an Aryan of noble family on top of that. She put up with him for some time, and then she had to divorce.¹⁴ She took the child. She divorced. And slowly it dawned on her that real nobility was not a title. But real nobility was the nobility of blood. If you have the blood and the title, all right. But in that case, your title must give you the feeling that you have to live up to it. You can't have any sort of private life with a title.

But she was already in that milieu, and it was very difficult for her to pull herself out and to live up to the austerity of a real National Socialist. She feels National Socialist, of course. But many times I've told her about the needed austerity of everyday life if one is a National Socialist. She tries to live up to it. At least she tried.

¹² Dior's first husband was Robert-Henri Aynar de Caumont La Force (b. 1925).

¹³ Dior's daughter, Christiane Caumont La Force, was born 4 November 1957 and hanged herself on 4 July 1978. Savitri learned of her death only in the latter half of 1979 (Letters to O.L., 16 July 1979 and 19 January 1981).

¹⁴ According to Terry Cooper (personal correspondence, 20 April 2002), the divorce was initiated by Dior's husband because of her infidelities.

I've not met her for quite a number of years now, more than seven years, and I only know of her evolution through very rare letters. I am at fault. I should have answered her last letter. Owing to many reasons, owing first of all to the fact that writing is difficult for me with my poor eyes, I have not yet replied. I am going to reply for the Winter Solstice.

She's interested in occult things, and she would like to have an occult background, that is to say, a background of experience of—I wouldn't say yoga—but the equivalent of it, to strengthen, not her belief in National Socialism, but her efficiency in supporting it. Of course, if one has developed yogic powers one is stronger, but I don't know exactly what way she's following. She told me she was following a way that was difficult but quick. I don't know enough about it, enough about what she's doing, what she's following, who is the man or the person who is helping her. To give an opinion, I'd have to know all that, and I don't know a word about it.

The only thing I can say is that she did a few rash things in Paris and had herself put in jail. She put up with jail very bravely. She was again in jail in England, accused of having ordered two members of the NSM to set fire to a synagogue, which was not the case. She never gave any such order. And she was asked in her trial, "Why did you give that order?" She said she didn't give it, and she was asked, "Do you approve of setting fire to synagogues?" If she had answered, "I don't approve of it at all," she would've got away with it. She would've perhaps had a month imprisonment. She had in fact something like two years. And she had these two years for the boldness of her answer.¹⁵

I had given her a piece of information. I had told her that around page 84 of Hans Grimm's book Warum? Woher? aber Wohin? it is said that the Führer himself did not approve of the pogrom of the night of the 9th of November 1938. It was organized, or rather supported, by Goebbels on his own account without the knowledge of the Führer at all. It was a movement whose real root was the indignation of the German people because at least two prominent Germans, Gustloff and vom Rath, were killed by two Jews, the last one being the famous Grynszpan.¹⁶

And it was a reaction to that, just as there was a reaction in 1905 in my own native town of Lyons because the president of the republic, Mr. Carnot, happened to be killed there by an Italian.¹⁷ The Italian quarter was wrecked and ruined. People were even hurt. They tortured Italian pigs, pigs belonging to Italians, that is to say. It was a stupid thing to do and an awful thing to do. They were not the cause of that thing. The same thing, minus torture of animals, happened in Germany. People were indignant.

¹⁵ Dior was tried at the Old Bailey and in January, 1968 was sentenced to eighteen months in Holloway Prison.

¹⁶ Wilhelm Gustloff (1895-1936) was the leader of the Swiss National Socialist Party, who was assassinated by David Frankfurter. Ernst vom Rath (1909-1938) worked at the German Embassy in Paris and was the random victim of Herschel Grynszpan. Both assassins were Jews.

But the Führer did not approve of it. He told Goebbels the next day, "You have set my work back for years and perhaps broken it entirely with your stupid nonsense. Stupid nonsense, why? Because this will give a bad name to Germany in foreign lands. And we don't need that bad name now. We need to go forth without any complications. Why do you create trouble?" So, that's what the Führer said. I told Françoise about that. And she remembered it. She remembered the quotation of Hans Grimm, also the page and the book. And she had replied to the judge in front of everybody, "Well, I cannot approve of the burning of synagogues and such kind of things because the Führer did not. And I cannot approve of anything which he did not approve of. And I know he did not approve it because it's written in Hans Grimm's German book, Warum? Woher? aber Wohin?, page so-and-so." She got that information from me.

In fact, I myself was asked in Germany in 1955 what I thought about that pogrom. And I told them, "Well, I used to approve of it until last year, 1954." They said, "What, in 1954, you got better knowledge, better sense, and now you understand that it's wrong?" I said, "Not at all. In 1954, the book of Hans Grimm, Warum? Woher? aber Wohin?, appeared, and I read it and in that book I saw the Führer did not approve of it. Therefore, I cannot approve of a thing that he disapproves of. That's the only reason why I don't approve of it. Because, in the time, in 1938, I was in North Bengal preaching for the Hindu Mission. And when I heard of the pogrom, well, I said, 'All right, good for them. Some damage to some Jewish shops, and what of that? Doesn't make any difference.' But now I know the Führer was against it, I am naturally against it." My answer angered the people I was talking to in Germany, people who were not National Socialists, more than if I had said I approve of it, even more.

So I can understand the reaction of the judge in Françoise Dior's case. He gave her two years, and she put up with it, and she scrubbed the floor in the prison. She was made to do the most heavy work, and she did it joyfully.¹⁸ People insulted her.¹⁹ People caused her to have a very bad time, and she said, “I don’t mind at all. I’m doing this for my Führer.” And I liked that. I told Françoise, “I’m proud of you,” when she told me that she was in prison.

¹⁷ Marie-François-Sadi Carnot (b. 1837), the fourth President of the third French Republic, was assassinated in Lyons on 14 June 1894 by Italian anarchists.

Now, I cannot say more about her because I have not been in touch with her for many years. But she was sincere. She is sincere, I think. And even if she does not always understand all the implications of National Socialism, well, who does? It’s no business of mine. My business is to try to be a good National Socialist myself and not to criticize anybody.

About the dealings between Françoise Dior, Jordan, and Tyndall, it’s better to ask Tyndall himself, or Colin Jordan.²⁰ It’s no business of mine at all. And I really regret that whatever happened might’ve contributed to the breaking up of the NSM, and I deplore that very, very, very much. But I think that if the people in the NSM had been a little more attached to the ideology, whatever may happen in the private sector could not influence their attitudes, and they could’ve stayed together all the same. There was no reason for the falling apart between Jordan and Tyndall, and they have stayed apart.

Tyndall is now heading the National Front in Britain. I’m very glad of that. I’m very glad the National Front is against entry of more and more and more complete non-Aryans or mongrels. Colin Jordan wrote to me lately telling me that Tyndall accepts the membership of Jews in the National Front—if they are English Jews, of course. I did not answer his letter. I don’t know whether that’s true or not, and therefore I’m not repeating it. I’m just saying that Jordan wrote to me to tell me that. I did not reply to him. I don’t know what to say. I’m not on the spot, and I don’t wish to judge. I hope it’s not true. I hope it’s a mistake. I hope it's misinformation and not any gesture of Jordan's purposely directed against Tyndall. I hope that the difference, the falling apart, is a thing of the past completely now.

¹⁸ According to Terry Cooper (personal correspondence, 20 April 2002), Dior did cleaning work only once in prison, then complained to the prison doctor about her health. Her doctor in Paris sent a letter certifying that her health was delicate. From then on, she worked in the prison jam factory, which she enjoyed so much that jam making remained a hobby once she was released from prison, eventually to the distress of her close friends.

¹⁹ While in prison, Dior’s fellow prisoners nicknamed her “Nazi Nell.” Prison nicknames, however, are not uncommon and not necessarily mean-spirited.

²⁰ In 1963, Dior was briefly engaged to Tyndall. She then broke her engagement and took up with Colin Jordan. They were married in a Nazi ceremony in London on 6 October 1963. In August 1964, Tyndall split off from Jordan and the National Socialist Movement, launching the Greater Britain Movement. Tyndall maintains that the split was purely political and denies that it was motivated by the loss of Dior to Jordan.

6. IMMIGRATION AND MISCEGENATION

Whatever it is, anything that can contribute to the stopping of the inrush of non-Aryans into England and their settling there and their marrying there and their mixing with English people, anything like that is very good. But they should've thought of it long before. This invasion of England by non-Aryans and this awful damage to the Aryan race in England is in reality, in my eyes, a sort of divine punishment for England raising her hand against Adolf Hitler. That's what a country gets when it turns against Adolf Hitler and against his people.

Unfortunately, his own people are having the same trouble with the Gastarbeiter.²¹ I wouldn't mind so much if the Gastarbeiter in Germany were only North Italians, say. Lombards are Aryans. Or if they were really good Greeks. Not all Greeks are really good. Some Greeks are mixed, like some Italians are mixed. In most countries of southern Europe, you get people who are not perfectly worthy of marrying northern Europeans, Aryans. But you have a number of Turks among the Gastarbeiter. And that's the trouble. Turks and what not, anything you can imagine, anything you can imagine.

I wouldn't be astonished if you have North Africans. There are so many in France. I don't know if they are invading Germany also, but France has about two or three million North Africans, Berbers and Arabs. Well, of course, these people have been breeding very heavily since the occupation of their country by the French. In 1830, they were not so numerous, and they never needed to go outside the frontiers of North Africa, of Algiers. Now I think they are ten times more numerous or fifteen times more numerous than they were in 1830. And they need space. Well, instead of invading their neighbors, they invade the former protecting countries. And they marry French girls. Well, it's the fault of the French girls. It's not the fault of the Arabs. Because the French girls are not so natural, if they haven't got the sense of a tigress, who will not mate with another species unless she is forced to. Or the lion.

They tried an experiment in the zoo in Vienna. Before the war, the zookeepers were party members. Everybody who had a government job in Austria or the greater Reich was generally a member of the party. After the war it seems they dismissed all the zookeepers who had been Nazis. Now fancy that. As though they were going to make Nazi propaganda among their animals. The animals don't need it. Animals are naturally Nazis. At least the higher animals, the big cats, the felines. They took it into their heads to do an experiment, and they put an unfortunate lioness with a tiger. Well, the poor tiger didn't want the lioness, and the lioness didn't want the tiger, but what could they do? They are animals. Men can't keep control of their instincts. I mean to say, many men cannot. But I speak of big felines. And they mated, and the product was a feline, and they called that a "tigro."

²¹ Guest workers.

Well, if I say a human being hasn't the sense that a tigress has, that is to say, willfully goes with a person of another race, it's not the fault of the person of the other race, it's the fault of the woman. I disapprove strongly of these French women who go around with the North Africans or anything else, any other non-Aryan, and of the English women in Cheltenham. That's a small place in the West of England where I went before going to the Cotswolds camp. I met two perambulators with half-Negro babies in them. In a small town like that. How do those things happen? How do these women come to do these things? That is what puzzles me. And if they do, well, they are not worthy to belong to the Aryan race. They should be dismissed.

If I were the dictator of England I would send them to work in some place where they have need of workers. Instead of sending a foreign worker, I would send them. After sterilizing them, because it's no good mating them with an Aryan afterwards. I suppose you know that the people who breed dogs, say Alsatians or something like that, do. If an Alsatian bitch has been with a mongrel dog, they do not mate her with an Alsatian again. If she's impregnated once it's sufficient. She's no longer useful for breeding purposes. They might keep her if they like her. I don't see why they shouldn't keep her, poor dog. Why kill her? No, certainly not. I'm not for killing her. But they don't mate her again. They don't have her mated again.

7. MATT KOEHL²²

I like Matt Koehl. I admire him. He's a very worthy successor of Rockwell, and he has an advantage over Rockwell. He's a German. It's not Rockwell's fault, of course, but in my eyes, that's an advantage. I wish I could become a German one day myself if there was such a thing as reincarnation. I don't know whether I'd like to be a German or not. But at first glance, I'd like to be. On the other side, I don't know if I would like to be a German if I had to put up with the discipline in the German family. Suppose my father was an anti-Nazi. It can happen in Germany, you know. Suppose my father was an anti-Nazi and gave me slaps and kicked me about because of my ideas. That could happen. I wouldn't like it to happen. I'd rather be something else, but a Nordic race of course.

²² Matthias Koehl was born in 1935.

To speak of Matt Koehl: I like his articles. I read his articles in White Power. I like White Power immensely. I think it's one of the best papers that comes out in the USA. And I find that whatever he says is perfectly logical. Another thing: he never speaks of himself. He speaks of the ideology. And his book is very good. Very, very good really.²³ I have nothing to say except one thing: I'd like to meet him. I've never met him. I'd like to meet him very much. I think he's most efficient.

There's one thing I don't like in the movements of America. There are too many. I don't like this idea of small National Socialist groups that exist only because somebody wants to be at the head of them. I'd like them to all meditate on the example of Streicher, Julius Streicher, the one of the Nuremberg martyrs who said "Heil Hitler!" in front of the gallows. They were his last words, his words before that being, "One day the Bolsheviks will treat you as you are treating us." Now, "Heil Hitler!" and he went up, and they hanged him. Well, this man Streicher had a party of his own. He was the head of, well, I would say, a national socialist party, a party with the same ideas, when Adolf Hitler was rising. But he felt that Adolf Hitler was the man, that he was worth more than Streicher was. Streicher was sincere and disinterested, and this disinterested attitude is the attitude for a National Socialist. What did Streicher do? He went to his followers and told them, "The party is dissolved. I am dissolving it. There's no more party at all. You go join the NSDAP. I'm joining the NSDAP myself. Hitler is our Führer, Führer of all the Germans." And he dismissed his own people and told them to join our party, the growing party, the party of the future. Well, why don't these small leaders, those who are conscious at least of the efficiency of Matt Koehl, tell their followers to join the NSWPP?

There's another thing I feel rather shaky about, and I felt that already under Rockwell. It's the insistence, in some of the literature supposed to be National Socialist from the USA, on the ideas of “Christian” and “White.” Even the title of Matt Koehl’s organization, National Socialist White People’s Party. Well, if I were a Jewess, I would join it. I would infiltrate. I would try to destroy it from inside, if I were a Jewess. And I would get in because I’m White. Isn’t that so? It’s a funny thing to see that more Jews have not thought of it. Well, good for us if they’re not so clever as they were once. If they’re going down, good for us.

²³ Savitri is likely referring to Koehl's pamphlet The Future Calls (Arlington, Virginia: National Socialist White People's Party, 1976).

But White is not necessarily Aryan. The Arabs are White. Real Arabs, not mixed with Negroes. But too many Arabs are mixed with Negroes because they have harems, and they like a variety of females. Unfortunately, a variety of females makes a variety of offspring. But those who are pure Arab are White. Berbers are White. Berbers are Mediterranean people. They were in North Africa before the Arabs came. Jews are White. Jews are Semites. They are the first cousins of the Arabs. They might be enemies, but they are the first cousins of one another, or should be. The Assyrians, the Akkadians, all these people of Mesopotamia and of North Mesopotamia, of the upper Euphrates, in antiquity, they were White. Hittites were White. I don’t know how far the Hittites were Aryans, or have Aryan mixture. I don’t know. Their language may be Aryan, but that doesn’t mean to say that they were. Many people speak an Aryan language. Negroes speak English today. Who doesn’t? That doesn’t mean they are Englishmen. Anyhow, White does not mean Aryan.

The trouble is that in the USA today, the situation is such that the people’s consciousness, simple people’s consciousness, is White and Black. If you say “White,” they understand. They wouldn’t understand the word Aryan, half of them. But it’s dangerous, because Jews are White. And they are much more dangerous than Negroes. A clever Jew is much more dangerous than a Negro. Negroes are like children. Leave the Negroes to themselves, absolutely to themselves, without any foreign influence, and they are not dangerous at all, except that they breed fast. Well, put them in another surrounding. Put them in another place, and don’t give them any development aid. That’s one thing I would say: this aid to the undeveloped should be stopped completely. Completely.

And even more I would say, I’m not for all this aid even to the developed. When I was in France as a stop-gap teacher we had propaganda: such and such a society for retardates, backward children, sick people, etc., etc., supporting, giving money for them to be pushed along, to be not so undeveloped. Even Whites, even Aryans who are not really up to the mark, deficient, shouldn't be encouraged, and encouraged to breed at that. I'm all for the steps that Adolf Hitler took, or wanted to take. He didn't take them, in fact. He couldn't take them, really, because the church was against him. Especially the Archbishop of Münster, von Galen.²⁴ Von Galen used to preach against the measures he wanted to take from his pulpit. These people should not be encouraged to live, because you cannot get a real strong Aryan society if you have these people in it, and if they breed. If they don't breed, all right. If you have a weak person that doesn't breed, it doesn't make any difference, but don't allow them to breed. Anyhow, that's one thing, White instead of Aryan.

Another thing is that mixture of Aryan and Christian. I have had very good propaganda sent to me from an organization called Sword of Christ in America asking for the liberation of Rudolf Hess. Nothing better. But telling us that it's from the so-called Christian point of view. I wrote to them. I told them what I thought of it, and they replied telling me that the Jews, the Israelites of antiquity, were originally Aryans. But how can they believe that? I know that's a theory. It doesn't come from them. It comes from a man called Saint-Yves d'Alveydre, a Frenchman who wrote a book a hundred years ago with a queer theory like that.²⁵ He also mixes up Hebrew words and Sanskrit words. "They look like each other, therefore they come from Sanskrit." They don't come from Sanskrit at all. It's just like so much stuff you read from old missionaries in India, telling you Hinduism comes from Judaism. Why? Why is it? One of the gods of India is Brahma. "Brahma is Abraham." His wife is Sarasvati. "Sarasvati is Sarah." All right! They put two words together, and it's finished. There's no good etymological connection between Brahma and Abraham. Absolutely none. But still they put one where there is none. And Saint-Yves d'Alveydre did exactly the same to support this theory that the ancient Israelites were Aryans. They were not Aryans at all. They were Semites, and they always were Semites.

They may be mixed with Aryans now. That's a different thing. And that is one of the reasons for their efficiency. When they mixed with ²⁴ Clemens August Count von Galen (1878-1946).

²⁵ Joseph-Alexandre Saint-Yves d'Alveydre (1842-1909) was an influential nineteenth-century French esotericist. His teachings on Agartha, the mysterious Himalayan headquarters of occult masters, and his concept of "root races" influenced, among others, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831-1891), the founder of the Theosophical Society. The book Savitri mentions is La Mission des Juifs, 2 vols. (1884) (Paris: Éditions traditionnelles, 1990).

Aryans. Especially when an Aryan marries a Jewess, the child is a Jew. The child is a Jew from his mother, not from his father. If an Aryan marries a Jewess, the child is a Jew according to Jewish law. And he gets some of the characteristics, some of the virtues from the Aryan race, along with some of the characteristics of the Jewish. He might get efficiency in trade from his mother and some sort of idealism, disinterested idealism, from his father. And then he's doubly dangerous.

That's what I have to say on Matt Koehl.

Chapter 3

RELIGION

On Christianity

1. GREEK ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY

I'll be very frank about Christianity. I used to go to church. I'm christened in the Greek Orthodox Church. And I used to go to church until I was about twenty-three, until I became conscious of being a National Socialist. The church was not really a church in those days. It was just a room in my native town. Now the Greeks of Lyons have a real church and a beautiful one. I go sometimes. I still go when I'm there. I used to go, but not because I loved the values of Christianity. I never could accept the values of Christianity. But, I liked the church. I liked the church because it was national, supposed to be national at least. I had been told that forever: "The national church of Greece is the Orthodox Church. Modern Greece is the daughter of Byzantium. It's the continuity of what was Byzantium once, what the Turks have destroyed. The Greek nationality would not be alive if it hadn't been for the church and for the monasteries under Turkish dominion for four hundred years." And this, and also the beauty of Byzantine music and of Byzantine singing. I used to go to church, and I liked it. And I like it still. But as far as the values of Christianity, that's a quite different thing.

By the way, I really believe that a very great number of modern Greeks don't believe in the values of Christianity at all. Many of them might not even believe in the facts that they are celebrating, for instance, Easter, the resurrection, and things like that. If you really ask them, if they are sincere, they will tell you, "The church tells us so, but it seems rather queer to believe, rather difficult to believe." It doesn't matter. They are attached to the church just because it is the national church.

My second doctoral thesis was on a Greek philosopher, Theophilos Kaïris, born in 1784, died in prison in 1853. He was put into prison by the Greek government for openly not believing in the Orthodox Church, the national church. The real theme of my thesis was not so much the person Kaïris, but the Greek mentality regarding religion. The modern Greek mentality is exactly the same as that of Ancient Greece. Socrates was condemned because he did not believe in those gods in which the city believed. Had he not been an Athenian, nobody would have cared in Athens. Had he been an Egyptian, a Persian, an Assyrian, nobody would have cared whether he believed in the gods of Greece at all. It was natural that he should believe in his own gods. Each country had its own. And there was harmony between them all. They used to borrow each other's gods now and then, when they really wanted the services of a god, against illness or something like that. That is antiquity. That is modern Greece.

No modern Greek would find it necessary to convert a Turk to Christianity. He's a Turk, well, all right. It's natural for a Turk to be Mohammedan. He's a man from Western Europe, and it's natural for a Western European to be a Protestant or a Catholic. He's a foreigner. A Catholic, even a Greek Catholic, is a foreigner. You can hear a Greek tell you, "Well, we have three foreigners in our building. There is a Catholic on the first floor. There's a Jew on the third floor. And there's an American on the ground floor." An American, a Jew, a Catholic: they're all foreigners.

Well, I had this spirit myself, as an adolescent. Although it was not my father's spirit. My father was not a believer at all. He was christened, but he didn't believe it. He was what you call a free thinker. My mother was a follower of the Church of England as an Englishwoman, but she was more and more and more going towards skepticism, agnosticism, as she grew older. In the end she used to say, "Well, I don't know whether the soul exists or not, whether we have a soul or not. That is a metaphysical problem that's beyond my comprehension."

2. CHRISTIANITY AND NATIONALISM

And what I had against Christianity from the very start was, first, that it was not national. It was not national. We had something before it in Greece. Why didn't we stick to that? We had something as beautiful and more beautiful than it. We had the worship of the sun. We had the worship of gods that represented natural forces. We had the worship of the forces of the universe. We were in harmony with the universe and not with man. It was not man-centered. Our religions were not man-centered. No religions of antiquity were man-centered. Except one. Judaism was not only man-centered, it was Jew-centered.

The other religions were, of course, national. But at the same time they were cosmic. Anything that has to do with sun worship or moon worship or worship of forces of nature is naturally cosmic. And the man of antiquity never thought anything of worshipping somebody else's gods. The Pharaoh Amenhotep III, when he was sick, couldn't find any solace by the means of the god of medicine, the god of healing, of Egypt, Khons the son of Amon and Mut. No. But he heard that Ishtar of Nineveh was good for healing. She had healing powers. He brought the statue of Ishtar of Nineveh from two thousand kilometers away. He brought it to Egypt. And it seemed that she cured him. She stayed two years in Egypt, and then she was sent back with her priests to Nineveh. That was the spirit of antiquity. Freedom, no intolerance at all. No lack of toleration. None of that, "If you don't belong to us, you're damned. If you don't have our religion, our belief, you're damned." None of that in antiquity. None of that before Christianity.

The Jews are quite a different thing. The Jewish religion is quite a different thing. The Jewish religion is national, tribal. Yahweh, Jehovah is the God of the Jews. The Jews will not say, "If you don't belong to Jehovah you are damned. Oh, no. Oh, no. You are a Moabite, it's quite natural you worship Chemosh. You are an Ammonite, you worship Milcom, quite natural. You're a Philistine, you worship Dagon, you worship somebody else, Philistine gods. But if you are in our Bezirk, in our region, you must be destroyed. This place is only for us." That's the Old Testament. I don't want to expatiate on that. I only ask those who don't believe me to open the Bible and read Deuteronomy chapter seven, the first verses of chapter seven. That's all in it.

Now I didn't like that very much. It has one advantage only, that is to say, it is forbidden for a Jew to marry a non-Jew. Not that the non-Jew is bad. Sometimes he does marry non-Jews. For instance, Mahlon, son of Naomi, married Ruth who was a Moabite.¹ And that very same Moabite married Boaz,² the son of Rahab of Jericho³ who herself was celebrated for taking in the Jewish spies of Joshua.⁴ Anyhow, they were taken in sometimes. "Your God is my God, and your people will be my people," said Ruth to her mother-in-law Naomi when, after the death of her husband, she followed Naomi to Judea. But it was an exception. Generally it was forbidden for the Jews to take women in Canaan. Although racially they were same. There was no difference between the Jew and the Canaanite, racially. But they were worshippers of different gods. And it was feared that they would entice their husbands to

¹ Ruth 1:4; 4:10.

² Ruth 4:13.

³ Matthew 1:2.

⁴ Joshua 2:1-7.

worship their gods. That was the great idea. In that way, of course it kept the Jews among themselves. It was a good thing, from a racist point of view.

3. INTERNATIONAL RELIGIONS AND RACE-MIXING

What I have against international religions—be it Christianity, be it Islam, the two religions that sprang from Judaism, be it even Buddhism that sprang from an Aryan creed—is that they are international and that they have no objection to interracial marriages. In Buddhism it's not generally done. You don't see an Indian Buddhist marry a Japanese Buddhist. A Japanese Buddhist wouldn't like it anyhow. Japanese people are really racials. But you could see Arabs with harems of women of all nationalities. The Arabs of Spain, the founders of the Caliphate of Cordova, were no Arabs at all after the third generation. The very son of Musa ibn Nusair, the conqueror of Spain in the early eighth century, was called Abdul Aziz. He married a Visigoth woman, Egilona, the widow of the last king of the Visigoths.⁵ And his son married another Aryan, or part-Aryan, and his son the same thing. After three generations or four there was virtually no Arab blood at all in the rulers of Cordova. And you get the same thing in other countries. You get intermarriages of Arabs and Negroes. Abyssinians are a mixture of the two. You get a mixture of Arabs and anything that's Mohammedan. If you are a Mohammedan you can marry any Mohammedan. And if you are a Christian, there's no reason why you shouldn't marry any Christian. According to the church it's not forbidden. It's not forbidden at all. And I don't like that.

I was always shocked by the National Socialist propaganda, very opportunist propaganda, saying that, "We have nothing against Christianity. We are very good Christians." That always shocked me. The one thing that I underlined when I read the twenty-five points for the first time—the twenty-five points was at the basis of National Socialism, for the public at least—is point twenty-four, "We stand for a positive type of Christianity." What does the Führer mean by positive Christianity? Probably: aid one another. All the institutions like NSV,⁶ the Winter Aid, Aid to Mother and Child, all these things represent what the public can consider as positive Christianity: love your neighbor. All right.

⁵ Roderick (c. 670-c. 711) was from 710-711 the last king of the Visigoths. Musa ibn Nusair lived c. 640-c. 715, his son Abdul Aziz c. 670-717. Egilona's dates are unknown.

⁶ NSV stands for Nationalsozialistische Volkswohlfahrt, National Socialist People's Welfare.

And then comes the end of point twenty-four: "The party is neutral in matters of religion. We admit any kind of religion, provided it does not shock the moral feelings of the German race and does not go against the state." Well, I thought of this, and I said to myself, "Any religion that allows marriage with view to reproduction between an Aryan and a non-Aryan, provided they are both christened in the same church, is naturally against the moral feelings of the Germanic people and against the interests of the state, and Christianity is one of these religions. A Catholic Negro can marry a Catholic of any country including a Catholic German. Why not? They are both Catholics."

I knew a couple, a mixed couple like that. The woman, a beautiful, young, blue-eyed blonde Aryan, the daughter of a German soldier of the First World War and of an Alsatian woman. Unmarried. Doesn't make any difference. An Aryan. She met in some bar room in Lyons, my native town, a perfectly brown, dark brown Dravidian of South India, considered by other Indians of upper castes as an untouchable. And he was a Catholic, and she was a Catholic, and the two married. And they had four children, three sons and a daughter. Fortunately the children are not married. I hope they never marry. They were very happy together it seems. The man was not bad. I have nothing against him. But I would've liked him to marry a Dravidian untouchable, a Dravidian harijan, they call it, like himself. And she should've married a Frenchman, an Alsatian, or a German. She was a German herself. But because they were Catholics they got married. If they had not been Christians at all, if he had been worshipper of Mariama—Mariama is a mother goddess of South India, one of the numerous mother goddesses of South India—and she a worshipper of Wotan, like in antiquity, they never would have come together. There you are. That is the advantage of these national creeds. They keep each one in his place.

And when they don't, well, it's an exception. Or else the two people are very near each other. You had, for instance, probably intermarriages between people who worshipped Thor in antiquity and Slavs. How did the Poles come about? Poles are Slavs with a mixture of German. They are not pure Slavs, and so many Russians are not pure Slav either. The Russians, the ancestors of the Russians, before Christianity worshipped another god with a hammer also, with four heads, Perun. Perun and Thor got along very well together. They were neighbors. They symbolized the same thing. Well, why not? They were brothers. They were very near in all this.

And of course you had the Gauls marrying Germans in the Merovingian days. Before the Gauls became Christians, they had their own gods. They had some international gods, cosmic gods, the sun and the moon, naturally. The sun and the moon. There's a lovely little dialogue in a French tale, a short story of Anatole France, of a Gaul who followed Caesar to England. And they are both coming back, and the Gaul saw with his own eyes the shattering to pieces of the Roman fleet on the coast of England due to the tide. And he knows the moon governs the tide. And he tells Caesar on his way back, "You see, the moon is a very powerful goddess, and she loves the Gauls. She's on the Gauls' side." And Caesar laughs and says, "Well, everybody considers the moon as a goddess. We do. The Greeks do. Everybody does. Even the Carthaginians did. And that moon, you say, belongs to the Gauls, but she's now shining over Rome." And the Gaul looks at him and says, "Shining over Rome, the moon? It must be a different moon." That's national spirit. I would say that. Real tribal spirit. It might look rather naïve to a person who lives in the twentieth century. But it has its advantages. It has its advantages.

The Gauls very quickly married Romans, and led to Gallo-Romans. But some of them also married Germanic people. All the North of France is Germanic. And I'd like to point out that not only the North of France but all of the aristocracy of Europe, all the kings and queens of Europe from the early days on, are Germanic. Even the Russians. Who was Rurik?⁷ Rurik was a German, or a Swede. It's the same thing. Who were the rulers of Italy? Well, the German emperors, of course. Who were the rulers of France? The Merovingians, the Carolingians, and the other ones. They were all descended from Germans, from Franks who conquered France. France was called France because of the Franks, and Franks are Germans.

They were Christians. That was their downfall. That is to say, they did not stay purely Germanic because they were Christians. They shouldn't have married people from the South of Europe. They should have married from the North of Europe. And you have some of the greatest emperors of Germany who married foreigners. For instance, Otto II. Otto II married Theophano, the daughter of Romanos II of Byzantium, the sister of Basilius, the exterminator of the Bulgarians, as we call him, Basilius II.⁸ She was his sister. His other sister, Anna, ⁷ Rurik (c. 830-c. 879) was a Viking warrior who founded the first Russian state of Novgorod in 762. His descendants ruled Russia until 1598.

⁸ Otto II, King of the Germans and Emperor of Rome (955-983), reigned from 961-983. Theophano (c. 959-991) married Otto II in 972 and bore the title of Empress of married the recently Christianized Russian Vladimir, and Russia became Christian, officially at least, from that day.⁹ The sign of Christianity is, in the beginning, intermarriage. And I don't like that.

Of course, I know there are some National Socialist groups in the USA like this Sword of Christ group in Arkansas that tell you the Bible doesn't encourage interbreeding. The Bible doesn't encourage it, perhaps. It doesn't encourage interbreeding of Jews with non-Jews, with non-Jews religiously. But it doesn't mind a Jew marrying a Semite who's converted herself or himself to Judaism. And you get converts to Judaism in the days of Christ and afterwards. Who was Timothy? Half Greek, half Jew. And there were many of these God-fearing people. They called them in the Bible, the New Testament, God-fearing. They were half Jew, half Greek, or proselytes, people who were living near the synagogue who were not circumcised but still worshiped Yahweh. And this, all this prepared Christianity.

That's what I have to say about Christianity. I'm not against it. I don't want to say that I would like to bring people away from it. If they have nothing else, let them have it. But I think on principle it's incompatible, not with National Socialism only, but with any attitude centered on race, centered on nation and race. In order to be a nationalist and a Christian, you have to distort Christianity. You have to consider it as a national religion, like the Irish do. The Polish do, in spite of Communism. Like the Spanish do. In that way they are all right. Nothing will happen to them. But it is due to a misunderstanding of the spirit of Christianity, of the spirit of Christianity as it has come to us through the legend of Christ, perhaps not through the historical Christ, if it is true—I don't say it is, but some people think it is—that the historical Christ was really a Jewish nationalist fighting the Romans.

4. ROBERT AMBELAIN ON CHRISTIANITY

[I wish to recommend three books by Robert Ambelain.¹⁰] They Rome until her death in 991. Her father (or on some accounts, god-father) Romanos II, Emperor of Byzantium (940-963), reigned from 959-963. His son, Basil II, Emperor of Byzantium (958-1025), reigned from 976-1025.

⁹ Anna, Princess of Byzantium (963-1011), married Vladimir, Grand Duke of Kiev (c. 956-1015), in 988 or 989 to seal a military and dynastic alliance. One of the conditions of the marriage was Vladimir's baptism. Vladimir was the great-grandson of Rurik.

¹⁰ Robert Ambelain, Jésus, ou le mortel secret des Templiers [Jesus, or The Fatal Secret of the Templars] (Paris: R. Laffont, 1970), La vie secrete de Saint Paul [The were lent to me by this French lady. They are extraordinary, and they are all the more convincing in that the man is not a Jew. He's an Aryan, but he's pro-Jew. He's a very good Hebrew scholar. He knows Hebrew as I know French or English or Greek. And he is an historian. And a high graded Freemason, on top of that. What really gets up his nose is the antagonism between Christianity, especially Medieval Christianity, and the Jews. He says that, "May his blood fall on us and on our children,"¹¹ was an interpolation. "The Jews never said that. Why were they persecuted for saying that when they never said it?" Personally, I don't care if they said it or not. To me, it is quite immaterial.

To him, the person of Jesus is the son of a Jewish anti-Roman agitator, and he was himself an anti-Roman agitator and nothing else. No teacher of any sort of religion. Just an anti-Roman who was condemned to death by the Romans on the cross. Well, it's perfectly true that if he were really condemned by the Jews, according to Jewish law, on the charge of blasphemy for calling himself God, he would not have been crucified. He would've been stoned. The Jewish custom was stoning, lapidation, and not crucifixion. Of course he never called himself God. He always said, "the Father and I," "There are things I do not know but the Father knows."¹²

But even if he had called himself God and he were condemned by the Jews for blasphemy, he was crucified by the Romans. He was condemned by the Romans, not for calling himself God but for saying that he was "King of the Jews" and for resistance activities. He was a Jewish maquisard.¹³ According to Ambelain, his father also and his grandfather also. His grandfather Ezekias was supposed to have been crucified under Herod.

Now according to Ambelain, Paul was no insignificant little Jew. He was one-fourth Jewish and three-fourths Idumean, that is to say, Arab, of the dynasty of the Herods. He was the grandson of Herod the Great by his mother Cypros. And he was neither in the Arab gang nor in the Jewish. He was circumcised. He had himself circumcised when he was aged. That is to say, he was not circumcised as a baby. He had no place among the Jews, and Jews didn't like him. They did not like neophytes who come when they are older and for perhaps non-religious reasons.

Secret Life of Saint Paul] (Paris: R. Laffont, 1971), and Les lourds secrets du Golgotha [The Heavy Secrets of Golgotha] (Paris: R. Laffont, 1974).

¹¹ Matthew 27:25.

¹² Mark 13:32.

¹³ Guerrilla fighter.

So he tried to found a sect of his own. According to Ambelain, he took the person of that Jewish agitator and made him into a mystic figure, added to him all the characteristics of the age-old vegetation gods, Mithra, Osiris, Adonis, and others. The disciples of Jesus already had spread the rumor that he was resurrected, so half the job was done. He only had to say, "Yes, he was resurrected, and he rose up from the dead for the salvation of the world." He made him into a world figure, when in reality he wasn't even a Jewish figure. And by his doing that, he spread an influence of Jewry on the whole world. You have a perfect Aryan girl, a German named Ruth or named Sarah, or you have an Englishman named David. You have an Englishman, Isaac Newton, called Isaac. What is all that? What is that stuff? You have a man called Johannes. Johannes is Jokannan in the Hebrew. Jokannan is John. The whole thing has changed.

After the spreading of Christianity, after the acceptance of Christianity as a state religion by the Roman emperors after Constantine,¹⁴ it seems that then the gospels as we know them today were written. They hadn't got the same ones. There is no manuscript of any gospel except one or two, what they call the Apocrypha. And even then, there's no manuscript contemporary of Christ in the world. The first ones are of the fourth century AD. Those we have, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John (well, in reality, there were other names), date from the fourth century AD. The gospels that the Christians used to use before that date, they were taken back to Constantinople by order of Constantine. In packets of fifty. And packets of fifty of the new ones were given to them, the new ones we have today.

And there are queer things in them. For instance, in the gospel according to Matthew, Christ was born under Herod.¹⁵ Herod died in the year 4 BC. Therefore, he was born before 4 BC. Maybe 5 or 6 or 7 BC. According to Luke, he was born under the magistrateship of the Roman Quirinius.¹⁶ Quirinius ruled Palestine before Pilate, that is to say, in about 6 AD.¹⁷ That is to say, if Jesus were born in 4 BC. he would be at least ten years old. Which is the right date of birth? Why does one say this and one say that? Anyhow, this Ambelain has picked the gospels right through, the canonical ones and the apocryphal ones

¹⁴ Flavius Valerius Constantinus (c. 271-337) reigned from 306-337. Constantine's conversion followed the Battle of the Milvian Bridge in 312.

¹⁵ Matthew 2:1.

¹⁶ Luke 2:2.

¹⁷ Publius Sulpicius Quirinius (d. 21 or 22) ruled Palestine from 6-11.

that have survived in Coptic translation, in Slavonic translation, Ethiopian translation, in all sorts of translations. He has gone through them all. And it has given a figure of Jesus that is not at all the classical one.

The Jews are the ones behind the institution of Christianity.¹⁸ I'm quite sure of that. It was a means to emasculate the race. There is a contradiction between the principles of Christianity and warrior behavior. They can't go together. If you have to love your enemy like yourself, you can't fight. And the first Christians did not fight for the Romans. But there was a compromise. When Constantine wanted Christianity to be the state religion, he said, "Call the bishops." The bishops said, "All right, we accept it, but we have to accept to fight for you. It will no longer be an offense to fight for the Roman Empire." That was a compromise, an unhealthy compromise. All compromises are unhealthy. You can't have them, can't have them.

The gentle Jesus of the Christians, the classic gentle Jesus never existed. I believe in Ambelain's theory. The real Jesus was a Jew fighting for his own race, a very respectable man. I have nothing against him. I much prefer him to the classical image of Jesus, in fact. He didn't want the salvation of the whole world. He wanted his country to be out of the Roman Empire. I understand that. I quite understand his struggle. But that struggle doesn't interest mankind. It interests the Jews. And the Jews found out, of course, that the best way to put him onto mankind was to give him sort of a mystical personality, a personality of peace and what mankind wanted, and to assimilate his qualities with the qualities of the already existing gods.

Now 1,400 years BC, there was a religion, existing still in Christ's days, the religion of Mithra, the Iranian god. In fact, in the very words that are attributed to Christ at the moment of the consecration of the bread and wine, "He who does not eat my flesh and drink my blood has no eternal life," we have the exact replica in the cult of Mithra fourteen hundred years before: "He who does not eat my flesh and drink my blood has no eternal life." And this was discovered by Tertullian, the Christian father of the Latin church in the second century.¹⁹ And ¹⁸ This is the argument of Savitri's Paul de Tarse. Savitri's suspicions were shared by the American classicist and White Nationalist writer Revilo P. Oliver. See Revilo P. Oliver, Reflections on the Christ Myth (Uckfield, Sussex: Historical Review Press, 1994).

¹⁹ Quintus Septimus Florens Tertullianus (c. 155-c. 225).

Tertullian, of course, found an explanation. He had to find an explanation. How is it that Christ and Mithra speak the same language? He said, "Oh, no, that's not the fact. Christ is right, but the devil put these words into the cult of Mithra fourteen hundred years before out of mockery of what was going to be one day Christianity."²⁰ The devil did it. That's an explanation. It's no explanation in my eyes, anyhow. In reality, it's the Christians who took these words and applied them to their own master. Without that, their own master wouldn't be a god. He would just be a human being. And the crucifixion would have a quite different meaning. Crucifixion: he was condemned for rebellion against the Romans, that's all. The Christians made him into a sacrificial scapegoat. He was taking on the sins of the world.

5. CHRISTIANITY AS MAN-CENTERED

The message attributed to Christ is kindness to all men. But only to men.²¹ Animals are never mentioned in the gospels. Whether the person at the center of the gospel is the historic Christ or another person, invented by further commentators, especially Paul, it is a fact that no miracle is reported in favor of a creature that is not human. On the contrary, you get a fig tree that refuses to give Christ some figs out of season. It's mentioned in Mark.²² The fig tree did not give figs. It was out of season. And Christ curses the poor fig tree, and the next day it's gone completely withered. For not giving its figs out of season. What did he expect it to do? Did he expect the fig tree to give him figs out of season? And if he was so powerful why didn't he just give the fig tree the power to give figs out of season? That's something that used to shock me. That fig tree withered, cursed by the founder of Christianity, because it wouldn't give figs out of season, against the laws of nature.

And the poor Gadarene swine.²³ Here is a pack of people possessed by devils. The devils won't get out of them. They tell Christ, "We will only get out if you allow us to go into the swine." There was a herd of swine. Well, first of all, what business did a man have keeping a herd of swine in Judah? What was he bringing up these swine for? What was he herding them for? To sell them to the Romans, I suppose. For people ²⁰ See Tertullian, De praescriptione haereticorum [On the Prescription of Heretics], ch. 40.

²¹ For more on Christian anthropocentrism, see Impeachment of Man, ch. 1, "Man-Centered Creeds," and Souvenirs et réflexions, ch. 3, "Anthropocentrisme et intolérance."

²² Mark 11:13-14; cf. Matthew 21:19.

²³ Mark 5:1-14.

who used to eat pork. The Jews never eat pork. Anyhow, Christ allows these devils to enter these poor swine that have done no harm to anybody. And they go mad, and they throw themselves into the Sea of Galilee, from the cliff. I didn't like that. Whether it's true or not, I don't know. But I didn't like that. So many things I never liked in Christianity.

6. CHRISTIANITY AND INTOLERANCE

Another thing that I have against Christianity is that it was not taken freely by Europe. It was imposed on us. It was the fault of our princes, for different reasons that have nothing to do with religion. Constantine became a Christian in 313. Before him, ten years before, Tigran II, King of Armenia, became a Christian also.²⁴ And aren't the Armenians proud of that! "We are the first Christian nation," so they say. That is to say, Tigran II was the first Christian king. I don't know whether the Armenians followed him or not at once. Certainly the Greeks did not follow Constantine at once.

There were Christian communities already all over the Roman Empire. There were other communities too: Mithraic communities. Cybele, the mother goddess of Asia Minor, had many followers too. And these other religions were called religions of salvation. They had the idea of a god put to death and resurrected, risen from the dead, for the salvation of mankind. The idea that you have in Adonis, Osiris, and Tammuz, in those cults of Syria, of Egypt, and of Babylonia.

The fact is that Europe did not become Christian at once. First of all, why did Constantine become a Christian? His life was not a Christian life, absolutely not. He had his wife killed, on simple suspicion of adultery, not proof.²⁵ He had his own son killed.²⁶ He had so many people killed. Not Christian. But he was a Roman Emperor, and he wanted the unity of the Roman Empire. Unity of blood, there was none. Unity of language, there was none. And there could be none. There ²⁴ It was King Tiridates III (238-314) who introduced Christianity to Armenia after his conversion in 301. The year 303 is also given as the date of Armenia's conversion, perhaps because it was the year of the consecration of the cathedral of Echmiadzin, the holiest site of the Armenian Church. Tigran II (the Great) was born in 140 BC and ruled from 95 BC to his death in 55 BC.

²⁵ Flavia Maxima Fausta (c. 293-326) was the daughter of the emperor Marcus Aurelius Valerius Maximianus (c. 249-310, reigned 286-305). She married Constantine in 307 and bore him three sons and two daughters.

²⁶ Flavius Julius Crispus (c. 305-326) was the son of Constantine's mistress Minervina. He was likely killed for adultery with his stepmother Fausta.

could've been unity in the worship of the Emperor, but the worship of the Emperor only interested the Romans. It didn't interest the Syrians a bit. It didn't interest even the Greeks. I wonder if the Greeks did not even resent a temple to the goddess Rome on the Acropolis. There is a temple of the goddess of Rome on the Acropolis of Athens. A round temple. The ruins are there still. I don't know how the Athenians liked it. Anyhow, there was no unity. The only unity that could be was a unity of faith.

Now there were several faiths of salvation. Why didn't Constantine pick Mithraism? Mithraism was already very, very widespread among the Roman soldiers. Even some emperors later on were going to be worshipers of Mithra, the Aryan god, Sol Invictus, the invincible sun represented by a man with a Phrygian cap and a bull sacrifice. Well, the religion of Mithra would have taken centuries to spread because the priests of Mithra were no fanatics. They didn't say, "Outside the cult of Mithra you are all damned." They never said that. It would have taken centuries. The cult of Cybele also. Any cult except Christianity would have taken centuries to forge the cultural and religious unity of the empire. And even Christianity took centuries, but at least under Constantine there was a hope that within a few decades officially the Mediterranean would be Christian. And that was a fact. It was imposed.

There is no manuscript of any of the canonical gospels, Mark, Matthew, Luke, and John, older than the fourth or fifth century. What was there before? Other gospels, Apocrypha, of which there are pieces to be found now and then, and some of them quite different from the canonical gospels. What happened to the originals? They were collected from all the churches under Constantine, under the supervision of Eusebius of Caesarea, the great court historiographer and Bishop.²⁷ And they were collected by batches of fifty, and new batches of fifty of the gospels we know today were sent out to the churches. There were very many alterations in them for the Roman Empire to have one faith.

And then of course the crosses of Christ were found by Helena, Constantine's mother.²⁸ She dug somewhere in Jerusalem. Now Jerusalem was completely destroyed by Titus in the year 70. So much so that there was no trace, according to Flavius Josephus, of its streets.²⁹ One didn't know what was where before. It was completely flat. It was reconstructed afterwards. So in the fourth century, the emperor's mother, Helena, who was a Christian, digs somewhere in Jerusalem and found three crosses, wooden crosses, intact. How did they stay intact? Although the land is dry. I admit the land is dry. But three hundred years, more than three hundred years after the crucifixion, three crosses absolutely intact? That's funny. They put a dead man on each one, and when they put him on the cross that was Christ's cross, the dead man became alive again.³⁰ So they say. That's how they found the real cross. And when you go to Jerusalem as a pilgrim, you can buy a piece of the real cross. There are so many pieces of the real cross to be sold that if they were all genuine, the cross would have been kilometers long and kilometers wide. Anyhow, that was Christianity for the Mediterranean people.

²⁷ Eusebius of Caesarea (c. 264-c. 340).

²⁸ Flavia Julia Helena, later Saint Helena (c. 250-c. 330).

²⁹ Flavius Josephus (c. 37-c. 100), Wars of the Jews, 7.1.1.

"No jobs of high significance unless you are a Christian"—Constantine. And then came Theodosias, long after Constantine.³¹ You have in between the attempt of Emperor Julian to give another chance to paganism, to the Greek or Latin paganism.³² Unfortunately that failed. That failed in the year 363. Julian only ruled from 360 to 363. He was probably murdered on the battlefield, because he received a spear from behind. And they said it was a barbarian captive that did that. Since when were barbarian captives taken into cavalry charges and given spears in their hands? It's a story. He was murdered, probably by some Christian. Anyhow, after him Christianity was again the religion of the Empire. Then comes the Emperor Theodosias who died in 395. He shut the temples. He forbade as much as he could forbid. He forbade the Oracle of Delphi. Already in Julian's day, Delphi was an abandoned place. Now, in the sixth century, under Justinian, the last philosophical schools were forbidden, the Greek philosophical schools.³³ You were not to teach anything but Christianity. Antiquity was forbidden.

Naturally it continued on the sly. They say there was still worship of the gods in Greece in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. In those days Prussia, land of Frederick the Great, land of Bismarck, was still ³⁰ Saint Helena toured Palestine circa 326-328. There is no mention, however, of the discovery of the cross either during her lifetime or that of her son Constantine. By the middle of the fourth century, however, a number of stories of her discovery of the cross were in circulation.

³¹ Flavius Theodosius (c. 346-395) reigned from 379-395.

³² Flavius Claudius Julianus (331-363).

³³ Flavius Petrus Sabbatius Justinianus (c. 483-565) reigned from 527-565. Justinian prohibited the teaching of pagan philosophy in 529.

pagan. Prussians were Christianized in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, and so were the Lithuanians. They were pagans. Scandinavia was Christianized in the eleventh century under Olaf II of Norway and Erik of Sweden.³⁴ They were Christianized by fire and sword, just as Germany was under Charlemagne.³⁵

Charlemagne fought the Saxons for thirty years to make them Christians by force. Widukind defended Germany and defended the old faith.³⁶ He was vanquished. Well, the Franks were better organized. They had better weapons. They were efficient as warriors, and they were perhaps more united. They had the schooling of the Byzantines. They were very much in touch with the Byzantines. In fact, they speak of a prospective marriage between Charlemagne and the Empress Irene of Constantinople, of the Eastern Roman Empire.³⁷ It didn't come through anyhow. But the Germans were Christianized by fire and sword.

In 782, forty-five hundred German chiefs were put to death, beheaded one after the other after a solemn mass and a lot of pomp on the banks of the Aller in Verden in North Germany because they didn't want to take the new faith. They refused it. They were all beheaded. The river Aller must have been red with blood. That was 782.

In 772, ten years before, the old high place of the sun for all North Europe, not for Germany alone, the Externsteine, was stormed by Charlemagne, and the sun room destroyed. The roof was blown off. He had no dynamite of course, but he put ice in a kind of little channel. He dug a channel all around and he put water there. It was in the middle of December. The water became ice. Ice is bigger. It takes more volume than water. The roof was shot off. You can see the ruins of it now.³⁸

³⁴ Olaf II of Norway, later Saint Olaf (995-1030), King of Norway from 1015-1028, converted to Christianity in 1010. Erik ruled Sweden from 966-995. He returned to paganism at the end of his life. The process of Christianization was taken up again by his son Olof, who reigned from 995-1022.

³⁵ Charlemagne (c. 742-814) was King of the Franks from 768 on and Roman Emperor in the West from 800 on.

³⁶ Widukind (d. 807) was a Westphalian nobleman and leader of the Saxon resistance against Charlemagne until he accepted baptism in 785.

³⁷ Irene of Athens (c. 752-803) ruled the Byzantine Empire from 797-802 after blinding then murdering her son, the emperor Constantine VI (770-797). She was deposed and exiled in 802. Since it was not legal for a woman to rule the Roman Empire, Pope Leo III crowned Charlemagne Roman Emperor in the West in 800, marking the final severance of the Eastern and Western Roman Empires.

³⁸ Savitri recounts her visit to the Externsteine in Pilgrimage, ch. 9, "The Rocks of the Sun."

And in 785 you have the famous Capitulary of Paderborn, the rules and regulations that Charlemagne imposed on Germany, or on the part of Germany he had conquered. He didn't conquer eastern Germany, of course: "Whoever runs away to the woods in order not to be christened is to die, penalty of death. Whoever burns the dead instead of burying them according to Christianity's new rules: the death penalty. Whoever reads the runic scriptures is to be killed. Whoever listens to runic teachings is to be killed." There's a list like that of I don't know how many things you mustn't do. "Whoever refuses to do this or to do that, whoever doesn't have his children christened: penalty of death."

That's how Germany was Christianized. That's how Scandinavia was Christianized. That's how, in fact, all the countries of the North of Europe were Christianized. Christianity was not liked by the Nordic race. The Nordic race didn't like it. There were certainly things in the Bible that shocked them. Even if nothing else, the story of Lot and his daughters.³⁹ That was shocking enough. And then the polygamy of the old Semites. The Nordic race is by tradition monogamous. They probably didn't like that. There were so many things. And of course stories like how Jael killed her enemy during his sleep. That was so anti-Aryan, so shocking. How could they accept that?

The result was that the Catholic Church very wisely forbade the faithful reading the Bible. It was not allowed to read the Bible in the Middle Ages. Of course it was not allowed. I can understand the Catholic Church. And what I can't understand was when the Bible was allowed to be read, after Luther, after the Reformation, how did people remain Christian? It's the Bible that put me against the Jews. It's not anything else. It's not Mein Kampf. I didn't own Mein Kampf in those days. When I was a child I was made to read the Old Testament and the New Testament by my pious aunt. There were so many things that shocked me.

And that's what I have to say. Christianity was not taken by Europe spontaneously, at least not by the Nordic race. And even the Mediterranean people had their own beliefs. They had their own superstitions. They carried those superstitions into Christianity. There's nothing more superstitious than a southern European even today, among the masses. The Marian cult, the cult of the Virgin Mary, is nothing but the cult of the Great Mother of antiquity, transposed. They stuck to it. They gave it another name, that's all. They made Christianity according to themselves.

³⁹ Genesis 19:30-38.

But what is awful is that it is a religion that inherited, from its Jewish origin, intolerance. A typical Jewish product. Although the Jews never did these things, because their policy was not conversion or death, but death in any case if you are not a Jew and if you stand in the way of the expansion of Jewry, like the Canaanites. In Europe there was not that. You could save your life by becoming a Christian. If you don't want to become one, or if you work against it, in the Middle Ages, it's the stake. You're burnt at the stake. So many people were. It was not done in the Greek Church. I must say, to be just, in the Orthodox Church you have no burnings. You get it in the Catholic Church. You get it in the Protestant Church. They're no better. One is as good as the other. Some burnt Catholics, others burnt Protestants, or heretics, or whatever you like. You have the awful story of the Cathars from the South of France, early thirteenth century.

I much prefer our old, old European religions. European or non-European, anyhow, all religions of antiquity, of that free antiquity of which Adolf Hitler speaks on page 507 of Mein Kampf, the German edition of 1935, in which he says, "The Ancient World, which was much freer than it is today, became unfree with the entrance of Christianity."⁴⁰ He's perfectly right. You don't get persecution of religions for the religion's sake in antiquity. You get persecutions for political reasons. That's quite different. Socrates was killed because he was an Athenian who did not believe in the gods of Athens.

On Hinduism

7. HINDUISM AND NATIONAL SOCIALISM

I embraced Hinduism because it was the only religion in the world that is compatible with National Socialism. And the dream of my life is to integrate Hitlerism into the old Aryan tradition, to show that it is really a resurgence of the original tradition. It's not Indian, not European, but Indo-European. It comes from back to those days when the Aryans were one people near the North Pole. The Hyperborean tradition.⁴¹

Well, I'm not a full Hindu. I'm a National Socialist. To me it's quite sufficient. I'm a European heathen. I'm one of those who would've fought Christianity in the fourth and fifth centuries. The great man I admired in my youth was Alexander the Great, my first love. My second love is Emperor Julian. Adolf Hitler is the third one. I put him above the others, but chronologically he's the third. The first book I wrote in English in India is called A Warning to the Hindus.⁴² It was written in '37. It was translated into six Indian languages. It's not dedicated to an Indian. It's dedicated to Divine Julian, Emperor of the Greeks and Romans, 360-363, the one who wanted to bring back the old Greek and Roman religion after Christianity had been ruling for—well, I don't know—say fifty years. The Christian religion was instituted as the religion of the Roman Empire in 313. It was too late in 360. It was too late.

⁴⁰ See ch. 1, §12, n. 84 above.

⁴¹ Savitri accepted the theories of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, The Arctic Home in the Vedas (Poona: Kesari, 1903).

Now I must tell you something that I recently read this morning. I have a French friend. Well, she could be my daughter or, according to Indian standards, even my granddaughter. She's much younger than I, thirty-eight. And she's now in the South at her guru. She has a guru. Or rather the disciple of a dead guru. Her guru is dead. And she was visiting the ashram of the famous Ramana Maharshi.⁴³ Ramana Maharshi is really the greatest, or perhaps one of the greatest, one of the first or second of the two or three greatest sages of modern India. An extraordinary man. He did not teach. He taught only through his radiations. He was perfectly silent. He was vowed to perfect silence. That's a very queer thing to say, but he did teach like that. I know people who saw him and who said, "If silence can have meaning, that man shows it."

Anyhow, he used to speak sometimes, of course. He was not silent completely. This woman asked his shishya, his disciple, "What did Ramana Maharshi say about Adolf Hitler? Did he ever mention him?" And the disciple answered, "Yes, he considered him as a jnani."⁴⁴ A jnani is something extremely high. A jnani and a rishi are the same thing, or practically the same thing. They're Sanskrit words. Jnani has the same root as gnos, the Christian sect, the Gnostics, the people of knowledge. A jnani means a man who has complete knowledge, who knows everything, infused knowledge, intuitive knowledge, if you like.

⁴² Savitri Devi, A Warning to the Hindus (Calcutta: Hindu Mission, 1939).

⁴³ Ramana Maharshi (1879-1950). His ashram is located in Tiruvannamali in Tamil Nadu, South India. For a vivid description of Ramana Maharshi as well as photographs, see Paul Brunton, A Search in Secret India (New York: E.P. Dutton, 1935), esp. 138-142 and 280.

⁴⁴ For more on the Ramana Maharshi's opinion of Hitler, see Savitri Devi, "Hitlerism and the Hindu World," The National Socialist, no. 2 (Fall 1980): 18-20, 18.

He is divine through his intuition. Like God, he knows everything through intuition. Well, I was extremely pleased to hear that said by a very great rishi, a very great Indian man, a sage, about our Führer.

It's not what you have in Europe. Here in India, nobody says anything against him, except people who are brainwashed by European ladies. Apart from that, the masses of India don't care. It's something foreign. They have their own little, small, petty lives to think of, the poverty and the struggle from day to day. Some of the intellectual Indians like him very much. My landlord likes him very much. My landlord's son likes him very much. Or else they have an idea like this. Satyananda Swami was the founder and head of the Hindu Mission, for which I worked for years, fighting Communism, fighting any religion of equality and especially Christian missionaries, in the name of Hindu tradition. Satyananda Swami used to say, "Adolf Hitler is the reincarnation of the god Vishnu." Vishnu is the aspect of the Hindu trinity who goes to keep things from rushing to destruction. To keep them back, to go against time. Time is destruction. You have to destroy in order to create again, but there are forces that try to postpone destruction. And he said Hitler was the reincarnation of that force. And he was. He was. But it's a nice thing to hear, a very refreshing thing to hear from a Hindu sage.

I told him, "I came here because I'm really a pagan, a worshipper of the sun, and I believe in the pagan reaction of Emperor Julian. And I came to India to get, if possible, a sort of tropical equivalent of what we had in Europe before Christianity. And I am not a disciple of any Indian, I'm a disciple of Adolf Hitler." He said, "Good, good. Adolf Hitler, he's as much a Hindu as any of our Hindus. He's an incarnation of the god Vishnu." There you are. It was extremely surprising and refreshing to hear that in 1936. And he said it during the war too. In Kubila he gave a speech in '42. He openly said, "What we need here in India, as everywhere in the world, is National Socialism." He openly said so. And I said to him, "Satyananda Swami, you'll get into trouble with the British police." He said, "I couldn't care less if I did. I told them the truth."

In fact, Hinduism is for the Aryans of India a means to be able to rule. According to tradition, the Aryans should rule here. They don't, because tradition has been abandoned for years and years and years. India is going away from tradition, like the whole world. We are in the Dark Age, and India is going to the dogs, and the whole world is going to the dogs. Except a minority who are fighting against time, against the current of time. And I hope that we'll win. We will have to win. We can't help winning. But I don't know whether we'll win just now and if the avenger Kalki, as the Hindus call him, is going to come very soon or whether he's going to come in centuries. Because centuries are also very soon in the infinity of time. A century is nothing. And ten centuries are nothing. In fact I feel that myself. When I feel the struggle of Christianity to master Europe fifteen hundred years ago, I resent it as though it were now. I feel the struggle of Widukind as though it were now.

In Europe I feel at home with National Socialists, but with non-National Socialist Europeans, and especially with the people who are against it, I feel much worse than I do with indifferent people here. Here at least if they are not for it, they are not against it either. They don't care. They let you alone. They don't run after you because you are a Nazi, you know. That's your right. And in the war time, those who were for Hitler, they would take his picture and put it among the gods. Every Hindu house has a little shrine for the gods, with pictures of the gods. And they put his picture there with them. And those who were for Stalin, Indian Communists, would do the same with Stalin. Nobody did this with Churchill, funny enough. It was Stalin or Hitler.

Here we can believe in whatever we like. There's no common belief among Hindus. One Hindu doesn't believe in any god at all. He's a perfect atheist, materialist if you like. Another Hindu believes in one god. Another believes in thirty-three million gods. Another one believes in a couple, god and shakti, god and consort. In fact, every god in Hinduism has a consort, meaning the two aspects of energy, the positive and negative, like electricity, negative and positive. That's what it means in fact. It comes down to science.

There's a book recently published, and I want to read it. The Greek Ambassador here told me he would lend it to me. It's his, but he has lent it to somebody else. It is called The Tao of Physics.⁴⁵ I'd love to read that. In fact, the idea of the expanding and contracting universe that the modern physicists believe in: that you get in Hinduism; that you get in Hinduism. Not after each manvantara, each succession of four ages, but after several successions of four ages, that is, the time comes when the universe expands, expands, expands and grows very, very wide, and the time comes again when it absolutely comes to nothing. It's very heavy. The whole universe is extremely heavy, and it has hardly any volume and begins again. That's creation and destruction. That's the explanation of creation and destruction by the old Hindu sages.

⁴⁵ Fritjof Capra, The Tao of Physics: An Exploration of the Parallels Between Modern Physics and Eastern Mysticism (New York: Dell, 1975).

8. REINCARNATION

Now reincarnation is one of the only two beliefs that unite all Hindus of any caste, from the Brahmin to the untouchable, that is to say, the harijans.⁴⁶ They call them harijans, that is to say, "people of god." But every creature is a person of god. It doesn't mean anything. They're outcasts, the lowest outcasts, generally the aborigines. What is a harijan? He's either an aborigine, or else he's a man of any caste who has done something awful or whose ancestors have done something awful, and was outcasted. And when you were outcasted in India, your descendants are outcasted also, for all times to come. From the topmost Brahmin to the lowest harijan, everybody believes in reincarnation.

That is to say, there is in every living creature, not in every man—reincarnation is for animals and plants also, not only for people—there is in every living creature a visible body and more than one subtle body, and these subtle bodies separate from the rest of the physical body at the time of death. And they constitute what they call the ego. That ego, if it is not already merged into the universal ego—that is to say, if a man is not what the Hindus say "liberated"—that ego takes a new birth, in some other body, animal or human or plant. Plants live. Even minerals have some kind of life. There is nothing in the world that's not absolutely soaking in some kind of life, some kind of vibration. So the belief is not that when you are good you are reborn in a higher social status. That's nonsense. You will not be born rich if you are poor. If you wish to be rich, if you are good, you don't become rich in the next life, not necessarily. It might be the contrary, that the rich man is re-born as a beggar. He is reborn in that state which will be the best for his spiritual evolution. If it is better for his spiritual evolution for him to be born in a very low social status, he will. And the low social status does not mean in India a low race. There are Aryans and there are non-Aryans. There are Brahmin beggars. And there are untouchables who are millionaires. It has nothing to do with money. And that's one of the things I like the best of it. An Aryan, or supposed Aryan, say, a Brahmin, if he is a beggar and he goes to marriage ceremony, they put him inside at the best place, the most honorable place, with the other Brahmins. If a multi-millionaire untouchable goes to a marriage ceremony, he'll be put outside with his fellow untouchables. He will not be given a better place because he has money. Money or learning. Even learning. Brojendranath Seal⁴⁷ was a scientist, a very great scientist. He was a Seal.⁴⁸ That's a very low caste in Bengal. Seals are a very low caste. He was never given greater status.

⁴⁶ The other common belief is, presumably, the caste system itself.

Learning can be acquired. Money can be acquired. Only blood cannot be acquired for the Hindu religion. And that's what I like in the Hindu religion. It's the only real, living religion compatible with National Socialism. It gives priority to what cannot be acquired with any means. You are born with a race. You can't change your race whatever you do. You get reborn if you are not perfect. That is to say, if you have not gone through all the experiences resulting from the algebraic sum of your good and bad deeds.

Good and bad mean nothing. Good is what is according to the nature of your soul. And bad is what goes against nature. That's all. In Hinduism, you do not have to kill your instincts. Not at all. In fact, if you go to a yogi and ask him to be your master, he asks you some questions. Among the questions there is this, "How strong are your instincts?" If you tell him, "I have no instincts, very little." He says, "That's no good for you." The stronger the instincts you have, the better, because the stronger means the more and greater energy you have. You have to take that energy upwards. You have to transform it. Well, it's the theory of Nietzsche. It's exactly the idea of Nietzsche. The superman does not have to kill his passions. He has to canalize them for a higher purpose. Dominate them. Not let them dominate him but dominate them. That's a Hindu idea too.

Now you get reborn. Unless you are finished with the processes completely, you will get reborn. Some people are not reborn, but they wish to be reborn for the good of creatures. Again, not of man, but of all creatures. And they are reborn where they want to be. They choose their race. They choose their family in which they are getting reborn. They choose their own life beforehand. And they get reborn. These are what the Buddhists call the Bodhisattvas and the others who are not reborn at all, they are called Arhats in the Buddhist terminology.

Now, generally when you are reborn higher, you are reborn not higher in a social status, but higher in race. It will take centuries and ⁴⁷ Transcription uncertain.

⁴⁸ Transcription uncertain.

millennia for a man of a lower race to become an Aryan. Generally an Aryan is reborn as an Aryan. Unless he has done awful things, then he might be reborn very low. I suppose the men who tortured Streicher, for instance, would be reborn as Negroes. It wouldn't astonish me at all. They would deserve it. Certainly they do. Especially if they were Aryans. If they were Jews, not so much. If they were Jews they would be more excusable. If they were Aryans, less excusable.

I'm not a strong believer in anything that I cannot either see or prove with my own strength. I just take reincarnation as an hypothesis, a theory, if you like. But I do think that of the many, many theories that have been put forward to explain the unexplainable, reincarnation is the most plausible. It is at least the one that can be the best exploited for National Socialism. I told you of Khudiram, didn't I?⁴⁹ Telling me that he was a Shudra, and even if he was still a Shudra under the New Order it wouldn't matter to him because he was born in the Shudra family because of his past sins in past lives. And he said, "Well, whatever I am in the New Order, I believe in the New Order because it's true."

True or not, I don't know.⁵⁰ But I know that if we had this kind of belief in Europe, and if a European of more or less pure Aryan descent could think, "If I'm good in this life, and if I stay good in future lives for another five hundred years, I might become a German. What a lovely thing to be. Or I might become, say, a Swede." I wouldn't say a Swede like certain Swedes are today, because not all of them are perfectly Aryan in behavior. Some of them take drugs and do I don't know what. "But an ideal Swede, an ideal Nordic European, I'll become that one day. Before I get liberated completely." It would be a very good sort of propaganda. It's better propaganda than what we get in Christianity. Heaven and hell. And of course hell, if you don't believe in the church.

9. YOGA

Hinduism holds that there is no watertight separation between man, animal, plant, or whatever it is.⁵¹ There is one universe and one life permeating everything. And the individual has one thing in common with the universe and that is what they call the atman, not the soul, not the ego. The ego is the totality of his subtle body. The atman is ⁴⁹ For more on Khudiram, see "Hitlerism and the Hindu World," 18-20 and Defiance, 498.

⁵⁰ The truth of reincarnation, not of the New Order.

⁵¹ See Impeachment of Man, ch. 2, "Pessimistic Pantheism."

something different. It is that which in him is of the same nature as the soul of the universe. There's a spark of divinity in every living creature, not only in every man. We can act as though that spark of divinity were nonexistent. Or he should, if he wants to develop more spiritually, strive to become more and more conscious of it. And yoga is just nothing else but the science of making a person conscious of that.

There are different kinds of yoga. There's Hatha yoga. Hatha yoga is what you do on your body. You act on your body. There is Karma yoga. Karma yoga is one of the teachings of the Bhagavad-Gita. Not only of the Gita. You get it in National Socialism. I'll tell you what is Karma yoga. Karma yoga is: Act with your body for the interest of the universe, according to the scheme of the universe, the divine scheme, and without any passion, without any personal attachment or disgust or enthusiasm or anything. Just do it because it's duty. Act in the name of duty alone. That's Karma yoga.⁵²

Well, I was thrilled when I read a few of the writings, letters to Princess von Isenberg, of Otto Ohlendorf, a few letters he wrote before his death. He had that spirit. And he was the head of the Einsatzgruppe D of the four famous Einsatzgruppen, acting in Russia and acting in Poland especially. They were all SS men, naturally. And they show from the rules and regulations which Otto Ohlendorf told the judges when he was judged by the Americans how near they were to Hinduism. Without knowing it or knowing it, I don't know. Probably the chiefs knew it.

The Einsatzgruppen had very dirty work to do: mass executions of anybody who was opposing the German army, even children. Of course if the child is six and can shoot and shoots, well, we can't let him live. You have that experience with the Americans in the Vietnam War. I was told by an eyewitness that the Americans went to someplace in North Vietnam. They came in tanks, four or five tanks, perhaps more. They left their tanks and distributed candies to the kiddies. The kiddies took the candies, ate them, and then, perhaps eating them still, went under the tanks. They were young Communists with ideals, brave children. I admire them. Brave children, six, seven, eight years old. They put what they had in their hands under the tanks, and the tanks blew up and the children under them. They gave their lives for their cause. Well, if you catch a child like that, are you to keep it or are you to kill it? It's a powerful enemy, a convinced enemy. What are you to do? The Einsatzgruppen had to do that, against partisans in Russia, partisans in Poland, partisans who were harassing the German army from right, left, behind, and front. What could they do?

⁵² For more on Karma yoga, see Defiance, ch. 12, "The Way of Absolute Detachment."

And Otto Ohlendorf said, "If any of us showed the slightest pleasure or the slightest disgust in what we did, we were degraded and sent home." That is the spirit of the Bhagavad-Gita. That's what you call Karma yoga. All these SS men, whether knowing it or not, they were Karma yogis. They were getting salvation. They were mastering themselves, mastering their feelings, putting themselves in the proof, in the épreuve we call it in alchemy, for purification by their action.

And then you have Bhakti yoga. Bhakti yoga is the yoga of devotion. You feel devoted to something. And in devotion you raise yourself higher.⁵³

Well, I tried Hatha yoga years and years ago, '36, '37 with a South Indian Brahmin who happened to be at that time the curator of the Museum of Lahore. Lahore was in India, of course.⁵⁴ And I was teaching in Jallundhar not far away from Lahore. He taught me breathing exercises and the beginning of Hatha yoga. Now, I progressed very quickly, and I reached a stage at which I felt that my body didn't exist. I had no body. I was just a column of vibrating energy, up and down, according to respiration. And I felt I could pass through walls. No material obstacle was a real obstacle to me. And that's it. But, after my exercises, I had pains behind my eyes, as though somebody was pulling my eyes from inside. And I told that to this guru of mine. He said, "If you feel that, stop. Hatha yoga is not for you. You need very strong nerves for that. Your nerves apparently are not strong enough. You get this eye trouble."⁵⁵ Take another form of yoga." I said, "What form of yoga?" He said, "Don't you love anything?" I said, "Yes, I do. I have a cause." "Then work for your cause, work for whatever you love. But work in detachment. Try not to feel upset if you are unsuccessful. Try not to feel pride if you are successful. If people blame you or insult you, be indifferent. If they praise you, don't feel pleased. Feel indifferent. Feel, 'All right, they praised me.' Don't feel exalted if people are praising you. Every praise is really not right. I mean to say, it's not to the mark, because you are not perfect. You are not liberated. You have a body still."⁵⁶

⁵³ In addition to Hatha, Karma, and Bhakti yoga, there are three other generally recognized forms of yoga: Jnana yoga (the path of wisdom associated with the Upanishads), Mantra yoga (which exploits the consciousness altering power of sound), and Raja yoga (the royal path, the system of Classical Yoga set down by Patanjali in the Yoga-Sutra).

⁵⁴ After the partition of India and Pakistan, Lahore was in Pakistan.

⁵⁵ Savitri suffered from eye problems throughout her old age. She had glaucoma and cataracts, and by the time of her death she was nearly blind from the degeneration of her optic nerves.

To have a body, to be born, according to a Hindu, is bad. It's a sign of sin. If you never sinned you wouldn't be born. You sinned in your previous lives, therefore you are born. Even if you are born a Brahmin. If you are born Brahmin, you have all these weaknesses of a body. You eat and you sleep. You do all that the body has to do. Therefore, it's not a good thing.⁵⁷ Once I gave Mr. Mukherji a dhoti, the equivalent of a sari for a Bengali male. I never saw Mr. Mukherji wear a pair of trousers, dressed in the European style. He always wore a Bengali dhoti. I gave him a dhoti for his birthday. He refused it. He said, "Give me that at the time of the festival of the goddess Durga." "All right." "But my birthday, I don't celebrate." "But why? You came into this world." "I want to get away from it. I want to go back to the subtle, utmost part of myself. The divine spark should merge into the ocean of divinity, that is to say, the soul of the universe. I don't want to be an individual any longer. Individuality is a prison. Therefore, I act"—he acted all right—"I act. But I try to act with detachment." And that is the detachment.

I didn't do Hatha yoga any longer. I was told not to do it. I was told that Karma yoga was my line. I had to do what I could for what I love, and do it with detachment. That is to say, I should not have felt upset in 1945. I did, of course. But I shouldn't have been. I should have felt it ⁵⁶ From the context, one might infer that here Savitri is talking about Bhakti yoga, but she is describing Karma yoga. Savitri did, of course, engage in Bhakti yoga as well. Bhakti yoga centers on the cult of the incarnations of Vishnu, and Savitri regarded Adolf Hitler as the ninth avatar of Vishnu. Her devotion to Hitler was, therefore, a form of Bhakti yoga. Her book Pilgrimage is the best record of her Bhakti practices. Before her return to India in 1971, Savitri tried unsuccessfully to raise funds from her comrades in Europe to create a temple to Hitler in New Delhi. Thus the title of Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke's biography of Savitri, Hitler's Priestess, is quite well chosen.

⁵⁷ It should be noted that Savitri shared Nietzsche's rejection of this life-denying and pessimistic aspect of Hinduism and Buddhism. See Savitri Devi, Impeachment of Man, ch. 3, "Pessimistic Pantheism," on Hinduism; ch. 4, "Joyous Wisdom," offers a world- and life-affirming alternative. Savitri deals mainly with Akhnaton's philosophy, but the chapter's title (borrowed from Nietzsche's book Die fröhliche Wissenschaft, sometimes translated The Gay Science) and her use of the phrase "faithful to this earth" (a Nietzschean Leitmotiv) make clear her inspiration. See also Defiance, 375 and 484-485.

was necessary. It had to happen. I should have felt different. I couldn't feel that. I was not advanced enough to feel that. Very few people were.

Human and Animal Sacrifice

10. HUMAN SACRIFICE

I used to cry and keep silence on the 12th of October because that was the day Columbus landed in America. And I was against it. I didn't want Americans to be spoilt. I knew they had beautiful monuments. They had human sacrifices, of course. I couldn't care less. It was among themselves. And the victims used to like it. The victims found it an honor. It was an honor to have your chest cut open and your heart pulled out and offered to the gods. All right, if you like it. If you consider it an honor, carry on. I don't care. I never would have stopped that, if I had been the Spaniards.

If the Spaniards had been National Socialists, it would have been different. Supposing Europe had kept its old national religions and never became a Christian Europe, and of course, the Spanish or some Europeans would've gone to America and conquered America. All right. They would've taken a lot of the gold. They would have exploited the people, quite right. They are the strongest. The strongest exploit the weakest. But they would've left the gods and the monuments as they were. And that's all I liked. I would've liked to be able to see Tenochtitlán, that is to say, Mexico City, as it was in 1519 when the Spanish landed there. It must've been beautiful, these pyramids, with the temple on the top, and these stairs—down, down, down, down.

Of course, when the victim was killed and they sent his body downstairs, people used to cut it up and eat it. Well, I couldn't care less. That's not worse than eating a piece of beef for me. Not worse. If you offer me one or the other to eat, I'd say, "Neither, please. Neither." And after all, if you have to eat some flesh, I'd rather eat the flesh of an enemy than of a creature that never did a thing against me, that doesn't hate what I love and doesn't love what I hate. Say a lamb. What is more beautiful than a little lamb? The Aztecs used to eat their sacrificial victims. Well, they didn't used to eat them completely. They used to take a little bit off, just as what they call in Hindi a prasad, a part of the offering, and the offering was a warrior. It was always a warrior, a warrior whom they had defeated. Now the warriors liked it.

I don't know if you know the story of Tlahuicol. Tlahuicol was a Tlaxcalic warrior of the fifteenth century. Not under Montezuma II who had to deal with the Spaniards, but under his grandfather, Montezuma I. That is to say, between 1440 and 1469. He died in 1469.⁵⁸ He was a great warrior, this Tlaxcalic warrior. Tlaxcala and Tenochtitlán, two cities in Mexico, were always at war. Tlaxcala was defeated. The warriors were taken, and they were to be sacrificed, not in the ordinary war god festival, but in the fire festival. That was much worse. In the fire festival, the victim was made to fight alone with a wooden sword against five Aztec warriors with stone swords. They didn't know metal. Metal was not known. They couldn't make steel. They had iron but they didn't know it. They knew gold and silver and stones. They were living in the Stone Age, if you like. But they had beautiful works of art. They used to have clothes made of feathers and what not. They had an art. You only have to see Aztec art. So he was there, and generally the warrior was defeated, naturally: five with stone swords against one with a wooden sword. But this one was not defeated. Once defeated, he was supposed to be thrown into a fire and half burnt, pulled out with some hooks or tongs or something, and then his breast opened and his heart pulled out and offered to the fire god. That was the procedure.

Now, Tlahuicol knew it very well. To the amazement of everybody, including Montezuma I, he defeated with his wooden sword the five Aztecs with their stone swords, one after the other. Montezuma I said, "Stop! This man is more than a man." Nobody had ever done such a performance. "Now, Tlahuicol, I don't want you to be sacrificed. You are too precious. Take command of my own army, and you won't be sacrificed." And Tlahuicol answered, "What? To march against Tlaxcala tomorrow? My own city? Never. Let the feast continue. Let the ceremony continue."

Well, I find that so wonderful, so beautiful. And he was a non-Aryan mind you. He was a non-Aryan. He was a Red Indian. I found him worthy of having his story told—to another Aryan, an English friend I had then—on the top of the Externsteine. She came to Germany, and we went to the Externsteine together, and I told her.⁵⁹ We were talking of Mexican things. I said, "Wait till we come to the top of the Externsteine, and there in the Sun Room, I will tell you the story of a sun worshipping warrior, Tlahuicol of Tlaxcala. He deserves it. Aryan or non-Aryan, he deserves it." Well, I used to be feeling that way.

⁵⁸ Montezuma I (1398-1469), Montezuma II (c. 1480-1520, reigned 1502-1520).

⁵⁹ The friend was Veronica Vassar (d. 1972), to whom Savitri dedicated her Akhnaton: A Play. The event took place on 7 July 1954 (Pilgrimage, 316, n).

And when I think of the inquisition in America, so many people burned alive and the horrors, the same horrors as in Europe, in the name of the ghastly Catholic Church, I felt disgusted. I felt, "Better these sacrifices in which the victim himself thought it was an honor at least." He had nothing against it.

Like the suttees in India, the widows who were burnt alive, of their own free will, according to religion. I don't say a pressure was not put on some of them, but as a principle, as a law, they were only victims voluntarily. I wouldn't have stopped that if I were the British. There are so many other things to stop, not that. Stop that last. It was the first thing they stopped. There was one in my husband's family, one suttee. Only a few years ago, perhaps twenty, thirty years ago.

Well, when Mr. Mukherji died, I cut off my hair, clipped it off. That's why it's not so long now. It was a year and a half ago, a little more than a year and a half ago.⁶⁰ It grows slowly at my age. So I haven't got enough hair now long enough to make a mop. I'm letting it grow. When he died I cut it off, very short. And I went to the ceremony. He was burning. He was on a funeral pyre. Like the old Vikings were, like we were all in Europe in the old days before Christianity. And I stood by the pyre. And I said to myself, "What if I had to sit in the middle of it like the old suttees?" It takes courage. It takes a tremendous courage to sit in the fire.

Unless you have the capacity by yoga to take your etherical body and put it away. And I think some people have that capacity, because when the Buddhist monks were burning themselves alive in Vietnam, I remember the death of Thich Quang Duc on the 12th of June 1963.⁶¹ It is another thing I saw on the television, somebody else's television. You could've seen the serene expression of that monk. He lighted the fire himself, with a lighter. He poured himself and the wood with kerosene and lighted the fire. And he stood in the flames. You could see him on the television. He had the serene indifferent expression of myself when I was supervising a class. The boys were doing their own tasks. I was looking on so that nobody copied somebody else. That kind of expression. And then he got blacker and blacker and blacker, carbonized, and dropped. Without a scream, without a struggle.

⁶⁰ A.K. Mukherji died on 21 March 1977 in New Delhi.

⁶¹ Thich Quang Duc immolated himself in Saigon on 11 June 1963. Savitri probably saw Malcolm Brown's series of photographs on television. These photographs were seen around the world and won The World Press Photo of the Year 1963 award. Savitri may be giving the date she saw the photographs on television. Generally, her recollection of dates is remarkable.

And I think he had the capacity of taking away what they call the etherical body among Theosophists.⁶² It is the body that feels, because our physical body doesn't feel. It's the etherical one that does, the first subtle body, the grossest among the seven subtle bodies. If he had not that capacity, he couldn't have done that. Put your finger in the fire and see what you feel like. Let alone your whole body. I imagine the burnings of the Middle Ages were horrid. They must have been screaming. They were tied of course.

11. THE IMMOLATION OF CATS

But what I find even worse than that in the Middle Ages, at least in France and Germany and Belgium and so many other places, was the burning of live cats.⁶³ You see, whatever was revered, whatever was good, in pre-Christian Europe was considered bad in the Middle Ages after Christianity ruled. And cats were among the things. The number thirteen. The number thirteen was good in Germanic tradition. Then it was a bad number. Cats were well-kept and loved in pre-Christian Europe. In Christian Europe they became the embodiment of the devil, especially black ones, because when you caress a black cat in a storm, it gives out sparks. So that was very bad. That was devilish. And they burnt cages full of cats on the Saint John's festival, that is to say, the Summer Solstice. They were thinking they were feasting Saint John. It must've been horrid. Poor cats in the cage and then the cage burning. The bars would get red hot. The poor cats were inside. Or else they had a pole, and the cats would run up the pole and fall down and back into the fire. It was entertainment for people.

In France it was done, and in France there is a place called Saint Chamond, twenty kilometers from my native town. The inhabitants of Saint Chamond are not called Saint Chamondais. They have a name that is nothing to do with Saint Chamond. They are called chasse-minets, meaning to say the pursuers of pussies. Minet is a pussy. Those who ⁶² Savitri's connection to the Theosophical Society is worthy of investigation. Two of her books, A Son of God and Akhmaton: A Play, were published by the Theosophical Society. In Pilgrimage, Savitri makes it clear that she was quite familiar with the activities of the Theosophical Society in India and in Iceland, even as she denounces "Theosophy, Anthroposophy, the Rosicrucian Order, Freemasonry" (Pilgrimage, 265-66). It is also noteworthy that the second and all subsequent editions of A Son of God were published by the Rosicrucian Order as Son of the Sun.

⁶³ For more examples of this disgusting practice, see Robert Darnton, The Great Cat Massacre and Other Episodes in French Cultural History (New York: Basic Books, 1984), ch. 2, esp. 83-85, 89-96.

pursue, run after pussies. Up till 1875, they had a custom that apart from Saint John's day they tied a poor cat by its tail above the fire. And the string burnt, naturally. The string was the first thing to go. It was the lightest thing. The poor cat would fall into the flames and then run away. And they would run after the burning cat, through the streets, chasse-minets.⁶⁴

I heard of all that when I was a child. It put me absolutely against mankind. And when I started hearing of some movement in Germany, the National Socialist movement, "It's inhuman!" "Inhuman?" I said, "Goodness me. I'm going to go into it. If it's inhuman, I like it." "It's inhuman." "Well, well, very good. I wouldn't have touched it if it were human. It's inhuman? All right."

The Jews

12. THE JEWS AS INSTRUMENTS OF THE DARK AGE

The Jew, originally, was not different from other Semitic people. He was just as good as they are. I have absolutely nothing against him. I mean to say, the real Jew in antiquity. He believed in a God of his own. And he didn't think twice of praying or sacrificing to the gods of other people. You get that in the Bible. Again and again and again in the Bible you have examples of Jewish kings—they are called bad in the Bible, of course, all bad—sacrificing to gods of Syria, to Astarte or to different Baalims. "Baal" means "god" in Syrian religions. And the average Jew had no scruples about that. Only Moses and the prophets are the ones who made the Jews what they are. Really, what distinguishes the Jews from other people of antiquity is the intolerance that was given to them through the Mosaic law and through that command of Deuteronomy: "People you come in touch with and people that your God will give into your hands, don't spare them, don't make friends with them, destroy them. Destroy whatever opposes you."⁶⁵ That is the new thing. And most of the Jews didn't stick to it. So many times you get in the Bible: "They are a hard-necked people." "They will whore after other deities." And they did whore after other deities. Take the story of the King Manasseh.⁶⁶ He erected altars to all the stars in heaven and bowed down to them. He worshipped the stars.

⁶⁴ According to Darnton, the residents of Saint Chamond were also called "Courimauds," from cour à miaud, chasers of cats (The Great Cat Massacre, 83).

⁶⁵ Deuteronomy 7:1-3.

⁶⁶ 2 Kings 21:1-5.

Everybody did the same in those days. And you get worse than that, especially in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries BC. Excavations have turned up heaps of children's ashes in Palestine. It was the custom among the Semitic people to sacrifice their first born by fire. An awful thing. I don't condone it. I wouldn't do the same. But the Carthaginians, the Tyrians, the Sidonians, all these people did it. The Jews are one of them.⁶⁷ They did the same. And God, of course, was angry. Jehovah was angry. These were not the orders of Jehovah. They had to be different from the other people. They hadn't ought to do what the others did. But you get heaps of these places. And there's one awful place south of Jerusalem called ge Hinnom.⁶⁸ It's the original word for Gehenna, hell. Hell because I suppose if you were passing by when they were sacrificing you must've heard the screaming and smelt the burning. It must've been awful, really.

But the Jew has become what he is now through Moses and through the prophets. Through the prophets, in order to make them a different people. And the prophets were extremely resentful of any other people who opposed the Jews. You only have to read in the Bible the prophet Nahum. Nahum, when he hears of the fall of Nineveh in August 612 BC, is rolling with pleasure. "Woe to the bloody city," he says. "She's punished now, she's fallen."⁶⁹ He probably didn't hear it at once. There was no radio in those days. But perhaps three months later, after the fall, he heard that Nabopolassar of Babylon and his son, young Nebuchadnezzar who was then seventeen, had stormed Nineveh and set it on fire.⁷⁰ He was pleased.

I have nothing against the Jew as long as he stays in his place. That is to say, as long as he is a Jewish nationalist. A Jewish nationalist, proud of his race. All right, I'm proud of mine. The Negro should be proud of his too. Every creature should be proud of what he is. But what I resent in them, and what is a sign of the Dark Ages, is that they ⁶⁷ For instance, Kings Ahaz (2 Kings 16:3) and Manasseh (2 Kings 21:6) burned their sons as offerings.

⁶⁸ Ge Hinnom means the Valley of Hinnom or of the son of Hinnom, who was a person of ancient Israel. It was also called Tophet, the place of bones. See Jeremiah 7:31 and 2 Chronicles 28:3. Josiah converted the shrine into a garbage dump (2 Kings 23:10). It was also where the corpses of executed criminals were discarded, which gives a very this-worldly aspect to the threat of Gehenna. See Isaiah 66:24, Matthew 23:15, Mark 9:43, and Luke 12:15.

⁶⁹ Nahum 3:1.

⁷⁰ Nabopolassar became King of Chaldea in 630 BC. He freed Babylon from Assyrian rule and was the founder of the Neo-Babylonian Empire. He reigned from 626-605 BC.

are used for the purpose of this Dark Age of deracializing everybody. What I resent in the Jew is not that he's proud of being a Jew. All right. I can have a cup of tea with him, and he'll talk of his pride. I don't mind that. But I resent it when he starts telling me that I must consider race as nothing. I must be an internationalist and an interracialist, while he is not.

What I resent is this. On the 15th of September, 1935, the Nuremberg laws were promulgated in Nuremberg, interdicting any Aryan from marrying a non-Aryan and especially a Jew. The Jews are allowed in Germany as guests only. They are not allowed to raise the Reich's flag, the flag of Germany. But if they wanted to raise their own flag, the flag of Israel—Israel did not exist yet, but it existed among themselves—they had a flag of their own. The Jew in Germany can raise his own flag. And if the neighbors object, they will have to deal with the German police. The German police will protect the Jew against public opinion. He can raise his own flag, but not the German. He's not a German. When people all over the world heard that—I was in Calcutta at the time—they raised hell. "Oh, awful racialism! Look at the tyrant Hitler, persecuting the Jews." He wasn't persecuting them at all. He was giving them what should be given to them, and that's all. They are foreigners in Germany. They have the right to be proud of their foreign origin, and they are not right to call themselves Germans. They are not Germans. That's all right. That was 1935.

Twenty years later in Israel, a law comes out: interdiction for a Jew to marry a non-Jew. Nobody raised hell then. It was perfect. Nobody said a word. Why didn't they make the same kind of fuss about that as they did with the Third Reich? Why? One law is as good as the other. I approve of both. They approve of none. If they approve of none, and if they raise a fuss for the first, they should raise a fuss for the second. And that is the success of the Jew: "I am a racist, but you mustn't be." That's the sign of the Dark Age. He's an instrument. An Orthodox Jew who keeps to himself, all right. I like that one. But I resent the other one that keeps to himself, or lets his family keep to themselves, and goes out of his way to propagandize the Aryan and any race that is not his and tell them, "Your race is rubbish. You mustn't believe in it. Believe in mankind, mankind, mankind. All men are equal. All men are loveable. You can marry anybody."

13. ALEXANDRIAN JUDAISM

The rise of Jewry as the great powerful political factor and cultural factor and, unfortunately, religious factor in the world doesn't date from Christianity. It dates from the fourth century BC, from Alexandria. And the proof of it is that you have Jews of the third century BC with Greek names like Aristobulus. It is a Greek name, but he is a Jew, who dared to write in those days, long before Christianity, that all the marvels, all the good things of Greek philosophy really come from Judaism. They come from Moses. Pythagoras, Plato, all these great thinkers of Greece, they were influenced by the Jewish scriptures. So Aristobulus says. Of course, it's not true.⁷¹ And after that you get Pseudo-Aristeas.⁷² You get so many writers.

And you get Philo the Jew,⁷³ who is one of the first ones to speak of the logos, the word, the incarnate word that is going to become the second person of the *Sainte*⁷⁴ Trinity in Christianity. He's preparing the way for Christianity without knowing it. And who goes to Rome with a Jewish delegation when he's not far from one hundred, under Caligula?⁷⁵ And what did they go to Rome for? To ask the Roman Emperor to dismiss Flaccus, Roman governor of Egypt.⁷⁶ Why? Because Flaccus says that the Jews are no citizens of Egypt. They are something different. Flaccus said, in other words, what our Führer said also. The Führer said the Jews are no Germans, point four of the twenty-five points. Flaccus said the same. He said, "The Jews are a people apart. They have nothing to do with average Egyptians. I'm the ⁷¹ Aristobulus probably lived in the second half of the second century BC. He is the earliest Jewish thinker to show interest in Greek philosophy. His commentary on the Pentateuch, which is known only through quotations by Clement, Anatolius, and Eusebius, offers an allegorical interpretation of scripture and claims that Homer, Hesiod, the Orphic writings, Pythagoras, Plato, and Aristotle borrowed their ideas from the Old Testament by reading an alleged (and wholly fictional) Greek translation that predated by centuries the first Greek translation, the Septuagint, which was undertaken in Alexandria in the 3rd century BC at the behest of the Macedonian pharaoh Ptolemy II Philadelphus, who reigned from 282-246 BC. See Fragments from Hellenistic Jewish Authors, Volume 3: Aristobulus, ed. Carl R. Holladay (Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995).

⁷² Pseudo-Aristeas is the author of the fraudulent Letter of Aristeas, which seeks to establish the veracity of the Alexandrian Greek translation of the Old Testament, the Septuagint. Indeed, he seeks to establish that the translation was more authoritative than the Hebrew original! The author is thought to be an Alexandrian Jew of the second century BC who poses as a Greek of the third century BC, when the Septuagint was created. See Aristeas to Philocrates (Letter of Aristeas), ed. Moses Hadas (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1951).

⁷³ Philo Judaeus, a.k.a. Philo of Alexandria (c. 30 BC to c. 50 AD).

⁷⁴ Holy.

⁷⁵ Gaius Caesar Augustus Germanicus, nicknamed Caligula ("Little Boot") (12-41 AD), reigned from 37-41.

⁷⁶ Aulus Avilius Flaccus was the Roman governor of Egypt between 32 and 38.

governor of Egypt. I'm not the governor of the Jews. They must be considered as foreigners. They must be treated as guests, as foreigners." And for that Flaccus was dismissed by Caligula.⁷⁷

The same attitude in those days as now. They don't want to be called foreigners, but among themselves they are foreigners. And it is quite sufficient for an English Jew or an American Jew—or a Jew from England, a Jew from America—to sit in a seat on one of the El-Al planes, he's automatically an Israeli citizen. He lands, no trouble. No trouble at all. But when he's in France, he says, "I'm French." When he's in Canada he says, "I'm a Canadian." When he's in the USA he says, "I'm an American." But he gives one tenth of his income to Israel. He's logical. He does what he can to get on, to get on in the interests of his race. We should imitate them in that way. We should be as logical and as efficient in the defense and in the support of our Aryan race as they are of theirs. Then there would be no Jewish question, no question.

⁷⁷ Savitri is conflating two separate incidents. Flaccus was dismissed in October of 38, then tried, exiled, and eventually killed by Caligula because of anti-Jewish riots that broke out in Alexandria in August and September of that year. One of Flaccus's innovations in maintaining order was to confine the Jews to one quarter in Alexandria, thus creating the first Jewish ghetto. It should be noted that Caligula had no love of Jews, and in fact enraged the Jews by ordering a statue of himself set up in the Temple in Jerusalem. It is likely that Flaccus was removed for simple incompetence in maintaining order, not for his actions against the Jews per se. The Jewish side of the story is told in Philo's Against Flaccus. History does not record Flaccus' side. Philo's visit to Rome took place in AD 39 and dealt not with Flaccus, who had already been deposed, but with the practice of setting up statues of the emperor in synagogues. See Philo's Embassy to Gaius. Both texts can be found in The Works of Philo, trans. C.D. Yonge (Peabody, Mass.: Hendrickson Publishers, 1993).

Chapter 4

LIFE IN THE KALI YUGA

1. THE NATURE OF HISTORY

I have never shared the opinion that history is a linear unfurling with continuous progress. I don't believe in progress at all. I never did. In 1925, at the university, we had that subject in one of the four exams that go to make a university final exam. In those days it was four. And for the third one the subject they gave us was the idea of progress, and what I wrote then, I could sign today after all these years. That is to say, after fifty-three years I could sign the same writing. I said in that writing, "I don't believe in progress, except in technical fields." Yes, we have electricity. In Babylon they didn't have it. They used to light themselves with something else, probably with naphtha, petrol. They had ample supplies of petroleum in antiquity also in Mesopotamia, or else with something else, I don't know what, but anyhow they had no electricity. They had no electric fans. They had no hot and cold water. But excavations have proved that in Crete, 3,500 BC, they had sewers and hot and cold water in their houses.¹ There were wonderful arrangements for water in Crete. So anyhow, in the technical domain, I admit there is a certain progress, with ups and downs.

But in all other domains, I don't believe in progress at all. I believe in regression. According to the not only Hindu, but ancient, theory of the cycles, I believe that history goes in cycles. And it's always the same thing. It begins again and again and again and again. It starts with a perfect age in which there's no need for violence because everything is all right. The visible world is a reflection of the invisible, which is perfect, or of that which is perfect in the invisible. They call that in Sanskrit the Age of Truth, the Satya Yuga.

And the second Yuga is less good than the first, lasts less long. The first Yuga is very, very long: tens of thousands of years. The second one is long, but not quite so long. And there you already have the germs of decay in it. The germs of decay are in anything material, anything visible. Even when you come to the subtle material world—invisible, but material still—there you already have decay. You have no decay in the One, the universal substance behind everything. That does not decay. It is something eternal. But all the rest—wherever you go outside of the One—you have the germs of decay. In this second Yuga, called the Treta Yuga in Sanskrit, you get certainly something very good. Compared to us it would be wonderful, but compared to the Satya Yuga, that's already a step lower.

¹ The date is 1,500 BC, i.e., 3,500 years from the present day. This is a slip that Savitri makes four times.

And then you get to the Dvapara Yuga. The third one is already full of violence. You get wars and violence and all sorts of treachery. You get some characteristics that you have now, but to a lesser degree, and you have some races already existing. I think the Aryan used to exist already in the Dvapara Yuga. It is the youngest race of all. But still I suppose it existed then. Much better than now.

Now since some few thousand years BC—some say 3,000, some 4,000 BC, that is to say, the date of the entrance of the first Aryans into India—you get the Kali Yuga, the Dark Age.² And we are nearing the end of the Dark Age. I don't know when the end will be. Maybe in a few centuries. But we are nearer the end than we are to the beginning. That's all I can say. And the Dark Age is what you see around you. Technical progress, maybe. But in all other domains, perfect decay.

Decay in intuition, for instance. People can learn a lot by reasoning, and that is such today. They have been doing so for centuries. But before that, intuition was much more developed, and they could learn things directly. You didn't need so much reasoning and so much research. You didn't need any research at all—any scientific research, for instance. There were even some instances in the old Hindu epics, according to which they could fly. They had some appliances. I wouldn't call them aeroplanes. But something. They called it havavahana. A vahana is an appliance to go. A car is a vahana. Anything that goes. In the buses in Delhi or Calcutta, you have the Indian government's kind of vahana. A thing to go. Hava is air. Instruments to go in the air. You have a reference to those in the Ramayana.

The Ramayana is long before the Kali Yuga. I don't know how many thousands of years. It corresponds to some historical fact. At least it might be over 4,000 BC, a little over 4,000 BC, when the Aryans came, because Rama is an Aryan.³ He's an Aryan king who conquered

² Again, Savitri dates an event that probably took place 3,000 or 4,000 years from the present as 3,000 or 4,000 BC. Although Savitri may be following Tilak's dating of the Aryan invasion to between 3,000-5,000 BC (The Arctic Home in the Vedas, ch. 13).

³ The Aryan invasion was closer to 2,000 BC, i.e., 4,000 years before the present, and probably took place after 1,500 BC. (But see n2 above on Tilak's dating.)

the South and conquered Ceylon. Ceylon was the stronghold of Dravidian power, the Dravidians being technically far in advance of the Aryans of those days. But they hadn't got the Aryan virtues. And Rama is said to have conquered Ceylon with the help of flocks of monkeys. The king of monkeys made an alliance with him. Who were the monkeys? Probably the aborigines of India. The aborigines, very primitive people, made an alliance with the Aryan king against the Dravidian stronghold. It's quite possible that it corresponds to such a fact as that in history.

Anyhow, we know a lot more about it. But we know that there were achievements, even in the technical field, far older than what we can imagine, and realized through more intuition than research. Nowadays intuition is getting slower and slower, and less and less. Some people have it, of course. But the people who have a lot of intuition are fewer and fewer. And fewer and fewer people are conscious of the One, the substance beyond all existing things, visible and invisible, what the Hindus called brahman. Brahman and atman. Atman and brahman are the same thing. Atman is the soul, if you like, the soul of the universe. Not a person, anything but a person, anything but a personal god. That consciousness is given to a few people, even in our Yuga.

In fact, I have a friend who is now in the South, in an ashram. An ashram is a gathering of people who are interested in religious subjects. And the head of that ashram was conscious of that.⁴ In fact, our French friend is getting conscious of it herself. Through some exercises, breathing exercises from yoga, you can get conscious of it. But not everybody can. Only a few can, even with exercises. And very few can without exercises. Well, in the Satya Yuga, in the early ages, this consciousness, this supernatural consciousness, was a common thing. Well, not supernatural. It's natural. But consciousness of what is above the visible world and even above the invisible, above the subtle world: the One. People were more conscious of it than they are now. I don't know whether they lived in caves or not. It didn't matter if they did. You can live in a cave and be much more advanced spiritually than people who live in palaces.

The proof of this is that the ancient Germans were very highly civilized people, far in advance, I think, from that point of view, to the Mediterranean so-called more civilized ones. And the ancient Germans didn't live in caves. They lived in forests, in houses made of wood, without a single nail. They didn't have any nails. I've seen some of those reconstructed German settlements not far from Bielefeld in the woods. They are wonderful. I wish every German could see them. And how they are arranged. The family has a house of its own. And there is a house for the gathering of the community, the village community. There is a house for the head of the village. It's wonderful. But they hadn't any electricity of course. They used to light themselves with I don't know what. But they used to light themselves. They had lights. They had water. They used to bathe. They were very advanced people in every domain. Technical things are not to be the criteria of real civilization. Real civilization is something much, much more advanced than that.

⁴ Ramana Maharshi.

So, we are in the Dark Age. Technical civilization is advancing, and real civilization is going backwards. Real civilization had one characteristic all over the world: no race-mixing. You wouldn't have gotten an ancient German marrying an Etruscan or even a Greek, unless it were a Greek of the same race as himself. Because the real ancient Greeks, the invaders of Greece in the thirteenth century BC, came from the North of Europe, and they were Nordics. There was no harm in marrying Nordics. But the Greeks who were there before, the Cretan civilization, were Mediterranean people who were very beautiful indeed, but they were not Nordics. They were something different. As for the Etruscans, they were no Aryans at all. Which doesn't mean that they were not capable, that they were not a fine race.

You can be a fine person without being an Aryan. And you can be a wretched person while being an Aryan. There are some exceptions, of course. What I think of when I speak of racial superiority, it's a statistical affair. Statistically, you get, say, 80 or 90% Aryans that you can recommend, and you might get 5% Africans. But you'll get some. You get some in all races. You get perhaps 20% of other races. You might get 50% of the Semites or of the Mongoloids. I don't know about Semites. There are some fine ones. Take the history of Arabia, the history of Islam, and you get fine characters.

Even in the history of the Jews you get fine characters, now and then. The famous Berulia,⁵ for instance—the Jewess who lived in the early centuries AD. AD or BC, I don't remember—anyhow, she was a fine woman. There are some. Well, in our day the Führer himself said that the best Jew he ever knew was Otto Weininger,⁶ who discovered all the nasty things that his own race had done, wrote them down in a history, and committed suicide. He didn't want to be a Jew. Committed suicide. Then you have Martin Buber, who was mentioned in connection with the trial by the Soviets of the so-called war-criminals of the SS.⁷ He was friendly with SS men, although he was a Jew. He didn't have any intermarriage. He didn't marry his children to any of them. Nor did they theirs to any relatives of his. But on the intellectual plane, they were getting on very well together. He did no harm to anybody. He did no conspiracy. He did not try to destroy the Aryan race. Well, let him live in that case.

⁵ Transcription uncertain.

⁶ Hitler did not know Otto Weininger (1880-1903) personally, but admired his book Geschlecht und Charakter [Sex and Character] (Vienna: Braumüller, 1903).

We are only against people who are harmful. And we don't hate them. There's no need of hating them. We don't hate bugs. We fight them. We don't hate lice. We fight them. They're harmful. They bite us if we don't kill them. And they infect us with disease. Mosquitoes: the same thing. You don't want swarms and swarms of mosquitoes. You have to do something to make them go away, at least to get rid of them. It's the same thing with races that do harm to ours. We defend ourselves, and that's all.

But in this Yuga, this Dark Age nearing its end, you get more and more power in the hands of those people. That's natural. And there will be a racial struggle somewhere. I can see it coming. I can see it coming in the USA. I wouldn't be at all astonished if one day, not tomorrow, perhaps not in fifty years, but perhaps later on, the USA had a National Socialist government, made of Americans, after a terrific fight with the other races. By Americans, I understand Nordic Europeans who have immigrated amongst Americans. I wouldn't be at all astonished. It could happen anywhere else.

Of course, I think America will precede Europe in that way, not for any other reason but because in America the pressure of the dark races is much more powerful. I've never been to America, but I can imagine you meet Negroes everywhere. Well, you do in Paris, but you don't so much in the French countryside. Although I know a village in France called Chambly, six hundred inhabitants, six hundred. Of those six hundred, two girls have married Negroes. Two girls, two. Two out of six hundred. It's enormous, if you think of it. And there are more than two in the place where I used to teach, in Montbrison, with ten thousand inhabitants.

⁷ Martin Buber (1878-1965) lived and worked in Frankfurt am Main and published five books during the Third Reich. He moved to Palestine in 1938. He agreed with the National Socialists that Germans and Jews were distinct national communities. Savitri's source is André Brissaud, Hitler et l'Ordre Noir: Histoire secrète du national socialiste [Hitler and the Black Order: Secret History of National Socialism] (Paris: Librairie Académique Perrin, 1969), 285. (See Souvenirs et réflexions, 291.)

It's the fault of the Catholic Church, or of the Christian churches in general. The Negro is a Christian. Why not marry him? That's what happened. It happened to one girl in Montbrison. And I told her mother, "She's expecting a child from a Negro, all right, have her abort it and be finished. And may she never touch any man again. I would not advise an Aryan man to marry her after that. And just stay like that." And the mother said, "Yes, but abortion is a crime, you see." I don't believe it's a crime in that case. It's the best thing to do. No, she wouldn't on Christian grounds, and on Christian grounds with a man who was a Hottentot, if you please. The Hottentot being a Christian they married, and now they have five children. There you are, five French children. They are called French. They're born in France. They're called French. They marry French girls. Look at the danger of it. That is the thing that the Aryan race should react against, and I think it will react against sooner or later.

And if a new Yuga is to begin, if there is to be a world catastrophe, after which a new Yuga is to begin—a new succession of four Yugas, what they call in Sanskrit, manvantara—the first one will be perfect. Therefore the first one cannot have any struggle. It can only begin in an Aryan victory. But when, I don't know. And through what ordeals, I don't know either. There will be a terrific ordeal. The Hindus believe in the coming of the same one who always comes. It's the god himself. It's some inspiration from the force that they call Vishnu. They say Vishnu is a member of the Hindu trinity. There's Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. Vishnu is nothing else but the force of the universe that keeps things together, that is against change. And change is a form of creation. There must be another force, an antagonistic force, that's Shiva, who goes for change. Change in order for new creation, the new appearance of form. They are connected. The two are connected. You can't have one without the other. And Brahma is of course the unthinkable, the unthinkable soul of the universe, the One out of whom everything comes, the creator, if you like.⁸ We'll call him creator. It's not really creation ex nihilo.⁹ It's something that corresponds to a sort of emanation. In one of the Upanishads, the Chandogya Upanishad, the One says, "Bahu syam prajayeyti"—"Let us become multiple. Let us become many.”¹⁰ And it is he himself who makes himself many, who takes on forms, invisible forms, and a visible one after that.

⁸ Savitri is identifying Brahma, the creator, with brahman, being or the substratum of the universe, which Savitri also calls the One.

⁹ Out of nothing.

We have been in the Kali Yuga since about 3,500 BC.¹¹ It started then. It will last another perhaps two centuries. After the third or fourth World War—I don’t know—when the Dark Age will end, there will be a new world, few people. There will be Aryans and non-Aryans, all right. But the proportion between Aryans and non-Aryans will be better in favor of the Aryans. Because a great number of people will be dead. A great number Mongoloids will be dead. The best will survive. The Kali Yuga will last. We mustn’t expect the end tomorrow morning. We can expect for tomorrow morning only topical, that is to say, partial resurgences. Like in Germany. Germany was a partial resurgence, just for twelve years. It didn’t last. It couldn’t last in this era. This is a time when nothing good lasts. According to the laws of evolution, of manifestation, things don’t last, because the quality of the people is bad, and you cannot make a good omelet with bad eggs. Even the best cook cannot do it. The eggs are stinking. Now in this period, you have fifty stinking eggs and one good egg, all over the world, if you take the world population.

2. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF ADOLF HITLER

Hitler was a throwback, something that belonged to none of the ages. But his movement is typical of this Dark Age. If he had come in the Satya Yuga, in the Golden Age, in the past long ago, he would have been at home. They were all like him in those days. Everybody lived according to the laws of nature. He went against time. He went against the current of time, and he was one of the latest ones. There’s one that the Hindus are expecting, but not only the Hindus. The Christians say Christ will come again. Somebody will come. The Parsis say Saoshyant will come. Muslims say the Mahdi will come. The Buddhists say Maitreya will come. They’re all expecting somebody. If Adolf Hitler had been that somebody, he would’ve won the war. Even if he had the whole world against him, he would’ve won. But he didn’t win. The only reason why he didn’t win was that he wasn’t that somebody. He was the forerunner of the one to come.

He said it himself. He said it himself. He knew it. He knew what he was saying. He said it in 1928 in a conversation with Hans Grimm. He said, "I know that Somebody must come forth and meet our situation. I have sought him. I have found him nowhere; and therefore I have taken upon myself to do the preparatory work, only the most urgent preparatory work. For that much I know: I am not he. And I know also what is lacking in me."¹² And he knew he was going to fall. Kubizek tells that in his book, Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund.¹³ When he was sixteen he went with Kubizek to the theater and saw Rienzi, the opera.¹⁴ It was 1:00 in the morning. He came out of the theater, and instead of going home, he said to Kubizek, "Gehen wir zum Freinberg."¹⁵ The Freinberg was the mountain near Linz where they used to go spend their Sunday afternoons. At 1:00 in the morning! Through the fog. But Kubizek followed. They both went there, through the fog. Time came when they were on the summit of the Freinberg. The fog was below. You could see nothing but fog and stars. And then Kubizek says in his book, "Then he caught hold of my hand and spoke to me with words that cannot be re-told, so great they are, and he unfurled in front of me, his own future and the future of our German people." He was sixteen. He knew he was going to fall. He said, "Like Rienzi, I'll go up." Rienzi was a Roman of the fourteenth century. "I will be carried up by popular love, and I'll fall." He knew it. He couldn't do otherwise. He had to fight all the same, because a fighter is a fighter. Of course, he couldn't say that to the public. He had to do his job. And his job was this: Go against the current of time. Show that the Germans could go against the current of time. They are the ones. They are the best Aryans in Europe.

¹⁰ Chandogya Upanishad, 6, 2, 3.

¹¹ Savitri probably means 1,500 BC.

Not because they are the purest. Swedes—well, up to now—are equally pure. Now they are taking in all sorts of non-Aryans. There is a hateful Catholic organization here: Mother Teresa, supposed to be a lover of children. They gather all the children they can, and if you want ¹² Hans Grimm, Warum? Woher? aber Wohin? (Lippoldsberg: Klosterhaus Verlag, 1954), 14. On the tape, Savitri quotes only a fragment, in German. I have substituted her English rendition of the whole passage from The Lightning and the Sun, 430. She renders it in French on page 201 of Souvenirs et Réflexions.

¹³ August Kubizek, Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund (Vienna: Stocker, 1953); in English: The Young Hitler I Knew, trans. E.V. Anderson (New York: Tower, 1954), 96-98.

¹⁴ Rienzi is Richard Wagner's third opera. It is based on the life of Cola di Rienzi (c. 1313-1354), who became the popular dictator of Rome and would-be restorer of the Roman Empire. He was overthrown by a conspiracy of the aristocracy and the papacy, restored to power, then overthrown and killed in a popular uprising supposedly provoked by his own excesses. Wagner's opera portrays him as a popular leader undone by the Pope and the aristocracy.

¹⁵ Let us go to the Freinberg.

to adopt an Indian child you can. They adopted three hundred in Sweden last year. Only last year. Little girls and boys of low castes generally, as dark as possible. They adopted them. First of all, they are uprooted from their surroundings. They will never hear a word of Bengali or of Hindi again in their lives. They'll be Swedes. But they are non-Aryans. The masses of India are non-Aryans, and they'll probably marry Swedish girls and boys. You get the end of Sweden. These beautiful Europeans. And that's encouraged. That's encouraged by the Indian government. This government is nothing but under the impôts, under the orders, of the international Jew. There's strong Freemasonry here.

3. KNOWING THE FUTURE

My idea of the future is this: If one lives in the eternal present, one knows the future. One doesn't see it as we see it through reasoning, but one just is conscious of it. You have examples in history of this. One is the Grand Master of the Templar Knights and some of his followers.¹⁶ They were burnt alive, some say on the 11th, some say on the 18th of March, 1314. It is said that the Grand Master in the flames spoke and said, "I call you to God's tribunal, both of you, the Pope, Clement V, within a month, and the King, Philip the Fair, within this year." And it was true. They both died. The Pope died on the 9th of April and the King died on the 29th of November of the same year.¹⁷ How did that man know it? It was perfectly true. How did he know it?

Long before him, how did Confucius know about modern China? They say Confucius was asked by his disciples, "How long will your doctrine rule China?" And he said, "Twenty-five centuries exactly." After twenty-five centuries exactly Mao Tse-Tung came. With Mao Tse-Tung, the rule of Confucianism, the rule of the spirit of Confucius, was put to an end. The Chinese does not any longer live for his ancestors and in respect to his father and mother. He lives for the thoughts of Mao and the application of the thoughts of Mao. So he was right. How was he right? How did he know it? Why didn't he make a mistake of at least two or three centuries? He didn't. If he was on the margin, it was a margin of fifty years.

This is knowing the future. Unfortunately I have not that capacity. I don't live in the eternal present. To live in the eternal present, you have to be much higher than I am. Probably the Führer lived in the eternal present, because according to Kubizek he knew when he was sixteen he would rise and fall like Rienzi.

¹⁶ Jacques de Molay (1244-1314) served as the last Grand Master of the Knights Templar from 1293-1314.

¹⁷ Philip IV (The Fair) (1268-1314) reigned from 1284-1314 and died on 29 November 1314. Pope Clement V (Bertrand de Goth, archbishop of Bordeaux, b. 1264) was Pope from 1305-1314 and died on 20 April 1314.

But very few people do live in that way. For those who don't, well, the future is a matter of reasoning, of conjecture. Suppose this and suppose that. From the data of the present and from the data of the past, you do some comparisons and you try to deduce the future. But this is nonsense. Nobody can deduce the future from the present and the past. At least the far future. Perhaps the near future. And in small things of everyday. Supposing it is known that in the locality there is a shop that shuts on Monday. Well, I'm perfectly sure, practically sure, that if I go on Thursday, I'll find it open. That's very easy. That's the future, the very near future and a very paltry kind of matter. But to tell you whether there's going to be a war before the end of this century or not, nobody knows. Because any event in the future depends on many factors, and the most obvious factors are not always the most important. Not always the most important.

There was a very great speech or sermon of the Bishop of Meaux, Bossuet.¹⁸ He was known as one of those who spoke the most beautiful French. He is given to the children of the college, college boys and girls, to read for his French. And he used to give sermons on the deaths of great people. There is one famous sermon of his on the death of Henrietta Anne of England, who had married the brother of the King of France, Louis XIV.¹⁹ And she lived in Cromwell's day. And there's a passage of that sermon about Cromwell and about the trouble he had. He died of a stone, not in the bladder, but in the tube that goes down from the bladder to the lower parts of the body. In French it's called urètre.²⁰ Well, Bossuet says this stone, a tiny little stone, if it had been anywhere else in Cromwell's body, wouldn't have made any difference. But it happened to be just in that tube. And he died.

Now of course the death of Cromwell was something important in English history, and it was not foretellable. You couldn't see it twenty years before. Who knows what will happen to this person or that person? From a tiny little cause like this, a physiological cause. And that goes for the future. If Roosevelt had died twenty years earlier, world history would've been different. He could've died. Nobody knows. Life and death are in the hands of forces that we don't know anything about. World history would've been different.

¹⁸ Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1627-1704).

¹⁹ Bossuet's 1670 Oraison funèbre de Henriette d'Angleterre, on Henrietta Anne of England (1644-1670), wife of Philippe of France, Duke of Orléans (1640-1701), is not to be confused with his 1669 oration on the death of her mother Henrietta Maria of France (1609-1669), the wife of King Charles I of England (1600-1649, reigned 1625-1649), also mother of Kings Charles II (1630-1685, reigned 1660-1685) and James II (1633-1688, reigned 1685-1688) of England (Oraisons funèbres [Paris: 1689]).

²⁰ Urethra.

They say political assassination is generally useless when one wants to suppress a movement. The movement is represented by a man. One kills that man. Some other man appears. It depends. Political assassination is generally useless because it comes too late. It always comes too late. The knowledge that this man is dangerous is the cause of his assassination. If somebody, knowing the future, had known that when the man was a baby and killed the baby, history would've been different. Suppose somebody had killed Stalin when he was six. History would've been different. Or anybody, any great man. You know the great man too late, and you get rid of him too late. You need to have insight. To have insight, you have to live in the eternal present, and that's not the affair of most people. But if you lived in the eternal present and could know that this man's going to be dangerous for this purpose, and you want that purpose—you want that thing, you love the ideology or whatever you like, that state of things—and you want to get the man out, get him out as a child before he knows himself what he's going to do.

That's what I have to say of the future. So I cannot say anything about the future. I just don't know it. I'm not living in the eternal present. All I know is this: do, every one of us, what we can now. The future is made of many factors. One of the factors is now. And whatever one does, counts. Whatever one says, counts. Whatever one thinks, counts perhaps even more.

I actually believe that thought is a force.²¹ Thought is something that comes from our nerves. It's a sort of radiating force. It's waves, if you like. There are waves of thought. We emit waves. These waves have an effect. A very small effect, of course, smaller or bigger depending on the person. But it has an effect. I would say why don't you try to do one thing: Get together every day, or every two days, or every week, or twice a week at the same place and especially at the same time. Time is very important. And intensely think. Don't do anything else. Intensely think about what you would like to happen. You have to think all the same. All the people united in one place have to think the same thing.

²¹ Cf. Pilgrimage, 92-93.

Intensely think what you want the future to be. Intensely think of, say, something simple. How to change the status of the USA or of Canada or of North America. How to do it. Think that. Think, “Superior forces of the universe, help us to do this or that, to reveal the responsible people for the mess in which the Aryan race is now in, and how to get out.” I think that is useful.

I really think that the only thing we can do is to wait. Make ourselves strong, and create among ourselves a superior layer of people able to command, able to take the lead of the race one day in each country. People who are nearer in their daily lives to the ideals of the Führer than any others.

4. THE EXAMPLE OF THE FÜHRER

Study the life of the Führer. Study his ideals. There are certain things he never did. I really think he was quite right. For instance, the Führer was a vegetarian, a perfect vegetarian. He didn't smoke, and he didn't take any alcohol. How many of us do the same, what percent, how many? He didn't ask anybody to do it. He says in the Tischgespräche, “If I had made these items a condition of belonging to the NSDAP, I would've had nobody. Therefore, I could not make them a condition.”²² But he felt that they were things important in life. Of course, if you drink no alcohol your blood is pure, more pure, and you are stronger than if you do. It's artificial. It's a kind of drug. Of drugs, of course, he had no knowledge. No knowledge.

He gave up smoking when he was a boy. He said, “Isn't it a shame to spend money on cigarettes when I'm so much in need of butter?” He threw his last pack of cigarettes into the Danube in Vienna and bought butter instead of cigarettes. I think that was quite right. Of course, some people can buy both, but it is not good for the lungs. And the fact that people smoke necessitates and causes experiments to be done on poor dogs to see how long it will take for the poor dog to get cancer of the lungs by smoking. They put a kind of thing on his nose. He doesn't ask for it. He doesn't want to smoke. And they pour smoke into him. All these awful things are done because people smoke, and the doctors want to know about it. They should do experiments on themselves, or on smokers. Not on dogs. I'm absolutely against that.

The Führer forbade all these experiments. If you have to do them, do them on enemies. I would say better than that, do them on “lovers of science.” People who are in love with science, let them suffer for what they love. I would be glad to suffer, if at the cost of me being vivisected there would be, for instance, the reunification of Germany. I’d accept at once. I wouldn’t accept for anything else, mind you, unless it could be for the suppression of vivisection for all times to come and everywhere in the world. Then I would accept.

²² Hitler's Table Talk, 1941-1944: His Private Conversations, ed. Hugh Trevor-Roper, trans. Norman Cameron and R.H. Stevens (New York, NY: Enigma Books, 2000). I cannot locate Savitri's quote in this edition.

Another thing: the Führer used to consider that there was what he called “the sacred flame of life.” You get that in Kubizek’s book, Adolf Hitler, mein Jugendfreund. How, during his youth, during his preparation for life, in that den that was Vienna in those days, with all its temptations, he never fell for any temptation of a woman. He was strong. He wanted to keep his force for something better. Afterwards, when he was settled in life, whether he knew that kind of experience or not, I don’t know, and I think nobody can know. Nobody can tell. Nobody was there. But if he had it, it’s all right. All right. It was his own business. But he did not waste his energy, as so many people nowadays do, when he was young, when he could use it for something else. I don’t think he could’ve done what he did if he had wasted his time. It’s a waste of time and energy in anything one does without a real purpose.

Apart from that, he did not drink, although he was a man of a cold country. He never drank. He was not a tyrant. He was not a fanatic. He allowed people who did drink to come into his party, Robert Ley, among others. He didn’t tell Robert Ley not to drink. But of course, I think he would’ve appreciated him more if he had also been a tea-totaller. He took coffee. I don’t know if he took tea. I know he took coffee, the Führer. But coffee now and then. He didn’t make a habit of it. He didn’t intoxicate himself with any kind of thing. He kept his body as fit as possible.

People nowadays tell me that in the USA there are children of twelve who are already addicted to drugs. Why do they do it? I was offered morphine when I was seventeen in Greece by a Greek woman. I said, “No, I’ll never take a drug in all my life.” As far as alcohol, well, I took Samos wine and Malaga wine once or twice in my whole life. And once it played me a bad trick. It was a birthday party in Athens, and I brought a bottle of Samos wine. I like Samos wine. I like these old wines, cooked wines. I don’t like ordinary wine or champagne. Cooked wines I really like. I brought it to this young man, the son of one of my friends. And it was a party. There were Germans. There were English people. There were Greeks. And she said, “You brought the wine. You’ll have a little, just a little, a bottom of a glass, with us.” I said, “Don’t ask me to take any wine. I don’t put up with it. I get nervous, and I get—I don’t know what to say. I get excited. So don’t ask me.” “Oh, just a little bit. Just a little bit. Just a centimeter.” “All right.” I took a centimeter. And I drank it with delight. Although it burns. I’m not used to it, so it burns my stomach. But it was nice. Samos wine is very nice. And then, after this party, we were all asked to sing a song. And some Germans said to me, “Well, you know German, you must know German songs, sing a German song.” Well, I said, “All right.” And I sang, Wir sind die Sturmkolonnen.

Wir gehen drauf und dran.
Wir sind die ersten Reihen
Der deutschen Revolution.
Sprung auf die Barrikaden.
Der Tod besiegt uns nur.
Wir sind die Sturmkolonnen
Der Hitlerdiktatur!

[We are the storm columns.
We are the go-getters.
We are the first ranks
Of the German revolution.
Jump on the barricades.
Only death defeats us.
We are the storm columns
Of the Hitler dictatorship!]²³

I left out the greater part of the song. That is the beginning and the end. I sang that. Some people were delighted, but some were not. It would have been better if I had not drunk any wine at all. That’s what happens to me when I drink even a little wine, and I can’t control my speech. *In vino veritas.*²⁴ And that’s not the point. I don’t mind if a good person drinks a little bit of Schnaps for Christmas or something like that, on a great occasion. Christmas meaning the Winter Solstice, of course. It does no harm. But drinking every day and drinking too much. I know that in cold countries people drink a lot. You can put up with it in cold countries. You can't in hot countries. You can't in hot countries at all. You get ruined. But it's not so bad as drugs.

²³ The title of the song is “Wir sind die Sturmkolonnen.”

²⁴ In wine, truth.

I think the Führer's life was abridged at the end by the stuff Theodor Morell gave him.²⁵ He had confidence in Theodor Morell, as his doctor. I'll tell you the source from where I got it. I remember comrade F—,²⁶ SS-Sturmbahnführer who was imprisoned in Landsberg. I met him in Uelzen in 1953 when he was just liberated from prison. And he showed me a letter, a letter from Karl Brandt, to him—Karl Brandt was also a doctor, an SS doctor²⁷—telling him, “Please can you do anything for him? Can you help me in this way? I'm sure that Theodor Morell is just poisoning the Führer with all his medicines. Tell the Führer not to take that stuff, if you possibly can.” So be very aware. Of course he had confidence in this Morell. Unfortunately, they say he abridged his life. That's possible. I don't know. I can only speak of the letter I saw in F—'s hand, a letter addressed to him by Karl Brandt who was also a very high-ranked SS man and a doctor.

Another thing is the vegetarian question. I think it's better if you follow the example of the Führer in that way. Now you tell me that in cold countries it's difficult. It's difficult for some people. Myself, I never took meat. I didn't like it. I didn't like the idea of it. I didn't like the sight of the quarters of animals hanging in front of the shop. It used to disgust me. But I took fish when I was young. I took fish, not every day, once in a while. Once in a while, on festivals. Or when I went to see people who had fish. I didn't refuse. I had fish. And it was a struggle, an interior struggle on my part, to give up fish. Even now, sometimes, when I take some fish for my cats—take a box of sardines for my cats, for instance—I'm tempted to take the oil for myself. I love the oil, fish oil. They used to give me cod liver oil when I was a child. Some children don't like it. I used to relish it. I don't know why, but I used to relish it. They gave me a spoon, and I said, “Give me another ²⁵ Dr. Theodor Gilbert Morell (1886-1948) was Hitler's personal physician from 1937-1945. Hitler's life was, of course, “abridged at the end” by suicide, but Savitri's point was that Hitler's health was harmed by Morell's treatments. See David Irving, The Secret Diaries of Hitler's Doctor (New York: Macmillan, 1983).

²⁶ The name is unintelligible.

²⁷ Dr. Karl Brandt (1903-1947) was Hitler's escort doctor from 1934-1944, and from 1942-1945 was General Commissioner for Public Health and Sanitation. He was executed for his role in Hitler's euthanasia program.

spoon of it.” I liked it. Well, no accounting for taste, of course. The Führer gives us that example, neither meat nor fish. All right. If we can do it, I think it’s very good. It’s good for the health, and it’s good to feel that one is doing as the Führer did. I believe it.

And I believe it is also a good thing to feel that we are not contributing to the industry of the slaughterhouse. I’ve never been to Chicago, but I’ve read descriptions of the stock herds of Chicago with all the animals in a row and killed en serie, one by one.²⁸ They are killed by Negroes. But whoever kills them, they have a struggle of death, on a string, one after another. It’s horrible to think of. And these flows of blood. It’s disgusting. It disgusts me from an aesthetic point of view. Now there’s another point of view. In Europe, they are not Negroes who kill them. They are people of our own race. And to think that by eating meat, we are forcing some people of our own blood to do that disgusting work, killing creatures eight hours a day, and then going home. And to think that these people have wives and children at home. I wouldn’t like to be the wife of a slaughterer, but there are some women who are. And they’re our people. They’re our sisters, our sisters in blood. Could we not do something to suppress that obligation of some of our brothers and sisters in blood to do that dirty work? If we could do it, I think it would be a good thing.

Anyhow, the great idea behind that is the example of the Führer. I believe in him, and I believe that everything he did is something to look at. There’s something contained in it for our own discipline and betterment.

5. BABY SEALS

One thing also, there are certain things going on, especially in Canada. I cannot end this speech without saying that. It’s something that hurts me so much and still makes me shudder every time I think of it. We should follow the spirit of the Führer in every way. And one thing that would’ve made the Führer indignant, if he had known it, is that massacre, that mass massacre of seals on the coast of Canada. I’ve not seen it. I’ve seen pictures of it. And it’s more than enough for me. Poor baby seals, so beautiful, such trusting creatures that you can tame them if you like. Just killed. And how killed? A knock on the head, and their skin pulled off while they're alive, practically alive. Their skins stolen from them. To steal their skins, mass massacres of these beautiful creatures. Trusting creatures that do no harm to anybody.

²⁸ In Pilgrimage, Savitri mentions reading about the stock herds of Chicago in Georges Duhamel, Scènes de la vie future (Paris: Mercure de France, 1930); in English: America the Menace: Scenes from the Life of the Future (New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1931) (Pilgrimage, 85, n).

And one has the cheek of criticizing us for treating our enemies badly. And sometimes without us doing it. Take the Malmédy case. These SS men who were so tortured in prison that van Roden, an American of Dutch origin, had to come to Germany to investigate the case.²⁹ Some of them were not even in Malmédy, and some of them there had no part in the shooting of some American prisoners. They had nothing to do with it. And still, just because they were SS men of that same division or what, they were tortured in a most awful manner. They had to be condemned. Well, criticizing people for torturing, for using their enemies badly, and allowing in one's own country what goes on with the seals: that should be something to stop.

There were ten million seals. Now there are eight hundred thousand. Whatever is going to happen to the rest? I can see them. I can see them, see them skinned. I can see their corpses skinned, lying on the snow in pools of blood. Take away that sight. That's an awful thing. And what's even more awful than that, is to think that some Aryan men do it for two and a half dollars each. How can they do it? They are disgracing their race. Every Aryan who does something horrid disgraces his race. Disgraces his children first.

In old China, a man who did something wonderful was rewarded. He was made noble. His sons were not noble. His fathers were. His fathers were responsible for his birth. They were made noble. He was perhaps a peasant. He did something extremely good. And the Emperor gave him nobility. It went backwards. There were very many good things in old China.

There was another thing I can tell you of in five minutes, just in parentheses. You have a doctor when you are sick. You go to the doctor when you are sick, and you pay him for what he says. In old China you didn't do that. Every family had a family doctor. And they used to pay him a small sum as long as they were well. He didn't do anything. He just received the money from so many families, as long as these families, these family members, were all well. Once somebody fell sick, then they called the doctor. The doctor's pay was stopped. They did not pay him any more until the person got well. If he took a long time to cure the person, he had no pay. If he wanted his pay, he had to cure the person quickly. I find that much more reasonable than what we have now. He had an interest in curing the person quickly. Now a doctor has an interest in making the person stay sick as long as possible to receive some pay. Isn't it so?

²⁹ Judge Edward L. Van Roden reported some of his findings in his article, "American Atrocities in Germany," The Progressive, February 1949, pp. 21ff.

There was some wisdom in antiquity in all countries. And of course, among our own people—nobody has to learn from me these things—you all know of the wise women of the ancient Germans. There were wise women, in ancient Germany, four or five or six centuries, up to 30,000 BC, prehistoric Germany, prehistoric Europe, North of Europe. And they were very celebrated in the art of healing, as well as in the counsel they could give, in the advice they could give for governing. So, that much for history.

6. SEX, MARRIAGE, AND FAMILY LIFE

There's this widespread propaganda, in order to destroy our race—it's willfully done—propaganda of the excellence, of the indispensable character of sex. Even to children. Telling people that if you don't have that, well, what are you missing? And that is disastrous. That is disastrous, because it's one of the signs of the Dark Age. As said by the Hindu scriptures, if the marriage bond is no longer duty, but pleasure only and money, it's the beginning of the end. It's the Dark Age. And that's what they preach. They preach, "Enjoy yourself. You ought to have a good time. You're on earth to have a good time."

No, we are not on earth to have a good time. We are only individuals. We are on earth to serve that which is eternal in us, and the only eternal thing in anybody is the race. You are immortal if you have children. And children of your own kind. You are immortal if you have works. I don't say works that are known. In the old cathedrals of Europe, if you look at the sculptures, you have some little details that are perfect, as sculptures. The workman who sculpted those, sculpted that wonderfully eight hundred years ago, in the twelfth century, that man is immortal. You don't know his name, but he's immortal all the same. His work lasted. And the work doesn't last as long as the race. The race will outlive the work. Work is something that depends on climate. In a damp country, a sculpture will not last as long as in a dry one. But race, if it's kept pure, will last.

And that is the reason, of course, for the bondage of marriage, and it's not to be made a plaything. It's not to be made a pastime. It's a sacred thing for a purpose, in the spirit of the Führer. He said he was all for early marriage and for many children of good Aryan blood. He told the people that were not of perfect Aryan blood or who were deficient in a bodily way, “You can’t have children. You are not to have any. You can adopt an Aryan child.”

I like the propaganda of the NSWPP: “Adoption not abortion.” When they go picket in front of the abortion clinics and tell the people, “Don’t do any abortions of Aryan children. We are not so numerous, proportionately to the others. The Negroes multiply ten times as quick as we do.” In England also, and that’s a danger. That in itself is a danger. Don’t abort Aryan children. Let the mothers have them. The mother doesn’t want the child, all right. Find a couple without any children who is willing to take it. Or even a couple with children willing to bring it up as a brother or sister of their own children. Why not? Why not?

If I had money—I never had a fixed job, you see—if I had had a fixed job with a fixed income, I would’ve liked to adopt an Aryan child myself and bring it up in my own spirit. I would’ve inquired into the family. Failing that, when Mr. Mukherji had a job and when I thought it was stable—it wasn’t of course, but I thought it was in those days—I told him, “We are outside the pale of breeding and all that. We are faithful to the caste system, both of us. All right, we don’t want any intimacy and any children. But I wouldn’t mind adopting a little boy or a little girl of your caste, an orphan of good Brahminic stock.” He didn’t want that. He didn’t want to take the responsibility, probably feeling that his financial situation was not stable. In fact, after the war, he had no job at all. He had some kind of earnings during the war. But after the war, he no longer had any earnings at all. And he was right. He lived his last years on his astrology. And an astrologer in India doesn’t earn so much as that. There are so many astrologers here.

But I’m all for this propaganda: no abortion, adoption instead of abortion, quite good. And encourage people to have children, not one or two, but more if they can afford to bring them up decently. And what does it mean to bring them up decently? Bringing them up decently means: cleanly-lodged, I don’t say lodged in luxury; well-fed, as they need to be fed for their health; and given a good, sound education, a general education and an ideological education. And that’s all. It doesn’t mean to have a TV. You can live without a TV. You can live without a radio.

There’s our Kamerad in France, Marc Augier de Saint Loup, author of several books, and author of a trilogy on the fight for our ideology in Russia: Les Volontaires, histoire de la LVF, the Legion Volontaire Français; Les Hérétiques, histoire de la SS Charlemagne; and a third book called Les Nostalgiques, The Nostalgic People, very good books.³⁰ He has no radio in his house, and no TV. He doesn't want the appliances, just as I don't want them myself. I never had a radio. I listened to the radio during the war at my landlord's place. I only listened to one thing: the Führer's speeches. I never listened to anything else. And Mr. Mukherji used to come to listen with me, although his German was anything but good. But he wanted to hear his voice. That's all. But you can live without that.

Instead of spending so much on these kind of things, which after all are just propaganda, and the enemy's propaganda, why not spend that on an extra child? Have an extra child. It's very good. Have, I would say even, a pet. It's good for children to be brought up with a young animal. It teaches them to love creatures, to love nature. If you have a garden, plant something beautiful in your garden. It's a good thing to put children in touch with nature, to keep them in touch with nature. Teaches them to love nature, and love of nature is one of the things that Adolf Hitler had. Germany still, in spite of all the devastations of after the war, has one-third of its surface covered with forest. It's one of the very few countries in Europe that has that. Sweden of course. Sweden has a small population. But more simple living, not so much artifice, not so much uselessness in life, and more concentration on health, beauty, ideology, truth. Health, beauty, truth.

Well, that's what I believe for the future. And the only thing we can do now, I think, is to prepare ourselves by sticking to ourselves. That is to say, either not breeding at all or breeding people of our own race. Not breeding at all, if we have any defect. I consider a defect some mixed ancestry, or else some weakness. Personally I opted for this solution for myself. My mother is one of the daughters, one of the fourteen children, of a couple of first cousins. It's allowed according to the English church. They were Church of England, both of them, English people of old descent. My grandfather descended from a Viking of Jutland, who came to England in the tenth century. He was not a Christian, but then they became Christians, of course. They intermarried with the British people. They became Christians, those Vikings. When they became Christians, it was not forbidden to marry between first cousins. Well, it was not forbidden at least after the ³⁰ Marc Augier (1908-1990) was the author, under the pen-name Saint Loup, of the trilogy Les Volontaires, histoire de la L.V.F. [The Volunteers: History of the French Volunteer Legion] (Paris: Presses de la cité, 1963); Les Hérétiques, histoire de la SS Charlemagne [The Heretics: History of the SS Charlemagne] (Paris: Presses de la cité, 1964); and Les Nostalgiques, aventures de survivants [The Nostalgics: Adventures of the Survivors] (Paris: Presses de la cité, 1967), as well as many other books.

Reform of Henry VIII, when it became the Church of England. And my grandfather Nash and my grandmother Nash were son and daughter of two sisters. One of the sisters married a Nash, and the other sister married a Morgan. And they were the father and mother of my grandfather and grandmother. Well, the fourteen children all died as babies, except three. And of the three, one died at fifteen of tuberculosis of the lungs and tuberculosis of the bones. She had tuberculosis of her bones all her life, poor thing. Never married. The other aunt never married either, but she was strong. Always suffering from stomach pain, though. My mother is the only one who married, and she only had me. Well, I thought that with this heredity, it's not necessary for me to continue the line. So I didn't do anything to continue it. That's all.

7. DETACHMENT

Another thing is detachment. It is what I like immensely in the idea of the SS and especially in the idea of the élite of the SS, the Einsatzgruppen in charge of all the dirty work in defense of National Socialism, in Poland and Russia especially. We heard of it during the trial of Otto Ohlendorf. And I have the honor of knowing the family of Otto Ohlendorf. I was the guest of his widow several times, and I met his children when they were quite young.

Otto Ohlendorf was the head of Einsatzgruppe D. Of course he was condemned to death and hanged by the Americans with the other six of Landsberg in the night between the 7th and the 8th of June 1951, in spite of people asking to be hanged in his place or in the place of the others. Among those people was myself. I wrote to McCloy, the High Commissioner of America, in that connection.³¹ But there were better people than I. There was a Catholic priest who had been interned for anti-Nazi activities during the war in a concentration camp. He offered his life for them, on other grounds, of course, on grounds of Christian love. Whatever it is, they rejected his demand, and they rejected the demand of several other people in Germany, and they rejected mine. As a sign of stupidity, McCloy sent me a book about the career of the seven, and with a small letter, written by his secretary, of course. He wouldn't take the trouble of writing to me. "If you knew the career of this man, you wouldn't try to offer your life in the place of theirs, or even in the place of one of them." I'd gladly be hanged in the place of one of them, any of them. And I found that so stupid. Ridiculous, ³¹ John McCloy was US High Commissioner in occupied Germany.

laughingly ridiculous. I am a person who tells the people outright, “I am a National Socialist, and in the place of these seven people I would’ve done what they did, and perhaps worse. You don’t want to do anything unreasonable. You don’t want to do anything that would worsen your position in Germany. You have now the cold war with the Bolsheviks. You want to strengthen Germany against the Bolsheviks, your former Allies, your gallant Allies of before ’45. You’ll get the curses of all Germany for killing these seven people. If you kill one insignificant National Socialist from the other end of the world, who is not even a German, nobody would care. You will have Germany’s approbation because you saved the seven, and that would be all right.” They didn’t even listen to that argument, which was a very reasonable argument. They didn’t listen to me.

Otto Ohlendorf said in his trial—to come back to him—“If any of us showed pleasure in what he was doing or disgust, pleasure or disgust, he was degraded and sent home. We should act only on the ground of duty. We had to act with indifference, because we had an order, and Befehl ist Befehl, an order is an order. It’s our duty to obey the order. We obey, finished. We don’t think about it any longer. It’s finished, we do it, and we go do what we have to do later on.”

That is the spirit of the oldest philosophical poem written in Sanskrit by Aryans for Aryans. It’s the Bhagavad-Gita. The Bhagavad-Gita says, “You are a fighter by nature. You belong to a fighter’s race.” The lord Krishna, the god, tells that to the hero Arjuna. He has taken the shape, the form, of Arjuna’s charioteer to accompany him to the war. And Arjuna is reluctant to fight, because he is fighting his own kinsmen. Krishna tells him, “Take victory and defeat as equal. Take pleasure and pain as equal. Take success and failure as equal. Be indifferent, but throw yourself into the battle with courage in spite of that.” This is said in chant number two. In chant number four it is said that whoever acts—any kind of action, be it the most violent action—but not for himself, not for his personal interests, not for the interest of his family because it is his, not for the interest of his country because it is his, not for the interests of mankind because he’s a man, but purely in the interest of all living things in the universe, in the interest of the universe, and also, dispassionately, without any feelings or enthusiasm or passion, hatred, love, just because he feels it is his duty, his higher duty. He feels that it is not the duty of every man, because in Hinduism, all men have not the same duty. Duty is a matter of who he is and how he is to act. The duty of the priest is not the duty of the king’s minister. The duty of the warrior is not the same as the duty of a mother. Each one has his own duty, svadharma. Well, whoever acts in the name of his svadharma, his own duty, without passion, and in the interests of the whole universe, whatever he does, he does not sin. That action will not fall into his karma. That is to say, that action will not be a determinant factor in his next birth or his re-birth or his lack of re-birth. It will exist as though it didn't exist. He can do whatever he's told, or whatever is considered as his duty. That I find wonderful.

And that is the spirit of National Socialism. Otherwise, Otto Ohlendorf wouldn't have said in his trial to the face of the Americans, "We acted like that." He didn't tell them, "We acted in the spirit of the Bhagavad-Gita." They wouldn't have understood, first of all. Half of them don't know what the Bhagavad-Gita is. But he said the same, and I had the honor, at his house, to read a few letters of his written a few days and a few hours before his death, his correspondence with the Princess von Isenberg, Eleni von Isenberg. And I must tell you one thing, those letters are absolutely detached. He knows he's going to be hanged in a few days or in a few hours. He doesn't care. He couldn't care less. He has done what he could according to his conscience. He has done his duty. Fate is fate. That spirit, that spirit is our spirit. That spirit is our spirit. And I've seen it also in other National Socialists. Great ones have all the same spirit. It was cultivated especially in the SS, which was the élite of National Socialism, but it must be cultivated at every level if possible, to the extent it is possible. I really like these people.

8. ARYAN SOLIDARITY

I wouldn't criticize the Führer, but I criticize the people who tried to keep down Russia. They should've been allies of the Aryan Russians—Slavs, the real Slavs—not despise them. Slavs may be inferior to Germans, all right, but they are not non-Aryans. The real Slavs. And the real Slavs got on very well with the Germans in antiquity. Thor with his hammer got on very well with Perun, the four-headed Perun with his hammer, who was the god of the Poles and the god of the Russians, the Slavic equivalent of Thor. It's only when they became Christians of different churches that they started quarreling. They used to get on very well, the Germanic people and the Slavic people. Well, they should've tried today.

[I am told that there's a pan-Aryan movement in Russia.] It would be very good. It would be very good if they could take over Russia. There's a former SS French correspondent of mine who wrote to me not long ago saying the Russians should've packed off Marx and kept Stalin. Instead of that, they put Stalin into the dustbin and kept Marx. It was a mistake. Quite true. Quite true. Stalin at least was Russian, but his wife was Jewish and his brothers in law, the Kaganovich brothers, were Jews. His daughter was half Jewess.³² The Russians are conquered. Communism is Jewish.

[Some people say the Russians freed themselves of the Jewish yoke.] I don't believe that. As long as you have Jews at the top. At the top you have Jews there. Of course the Russians are anti-Jewish by nature. When Mr. Mukherji was in Russia, he had a friend called Ligachov. Ligachov was expelled from the Communist party for three years for calling a man who stepped on his toes in the tram a "dirty Jew." He said, "You dirty Jew." That was reported. He was expelled for three years from the Communist party. He was a Russian, not a Jew.

There are many things that we could take from the Jews. I very often said if we had some of the virtues that the Jews have, there wouldn't have been a Jewish question. And one of them is this: solidarity. If a Jew goes bankrupt, other Jews will bring him out, three times. He can be three times bankrupt. He will survive with the money of the other Jews. In my native town, there was a Greek who tried business and failed, the son of friends of mine. His father and mother gave him some money. He wanted to go into the cloth business. Well, the cloth market in Lyons, as well as everywhere else, is a monopoly of the Jews practically. This young boy failed. Oh, the other Greeks laughed at him. "Why did he try business when he was not fit for it?" That's all. "Why did he try business? Serves him right." Jews would never have said that of him. They would've picked him up once, twice, three times.

Now every Jew in Lyons, every Jew in Saint Étienne, France—I know those two towns very well—gives one-tenth of his income to Israel. If every person with an income—I wish I had one, I'm living on private lessons and have no fixed income—but if every person with an income could give even one-twentieth to these National Socialist organizations, to one National Socialist organization—it's a pity there are more than one—it would make a great difference. It would make a great difference. You cannot yet think of the head of the NSWPP becoming president of the United States. Why is that unthinkable? Why is it unthinkable, after all? Because you need an enormous quantity of money to get the television hours for the propaganda to be president.

³² Stalin was Georgian, not Russian, but Savitri's point was that he was not a Jew. Stalin's third wife, from 1934-38, was Rosa Kaganovich, the sister of Lazar Kaganovich (1893-1991) and Mikhail Kaganovich, both enthusiastic accomplices in Stalin's crimes. Stalin's daughter, Svetlana Alliluyeva (b. 1926), was from his second wife, Nadezhda Alliluyeva Stalin (1902-1932), who was apparently not a Jew.

9. ANTHROPOS AND MISANTHROPY

I am at home when I'm thinking of gods. I've never seen any gods, but I like to think of them. And the supreme. I'm at home with animals. I love all animals, especially felines. But I'm not afraid of them. I've caressed a tiger, a Bengal tiger three hundred kilos in weight, twice in my life. I put my hand in the cage in the Calcutta zoo. I gave a tip to the guardian. The guardian, the keeper, was green with fear. I said, "No fear. I'll give you a tip." And I put my hand in and caressed the tiger. I'm not afraid. If I were going into the cage, I wouldn't be afraid. I love them. I love felines.³³ And I don't mind serpents. I had two cobras in my house when I was living in Jallundhar. I used to give them milk. They never did a thing to me. I love trees, and I love that German characteristic that is love of forests and trees. That's perfectly Germanic. I think it's one of the reasons why I'm so much in love with the old Germany of former days, when the country was covered with forests, the Germany of Herman the Cheruscan.

Well, the only creature that I cannot love is the stupid, average two-legged mammal who doesn't think for himself. He's supposed to think. He's supposed to look upwards. Man in Greek is called anthropos. Now if you decompose the word anthropos, it means "the one who looks above." If he doesn't look above, he's no anthropos. He's no man. And the majority of people who call themselves men, they are not men according to the Greek etymology of the word. A man is supposed to think. That's what he's supposed to have more than the animals. He's supposed to think. Ask your neighbors, ask yourself, all those people that you are around, that are all around you, how far they think.

They tell you, "Yes, there were six million Jews killed in the war by your Führer. Six million. It was on the television." It's on the television, therefore it's right. And they have the cheek of criticizing the people of the Middle Ages who would tell you, "The priest said it, therefore it's right. The church says it, therefore it's right. The church says the world is flat, not round; therefore, the church is right. And Galileo's wrong." There's no difference. If you listen to what the radio says, because the radio says it, the radio is gospel or veda. And you listen to the television, and what the television says must be true. The television says the Führer is wrong. He must be wrong. That's not thinking.

³³ Cf. Pilgrimage, 316.

If a man doesn't think, he's no man. What we should develop among ourselves is thinking. And what is compatible with our National Socialist faith, and what is not compatible, we should know that. Try to analyze. We are given a theory or given a philosophy. We are asked to adhere to it, of course, by the one who does adhere to it. Is that philosophy compatible with our philosophy? And we should know our philosophy for that.

Nowadays, at least in this Yuga, and more and more as we go to the end of the Yuga, people are not, as a mass of people, race-conscious. And you can wash their brains so well that they can go against their race. I've seen pictures—I've never seen the thing itself, but I've seen pictures—of pro-Negro demonstrations in the USA, and half the people are White. What do those White people want in a pro-Negro demonstration for Negro rights? Of course, I have answered this long ago. And my answer is this: "All right, you are White and you don't mind supporting the Blacks. Well, I'm a two-legged mammal. I don't mind supporting the other animals. I'll be for the animals against you, against the two-legged mammals. I'll be for the trees and for nature against man. That is no worse than you being against your own race among men." But of course, among men, I'm for my own race. And I would say, more than that, I think that if I were not an Aryan by birth—well, already I'm not a pure Nordic—but I would support a Nordic. And if I were a mongrel, or if I were anything, a perfect non-Aryan, I think I would support the Aryan race all the same for the very same reason I support felines: because it's beautiful. Beauty is everything for me. Beauty is my god and goddess. Visible beauty first and, as it's said in the Banquet by Plato, "From visible beauty go up to invisible beauty, to truth without a form."³⁴ All right, but the basis is visible beauty. I'm all for beauty. And the first reason why I feel proud of being an Aryan is that in general—not myself, of course—but in general, the race is beautiful.

10. PROPAGANDA

You allow yourself to be brainwashed. I was brainwashed too. We were all brainwashed. In school: the French Revolution, the French Revolution, the French Revolution. I didn't have the time for it. I wouldn't have it. Who obliges you to think what people tell you? Who obliges you to bow your head to authority? Rise up, stick up—in your mind at least. You can say, “Yes, yes, yes,” for your job. I have a job at the United Nations here. I have a job teaching French to the personnel. If I say no, I would lose four hundred rupees a month, and I would have nothing to live on. I have to accept. All right. But even to my pupils, I tell them, “The United Nations is rubbish.” I tell them, and they say, “We think so the same, but we have to live. So we take a job here.”

³⁴ Plato, Symposium, 210a-211c.

And I could've had a very good job in 1946 at the United Nations in New York, recommended by the Greek Consul in Lyons, my native town, who told me so. And he said, “You can have a very good job if you like. You know several languages, and you can go there.” You know what I answered? I was rude to him. I said, “United Nations? That organization? I'd rather be the head of a brothel. Not do the work myself, but have it done by dirty girls, and have the profit. And earn even more than at the United Nations. But I don't like that kind of work, nor do I like the work of the United Nations. I'm not going to go there.” He said, “All right, as you like.”

